In the universities throughout the world are men who have earned money in the school of life and who are preparing to take up the various professions, such as law or medicine.

Such men spend from two to four years of time and a large amount of money in preparation for their new vocation, and then rarely enjoy an income of more than $1,200.00 to $2,000.00 a year.

There are exceptions of course, but the figures just given are above the average.

We are living in a commercial age and one in which the prizes go to those who can produce.

Opportunities of Graduates

The big prizes go to those who can produce through others, or, in other words, who can multiply their efforts through others.

This course of training will cost the student much less than the necessary training for the practice of the learned professions. It will cost less in time and less in money—much less indeed—and the earning power of the trained sales manager or teacher of salesmanship is much greater on the average than that of professional men.

The large department stores of the nation are many of them in need of permanent teachers of their sales people. Many of them desire women in this capacity. Our course of training will fit business women for lucrative positions in that line.

Register Now

It is essential that we know at an early date who will be with us in the class beginning July 1st.

The class will be limited. Not more than one hundred people will be accepted. They will be accepted in the order of registration and no favoritism shown.

Mr. Sheldon will conduct the first class personally, and while this class will mark but the beginning of a regular school along this line, it is not probable that Mr. Sheldon's time will permit his personal teaching of future classes.

Cut Out and Mail this Coupon Today

THE SHELDON SCHOOL,

Area—P. O. Libertyville, Illinois.

.....1910

Gentlemen—Will you please forward full particulars regarding The Sheldon Business Normal School, as advertised in THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER for June.

Name .....

Local Address .....

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

GET TOGETHER PAGE

In this page our subscribers will have the free use of a four line space for one insertion. In this space they may advertise themselves for sale or may advertise for the services of some one else. Others—not subscribers—to THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER will be obliged to pay 25 cents per line for classified ads. In sending in yours ads you should figure seven words to the line so that there will be no trouble over the insertion.

LARGE CATALOGUE GIVING CUT RATES ON all magazines mailed free for the asking. Royer Gross, publishers' representative, 415 E. Strawberry St., Lancaster, Pa.

SALESMAN WANTED FOR A PAINT SPECIALTY of singular merit which appeals to jobbers and dealers. Only A-1 trade acceptable. Address Box 26, care this magazine.

GOOD PRINTING CHEAP—1,000 BOND LETTER heads, 8½ x 11, $2.00; 1,000 good white envelopes, size 6¾, $1.50; 1,000 statements, 5½ x 8½, $1.50; 1,000 2 x 4¼ gummed shipping labels, $1.25; 1,000 gummed stickers, ¾ x 2, 50c; typewriter circular letters, $1.50 to $2.75 per 1,000. Larger quantities cheaper. Sample free. A. H. Kraus, 409 Chestnut St., Milwaukee, Wis.

STUDY AT HOME AND BECOME AN AUDITOR or public accountant. Our examination record has never been equaled by any school. Write for booklet, "Higher Accounting." The Shaw Correspondence School, Toronto, Canada.

LOCAL REPRESENTATIVE WANTED—SPLEN-did income assured right man to act as our representative after learning our business thoroughly by mail. Former experience unnecessary. All we require is honesty, ability, ambition and willingness to learn a lucrative business. No soliciting or traveling. This is an exceptional opportunity for a man in your section to get into a big-paying business without capital and become independent for life. Write at once for full particulars. Address E. R. Marden, Pres. The Nat'l Co-op. Real Estate Co., Suite 494 Marden Bldg., Washington, D. C.

EXPERT ADVERTISING MAN AND SALESMAN desires position with a growing concern—a chance to produce business. Possesses several years' experience as business manager. Salary only. Jno. H. Lettow, Kingston, Illinois.

SHELDON STUDENT, GRADUATE COLLEGE OF Hard Knocks, five and one-half years salesman in Mexico. Would consider first-class proposition in Spanish-American territory. J. B. Schorn, Hugo, Oregon.

SALESMEN WANTED—IF YOU ARE A CLERK with natural qualifications as a salesman, I have an exceptional opportunity to offer you. If you are a merchant going out of business and looking for an opportunity to go on the road, my proposition will appeal to you. I want two or three capable men with the work habit, and who have energy plus. I want men with ability to sell goods all day long. I require references, also send an abstract of your qualifications. I have an advertising specialty proposition that interests all progressive retailers. Hundreds of the best retailers have endorsed my plan because they have found it profitable. Samples will go in coat pocket. My best salesmen are making from $500 to $1,000 a month. I want men who can do just as well or better. If you are of the right caliber, think you can handle a high-class, ready-selling proposition, write me immediately before all territory is assigned. W. F. Main, Dept. 117, Iowa City, Iowa.

"MR. SHELDON STUDENT"—WE HAVE A FINE proposition for the new beginner to make big money. Write today. Smith Flavoring Extract Co., 144 Henry St., Grand Rapids, Mich.

WANTED—EXPERIENCED OFFICE AND SALES manager, a man familiar with general office work, and who can handle a corps of salesmen in a manner that will secure results, in a good line. Give age, experience and salary expected. Address, Manufacturer, care Business Philosopher, Libertyville, Ill.

OF INTEREST TO "A LIVE WIRE." Oregon has a finer "all-year-round" climate than any other state in the Union. No other state is as prosperous as Oregon. No other life insurance company does as large a business in Oregon as Oregon Life. All our men are high grade. They are doing well. We need more of the same kind. Perhaps you are one. No previous life insurance experience required if you are a salesman. Address L. Samuel, General Manager, Portland, Ore.

ONE OF THE LEADING OLD LINE LIFE INSUR-ance companies issuing exceptionally attractive policies will grant liberal contracts to agency managers to two or three men having records as producers, in the States of Missouri and Illinois. Address Dept. 108, Business Philosopher.

Now on Sale

For $30.00 a Suit

☞ About 500 patterns of English Worsteds and Scotch Tweeds reduced from higher lines to even up our stock.

☞ Early visitors will have largest assortment to choose from.

NICOLL, The Tailor
W. JERREMS' SONS
CLARK AND ADAMS STS.
CHICAGO

if you have advertising troubles I can help you

I make sketches, layouts and dummies or handle your advertising campaign complete. Write me.

Burton Gibbs Smith
Ⓢ ADVERTISING COUNSELLOR Ⓢ
1150 OLD COLONY BUILDING - CHICAGO Ⓢ

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

The author speaks from first hand of the decade in which Chicago reached the maturity of its first growth — Chicago Daily News

Bygone Days in Chicago

By FREDERICK F. COOK

THE COURT HOUSE, CHICAGO, IN 1860

THE WORLD is interested in Chicago, and there is no one who will not be interested in this, the most fascinating and informing book ever published dealing with the early life of Chicago. The prominent part that the city took in war preparations; the picturesque incidents and personalities of war-time days; the life of the "Under-world," then graced by a type of gambler which has disappeared forever, and a hundred and one vivid stories of the "Garden City," are here presented in a fresh and vigorous style by an old newspaper reporter, who writes for the most part from intimate personal observation.

Mr. Cook's pen pictures of the down-town life of the '60's are much more dramatically picturesque than the hectic survival of the same element that exists in the down-town life of today. — Chicago Journal

Illustrated from rare prints and photographs. 8vo, $2.75 net

Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Ill.

Sherwin Cody's Latest Book

How to Do Business by Letter

and Training Course in Business English Composition

The most successful book on letter-writing ever published, now in its 47th thousand, eleventh edition, though but recently published.

Contains over 125 model letters of all kinds, including a number of the most successful pulling letters used by prominent houses.

Also the Rules of Grammar complete, with all common errors; the Rules of Punctuation, Words Often Misused, Rules and Regulations of the Postoffice (correct to 1910), etc.

Price, postpaid, $1.00. See table of contents.

Sherwin Cody's Form Paragraph Letter-Writer

An indexed and gummed blankbook, full letter size, loose leaf, in which to paste form paragraphs to be used in answering all kinds of correspondence.

By this system an $8-a-week girl can write better letters than a $25-a-week correspondent, because she simply copies into her book the best paragraphs in the regularly dictated letters of the head of the business, and all letters are in his language, perfect in every detail of punctuation, grammar, etc., and may be signed by his name though he never sees the letter himself. This is a wonderful means of raising the quality of correspondence, as well as saving much time and expense. 80 gummed pages, 20 index pages, 100 pages in all; price, postpaid, $3; subject to approval and return at my expense.

Sherwin Cody's Compendium of All Card Systems

An instruction book on loose-leaf and card systems (the only book ever published clearly stating the simple fundamental principles of these systems), accompanying a neat box of 500 cards, size 3 x 5 inches, printed from specially engraved wax plates in the best style, representing 18 complete systems all ready for use, including forms for mailing lists, advertising, salesmen's report and route cards, perpetual inventory forms, cost systems, school forms, and loose-leaf and card ledgers of all kinds, for wholesale, retail, mail-order, instalment, and specialty businesses. Electrotypes of plates sold and directions given for printing systems at one-third the usual price. Price, complete, $3.00.

How to Make Advertising Pay

How to Write Letters that Pull

Office Salesmanship & Business Psychology

I have made a detailed personal study of forty-six leading lines of business: Manufacturing, wholesale, retail, mail-order, and specialty, and have taught presidents, secretaries and advertising managers how to make a success of their publicity—I know what will win in forty-six different businesses, yours among the number, and this information I give in my complete course, together with all the books and special features described above, with scores of others—everything I have for only $30, including twenty personal lessons. Write for complete catalogue.

SHERWIN CODY, LIBERTYVILLE, ILLINOIS

CONTENTS:

Using Words So as To Make People Do things.
How to Begin a Business Letter.
How to Close a Business Letter.
The Body of the Letter.
Applying for a Position.
Sending Money by Mail.
Ordering Goods.
"Hurry-up" Letters.
How Money is Collected.
Letters to Ladies.
Professional Letters.
How to Acquire an Easy Style in Letter Writing.
Two Kinds of Letters—Buying and Selling.
When to Write a Long Letter and When to Write a Short Letter.
Answering Inquiries.
Talking in a Letter—Colloquialisms and Slang.
Complaint Letters.
Condensation—Writing Advertisements.
Advertising and Follow-up Letters.
Display in Letter Writing.
Salesmanship in Letters and Advertisements.
Customs and Regulations of the Post Office.
Social and Official Forms; the Rules of Grammar, with Common Errors; the Rules of Punctuation for Business Office Use.

3000 GUMMED LABELS $1.00
 SEVERAL SIZES & STYLES
 PRINTED TO ORDER IN ONE AND TWO COLORS
 AT THIS AND EVEN LOWER PRICES. SEND FOR CATALOG
FENTON LABEL CO NINTH & THOMPSON STS PHILA. PA.

MAKE MONEY In Advertising or Mail Order Business. Send name and address and we will mail you three issues of the popular Advertisers Magazine. Each issue contains articles on Mail Order Business, Ad Writing, Business Correspondence, Selling Plans, Office Systems, Business Short-Cuts, Follow-up Literature, etc. Write today, as this is a very special offer. Address, ADVERTISERS MAGAZINE, 720 Commerce Building, Kansas City, Missouri.

Are You Looking for a Home

IF SO, don't buy before seeing a copy of the Real Estate Journal. It has hundreds of farms, city property and stocks of goods advertised in it and reaches 60,000 readers a month; 24 to 36 pages, colored covers. Ad rates 15c per line. 2c a word. 75c a year.

Two-Month Trial Subscription 10c

Farm and Real Estate Journal, Traer, Iowa
DESK K

What Some Well-Known Authors Say About

The Book News Monthly

"I have read The Book News Monthly for a number of years, and have found it intelligent and entertaining. In my experience, the comments have never been dull: they have seemed to me extremely competent. I regard The Book News Monthly as a useful medium of communicating literary intelligence, and as presenting judicial opinions on many of the books of the day."—Hamilton Wright Mabie.

"The Book News Monthly gives a sympathetic view of what is best in current literature, and renews interest in the good books of the past. It more than fulfills the modest promise of its title, and in that way is helping to make more readers and more intelligent readers."—Henry Van Dyke.

"The Book News Monthly probably surpasses any magazine in America in the number of books discussed and in the honesty and integrity of the criticisms. It is varied, comprehensive and sincere, and no other American monthly periodical is in this respect quite its equal."—Thomas Wentworth Higginson.

$1.00 a Year. Sample Copy
Sent Upon Request

The Book News Monthly
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Books that have Helped Thousands Develop Power to Make Greater Profits

THESE books will help YOU develop more power. Will teach you how to control your forces. Will show you how to inspire confidence. They are uniformly bound in green, printed on heavy book, contain over two hundred pages of helpful, inspiring, scientific, man-building advice. The simple, direct, concise language drives the lessons home at the first reading. Than these three the famous author of "As a Man Thinketh" has written nothing better.

—SEND THREE DOLLARS TODAY—

SHELDON UNIVERSITY PRESS, Libertyville, Illinois:

Enclosed find $.....Dollars.

Send me.....Copies (Mark the number).

....."From Poverty to Power"

....."All These Things Added"

....."Byways of Blessedness"

Name .....

City.....State.....

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

FIFTY CENTS

SECURES THIS GREAT REFERENCE BOOK

An entirely new, up-to-date, down-to-the-minute reference book, for bookkeepers, cashiers, accountants and business men.

This magnificent volume weighs nearly 6 pounds; contains over 500 pages, 200,000 words and 700 illustrations of forms and tables; beautifully printed on fine paper; handsomely and strongly bound; produced and presented to the business world at a cost which brings it within the reach of all; easiest for reference, plainest for acquiring information, and most economical when compared with all other publications of like nature.

It is Yours on Payment of Only Fifty Cents

down and the balance in monthly instalments of 50 cents or $1.00 as you prefer.

Monthly instalment price, $4.00 per copy; introductory special cash price (less 10 per cent) only $3.60.

In either case the expressage is prepaid to your address in the United States and Canada.

E. H. BEACH, Publisher, Detroit, Mich.

Make the Farm Pay

Complete Home Study Courses in Agriculture, Horticulture, Floriculture, Landscape Gardening, Forestry, Poultry Culture and Veterinary Science under Prof. Brooks of the Mass. Agricultural College. Prof. Craig of Cornell University and other eminent teachers. Over one hundred Home Study Courses under able professors in leading colleges.

250 page catalog free. Write to-day.

THE HOME CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL
Dept. 122, Springfield, Mass.

Prof. Brooks

A GOOD SHORTHAND REPORTER

is the only kind you can afford to employ. I am well prepared to handle all kinds of law and general reporting.

FRED H. GURTLE

SHORTHAND REPORTER

Phone Randolph 3038 810-811 Reaper Block, CHICAGO

Engraved Cards

Embossed Business
Stationery

Printed from Steel Dies
Send for Samples

We engrave a one-line plate

and furnish 100 engraved cards, postpaid. Engraved in script, $1.25; block, $1.50; solid Roman, old English or French script, $1.75; shaded old English or block, $2.00; shaded Roman or French script, $2.25. Cash to be sent with order. Best stock used. Monogram stationery. Wedding and business announcements.

The American Embossing Co., 192-69 Seneca St., Buffalo, N. Y.

SIGN AND SEND NOW

when you have received one number, if you are not satisfied, send us a postal and we will return your money.

DR. W. R. C. LATSON, the editor, the best known writer on health topics, is writing for Health-Culture three series of articles, each of which is well worth $1.00: "The Diet Question" all about "Meat-Eating," "Mixed Diet," "Raw Food," etc., some new facts; "Training for Maternity" should be read by every young woman who expects to be a mother and by young men also. It will help in the regeneration of the race; "The Effects of Taking Drugs," will be an eye-opener and will make the doctors sit up and take notice. "The Bearing, Feeding and Training of Children," by Mrs. V. Y. Garnett, will be found most helpful; besides other good things.

It is the best magazine devoted to the restoration and preservation of health without drugs. It teaches the proper use of Food, Air, Water, Exercise, Work, Rest, Recreation, Sleep, Dress, the Mental Powers and all that relates to the health and bodily development of men, women and children. One of the most valuable features is found to be Dr. Latson's answers to readers' questions every month on the recovery of health by drugless, home treatment.

It is opposed to Vaccination, Anti-Toxin and Serums and to Needless Surgical Operations. Fully illustrated. $1.00 a year. 10c. a Number. Sent "ON TRIAL" to new subscribers six months for 25c.

Money back if desired. Address HEALTH-CULTURE, 403 St. James Bldg., New York.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

HEALTH-CULTURE,
403 St. James Bldg., New York.

Gentlemen: Please send

HEALTH CULTURE

"On Trial" six months, inclosed 25

cents, to

Dr. Latson

ONLY 25 CENTS
USE THIS COUPON NOW

Own a Home in Area

HOW WOULD you like to live on the shores of one of the most beautiful of all the famous lakes of Northern Illinois, surrounded by hills and forests, near the campus of a growing university, and yet near enough to Chicago to attend to your business in that city every day?

How would you like to own a home where you would have all the quiet, comfort, cleanliness, and beauty of the country?

How would you like to invest a few dollars in real estate in a growing suburb, within thirty-two miles of the second greatest city in America—a city whose past growth and present prospects make it certain that it will be the greatest city on earth within two or three decades?

How would you like to live where your children can have the advantages of a school where they will be educated the Area way?

Well, now is your chance.

Last summer I opened up to private sale the Ravine View Subdivision of the Village of Area, Illinois. This subdivision is bounded on the north by the grounds and buildings of The Sheldon School, on the east by the campus of Sheldon Commercial University, on the south by the Libertyville road and the Libertyville branch of the Chicago & Milwaukee Electric Railway, and on the west by a portion of the village of Area. A number of lots were sold to my personal friends, but I reserved some of the best for this sale. In all, however, there are only a limited number. First come, first served.

These lots are fifty feet wide on broad streets, and run one hundred and fifty feet deep to a commodious alley. The land is slightly rolling, high, and well drained. Your home will be served with gas and electricity.

Area is about an hour's ride from Chicago by the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway or the Soo Line. Many people live in this neighborhood and go into Chicago to business every day.

Now Here is the Proposition

You can buy one of these lots at a very low figure and on easy terms. Then you can either hold it for the rise—and it will be a rapid one—that will surely come, or you can build your home on it and live in God's country.

Write and ask me about it, and I will tell you the particulars. But do it NOW. Tomorrow may be too late.

A. F. Sheldon, Libertyville, Illinois

Business Building Ideas For the Advertiser

Dollars and Sense

Do You Want More Dollars?

Do you want to increase your earning capacity? Then read Col. Wm. C. Hunter's famous book, "Dollars and Sense." Each chapter is full of plain, common-sense business philosophy and can be applied to any business. It deals with the real problems in your every day work. Written by a man schooled by years of real, live, actual experience in the business world.

48 of the 157 Subjects Treated in "Dollars and Sense"

Advertising
Advice
Ambition Anger Argument Associates
Backbone and Wishbone Brains, Birth, Boodle
Buying
Catching Up Compensation Competition
Credit
Discontent Elimination Employees Enthusiasm Expenses
Financing
Fixed Charges
Foreword
Generalists
Get Away
Good Fellowship
Hard Times
Hard Work Health Honesty
Horse Sense Independence Initiative
The Manager
Memory Night Work Obedience Optimism
Patience
Pay Day
Producers Promises
Salesmen Saving
Selling
Short Letters
Sizing Up Things Specialists
Speculation

If you are interested in or engaged in advertising in any form—if you are conducting any business enterprise which can be enlarged by the judicious use of printer's ink—if you are merchant, manufacturer, publisher, executive officer, salesman, salesmanager—if you are an employee, and wish to make yourself invaluable to your employer—then you can't afford not to read each month the

Advertisers Magazine

The Foremost Publication of its Class

Its 84 to 132 pages each issue contain articles of such interest that, no matter how busy you are, you will find time to read them. Filled with money-making ideas, business-building plans, enthusiasm-producing talks, business short-cuts, etc., THE ADVERTISERS MAGAZINE keeps tab on what is going on in the advertising and business world, tells you what the leading thinkers, writers and business men are writing and doing, and brings to you each month vital information whose money value cannot be compared with the trifling cost of the magazine.

Here is Our Big Special Offer

We want to secure as subscribers to the Advertisers Magazine every live, alert business man in America who is in any way interested in advertising or selling. To secure them we make this special offer:

One year's Subscription to Advertisers Magazine (12 issues)
Book "Dollars and Sense"
Book "How to Successfully Conduct a Mail-Order Business"
Three back issues of Advertisers Magazine

All For
$1.00

The three back issues of the Advertisers Magazine we will send you will be of recent date, containing splendid articles on business-building and advertising by such well-known authorities on advertising and business as J. B. Dignam, Ernest M. Mansur, E. F. Gardner, Frank Van Camp, A. E. Edgar, Franklyn Hobbs, Robert C. Brown, Arthur Bumstead, Hugh Chalmers, St. Elmo Massengale, and others.

Cut out the coupon below and take advantage of this special offer today. We guarantee you will be entirely satisfied or refund your money. Act today. Address

ADVERTISERS MAGAZINE

720 Commerce Building Kansas City, Missouri

ADVERTISERS MAGAZINE

720 Commerce Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

For the enclosed $1.00 you will please enter my subscription for one year and send me by mail the two books, "Dollars and Sense" and "How to Successfully Conduct a Mail-Order Business." Also send me three back numbers of Advertisers Magazine.

How to Successfully Conduct a Mail-Order Business

Money-Making Information for the Advertiser and Mail-Order Dealer

This book covers every phase of the mail-order business. In a condensed form you get the valuable experience of successful mail-order dealers. If you want to know more about mail-order business or advertising, read this book. Over 50 different subjects discussed.

Partial List of Contents of Mail-Order Book

Mail-order business—its advantages.
Possibilities of trading by mail unlimited.
Is this line of business already overdone?
Why failures are made in mail-order business.
What class of goods should be handled?
Selling toilet articles by mail.
An inexpensive way of increasing your sales.
Advertising to the farmer.
Does it pay to buy names and addresses?
Some mail-order schemes.
Mail-order correspondence schools.
The "Follow-Up" system.
How to develop business by letter-writing.
Hints on form letters.
How long should "Follow-Up" be continued.
Rudimentary facts about advertising.
Small advertisements and large ones.
Class of mediums to be used.
Selling medicine by mail.
Keying advertisements.
Card Index System.
Helpful hints for the Mail-Order dealer
Repeat orders make profit; how to get them.
Selling goods on easy payments.
Conducting an installment payment business by mail.
Complaints and what to do with them when received.
Where to purchase supplies.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Automatic Paper-Fastener

Fastens 25 sheets
with one blow.

Cash with order $1.50
post paid.
This price includes
500 staples.

The Hotchkiss Automatic Paper-Fastener uses a single strip on which there are 25 staples. These staples when inserted into the machine are automatically cut off and fed forward, accurately and without failure. The staple is always ready to be driven and a single blow will suffice to drive it through 1 to 25 sheets of paper, and with the same movement feed forward the next staple.

Useful not only for papers, but for fastening samples of silks, laces, dress goods, etc., being neater than any other method of binding.

Place the machine on a solid foundation, insert the papers to be stapled, and strike the plunger a quick, sharp blow with the hand.

Agents wanted to sell our line of office supplies
Send for Catalog

National Office Supply Company
ZION CITY, ILLINOIS

The Problem of the Advertiser

is to be economical and at the same time extend his reputation to reach from coast to coast.

If you have for sale any article used in the office or school room it will pay you to consider the

Progressive Stenographer

A Monthly Magazine for the Business Man, Stenographer, the Teacher and the Student

$1.00 a Year. Trial, 3 Months for 25c

There are more than 125,000 stenographers in the United States, spending weekly more than $500,000.

We don't reach them all but we do reach a large percentage of them.

Fifty thousand (50,000) business schools offer a large field worthy of your consideration.

If YOU want some of this business write us for rates, etc.

The Progressive Stenographer Pub. Co.
31 South Howard Street, Baltimore, Maryland

$100 in Gold Given Away

A GENUINE bona fide offer. Read our proposition. Are you a smart speller? We give $100 in gold and other prizes named below to those able to make the largest list of words from the words The Rountree Publishing Company. You can make at least twenty, we believe, and if your list is the largest you will get the greatest prize. In case of a tie, prizes will be divided between highest contestants. Here are the rules to follow: Use only words in the English language. Words alike, but with different meanings can be used but once. Use any dictionary. Pronouns, nouns, verbs, adverbs, suffixes, adjectives, proper nouns, allowed. Anything that is a legitimate word will be allowed. This is the way: Heart, temple, rain, only. Use these words and arrange alphabetically. The following is a list of the prizes:

$25.00 for the largest list of words as above. $20.00 set of Encyclopedia, second largest list. $15.00 third largest list. $12.00 set of dishes, fourth largest list. $10.00 Mission Lamp, fifth largest list. $10.00 cash, sixth largest list. $5.00 cash, seventh largest list. $2.00 each to the next twenty-two highest. Subscriptions to the Dixie Home one year to the next hundred highest.

We want you to know The Dixie Home, which is one of the brightest and best illustrated magazines in the world, and it is for this reason that we offer these premiums. We make no extra charge for the privilege of entering this word-building contest. To enter the contest it is necessary for you to send us fifty cents or subscription to the Dixie Home for one year, with your list of words. List should be sent at once. The lucky names will be published later. This is a great offer to those who take an interest in such contests.

— Address —

"Contest Editor," Dixie Home, Dept. 13, Birmingham, Alabama

THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

Ask For Book You Want

Place check in square below indicating number of book desired; write name and address on lines below and forward, with 10 cents postage attached, and the book is yours—without further expense or obligation, of course.

- 1—THE ART OF FINANCIERING
(Showing how business men may raise capital for business projects)
- 2—FINANCIAL HAND BOOK
(For promoters, fiscal agents and brokers)
- 3—BUSINESS BUILDING BY CORRESPONDENCE
(For the man who uses circular letters)
- 4—THE SELLING FORCE AND THE SELLING FARCE
(Showing why the great majority of selling plans do not pay)
- 5—THE GREAT LAW OF AVERAGE
(A new principle discovered by a business expert, bringing certainty to business affairs)
- 6—HOW $250 MAY RAISE $200,000
(For the man with a real opportunity)

If more than one book is desired add 10 cents additional for each extra book. Money refunded if not perfectly satisfactory. Each book conveys a message. Each tells something new and valuable.

The Business Development Co. of America

|   |   |   |   |   |   |                                               |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|-----------------------------------------------|
| 1 | 2 | 3 | 4 | 5 | 6 | Founded 1901119 NASSAU STREETNEW YORK |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|-----------------------------------------------|

These books sell for 10 cents a copy and are worth $10 a copy. We advise our readers to send for them. Editorial extract from American Banker of March 5, 1910.

Prof. Genung
English

HOME STUDY COURSES

Over one hundred Home Study Courses under professors in Harvard, Brown, Cornell and leading colleges. Academic, and Preparatory, Agricultural, Commercial, Normal and Civil Service Departments. Preparation for College, Teachers' and Civil Service Examinations.

250 page catalog free. Write to-day.

THE HOME CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL
Dept. 105, Springfield, Mass.

I Will Make You Prosperous

If you are honest and ambitious, write me today. No matter where you live or what your occupation, I will teach you the Real Estate business by mail; appoint you special Representative of my Company in your town; start you in a profitable business of your own, and help you make big money at once.

Unusual opportunity for men without capital to become independent for life. Valuable book and full particulars free. Write today.

National Co-operative Realty Company
118 MARDEN BUILDING, WASHINGTON, D.C.

Dr. Campbell
Principal

NORMAL COURSES

Our Home Study Courses for teachers prepare for Certificates of every grade. Special courses in Pedagogy, Psychology, Primary Methods and Kindergarten. We assist in securing positions.

Over one hundred Home Study Courses under Professors in Harvard, Brown, Cornell and leading colleges. 250 page catalog free. Write to-day.

THE HOME CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL
Dept. 78, Springfield, Mass.

French Lick Springs

is an all year round resort, famed for its healing waters and the out of door attractions of its climate and scenery. The thousand acres of natural park, walks, drives, golf and other outdoor amusements are charming any season. Hotel is modern in every respect, affording accommodations for 700 guests, with home comforts; all sleeping apartments are outside rooms, light and airy. The winter climate, while crisp and bracing, is dry, sunny and thoroughly enjoyable, and a stay of two or four weeks will prove very beneficial.

French Lick Springs Waters

possess medicinal properties unequalled for the treatment of stomach, liver, bowel and kidney diseases.

Pluto Concentrated Spring Water

is recommended by Physicians everywhere and sold at all Drug Stores, in half pint and quart bottles, costing 15c and 35c.

Write for booklet giving full information concerning the hotel, waters, etc.

French Lick Springs Hotel Co.

THOMAS TAGGART, Pres., French Lick, Indiana
ON THE MONON AND SOUTHERN RAILWAYS

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

SAVE YOUR OLD RIBBONS

MULTIGRAPH OR WRITERPRESS

They're Worth Money

There's no more reason for throwing them away because the ink is exhausted than there would be for throwing away your fountain pen when it's empty. Will you let us prove it and save you 50 per cent.?

Write at once for complete information and "Take No Risk" Trial Offer.

ROCHESTER RE-INKING WORKS

(Incorporated).

18 EXCHANGE ST., - ROCHESTER, NEW YORK, U. S. A.

Could You Sign This Check?

Eight years ago I certainly couldn't. I was making $15 a week. $2250 for a luxury was as far away from me as the presidency of the United States. I can do it now with good grace, and no one left me a fortune, either. I started in business for myself and the $2.25 I spent for my first stationery was a big item. I started a Collection Business on my own ideas, in a corner of a room in my flat. It grew and grew until I found myself owner of a big business. Then I discovered room for thousands in my business all over the country, and I founded a school to teach others my success with the mistakes and delays cut out—and the success of my school is the reason that a

|                                                  |  |
|--------------------------------------------------|--|
| DETROIT, $1 - 19 0 No 1031 |  |
| THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK                          |  |
| PAY TO THE ORDER OF                              |  |
| Detroit Automobile Company $2,250.00     |  |
| Twenty Two Hundred &amp; Fifty DOLLARS    |  |
| W. A. Shryer                              |  |

$2250 automobile is only one of the many good things I can now afford.

What I have done I can tell you how to do if you will meet me half way and ask the question.

W. A. SHRYER, President

American Collection Service

337 State St., Detroit, Michigan

W. A. SHRYER, President

American Collection Service, 337 State St., Detroit, Mich.

Sir: Without any obligation on my part, answer the question, "How may I build up from nothing a money-making Collection Business?"

Name .....

Address .....

A $100 Typewriter for 17 cents a Day

Please read the headline over again. Then its tremendous significance will dawn upon you.

An Oliver Typewriter—the standard visible writer—the $100 machine—the most highly perfected typewriter on the market—yours for 17 cents a day!

The typewriter whose conquest of the commercial world is a matter of business history—yours for 17 cents a day!

The typewriter that is equipped with scores of such conveniences as "The Balance Shift"—"The Ruling Device"—"The Double Release"—

"The Locomotive Base"—"The Automatic Spacer"—"The Automatic Tabulator"—"The Disappearing Indicator"—"The Adjustable Paper Fingers"—"The Scientific Condensed Keyboard"—all

Yours for 17 cents a Day

We announced this new sales plan recently, just to feel the pulse of the people. Simply a small cash payment—then 17 cents a day. That is the plan in a nutshell.

The result has been such a deluge of applications for machines that we are simply astounded.

The demand comes from people of all classes, all ages, all occupations. The majority of inquiries have come from people of known financial standing who were attracted by the novelty of the proposition. An impressive demonstration of the immense popularity of the Oliver Typewriter.

A startling confirmation of our belief that the Era of Universal Typewriting is at hand.

A Quarter of a Million People
Are Making Money with

The OLIVER
Typewriter
The Standard Visible Writer

The Oliver Typewriter is a money-maker, right from the word "go." So easy to run that beginners soon get in the "expert" class. Earn as you learn. Let the machine pay the 17 cents a day—and all above that is yours.

Wherever you are there's work to be done and money to be made by using the Oliver. The business world is calling for Oliver operators. There are not enough to supply the demand. Their salaries are considerably above those of many classes of workers.

"An Oliver Typewriter in Every Home"

That is our battle cry today. We have made the Oliver supreme in usefulness and absolutely indispensable in business. Now comes the conquest of the home.

The simplicity and strength of the Oliver fit it for family use. It is becoming an important factor in the home training of young people. An educator as well as money maker.

Our new selling plan puts the Oliver on the threshold of every home in America. Will you close the door of your home or office on this remarkable Oliver opportunity.

Write for Further Details of Our Easy Offer and a Free Copy of the New Oliver Catalog. Address—

The Oliver Typewriter Company
The Oliver Typewriter Building : Chicago, Illinois

WHEN IN DETROIT STOP AT HOTEL TULLER

New and Absolutely Fireproof

Cor. Adams Ave. and Park St.

In the center of the Theatre, Shopping
and Business
District.

Has large Convention Hall.

Has grand Roof Garden Cafe.

Music from 6 P. M.
to 12:30 A. M.

Every Room has Private Bath

EUROPEAN PLAN

RATES: $1.50 PER DAY AND UP

L. W. TULLER - - Proprietor

THESE SIX BOOKS

Tell How $2.00 Grew
Into $250,000.00; Yours
for $4.50

The men who wrote these business books have built up the largest business of its kind in the world, and when they were doing it they were everlastingly applying the very same principles that they have driven home in the chapters of these books. And you are to get all the benefits of their years of experience for $4.50.

Now, if these men built up a quarter of a million dollar business by knowing how to make every letter they sent out an order clincher and if they are willing to impart their methods, why can't you profit by their experience? Wouldn't a little more of this letter-writing skill be beneficial in your business? It would accomplish the very plans you have in view.

FOR THE BUSINESS MAN: It will open his eyes to the possibilities of more business. FOR THE ADVERTISING MAN: It will increase the percentage of orders from the inquiries his advertising has brought. FOR THE PROFESSIONAL CORRESPONDENT: This work will be a constant reference. Send us a money order, P. O. order, or check for $4.50, with your name and address plainly written. We will send the five books immediately, prepaid. If you don't find them worth their weight in gold, send them back.

Publicity Pub. Co., Dept. 24, Page Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

The United States Government Endorses "RED CEDAR" as Moth-Proof Wood

We quote as follows from a letter written us by the Department of Agriculture, under date of Nov. 13, 1909:
"Red Cedar is the most useful wood in the United States for the manufacture of Cedar Chests. The wood is close-grained, and has a delicate, agreeable fragrance which is especially marked. Its odor is disagreeable to insects, and for this reason chests and closets of cedar are highly valued as storage places for garments subject to the ravages of the moth and buffalo bug. Neither Libiodrus decurrens nor Chamæcyparis lawsoniana (the latter known as Port Orford or White Cedar) compares with the Red Cedar of the East, in the manufacture of Chests."

Our Chifforobes are the only ones in America that are made of RED Cedar. Style No. 107, which is shown in the picture, is as magnificent and useful a piece of furniture as was ever built. It combines the advantages of a Wardrobe and Chiffonier. Dimensions are: 62 inches high—48 inches wide—and 24 inches deep, which makes the wardrobe section sufficiently high for hanging garments, while the drawers will easily hold ladies' hats. Comes in dull finish or in a hand-rubbed piano polish, and has the appearance of mahogany.

Usable for Men's and Women's Apparel

TRY IT FOR 15 DAYS—ON APPROVAL

We guarantee this Chifforobe to be absolutely Moth-Proof. It will eventually pay for itself by saving the expense of cold storage on furs and other apparel. No camphor or moth paper is required. The construction throughout is of RED Cedar, which is the only moth-proof wood in the world. The doors fit so perfectly as to make the Chifforobe practically air-tight. For a birthday or a wedding present a more appropriate gift could not be selected. We sell DIRECT from our factory to the public, thereby eliminating the middleman's profit.

Catalog "B," which is beautifully illustrated, tells more about this splendid Chifforobe—also about our many styles of Cedar Chests. May we mail you a copy, free and postpaid? Write us TO-DAY.

PIEDMONT RED CEDAR CHEST CO., Dept. 91, Statesville, N. C.

A MAGAZINE OF

NOT NEW NOT OLD
JUST

64 PAGES OF UPLIFT
IS FOUND EACH MONTH IN

WE WILL MAIL
YOU A SAMPLE COPY
IF YOU SEND A
2¢ STAMP TO

THE LARGEST MAGAZINE PUBLISHED IN ITS FIELD IS

DO YOU NEED INSPIRATION?
THEN READ

YOU WILL FIND
THE BEST WRITERS ON PROGRESSIVE SUBJECTS IN

IF YOU WISH TO RETAIN OR REGAIN HEALTH READ

THE PHILOSOPHY OF LIFE IN GENERAL DISCUSSED IN

FOR SALE
BY FIRST CLASS
NEWSDEALERS

I T O
U
G
H
T

ADDRESS

MAGNUM
BONUM COMPANY

4663 A LAKE AVENUE
CHICAGO

PRACTICAL PSYCHOLOGY

Study Law at Home

THE oldest and best school. Instruction by mail adapted to every one. Recognized by courts and educators. Experienced and competent instructors. Takes spare time only. Three courses—Preparatory, Business, College. Prepares for practice. Will better your condition and prospects in business. Students and graduates everywhere. Full particulars and

Easy Payment Plan Free

The Sprague Correspondence School of Law
684 MAJESTIC BLDG., DETROIT, MICHIGAN

Relieve Your Memory

Depend on this convenient, useful, gentleman's memo book to keep your dates, figures, names, memos, etc., in better, neater style.

Bennett Everlasting Memorandum Book

—leather cover, 3.3-4 x 8 inches, pocket for cards, removable pads—the most convenient. Price complete with your name stamped in gold on the cover and four inside pads, only . . . . . $1.00

Send no money Simply send us your name and we will forward the book with your name printed. If satisfied, send us our $1.00. If not, return the book. Send today.

W. W. BENNETT CO.

Box 146, East End

Pittsburg, Penn.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Financing an Enterprise

By FRANCIS COOPER

TWO volumes that have helped hundreds of men win fortunes by showing them how to successfully finance and promote their business or their discoveries. Highly endorsed. Only successful work on promotion.

Volume 1 describes conditions necessary for successful financing; how to investigate, protect and capitalize an enterprise; experimental work and model making.

Volume 2 tells best methods for securing money, privately, or publicly, by advertising; how to advertise, how to write a winning prospectus. Important chapters on stock, bonds, incorporations, etc.

—Invaluable knowledge gathered from fifteen years' experience. Save you hundred times its cost. Full descriptive circular if you want it.

600 pp. 1909 ed. Buckram binding. Two vols., $4.00 prepaid. Either vol. separately, $2.00 prepaid.

SHELDON UNIVERSITY PRESS
LIBERTYVILLE, ILLINOIS

Save Money on Your Office Supplies

You Want the Best Because the Best is Always the Cheapest

¶ But you can get the best at a lower price than you are now paying by cutting out middlemen's profits—buying direct from the manufacturers.

¶ You want reliable service, satisfaction guaranteed or your money back. You get all that when you buy of us.

¶ Give us a trial order of three of the best typewriter ribbons for $1.50, post-paid, or three hundred sheets of high quality carbon paper for $3.00 and you will be convinced.

¶ Send for our latest catalog and special list of bargains.

AGENTS WANTED

National Office Supply Company
Lock Box N, Zion City, Illinois

Merchants—Lend Us Your Ears

DID you ever stop to consider that you may be buying goods from manufacturers and jobbers who are hooked up tighter than a tick to the mail order houses. A large number of the large wholesalers throughout the country are owned body and soul by the catalog houses and whenever you purchase goods from them you are aiding the ever present mail order evils.

You would not do this if you knew it, would you?

Don't you think it would be a good thing to know?

We can tell you. We are the only publication in the country that absolutely knows.

After twelve years of work along this line we are prepared to tell you what firms are doing a legitimate business and who otherwise.

Get Into the Game—Know What You are Doing Don't Buy in the Dark

Get Next to The Commercial News of Sioux Falls
Send for a Copy, 25 Cents—See if You Don't Like Our Style of "Dope"

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

The Microbe, Discontent

By HAROLD A. HOLMES, President

DISCONTENT is a microbe that does great injury to some people, and is exceedingly beneficial to others. Its action depends entirely upon the condition of one's mental attitude. ¶ If it sours the disposition, breeds jealousy, unbalances sound judgment, ferments the mind into a mad passion for quick riches; or if it urges you to undertake things, overnight, that need years of mature effort to accomplish, then it is doing you great injury and should be banished from the system. ¶ If it kindles a healthy ambition, if it inspires you to do good work today so that better things can be accomplished tomorrow; or if it gives a clearer vision of the great future to be attained, coupled with a willingness to do the necessary climbing, then it is exceedingly beneficial to you and should be nourished and encouraged.

The Caxton Magazine is a periodical for discontented folks, and is filled with inspiration for ambitious minds. ¶ It is not intended for lazy people, and the indolent ones do not enjoy it. It prints straight-from-the-shoulder stories about men and women who are rendering quality service—Tells What they are doing—How they are doing it—Why they are succeeding—and How you can learn from them and apply your knowledge. ¶ Discontented folks can get more real help out of The Caxton Magazine than they can obtain for a hundred times the cost anywhere else.

Send us one dollar, and receive The Caxton Magazine for twelve months. Read the first number, and if you do not get ideas that are worth more than the cost for a whole year, tell us, and your dollar will be promptly returned. You run no risk—so send the dollar today. This is the magazine that you will eventually subscribe for.

The Caxton Society, Pittsfield, Mass.

The Caxton Society _____ 1910
Pittsfield, Massachusetts

Enclosed find one dollar for which send The Caxton Magazine for twelve months. It being understood that if I do not like it, you are to return my dollar promptly.

_____

SHEL _____

Will You Accept This Business Book if We Send it Free?

*Sign and Mail the Coupon Below.
Send no Money! Take no Risk!*

One hundred and twelve of the world's master business men have written ten books—2,079 pages—1,497 vital business secrets, ideas, methods. In them is the best of all that they know about

- |                |                     |                            |
|----------------|---------------------|----------------------------|
| —Purchasing    | —Salesmanship       | —Position-Getting          |
| —Credits       | —Advertising        | —Position-Holding          |
| —Collections   | —Correspondence     | —Man-Handling              |
| —Accounting    | —Selling Plans      | —Man-Training              |
| —Cost-keeping  | —Handling Customers | —Business Generalship      |
| —Organization  | —Office Systems     | —Competition Fighting      |
| —Retailing     | —Short-cuts and     | and hundreds and hun-      |
| —Wholesaling   | Methods for every   | dreds of other vital busi- |
| —Manufacturing | line and department | ness subjects.             |

A 9,059 word booklet has been published describing, explaining, picturing the work. Pages 2 and 3 tell about managing businesses great and small; pages 4 and 5 deal with credits, collections and with rock-bottom purchasing; pages 6 and 7 with handling and training men; pages 7 to 12 with salesmanship, with advertising, with the marketing of goods through salesmen, dealers and by mail; pages 12 to 15 with the great problem of securing the highest market price for your services—no matter what your line; and the last page tells how you may get a complete set—bound in handsome half morocco, contents in colors—for less than your daily smoke or shave, almost as little as your daily newspaper.

*Will you read the book if we send it free?
Send no money. Simply sign the coupon.*

The System Co., 151-153 Wabash Ave., Chicago—

If there are, in your books, any new ways to increase my business or my salary, I should like to know them. So send on your 16-page free descriptive booklet. I'll read it. BP-6-16

Name _____
Address _____
Business _____
Position _____

SPINAL IRRITATION

An elegantly illustrated booklet explaining the cause and cure of the disease that produces the following SYMPTOMS:

HEADACHE or pains in the head, especially in the Back part or Base of Brain; Nervous or Bilious Headache; sensations that feel like the pulling or stretching of
CORDS in the Neck; trouble with the
EYES connected with pain or aching in back part of head or neck or upper part of shoulders; aches or pains in the eyes or back of them; specks or spots before the eyes or blurred vision; a frequent desire to
SIGH or YAWN or take a deep, full breath, and in some cases, an inability to do so;
PALPITATION or irregularity of the heart; pains, oppression, difficult breathing, or very peculiar and disagreeable feelings in the region of the
HEART, LUNGS, STOMACH, or other parts of the body that doctors often call Neuralgia, Rheumatism, Indigestion, Heart trouble and various other names, but fail to cure; aches or pains in the region of the
KIDNEYS; BACKACHE; sensations of oppression or constriction like a
BELT AROUND THE BODY, or part way around;
PARTIAL PARALYSIS of arms, shoulders, hands, lower limbs or feet, causing pains in these members, or a
NUMB FEELING or sensations of coldness, heaviness, or a tingling or feelings resembling the
PRICKING OF PINS or needles or as if the parts were asleep;
SORE, TENDER OR BURNING points along the spine or in the limbs or feet; pains in the face, arms, back, lower limbs or feet, resembling those of
NEURALGIA OR SCIATIC RHEUMATISM (physicians often treat these symptoms as ordinary neuralgia or rheumatism, but such treatment will not cure them);
CHILLS UP OR DOWN BACK;
CREEPING sensations, coldness or numbness; pain
BETWEEN SHOULDERS.

If you have the above named symptoms, or any of them, you probably have SPINAL IRRITATION, a very serious disorder that but few physicians can cure. Yet it is very easily cured by proper treatment. Our elegantly illustrated booklet explains how. It also describes the disease and explains what causes it.

Price, 10 Cents

OHIO STATE PUBLISHING CO., 93-5 The Birmingham, Cleveland, O.

THE ALAMO

Colorado Springs' New Fire-Proof Hotel

*Strictly First-Class—American
and European Plan*

RATES:

*American Plan—$2.50 to $4.00
per day and upwards.*

*European Plan—$1.00 per day
and upwards.*

*150 Rooms—Fifty Elegant Suites
with private baths.*

*Golf and other Outdoor Sports
accessible to guests.*

Colorado Springs, Colorado

Mr. Business Man

Are you interested in the resources and developments of Western Canada? If so, drop a card with your name and address to

Anthony Anderson

Drawer 735, Victoria, B. C.

This is an Advertisement it will Pay You to Answer

Save your Pocket and Insure your Keys

Key Insurance—Good for one year, Insures Keys and Identifies Owner; this with Genuine Morocco Combination Key and Knife Purses.....50c.
Accident Insurance—Above, plus a Limited Accident Policy for $1,000, renewable each year.....$1.00
Key Purses, { Cowhide.....25c. Combination { Cowhide.....40c.
(Key Chains { Morocco.....35c. Key and { Morocco.....50c.
Sc. extra. { Seal, Russia, 50c. Knife Purses { Seal, Russia, 65c.

Special Prices in Quantities for use as Advertising Novelties
MURRAY S. CHISM, Patentee and Manufacturer
224 N. Camac St., Philadelphia, Pa.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

THE VERY LATEST THING IN DUPLICATORS

"CANTYPE" SPRING-FRAME DUPLICATOR

1000 Perfect Reproductions per Hour of Hand-writing, Typewriting, Music or Drawing

Circulars can be taken direct from the Duplicator, and laid one copy on top another without off-setting or blurring. No other duplicator possesses this advantage. Circulars and samples of work on application. The only makers in America of all descriptions of ribbons, clean carbon papers, duplicators, stencil papers, inks, etc. Agents wanted in all unoccupied territory.

A Rapid, Medium-Priced Duplicating Machine

Simple, durable, rapid, clean, perfect work. Portable, inexpensive, practical, compact, noiseless.

Cheaper to Buy

Cheaper to Run

CHAS. E. ARCHBALD, PRESIDENT

PEN-CARBON MANIFOLD CO.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.

Originators and Only Manufacturers of Non-Flake Carbon Paper for Typewriter, Pen, Pencil and Stylus

The Practical Value of Mental Training

Henry Dickson

Principal Dickson School of Memory. The largest and most successful School of Mental Training in the world.

WHAT James H.C. A. Jones needed was a practical course of Memory Training; with that behind him he might now be in partnership with the merchant, instead of hiking for another job. No matter whether you are employer, employee, student, business man or Book Agent, you are not Making Good if your Memory is on the Job only Half the Time. The man

Read what WALT MASON, the Poet-Philosopher has to say about it:

STOP FORGETTING

The merchant said in caustic tones: "James Henry Charles Augustus Jones, please get your pay and leave the store; I will not need you any more. Important chores you seem to shun; you're always leaving work undone, and when I ask the reason why, you heave a sad and soulful sigh, and idly scratch your dome of thought, and feebly say: 'Oh, I forgot!' James Henry Charles Augustus Jones, this world's a poor resort for drones, for men with heads so badly set that their long suits it to forget. No man will ever write his name upon the shining wall of fame, or soar aloft on glowing wings because he can't remember things. I've noticed that such chaps as you remember when your pay is due; and when the noon-time whistles throb, your memory is on the job; and when a holiday's at hand, your recollection isn't canned. The failures on life's busy way, the paupers, friendless, wan and gray, throughout their bootless days, like you, forget the things they ought to do. So take your coat and draw your bones, James Henry Charles Augustus Jones."

Walt Mason

Copyright, 1909, by George Mathew Adams.
Reproduced by permission from the Chicago Daily News of Feb. 15, 1910.

with the Wandering Mind is a drug on the market—he has too many competitors. The Great Men of all ages are those who grasped the ability to Concentrate. You can acquire this ability. How? Send coupon for my free booklet.

The Dickson System has been highly recommended by Elbert Hubbard, Professor David Swing, Dr. Latson and many others.

Send this coupon for my free book (or a postal will do)

Prof. Henry Dickson, 938 Auditorium Building, Chicago

Send me your free booklet, "How to Remember"

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____ STATE _____

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Improved 1906 Edition, 160 Pages, 6½x3½ Inches

ROPP'S New Commercial Calculator & Short-Cut Arithmetic

Is from beginning to end a greatly improved, enlarged and thoroughly revised publication. It contains an entirely new system of unique Tables, Short-Cuts and up-to-date Methods. It is unquestionably the most complete, useful and comprehensive Calculator ever published. It has more than twice the matter, scope and capacity of Ropp's former editions, of which

Nearly 1,500,000 Copies Have Been Sold

It is the most convenient and practical Labor-saving work ever used in the business world. It will make every one independent, sure and self-reliant in all practical calculations. It will prevent mistakes, relieve the mind, save time and labor, and often loss and trouble. Its Tables are adapted to all the trades and occupations in the city and country, and Show the Answer as Quickly as a Watch Shows the Time.

It also explains and simplifies the principles of Arithmetic, Mechanics and Mensuration. It will make the study and use of Figures easy and interesting for young and old. It will enable every progressive mind to become an expert, sure and rapid calculator. It will prove a boon to all whose education in arithmetic has been limited or neglected. Its 48 new cuts clearly illustrate the elements of Mechanics and Mensuration. It defines about 70 points in "Commercial Law" which every man and woman should know. It is the result of devising, and improving system after system; of spending thousands of dollars in experimenting; of making millions of miscellaneous calculations, and of doing some vigorous thinking during 38 years, by an analytic, practical and preserving mind. It is especially designed for Farmers, Mechanics, Business and Professional Men, Bankers, Manufacturers and Dealers in Grain, Stock, Cotton, Coal, Lumber, Produce, etc.

|                                                                                |        |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------|
| OFFICE EDITION—9½ x 5¼ inches—Cloth binding, gold stamp, large type.....       | $1.00 |
| POCKET EDITION—6½ x 3¾ inches—Cloth, with pocket, flap and silicate slate..... | .50    |
| Leather, with pocket, flap and silicate slate, gilt edge.....                  | 1.00   |
| VEST POCKET EDITION—5¼ x 2¾ inches—Cloth, round corners, red edges.....        | .35    |
| Leather, gold stamp, burnished edges.....                                      | .50    |

*The Standard for Store, Farm,
Bank or Factory*

Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Ill.

How to Increase Your Mental Wealth at Small Cost—

TO BECOME a better Speaker of Words—and to be a scientific salesman one must know how to speak wisely and well—one should have a thorough acquaintance with the great classics of literature.

¶ The Caxton Brochures are exquisitely printed in two colors on high-grade paper—protected with a heavy cover—tied with silk—brightened with a special portrait of the author by Hillberg—and possess the great merit of fitting the pocket both in size and price.

¶ By special arrangement we have secured a limited quantity of these beautiful Brochures and while they last they will be sold for Fourteen Cents each or Ten for One Dollar.

¶ Of course you know we wrap all our goods with Satisfaction—which means that you can have your money back absolutely without question if you are not perfectly satisfied.

The Caxton Brochures

¶ A collection of Little Masterpieces, published one each month, by the Caxton Society, the aim being to present the most significant essays and short stories by the world's best authors, in a form that will appeal to all bookish people.

No. 1—CHARLES LAMB'S ESSAY, "A Dissertation upon Roast Pig," also "Detached Thoughts on Books and Reading."

No. 2—RALPH WALDO EMERSON'S "Essay on Compensation."

No. 3—"THE CHINESE PHILOSOPHER'S SON," by Oliver Goldsmith. This number is now out of print.

No. 4—"BIBLIOPHILE AND BIBLIOMANIAC," by Henry Houssaye and Henry Ward Beecher.

No. 5—"COLLECTANEA," being certain verses written by Rudyard Kipling.

No. 6—"POOR RICHARD'S ALMANACK," Shrewd wit of Benjamin Franklin as compiled by himself. With facsimile reproductions.

No. 7—"HENRY DAVID THOREAU, His Character and Opinions," by Robert Louis Stevenson.

No. 8—"BACON'S ESSAYS," being those contained in the first edition, published in 1597. With facsimile reproductions of some of the pages.

No. 9—"WISDOM OF CHESTERFIELD." Being extracts from letters of the Earl of Chesterfield to his son.

No. 10—"LOVE LETTERS OF HENRY VIII TO ANNE BOLEYN." The authentic love letters of a real king.

No. 11—"RUBAIYAT OF OMAR KHAYYAM," by Edward FitzGerald. This is a careful reprint of the first edition, introduction and notes.

No. 12—"SELF-RELIANCE," by Ralph Waldo Emerson. "Let a man know his worth, and keep things under his feet."

No. 13—"WILL O' THE MILL," by Robert Louis Stevenson.

No. 14—"RABBI BEN EZRA," by Robert Browning. This number contains a special analysis and study.

No. 15—"THE LEGEND OF SLEEPY HOLLOW," by Washington Irving.

No. 16—"THE ATHEIST'S MASS," by Honore de Balzac.

No. 17—"ODES OF ANACREON," as translated by Thomas Moore.

No. 18—"EVERYMAN," the great Morality Play. Facsimile reproductions from old editions.

No. 19—"ADDRESS ON ARTS AND CRAFTS," by William Morris.

We believe these Brochures are a little better than anything ever before attempted in special editions at a popular price. The numbers now ready are No. 1 to 19, inclusive; and with exception of No. 3 which is out of print. We will supply them at fourteen cents each, or ten for one dollar.

Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Ill.

DEPARTMENT 87

EFFICIENCY of Service is impossible without Reliability, which is born of a development of the positive feelings. —Sheldon

JULY, 1910

AUG 5 1910

Gen. Lib. PRICE 20 CENT

The BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

ARTHUR·FREDERICK·SHELDON
EDITOR

SHELDON·UNIVERSITY·PRESS
LIBERTYVILLE·ILLINOIS

Ginger Talks

235 PAGES—15 FULL PAGE CARTOONS

Sales of Two Millions a Month

The Course in Salesmanship that Built Them for the National Cash Register Company

Yours for Two Dollars

THINK of a course in practical salesmanship, written straight out of the heart of the greatest selling organization in the world, by a Director of that organization; a course that does not merely describe the selling system of this colossal concern—but IS THAT ACTUAL SYSTEM ITSELF—the word for word Ginger Talks of that world famous company to its 1,000 salesmen—the verbatim coaching, the exact specific instruction, the very selling pointers and arguments and inspiration and enthusiasm that built up, through those 1,000 red-blooded salesmen, a business of over two million dollars a month in monthly sales.

The Pabst Co. bought it for its 1800 salesmen. The Quaker Oats Company invested $450 in it. 1682 other giant concerns have taken it for their entire sales forces, many taking from 100 to 1000 each.

Ask us to send you a list six feet long of these concerns which employ nearly 50,000 salesmen

GINGER TALKS are a complete text-book of instruction and pointers on the art of selling goods. They simplify the whole of practical salesmanship; make clear with wonderful illustrations and exact explanations how to make approaches, how to secure attention, how to create desire, how to stimulate to immediate action and walk out with the order. They tell the salesman how to turn enmity into friendship, cold indifference into eager interest, casual inquiries into actual buyers, actual buyers into permanent customers. They touch on a thousand salesmen's difficulties and perplexities and show a way out of each one.

GINGER TALKS is the only business book ever written that is as brilliant and fascinating in style and has the same human interest as George Ade's "Fables in Slang," Billy Baxter's Letters," or Mr. Dooley's famous conversations with his friend Hennessy. The sentences are crowded with epigrams, sharpened with penetrating wit, lighted up with humor, and made fairly alive with the tones of a masterful personality. It is this wonderful combination of solid instruction and brilliant expression—"beef-steak nutriment and champagne style" that has brought Ginger Talks their tremendous sales.

SEND YOUR GINGER

SHELDON UNIVERSITY PRESS, Libertyville, Illinois.

I am enclosing Two Dollars. Send me a copy of Holman's "Ginger Talks."

Name.....

Address..... State.....

You can enclose $3.50 and receive a copy of Ginger Talks and The Business Philosopher for one year

ARTHUR F. SHELDON
EDITOR-IN-CHIEF

CONTENTS

ARTHUR W. NEWCOMB
MANAGING EDITOR

SHELDON'S BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER AND SALESMANSHIP

JULY, 1910

|                                                            |                     |
|------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------|
| AERIAL PHOTOGRAPH OF SHELDONHURST.....                     | Frontispiece |
| EDITORIAL .....                                            | 387                 |
| By A. F. Sheldon                                    |                     |
| FELLOWSHIP .....                                           | 394                 |
| By James Whitcomb Riley                             |                     |
| MAKING A LIBRARY A PRODUCTIVE FORCE IN AN INSTITUTION..... | 395                 |
| By Arthur W. Newcomb                                |                     |
| THE STORY OF SAM ADAMS.....                                | 399                 |
| By C. R. Trowbridge                                 |                     |
| GLEANINGS FROM BUSINESS FIELDS.....                        | 401                 |
| By Thomas Dreier                                    |                     |
| ADVERTISING AND SELLING CAMPAIGN OF AN UNDERTAKER.....     | 403                 |
| By W. E. Gerry                                      |                     |
| THE CONFESSIONS OF A PUTTERER.....                         | 405                 |
| By a Sheldon Student                                |                     |
| THE QUESTIONS OF SOCRATIC.....                             | 407                 |
| By Arthur W. Newcomb                                |                     |
| THE HUMAN POWER PLANT AND ITS SCIENTIFIC DEVELOPMENT... .. | 415                 |
| By Robert C. Hopkins                                |                     |
| LETTERS OF A SALES AND ADVERTISING MANAGER.....            | 417                 |
| By George H. Eberhard                               |                     |
| THE FIRE LOSS IN AMERICA—HOW TO REDUCE IT.....             | 421                 |
| By C. R. Lippmann                                   |                     |
| SMALL CHANGE FOR THE MENTAL CASH REGISTER.....             | 426                 |
| Minted by Dr. W. A. Mackenzie                       |                     |
| LEAVES FROM MY ORDER BOOK.....                             | 429                 |
| By Morton Mayne                                     |                     |
| NATURE'S LAWS FOR KEEPING YOUNG AND VIGOROUS.....          | 433                 |
| By H. Lindlahr, M. D., D. O.                        |                     |
| TIE YOUR ADVERTISING UP TO YOUR PROSPECTIVE CUSTOMER.....  | 437                 |
| By Edward Booth                                     |                     |
| HOW RETAILERS SHOULD MEET MAIL-ORDER COMPETITION.....      | 441                 |
| By George H. Eberhard                               |                     |
| EVOLUTION OF THE SALESMAN—THE BEGINNER—HIS LIMITATIONS     | 443                 |
| By James D. Kenyon                                  |                     |
| THE VIEWPOINT IN ADVERTISING AND WHAT DETERMINES IT....    | 445                 |
| By Frederick W. Pettit                              |                     |
| THE PHILOSOPHER AMONG HIS BOOKS.....                       | 447                 |

¶ Two dollars a year will bring the magazine to anyone in the United States or its possessions, $2.25 in Canada, and $2.50 in foreign countries. Requests for "change of address" must reach this office before the tenth of the month in order to insure the proper mailing of the current issue of this magazine. In sending in the new address please give your previous location.

Published by the Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Illinois

Entered as Second-Class Matter, December 15, 1908, at the Post Office at Libertyville, Illinois, under Act of March 3, 1879. Copyrighted by Sheldon University Press.

Seventeen Cents a Day Buys an Oliver Typewriter

This amazing offer—the New Model Oliver Typewriter No. 5 at 17 cents a day—is open to everybody, everywhere.

It's our new and immensely popular plan of selling Oliver Typewriters, on little easy payments. The abandonment of longhand in favor of clean, legible, beautiful typewriting is the next great step in human progress.

Already—in all lines of business and in all professions—the use of pen-and-ink is largely restricted to the writing of signatures.

Business Colleges and High Schools, watchful of the trend of public sentiment, are training a vast army of young people in the use of Oliver Typewriters.

The prompt and generous response of the Oliver Typewriter Company to the world-wide demand for universal typewriting, gives tremendous impetus to the movement.

The Oliver, with the largest sale of any typewriter in existence, was the logical machine to take the initiative in bringing about the universal use of typewriters. It always leads.

Save Your Pennies & Own an Oliver

This "17-Cents-a-Day" selling plan makes the Oliver as easy to own as to rent. It places the machine within easy reach of every home—every individual. A man's "cigar money"—a woman's "pin-money"—will buy it.

Clerks on small salaries can now afford to own Olivers. By utilizing spare moments for practice they may fit themselves for more important positions.

School boys and school girls can buy Olivers by saving their pennies.

You can buy an Oliver on this plan at the regular catalog price—$100. A small first payment brings the machine. Then you save 17 cents a day and pay monthly.

And the possession of an Oliver Typewriter enables you to earn money to finish paying for the machine.

Mechanical Advantages

The Oliver is the most highly perfected typewriter on the market—hence its 100 per cent efficiency.

Among its scores of conveniences are:

- the Balance Shift
- the Ruling Device
- the Double Release
- the Locomotive Base
- the Automatic Spacer
- the Automatic Tabulator
- the Disappearing Indicator
- the Adjustable Paper Fingers
- the Scientific Condensed Keyboard

Service Possibilities

The Oliver Typewriter turns out more work—of better quality and greater variety—than any other writing machine. Simplicity, strength, ease of operation and visibility are the corner stones of its towering supremacy in

- Correspondence
- Card Index Work
- Tabulated Reports
- Follow-up Systems
- Manifolding Service
- Addressing Envelopes
- Working on Ruled Forms
- Cutting Mimeograph Stencils

Can You Spend 17 Cents a Day to Better Advantage than in the Purchase of this Wonderful Machine

Write for Special Easy Payment Proposition or See the Nearest Oliver Agent

The Oliver Typewriter Co., The Oliver Typewriter Building Chicago, Illinois

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Ring the Bell Every Time

WHAT is it worth to you to be able to ring the bell every time you strike for a customer's order? What is it worth to you to be able, when he puts forth an objection, to knock that objection sky high with the irresistible force of a selling argument that has been tried and proven by the best salesmen of the best concerns in the world—concerns whose names are household words by reason of the enormous sales these very selling arguments have brought them?

What is it Worth to You:

—To know in advance the objections your prospect will make and the best answer to each that has ever yet been discovered.

—To have a number of answers (in some cases as many as twenty to thirty) to each objection—all irresistible—600 irresistible selling arguments?

—To know that every one of these arguments has been evolved by years of hard experience—improved and made stronger by constant successful use?

—To know that many of these arguments cost thousands of dollars in experience before they were discovered and perfected—and that many of them have sold millions of dollars worth of goods?

Every Page Coinable Into Money

A chemical formula written on the back of an envelope may be worth a fortune; a few figures giving the combination to a safe may unlock a door with millions behind it. Every page of this book contains a selling formula that you can coin into ready money. Every one of these 600 irresistible arguments opens a door that will lead you to more sales and more commissions. You could well pay, if you had to, a greenback for every page of this book; but the cost to you is slight.

Sign This Coupon —Can you afford to pay one-half cent for an argument that has sold thousands of dollars worth of goods—an argument whose discovery cost hundreds or even thousands of dollars in time and experience and actual money of star salesmen and great concerns.

—An argument that will surely close sales for you—that may clear you a hundred dollars in commissions the first day you use it, and hundreds or even thousands of dollars as you use it over and over again, throughout the entire year and for years to come.

Can you afford to pay one-half cent for what is worth anywhere from $10.00 to $1,000.00 in actual money-making power to you?

Then Sign This Coupon and Mail Today

THE SHELDON UNIVERSITY PRESS, Libertyville, Illinois

Enclosed please find $4.00 for your Two Big Volumes of Six Hundred Talking Points and Selling Arguments.

Name.....

Address, etc.....

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Did you ever see a proud office clerk?

Did you ever see a man spending his years in pushing a pen over a lot of books or holding down some routine office job, proud of his position?

Did you ever see one proud to have you know that he was just a clerk?

There are such men, but they are satisfied with a small success; they are not the men of ambition, who long to be bigger men.

There are today thousands of good men who are ordinary clerks, who wish they were not—men who want to be far more than that.

But yet they keep on plodding, thinking that if they stay with it long enough, something will surely turn up. And the truth is it seldom does.

If you think long years of toil alone will make you a big success, you are not in tune with present day methods.

You must concentrate ten years—fifteen years, even twenty years' experience into a few months of study at home. And the men who are doing this are the men who are winning.

If you want to move ahead quickly, be more than just a clerk, get dissatisfied—and then get in touch with The Sheldon School.

By a few hours of home study each day it will bring out the success qualities which you and every normal man possess and fit you for the big things in business.

You want to read the interesting literature we'll send you without a penny of cost, if you simply mail this coupon with your name and address—now—this very day.

A Personal Word from Mr. Sheldon

Any work an office clerk may be doing, provided it be honest, is worthy our esteem. All praise to a good man who makes good keeping books or being a clerk. But goodness alone doesn't go far in business. Ability, plus Reliability, plus Energy, plus Action—that is the quartet which reaches the harbor of big returns. Hundreds of good men need only a little training to lead them on to great achievement. And most any man can be a "100 point" force in business by coupling what he already has with what he can get in Sheldon School Training. The question is, how soon are you ready to start?

A. F. SHELDON.

I want to read your Free Literature and The Sheldon Book.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

The Sheldon School

998 REPUBLIC BUILDING

CHICAGO.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Are You One of the Fortunate Company of Live Ones? : by the Sergeant-at-Arms

THEY are coming! Reservations are pouring in from nearly every state in the Union, from Eastern and Western Canada, from England, and Australia, and South Africa.

Who are they.

Live, wide-awake, ambitious business men, merchants, salesmen, professional men, advertising men, executives, clerks, accountants, and their wives and families.

Whither do they come?

To the Sheldon Summer School, which is being prepared for them on the shores of beautiful Lake Eara, at Sheldonhurst, Libertyville, Illinois.

When are they coming?

The session of the Summer School is from Wednesday, July 27, 1910, to Tuesday, August 9, 1910, inclusive.

And what is the Sheldon Summer School?

A school with two purposes:

First to give its students the personal instruction of Mr. Sheldon and his corps of assistants in man building, business building, salesmanship, advertising, character analysis, and other practical business sciences and arts.

Second, to give everybody on the grounds the time of their lives socially, in outdoor games and sports, and in the communion with Nature in lake, ravines, hills, meadows, forests, and open sky.

The whole school will be in camp.

Chicago, bristling with object lessons in business building, is only thirty-five miles away.

Ravinia Park, with its amusements, its music and drama, is only a half hour's ride from Sheldonhurst.

We are getting ready to feed you, too, in a way that will be in keeping with the healthy appetite you will bring to the table from your studies and frolics.

Will you be there?

You think I'm making this pretty strong—at least I want you to think so. I only wish that I could make it stronger. But just to show you that I am within the truth, I'm going to call a few witnesses. You see we held the first session of the Summer School last year, and we had a goodly company of the best people on earth there. What they thought about the School you can tell from these letters, which are just samples of the dozens that were written:

“Measure Was Heaped up, Pressed Down, and Running Over”

Here is a whole handful of jewels from J. M. Lancaster, of Franklin, Nebraska:

You gave more than we expected. The measure was heaped up, pressed down, and running over. I believe I got more enjoyment and general growth—A R E A development—than I ever experienced before in many times that length of time. The instruction given on any one of half a dozen different topics was worth the whole cost. Especially was this true regarding expression.

That covers the ground pretty thoroughly. You will feel the same way about it after you have attended this summer's session.

THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

The Power of the Teacher

Here is what Mr. Charles H. Dayton, manager of the Inter-State Manufacturing Company, of Chicago, wrote to a friend in London about Mr. Sheldon, who is the principal instructor at the Summer School:

Without doubt, Mr. Sheldon is possessed of the power to impress his personality upon the people with whom he comes in contact in a greater measure than almost any other man I ever met.

It is not necessarily eloquence, but intensity of thought and earnestness of purpose, coupled with his simplicity of character, his gentleness of personality, the poise of his movements. He is a man of power.

"The Value of the Personal Touch"

Here is what Mr. C. G. Norris, of Toronto, Canada, has to say about the personal instruction received at the School last summer:

The course of instruction was chock full of information and inspiration to me. You made the Science of Business clear and complete. You brought us up to date in the latest developments of your philosophy. You gave us many special things, fine points, side lights, that I realize could not be included in a printed course of instruction. Finally, what seems to me most important, we had the privilege and advantage of two weeks' personal contact with the author and finisher of our faith in science as applied to business.

Will you be there?

When the crowd scampers off, laughing and joking for the morning plunge in the lake, will you be one of them?

When, three times a day, the jolly company meets at the dainty but plenteous table, will there be a place for you?

When everybody rounds up at the big tent and learns from the best authorities in the country how to do more business and do it at a bigger profit, how to make that bigger business permanently increasing, will you be on hand?

When the base ball, basket ball, tennis, and croquet games are in full swing and the air is ringing with their happy music, will you be one of the players?

When the wind sweeps across the lake and the water roars under the prow of the sail boat; when the fish are biting good, when the bunch goes off for a canter on Art Koon's saddle horses, when the moonlight sifts through the trees and the hammock is swung, will you be in on the fun?

When the camp fire is roaring and the crowd gathers for stories, songs, music, experiences, and good fellowship, will you have a part in it?

When the orchestra strikes up and the dancers swing

MOONLIGHT ON LAKE EARA

THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

out on the polished floor, will you trip the light fantastic toe with the rest of us?

When it's all over, and the students are going back to their work; when everybody is saying, "I never had a better and more profitable time in my life"; when with new strength, fresh vitality, greater knowledge, more ability, stronger reliability, tougher endurance, and more effective action, they begin to serve better and make bigger profits, will you be one of those who will say, "I wouldn't have missed it for a thousand dollars"?

You will?

Then you will have to get busy and let us have that reservation of yours very soon.

There will be room for all who come, if the applications are received in time, but the indications are that the attendance will be so large that it will be necessary to close the enrollment books early in order to prepare for those who are coming.

Make Your Reservation Now

Tuition, tent, and board will be forty-five dollars. For shorter periods, three dollars and seventy-five cents a day. Children under fourteen years, half price. The payment for tuition by the head of the family includes the other members. Board at the big table and a good tent will be ten dollars a week for those not paying tuition.

Boats furnished free.

Art Koon's famous saddle horses, seventy-five cents for the first hour; forty cents for each additional hour. Single buggies, one dollar for the first hour; seventy-five cents for each additional hour.

The Sheldon Summer School session for 1910 opens on Wednesday, July 27, and closes on Tuesday, August 9.

Make your reservation now, if possible. Anyhow, send it in just as soon as you can decide to come, so that a tent may be provided for you, and a plate laid for you at the table.

Bring your old clothes, tennis racquet, fishing tackle, walking shoes, riding habit, camera, swimming suit, mandolin, guitar, good appetite, a merry heart, family, and congenial friends.

Use this coupon in making your reservation:

SHELDON SUMMER SCHOOL, ..... 1910
Libertyville, Illinois,

Make reservation for.....persons in a good tent, also a place at the table.

Men.....Women.....Children.....

Name.....

Address.....

SEND FOR OUR BEAUTIFUL PROSPECTUS

AERIAL PHOTOGRAPH OF SHELDONHURST AND LAKE EARA
TAKEN FROM A KITE AT A HEIGHT OF TWO THOUSAND FEET

The Business Philosopher

A. F. SHELDON, EDITOR

VOLUME VI

JULY, 1910

NUMBER 7

On the Front Porch

Where We Talk Things Over

A FEW years ago I spent several months in California.

While there I saw millions of acres of as fair and fertile fields, vineyards, orchards, and orange and lemon groves as grow beneath the shining sun. Grains, grasses, fruits, and flowers seemed fairly to leap from the soil and fill the air with beauty and fragrance—and the people's pockets with wealth.

Yet they told me that only a few years before, that smiling land had been a barren desert—an inferno of blinding glare, choking dust, scorpions and rattlesnakes.

"What has wrought the change?" I asked. "Irrigation?"

"Yes," was the reply, "water and people."

And then I was shown millions of acres more of desert—dry, gray, sullen. I rode through it for hours on the train.

"This land," a man told me, "is just as fertile as that you saw back there under cultivation. It will grow almost anything that grows anywhere. It will grow most things better than they grow anywhere else."

"Well, why don't they cultivate it?" I asked. "Can't they get the water on it?"

"Oh yes, there is an abundance of water. But we want people."

"Well, then," I said unto my guide, "why don't you get the people? Surely there must be millions in this country who would think that they had died and gone to heaven if they could live in this climate of eternal springtime, in the midst of a profusion of fruits and flowers, and be as happy and prosperous as those people back there in the Valley."

"We are doing all we can to get the people," he said. "But I guess they must think that it is too good to be true. Or perhaps they lack the enterprise to make the move from the cities where they are herded worse than cattle, or hogs, and starved and kicked about."

I thought a good deal about that for awhile. Then I answered and said unto the man:

"But how are the people to get from the distant cities here, if they are starved and oppressed. They can't walk all the way."

"They could find a way if they wanted to come," was the reply. "Thousands of them do. The poorest peasant or beggar in Europe can find a way of getting across the Atlantic to the shores of America.

Chinese and Japanese paupers find their way across the Pacific to this state. People can always migrate when they have the enterprise."

"But what would become of them if they landed here without money? Wouldn't they be worse off than they were before? They would have to buy this land before they could cultivate it, wouldn't they?"

My guide looked at me in pity.

"Don't you know," he asked, "that the dairymen of California are losing hundreds of thousands of dollars because they can't get enough help to milk their cows? Don't you know that tons of good fruit rot on the ground every year because the growers can't get help to pick and pack it? Don't you know that there is a dearth of almost every kind of human labor—except clerical—on this Coast?"

I had to admit my ignorance. But my informant was well warmed up by this time. He went on:

"I can show you a dozen fat and prosperous ranches within a half-day's walk from the town where I live, owned, clear of all debt, by men who came here a few years ago without one cent to rub against another. I can show you properties that are now paying clear incomes of thousands of dollars a year, bought by their present owners on time, and paid for out of the first year's crops. I know plenty of men who came here a few years ago, worked two or three seasons as ranch hands, and saved up enough money to make the first payment on a ranch of their own. They are riding in their own automobiles today.

"But those golden days are gone, aren't they—all those plums have been plucked long ago?"

"Don't you believe it! There are better opportunities right in this state today than there ever were before."

"But," I objected again, "it takes capital to develop these lands. And the people from the city slums haven't the capital."

"There's where you are mistaken. People are vastly more important than capital. Besides, there's plenty of capital ready, willing, eager to do its part if only the people would come and do theirs."

THAT WAS California a few years ago. They tell me the situation is the same out there today.

I read that Florida, Texas, Oklahoma, Colorado, Utah, Nevada, New Mexico, Arizona, Oregon, Washington, and Idaho are likewise sending up a call for people. They have resources of untold wealth, but need people to develop them.

From Western Canada, the new granary of the world, comes a similar cry.

Mexico comes to the front and makes her bid, too—especially the west coast of that wonderful country.

I read, recently, that there were millions of square miles of virgin soil in Australia, with one of the finest climates in the world and plenty of rainfall, waiting for nothing on earth but people.

A vast empire is opening up in our own Alaska.

Even New England, the reputed region of worked-out and abandoned farms, now offers big opportunities to the enterprising. It has been demonstrated that these same worn-out hillsides can be made to pay big profits by scientific and intensive farming. The same thing is being proved true in all parts of the country. The science of agriculture has succeeded in teaching that there is more profit to be made from a few acres, intensively farmed, than from a vast domain tilled by the old methods. That means a revolution—no, I mean an evolution. Where one family formerly worked itself to death to get a bare living off of one hundred and sixty acres, sixteen families will grow prosperous on ten acres each.

And all these lands spell opportunity for hundreds of millions of people.

---

ARMOUR STARTED in life as a butcher's "boy." Rockefeller began as a clerk at two dollars a week. James J. Hill was a deck-hand and freight-handler in the days of his youth. H. H. Rogers was a grocer's delivery boy. Harriman began as a clerk in a railroad office. Vanderlip was a newspaper reporter. Sir Thomas Lipton was a grocer's errand boy. Andrew Carnegie earned his first pennies by delivering telegraph messages. None of them had any "luck," any "pull," any advantage over any other boys of their time—except such as was in their own characters.

But, some people tell us, the day of such opportunities is gone forever. Big Business has hogged the whole thing, now. The best you can hope to do is to be a well-paid slave of Mammon.

But I have told you of independence and prosperity beckoning to humanity with open arms, from millions of unoccupied—or only half-occupied—acres, right at our very doors.

But, you may object again, not everyone can be a rancher or a farmer.

Granted. Let us take a little closer look at business and the professions.

Begin at the bottom. Look around you. Try to count the well-to-do business men still under forty who began with nothing but their own good hands and brains. I, personally, know so many that I can't count them.

The fact is, there is so much ignorance and laziness still clogging the wheels of progress in the business world that a young man who is willing to take the trouble to develop his qualities of industry, initiative, judgment, memory and imagination, has more opportunities pressed upon him than he can begin to grasp.

Last month, in our talk on the Front Porch, we had something to say about the inertia of many business men—of their unwillingness to take the trouble to learn the science of business. I quoted from various authorities who made the charge sweeping in its scope.

What does that mean to you, Brother Man?

Think it out to its conclusion.

Go into any ten retail stores, anywhere. How many of them are clean, up to date, and appear well managed? In how many of them do you get good service?

What does that mean to you?

Read the answer in the tenth store—the store where everything is clean and snappy, where there is an air of efficiency, where you get real service.

That is the one store in the ten that is making money. The others are making a living—perhaps.

And inquire about the proprietor of the prosperous store. Started in as a clerk, worked and studied night and day, cut out the cheap pleasures so that he would have more time and money for self-improvement? I thought so.

He had no time to whine around the street corners telling how Big Business had hogged all the opportunities and made us a nation of slaves.

But, you may object again, everyone can't be a retailer in some small city or village.

Granted again.

Hugh Chalmers is still a young man. He began his business career as an office boy. Today he is at the head of one of the most successful manufacturing institutions in the world. And he made his success by hard work and constant self-improvement.

I do not need to multiply examples. Look around you in the manufacturing world. Young men everywhere in the highest positions! Young men as owners and proprietors!

There's Mix, head of the Dodge Company, down at Mishawaka, Indiana. Every poor boy in America has just the same opportunity today that Melville Mix had when he started in at five dollars a week in the Dodge plant—the opportunity to work hard and improve himself.

Improve himself I said.

There's the secret.

BUT LEAVE the business world, and let us take a look at the professions.

The churches are pleading for more men to enter the ministry. So eager are they for them that they offer to educate them free.

The medical schools are advertising that more doctors are needed to treat sick folks and teach well people how to take care of themselves. Did you ever know a good doctor who was not driven almost to death with patients?

A dentist told me, not long ago, that he could do just five times as much business as he was doing if he could only get competent assistants. You know yourself that you have to go days beforehand to get an appointment with a good dentist.

Let a young lawyer show that he is able, reliable, and can get action. How long is it before he is hiring clerks to help him take care of his business? Look around you and see. Representatives of the big corporations haunt the colleges of engineering, trying to make contracts with the best of the senior class students before they graduate. I've seen it done.

The English speaking world is reading more today than ever before. And there is a greater demand for writers and editors—with greater rewards offered.

Take the stage and playwriting. The opportunities are legion. Almost every season sees men and women emerging from obscurity into fame and wealth.

Turn where you will. Throw your searchlight upon every avenue of human endeavor. There you will find the opportunities seeking for men and women who are willing to take the trouble to prepare themselves for service.

All the biggest successes in all these activities were poor boys and girls yesterday.

But they didn't bemoan their sad lot. They didn't sit down and wish that they had been born rich instead of beautiful. They didn't envy the rich and froth at the mouth over their own "wrongs." They didn't have time for any such foolishness.

Neither did they sit down and wait for a "lucky" chance to fling them to the crest of the wave of riches and fame.

You know what they did. Their stories have been told in thousands of newspapers and magazines. You have seen the rise of many of them yourself.

As Lafayette Young says, "it was by hard work and sticking to it."

---

SEE THAT "down-and-outer."

He is getting old and gray. He is haggard and hopeless. When there is a big snowfall, he gets a few hours' work helping to clean the streets. When some extra force of men is wanted somewhere for the commonest kind of labor, he is on hand to get a few days' work at a pittance.

When none of these windfalls come his way, he is in the bread-line at midnight, and sleeping in corridors and the city parks.

He is one of the "great army of the unemployed."

But where was he twenty years ago?

With very few exceptions, he was making good wages and spending them in "having a good time," while the man who now dashes past him in an automobile was sitting in his hall bed-room, wrapped in quilts to keep out the cold, and studying by the poor light of a cheap oil lamp.

He was wearing good clothes and living well when the man with a big house up on the boulevard was making the best of his father's cast-off clothing and saving his money to buy books.

He was always too tired, or too busy, or too sick, or feeling too full of life, or getting along too well, or too old, or too young, or too stupid, or too smart to study. Anything for an excuse.

He couldn't see any sense in all this rot about improving oneself—what he wanted to do was to make money.

Or, perhaps, he did plenty of studying, but the time was never just right for him to make any application of what he learned. He knew well enough that he ought to develop habits of speed, accuracy, punctuality, enthusiasm in his work, initiative, and concentration. But he was always "going to."

Or there may have been any one of several other ways in which he failed to "work hard and stick to it," always improving himself with the idea of rendering more and better service.

The law holds good:

"He profits most who serves best."

---

AND NOW, let us connect all this up with our talks in the May and June numbers of THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER.

You remember the argument. In the May number we found that the business world had the means and the power to mould society, governments, and individuals to its will; that, with the concentration of wealth, there was danger of great poverty; and that neither Business nor the race could afford poverty.

In the June number, we found that Business was conservative; that it moved slowly in making changes; and that, while prudence was good, stagnation in old ruts was bad.

In both numbers we reached the conclusion that education is the great solution of the problem.

Now, in the light of what we have been talking over here, look again at education.

Suppose that the business world grasps the meaning of the opportunities in the land, in business, and in the professions.

Suppose that, controlled by business men, the state were to educate boys and girls from their babyhood to fit themselves to leap into these opportunities and make the most of them. And when I say educate, I do not mean simply put them through a fixed course of mental fodder and gymnastics. I mean to show them how to develop the latent powers of the intellects, their feelings, their wills, and their bodies; to inspire and encourage them by precept and example—to go at it scientifically to make able, reliable, enduring men and women of them, strong in initiative and action, powerful in self-control.

Suppose these barren acres all over the world were to blossom and bear fruit under the skillful, scientific cultivation of people thus educated.

Suppose the millions of employees in the factories of the world were men and women thus educated.

Think of every retailer and retail salesperson striving in the power of that kind of education to render their customers the very highest service.

Imagine the men and women of the professions, able, reliable, and strong in endurance and action.

Picture what the world would be if all the men of wealth and influence were thus educated and strove only to serve the race better and better.

Wouldn't there be an enormous increase in the aggregate of wealth produced, so that there would be much more for every human being?

Wouldn't there be a much more equitable distribution of that wealth, so that there would be no poverty anywhere?

I believe that day is coming.

Already I see the gleams of its dawn in the increased interest in education everywhere in the business world.

---

BUT MEANWHILE, what about the poor "down-and-outer"?

He is with us today. And, aside from being a brother who is in trouble and needing our help, he is a menace.

We have talked him over before, and decided that he is a poor producer, a scant consumer and poor pay, likely to be a criminal, pretty sure to be sick and not only spread disease but cost us a good deal to doctor and bury, full of discontent and unrest, and thus the victim of agitators and revolutionists.

But even he is not too old to educate. On the municipal farms near Cleveland, Ohio, and in many private institutions, it is being done. And the work, once begun will grow and spread.

The great social problem is not to make it easier for those who shirk, but to teach them to work—to prepare for their opportunities, to see them when presented, and to grasp them like men.

Some of the agitators tell us that the great cry is "We don't want charity—we want a chance to work!"

Let me tell you something that I want you always to remember.

Burn it deep into the tablets of your heart—whatever they are. Anyhow, get it fixed somewhere in your consciousness so that it will never get away.

This world is full of chances to work for the man who desires and is prepared to serve.

And remember this—when I use that word serve, I mean the very highest usefulness of which you, through development of all your powers, are capable.

Millions of acres of land, thousands of mines, factories, stores and offices; unnumbered pulpits, courts, operating rooms, drafting rooms, studios, sanctums, rostrums, and judicial benches are calling for men who can render service.

Opportunity doesn't knock timidly on your door and then vanish forever.

Opportunity bangs on your door with a club, shouts at you, pleads with you, cries for you, almost smashes the door in on you and drags you out.

But now is the time for you.

See that you do your part.

Opportunity will not go away. But the longer you wait, the less power you will have to get up and open the door—the less power to serve when you do get to work.

Your first care is to see that you have the desire to serve—then that you have the power to serve.

See to it that you are not traveling the rose-bordered path that leads to the fate of the "down-and-outer."

In the words of Goethe:

Are you in earnest? Seize this very minute;
What you can do, or dream you can, begin it;
Boldness has genius, power, and magic in it.
Only engage, and then the mind grows heated;
Begin, and then the work will be completed.

PLACE yourself in the middle of the stream of power and wisdom which flows into you as life, place yourself in full centre of that flood, then you are without effort impelled to truth, to right, and to perfect contentment.

EMERSON

---

Fellowship

By JAMES WHITCOMB RILEY

WHEN A man ain't got a cent, and he's feeling kind of blue,
An' the clouds hang dark and heavy, an'
won't let the sunshine through;
It's a great thing, O my brethren, for a feller just to lay
His hand upon your shoulder in a friendly sort of way!

It makes a man feel queerish, it makes the tear-drops start,
An' you sort o' feel a flutter in the region of the heart;
You can't look up and meet his eyes; you don't know what to say,
When his hand is on your shoulder in a friendly sort of way!

O, the world's a curious compound, with its honey and its gall,
With its care and bitter crosses, but a good worl'
after all;
An' a good God must have made it—leastways that is what I say
When a hand is on my shoulder in a friendly sort of way.

---

Making a Library a Productive Force in an Institution : by Arthur W. Newcomb

How They Use the Reservoir of Information at the Studebaker Bros. Manufacturing Company's Plant

I WISH that the article I am now setting out to write might get to the man who pays the bills in every business institution in the English speaking world. Not because it is going to be a great article from a literary standpoint—although I wish I might write another such preachment as Hubbard's "A Message to Garcia." Not because I am looking for literary immortality, but because, once the business world gets hold of the sense of the lesson in this article, the wheels of progress will spin as never before—and they will spin to some purpose.

Fra Elbertus, in his great work, "A Message to Garcia," writes from the standpoint of an employer addressing employers. But what he says is for the instruction of the employee.

All he says is good. It is true. It has been the inspiration of millions. It has done much to make this world a better place to inhabit.

What Have You Done?

But just listen to me talk to you employers on another aspect of the question.

The United States Government, for whom Rowan carried that Message to Garcia, spent several thousand dollars in educating him, at West Point, for his job.

How much have you spent, Mr. Employer, in educating the man you want to carry your message to Garcia?

Mr. Hubbard says:

"No man who has endeavored to carry out an enterprise where many hands were needed, but has been well-nigh appalled at times at the imbecility of the average man—the inability or unwillingness to concentrate on a thing and do it."

But how much has the employer done to educate the average man—to help him to develop ability and the willingness to concentrate?

The "weeding out process" goes on and on—has been going on for years. Yet employers everywhere are growing gray and gnarled combating inefficiency.

The times call for something better, something more effective, than hiring and firing.

The men you have may be incompetent, but they are not hopeless.

They are human beings, and they repay more for cultivation than any other living thing on earth.

Men are not commodities, to be bought and sold, traded and "scrapped." They are bundles of possibilities, only awaiting development and realization.

The value of a man is not in his legs, his shoulders, his arms, or his fingers—it is in his mind.

"Oh, if they would only think!"

How many times have I heard employers groan this prayer for their employees. Well, the employers can help them to train their power to think.

Signs of an Awakening

The business world is finding this out. The best and biggest concerns are spending money in the education of their employees—some of them, far-sighted, spending a great deal. Night schools, technical classes and clubs, correspondence courses, lectures, books, periodicals, trips to other factories and offices, and apprentice schools are among the things this money is paying for.

"Welfare work," while not all strictly educational, is all for the development of the positive qualities of the workers. And its profit making success has been so great that it is spreading rapidly.

Wide awake business men are studying education—they are interested in it. They are beginning to realize that it is a big factor in profit.

Just to show how much money, time, and trouble one of the most successful corporations in America is willing to expend on the brains of its employees, let me tell you about the Studebaker Library.

At South Bend, Indiana, at the foot of Lake Michigan, are the greatest wagon, carriage, and automobile factories in the world—those of the Studebaker Bros. Manufacturing Company.

Helping Employees to Use the Library

On the fourth floor of the administration building is the library, which is open every working day from eight o'clock in the morning until six o'clock in the evening. But it isn't just kept there and the doors kept open. The employees are urged

On the third page I find this:

Published weekly to carry to members of the Studebaker business family the latest and best on the manufacturing and marketing of the Studebaker products.

Suggestions from you will be welcomed. If you need a book, a magazine, or information that will help you in your work, send in your request to the library and, if not available, its purchase for the library will be considered. Every effort will be made to get the desired information. All suggestions of ways in which the library can be made more useful to you and others in the company will gladly be received by the librarian.

The library will not demand of you any additional sacrifice in your already busy life, to use it, and are given every possible help and encouragement to use it.

VIEW OF LIBRARY

Chief among these aids is the "Studebaker Library Bulletin," a weekly magazine, published and circulated by the company. This is neatly and artistically printed on heavy paper, so that it will stand usage—for these Bulletins are something worth while. A file of them would be valuable in any office. You'll see why when I tell you what it contains.

On the front cover, under the title, is the legend:

The Studebaker Library. For the promotion of efficiency and usefulness of interested workers to themselves and Studebakers.

but will prove to be a time saver. You will soon learn that it will be a constant and indispensable adjunct to your work, getting for you in the shortest time the latest and best material on subjects in which you are interested.

Now here is something that every business builder ought to read. It is a leading article from this bulletin. And it contains a truth so important that I reproduce it here in full.

THE VALUE OF A LIBRARY TO THE BUSINESS INSTITUTION

A word as to the relationship of a library to a manufacturing interest will not be amiss in this initial issue of the Studebaker Library Bulletin.

The business library is a general clearing-house of information relating to all phases of the institution. Information gleaned not only from books and magazines, but from every available source, should be gathered in a central place from which it can be disseminated to all departments and to every individual worker of the Company, if desired.

In the past, yes, even today (as the Commercial Library is a new activity in the business world), if a thorough search could be made throughout the institution, it would be found that in every department, in some way or other, an effort had been made to gather and file information for immediate use in promoting the interests of the business.

Reports and tests, secured frequently at great cost to the Company, are buried in one department, even at one individual's desk, available only to a limited number.

A man searching for valuable information one system, a wealth of data that would otherwise be lost to the greatest good of the greatest number of people interested in the largest development of themselves and the Company.

What the Library Contains

Speaking of the library itself, the bulletin says:

At present the library contains, other than the above mentioned material, books of general interest, such as encyclopedias, indexes, technical dictionaries in various languages, books of statistics, trade catalogs and directories, road maps, atlases, city directories, etc. Newspapers from all parts of the United States are received in the library.

STUDEBAKER LIBRARY COMMITTEE IN SESSION

seen at some time in a magazine, a book, even a letter containing data and statistics, spends hours trying to run down such data, often to find that the last man to whom the information was sent never received it, which means that it is lost; consequently a lack of material of untold worth to the Company, because no central bureau is provided in which can be gathered, indexed, and filed every bit of information, that is and may be of use to the business.

The worth of the business library, from a financial standpoint is beyond calculation.

The library is best able to serve because it has gathered from all authoritative sources valuable information, because it is a central bureau where employees take matter that has helped them, and make known their wants for further help, because it keeps filed, according to

Here is something that will give you an idea as to the working value of the library:

If you have in your department reports made by employees of or belonging to the Company, that you do not need constantly for reference, kindly send them to the library, where they will be catalogued and made available for you as well as other employees.

The Studebaker library and the time of the librarians in charge are entirely at your disposal. If you want a book, a magazine, a catalog, telephone the library. If you want information of any sort, get into communication with the library, and if it cannot be found for you, it will be secured at the earliest possible moment.

In order that the library may be a strong, working, co-operative force, you are asked to send to it all material that has helped you and that will be of value to the company. This means not only books and magazine information, but ideas that will tend toward its greater usefulness.

Employees Help Make the Library a Success

Following along the same general idea of co-operation, just look at this about the use of magazines:

YOUR CO-OPERATION IS SOLICITED

If, in looking over the periodicals sent to you, you find articles that interest you, and that you think will interest other employees of the Company, will you not kindly indicate same by marking with red ink or a red pencil, giving the name of the person or department to whom it would appeal? In this way articles will be included in the Magazine Index and you will have helped make the library a more efficient working force.

Please do not clip magazines. If you need to do this, kindly notify the librarian, who will provide you with a duplicate copy for this purpose.

If books or magazines are needed in a department for constant reference, as is necessary in some cases, they may be kept there after they have been through the proper channel, the library, for record and indexing. However, all material should be returned to the library as soon as it can be dispensed with so that it may be available for general use.

A Valuable Magazine Index

Following these general observations comes a list of the two hundred and eight business, technical, and popular magazines received regularly at the library. And then comes, what to us all is of the highest value if we could only get and use it every week—a topical index of the current magazines, giving titles of articles bearing on different phases of the company's business. An idea of the completeness of this index can be gained from the fact that it fills fourteen pages of the magazine.

That's a great library, isn't it, Mr. Employer?

Must help the Studebaker people to make bigger profits, don't you think? If it didn't, they would hardly be foolish enough to spend their good money for it—Studebakers don't do things that way.

Some Practical Questions

Now what are you going to do about it?

Think it all over carefully, not looking for excuses, not trying to find obstacles in the way, but with a determination to do all in your power to gather and make available to your employees all the information about themselves and their work.

Just by way of something practical, what do you do with the trade journals that come to your office?

Do you encourage your employees to use the technical books and reports in your office?

What do you do with catalogs and circulars from your competitors, sources of supply, and customers?

What records do you keep, and how are they analyzed and made available to those whom they would help?

Do you encourage your employees to make suggestions? Do you encourage them to bring to your attention magazine articles and books that they read that contain valuable information?

What are you doing to develop the intellectual, emotional, physical, and volitional powers of your employees?

In short, how much are you doing to help yourself and your employees to learn the lessons taught by your own and their experience? To learn from the experience of other people?

Here is a conservation policy that will make for you your best and easiest profits.

---

Thomas B. Reed has said that the greatest advance of the last fifty years has been the elimination of fear from the individual life. We have taken leaps and bounds in that direction, but that we have arrived is not true. To be sure, fear is largely eliminated from the home, the school, and the church. But fear of what our fellows may think is not wholly eliminated from our present consciousness. We all, in some measure, conform to it. To be conventional is so easy. To be unconventional sometimes carries its penalties, but whether they are so great as those attached to the former is a question. A form of slavery in dress, manner of life, and, oftentimes, thought, is the price we pay for our conformity. Ostracism to a greater or less degree is the price of nonconformity—with a free spirit—an untrammelled soul as its compensation.—Evangeline.

The Story of Sam Adams—How It Paid Him to Do His Best : by C. R. Trowbridge

SAM ADAMS was a salesman for the P. D. M. Co., a large manufacturing concern. He was 30 years old, of good character and habits and occasionally showed in his work that he possessed some very good qualities.

The way he handled customers and prospects indicated in the early stages of the game that he was capable of speed. The work assigned him invariably was well done.

Sam was a close observer and a deep thinker. He got to observing the other salesmen, heard of their weekly reports, and all of a sudden steam went down and Sam was classed with the very ordinary commercial travelers.

The general sales manager was responsible for Sam's employment. He was keeping close tab and there was keen disappointment in the results. It was true that he accomplished about as much as the other road men, but the G. S. M. knew that there was better stuff in Sam.

One day, just before Sam was preparing to make his usual Monday morning train, the G. S. M. called him into his private office and there was a heart to heart talk.

It developed that Sam's observations and deep thinking had shown him that he could get as many orders in three days as his brother knights of the grip could land in one week, and he had decided that as he was getting the same compensation he might as well take it easy.

The G. S. M. whistled through his big mustache, turned to his desk, and, bringing forth a box labeled "Salesmen," withdrew a large envelope and handed it to Sam. "Salesmen for P. D. M. Co., 1900," was the only inscription it bore.

"You will find in that envelope," said the G. S. M., "a list of one hundred names. It was made out in 1900. You are familiar with our force. Read and check off those you are acquainted with."

Sam did as was requested and was startled to discover that out of the bunch he was only able to place ten.

"Ten is correct," said the G. S. M. You will notice that the ten are now occupying responsible positions with the company.

Yes, Sam pointed out to himself the G. S. M., the manager of direct sales, their assistants, and the managers of the Chicago, San Francisco, Atlanta, New York, London and Paris branches.

"Do you suppose the men now holding offices got them by giving the house three days of their time each week," declared the G. S. M. "Not on your life. Everyone put in six good old sixes and then a few. You've been with us for four years, Sam. Has it occurred to you where you might be now if you had given the company your full equipment? You have been doing yourself harm as well as us. It's industrial suicide. Now get busy and show your mettle. We need men like you, but they must be men."

Sam quietly left the building. He did not say much, but he did the deepest thinking in all the time he had been in the employ of the P. D. M. Co. The G. S. M. also got busy, and a week or two later Sam was transferred to a new territory.

There was no increase in salary and it meant moving for the family, but Sam had no complaint to offer. He went at his task with a will. It was hard sledding for months, but the business was there and eventually well filled order sheets were received almost daily at the home office. Sam had found himself.

As the years rolled by conditions warranted increased capacity at the factory and additional salesmen were placed on the pay roll. One of the acquisitions was given Sam's place and the latter again transferred to still harder territory. He repeated his former success.

Not a word in commendation of his services was received by Sam since leaving the home office. He thought he was doing all right, but wasn't sure and kept on hustling. Then a short letter arrived from the G. S. M. advising him that the position of assistant manager of the Chicago branch was open and his acceptance or non-acceptance was awaited.

Sam wired his acceptance, of course. He did not move Molly and the children, however. He had a hunch things were on a satisfactory basis, but the G. S. M. had never given him any idea of the situation and he was loath to change again until he thought he was "safe." It was a good thing Sam made this decision for he was called to the home office six months after as manager of direct sales.

He was glad to get back and so was Molly. He put the spade in deep there; he dug like a Trojan and when the G. S. M. had him sitting opposite as assistant, a satisfied smile played about the corners of his mouth.

Moral: A man cannot afford to do less than his best.

Not a Game for Sprinters

By Charles E. Jones, in "Cos."

A MANUFACTURER who is a sprinter must not go into the advertising field. If he can't hold on "like a pup to a root" he does not belong in this field. It's a Marathon Race—not to be run in a series of dashes, but by one steady grind—wearing down opposition and competition—reiterating, repeating and duplicating your story month in and month out—never telling the shadow of a falsehood; never betraying the public's confidence—treating the public as courteously in print as if it were a speech—if possible, growing more affable with age; never getting tired of making new friends, so that every member of your business family will learn to say with respect and affection when some knotty problem confronts them, "What would the old man do in this case?"

Racial Conservation Policy

By Maron Watson

BUSINESS must learn the universality of the law of compensation, and that, though legislative bodies, executives, and the judiciary can sometimes be bought, that law will always be enforced.

Already that stern old Schoolmaster, Experience, has taught this lesson in cosmic government. And he has charged and collected an extortionate tuition fee.

New England farmers robbed the soil for generations, repaying nothing. Then the farms retaliated, deprived the farmers of their living, and threw them out into the cold, cold world.

Sturgeon fishers robbed the bays, rivers, and lakes, repaying nothing. Then the waters collected their share, and the fishermen were out of an occupation.

Lumbermen took and took and took, making no return. Then the denuded hills and mountains began to take their toll—in floods, fires, rich topsoil washed away, and the bankruptcy of many lumbermen and mill owners.

And so short-sighted business stands in danger of taking, taking, taking, until the great mass of consumers and producers is impoverished and denuded to a point where business can no longer exploit them as workers nor sell to them as buyers.

The conservation of our national resources is the problem of today, because, at the very head and front of it stands the policy of racial conservation. Unless the race advances, it falls back. Where there is no gain, there is loss. And a loss in the vitality, cheerfulness, enlightenment, and development of the race is a greater loss—from the mere dollars and cents point of view—than that caused by all other wasteful habits combined.

Let us, as business men, put first things first.

Handling an Interruption

By Ross Wilson

I WAS SELLING a bill of clothing to a customer one time when a customer of his came down to the sample room. I certainly did wish he and his boy were far enough away. Just dropped in to have a chat, now fancy that! I said, "Oh, by the way, get your son to take off his coat and vest as I want to show Mr. Smith the fit and finish of our latest models. I tried on almost thirty different garments on that kid until he was almost yelling for help.

He said he wanted to go home, and as I was right in tune with him on that idea, I aided father and son all I could toward getting home. But I showed my models off to good advantage, which I could not have done without the youngster.

IT WAS a San Francisco printer who sent the economists and sociologists scurrying to their studies when he sent into the world his teachings on the Single Tax. That this obscure, untrained worker in a printshop should presume to teach the world anything that had not already been taught by the professors in the colleges—why it was laughable.

The Prophet of Frisco

But Henry George felt within himself the inner promptings that come to those to whom it is given to see into the future. And those who see most clearly into the future are those who understand most fully the present.

Henry George saw clearly the havoc wrought in the great war of the House of Have against the House of Want. And it came to him that a tax on land alone would bring about conditions which would enable a greater number of human beings to get a square deal.

Today the philosophy of Henry George has circled the earth. To Tolstoi, closing his life on his estate in Russia, Henry George is one of the great men of all time. Those who championed the English Budget with Lloyd-George were influenced by the spirit of the Frisco printer.

A Philadelphia millionaire, Joseph Fels, finds his joy in spreading the teachings of the single tax. It was a Henry George book that sent Tom Johnson into the fight for a square deal for the majority. E. G. Lewis, the St. Louis publisher whose papers reach millions, writes editorials that advocate the single tax. Louis Post, who edits the sanest weekly in the country (The Public, Chicago) is an ardent single taxer, as is William Marion Reedy and scores of other thinkers and writers who are influencing their times.

Henry George advocated the abolishment of all taxation save that upon land values. Only men who own land would be taxed, the tax of each being in proportion, not to the area but to the value of the land.

Thus the taxes on a square rod of ground in New York would be greater than upon many a farm miles in extent. According to the single tax no one would be compelled to pay a higher tax than others if his land were improved and used while their's was not, not if his were better improved or better used than their's.

Thus men would not be punished for making improvements as they are at present. The man who improves his property has to pay a fine in proportion to the value of the improvement. This fine is called a tax. The single tax is a tax on land alone, in the ratio of value and irrespective of improvements or use.

Joseph Fels has made much money by making and selling soap, but more he has made by investing his money in real estate and holding it for a rise. He calls himself a thief. He says he has secured money through privilege. He now wishes to destroy that privilege by educating the people so that they will see its iniquities.

He therefore has contributed $100,000 a year for five years, which will be used solely for educating people so that they will see how the majority would benefit if the single tax system were adopted.

Only he knows how influential he was in the late British campaign. The thousands he contributed did not win him any love from the Lords and other great land-owners.

His latest plan, outlined to William Marion Reedy after a recent talk at Strauss' Studio in St. Louis, is this: "A corporation is to be formed, consisting of not less than twenty stockholders in twenty different cities of the United States and Canada, each stockholder to pay in cash, $5,000. Mr. Fels may put in the whole $5,000 himself or make up a $5,000 purse among his friends, for whom he will act as trustee.

This will provide $100,000 capital, which is to be invested in vacant land for speculation. The stockholders will receive five per cent cumulative dividends, and no more. Any profits above this will be turned into the Fels fund for the promotion of the Single Tax.

Only vacant lots in cities are to be bought, and each purchase must have the unanimous sanction of the twenty or more trustees.

"When the land is bought a big sign is to be erected upon it, advertising the fact that this land was bought by the "Land Value Speculation Company," for the purpose of holding it for a rise—to appropriate the earnings of the community—and such other advertising as may most clearly outline the vicious policy of land speculation. When a sale is made, that fact is to be announced, giving the cost and selling price, the fact that the company appropriated the difference, etc."

William Allen White, the great Kansas editor, told recently of the purchase of a lot in Emporia for a few dollars and, although he had made absolutely no improvements upon it, he has since been offered a price far above the purchase price, the interest on his money and the small taxes.

The increase in value was not due to Mr. White or anything he did, but to the growth of the city—something to which every citizen contributed.

Take the people out of New York and land values would drop to the bottom, yet the people of New York do not share in the increased values of the land. The profits go to the few, although made by all. All a speculator has to do is to secure control of a tract of land in a growing city, hold it while the city grows until this land is needed, and then sell it at a profit.

From the standpoint of the speculator, the present system is a good one. It is certain that you and I would not hesitate a moment if we could secure land for a pittance today and sell it at a big profit tomorrow. We are all so constituted that we never refuse anything that contributes to our contentment of spirit. But in spite of that fact, the present system of taxation is absolutely unfair and, so far, the single tax offers us the wisest solution of our problem.

I have ever gained the most profit, and the most pleasure also, from the books which have made me think the most; and, when the difficulties have once been overcome, these are the books which have struck the deepest root, not only in my memory and understanding, but likewise in my affections.—A. W. Hare.

---

"If you in the morning
Throw moments away,
You can't gather them up
In the course of the day,
You may hurry and scurry
And flurry and worry,
They are lost forever,
Forever and aye."

---

Art, like flame, has a power of sublimation. Throw into art, as into fire, poison, ordure, rust, oxide, arsenic, verdigris; pass the incandescent matter through the prism of poetry, and you will have a splendid spectrum, and the ugly will become the grand, and evil will become beautiful.

Amazing fact and enrapturing affirmation: evil will enter the beautiful and become transfigured. For the beautiful is nothing else than the holy light of goodness.—Victor Hugo.

---

The troubles that you have in life
Are of your own design;
They come and go according to
The way that you incline.

You must not blame the oil or lamp,
Or pumping wick between;
The fault lies in your own neglect:
Your burner is not clean.—Bramley Kite.

---

To be rather than to seem, to ring true at all times, to be taken at my face value whatever that may be, to deceive no one least of all myself, this is the kind of honesty that is, indeed, the best policy.

Successful Advertising and Selling Campaign of an Undertaker : by W. E. Gerry

A Talk Before the Chicago Advertising Association, by the Vice-President and General Manager of the Western Casket and Undertaking Company

THERE is no mystery about the successful advertising and selling of caskets, although it is a much more difficult proposition than advertising food or clothing or automobiles.

Public confidence can be won through honest, logical advertising, showing how the application of advanced business methods to the undertaking business can save the buyer money.

You are all, no doubt, familiar with the origin of the undertaking business. Originally, when the population was small, when a death occurred in a family, the relatives went to the nearest carpenter they knew, who nailed a few boards together and delivered them to the family. As the communities became larger, the carpenter became sort of an assistant to the family friends in taking care of the dead, and it became necessary for him to keep a few caskets in stock and thus the modern undertaker developed.

The undertaking business, except in so far as the designs and quality of the caskets are concerned, has advanced very, very little in the last twenty-five years. The retail end of the undertaking business is fifty years behind anything else required in every day life. Embalming, of course, is progressing, but it is a minor detail. The business was handicapped by a large number of men being engaged in it for a small volume of business.

In this city we have 410 licensed establishments with their attendant expenses, averaging about three men to the place, meaning approximately 1,200 men in this city to take care of an average business of 100 funerals a day. The expenses of these establishments, their light, heat, rent and advertising, are a great burden.

The Plan

Our idea was to reduce the number of establishments, concentrate the business, distribute direct from the manufacturer to the people, eliminate every possible detail of expense and give the benefit to the people.

It is a well-known fact among manufacturers that 70 per cent of the output of all casket factories in this country sells at an average of $12.00 wholesale, and these are the caskets for which the public pays from $75.00 to $150.00.

On that class of goods naturally there is a very small profit for the manufacturer. We, in order to make our manufacturing business satisfactory and profitable, concluded that if we greatly reduced the price to the public, they would use a higher grade of goods and in that way get better services at lower cost. That has been our experience up to date.

The question of the legitimacy of our business I can best answer in this way. I consider any business legitimate that serves the public better than the method they have been using before, and there can be no question in the mind of any man who will consider it, that a manufacturer distributing goods in the way we are, can save, as we guarantee, one half of former prices—we absolutely guarantee to save one half. There is no question about it. We give rich and poor alike a square deal, and we stand ready to give anyone a receipted bill if we fail to live up to our guarantee in every particular.

It is hard to advertise a proposition such as we have. It has always been considered unethical to advertise or solicit undertaking business—it is surely a business—it is nothing else. The reason advertising an undertaking business has not been successful heretofore, is that people in this business have something to sell that is entirely different from anything else that is advertised.

If a man advertises a breakfast food, shoes or hats, you are interested; you need the goods and want to spend the money; but when it comes to selling you a casket, you do not want it and what is more you will not have it if you can possibly avoid it. In advertising caskets we have to go at it from another standpoint. We cannot go at it "hammer and tongs"; we cannot say that it is a special sale and the caskets are marked down to $14.98 today.

How the Plan Works Out

The copy writers of the Mahin Advertising Company have demonstrated that this subject can be handled in such a way that it will not give offense, and yet will, in a negative way, do all that the advertising of any article would do.

We have kept away so far from the use of anything that would seem to be gruesome. We have never used pictures of caskets, but I have never been able to decide rightly in my own mind whether that was right or not. I have talked with other men about it, and there is a great difference of opinion.

We have found one thing in connection with our advertising that is very encouraging. As you all know, we have some competitors, in advertising at least, and we check up the business that is done pretty closely. We find that they get a cheaper class of trade than we do—the riff raff. Our proposition, while it has not appealed to many millionaires, has appealed to substantial people, people who own their own homes, people who appreciate value. That shows that while sensational advertising may get a certain class of business quickly, it does not get the solidity that the other kind does.

But we are not fighting individuals in our advertising; we are fighting the system—the Undertakers' Trust.

And to prove that the right kind of advertising pays in the undertaking business, let me say that our business has grown wonderfully. On May 1st we established a great central office to accommodate our growing patronage—an entire building in the heart of the "loop" district, with rest rooms, watchrooms, three chapels with pews and pulpits and five thousand styles of caskets.

The vote of support of our advertising methods just passed by the Chicago Advertising Association is pleasing proof that we are right in theory, as our own success proves us to be in fact.

Loyalty

By W. H. Tennyson

DID YOU ever stop to think for a moment of the meaning of the word loyalty?

If you look in the Century Dictionary you will find that loyalty is "hearty service in friendship or love, or to a cause." That definition implies a great deal.

A contemporaneous writer has said that, if all the noblest attributes of man are gathered into a superheated crucible, if honor, integrity, reliability, courage, kindness, steadfastness, devotion—all the qualities that make for manliness, are reduced to a single essential, there will remain in its fullest, finest and most beautiful form, loyalty.

The loyal citizen aims to serve his country. To serve his country he must serve his State; to serve his State he must serve his City; to serve his city he must serve his fellow men. It must, then, be the aim of the loyal citizen to serve his fellows. He must make service his motive power, to the end of mutual profit, mutual benefit. Hearty service to a cause is loyalty. Get that fact fixed firmly in mind.

Project this thought of service into the minds of your prospects.

Service is the expression of love in its noblest form. Unconsciously, perhaps, every man serves someone. No man works for himself alone. A man works to maintain himself and his family.

The man who is loyal to his work serves not only himself and family but his fellow men. What greater incentive to do great deeds could any man have?

Let this wonderful quality, loyalty, permeate your entire make-up, the entire make-up of your institution, and obstacles that seem mountainous will dwindle and disappear.

Success, from whatever point you view it, is indirectly attributable to such loyalty. Be loyal to yourself; be loyal to your house; be loyal to your clientele; and success in no little measure must be yours.

The Confessions of a Putterer—and His Decision to Reform: by a Sheldon Student

IT WAS a bit shocking to spend six months in passing through the various branches of study in the Sheldon course, and finally be brought face to face with a realization of the fact that I had been engaged during the first thirty-five years of my life in—puttering.

A half of the allotted years gone by, and nothing accomplished by which I might be remembered for more than a year or two, aside from my own immediate family. This too, in face of the fact that during all these years, I have been right on the eve of accomplishing great things for mankind—something worth while. Tomorrow I will put some really good ideas into practical use, but today I can't quite screw up my courage to begin. In the meantime some other fellow comes along and does the thing while I am just thinking about it.

Twenty years of hard work at things I don't want to do, because I have allowed to remain undeveloped some of the necessary positive qualities that win success. Let's soliloquise for a stickful or two; it may help some other fellow.

How It All Began

The old expression, "poor but honest parents" fits the beginning; death of father in infancy, spells the first disaster. These are the handicaps that are supposed to make a boy grow into a very great or a very rich man. At any rate they are no disgrace, and the boy has no excuse for failure by such a beginning.

Graduating from high school at fifteen seemed to indicate some intellectual ability.

The first bad mistake was made, when I decided the family needed my help more than I needed higher education. I could have given the one while getting the other.

A man may wiggle through this life without a college education, and if he wiggles long enough and hard enough he may accumulate a billion shekels, or win a place in the memory of generations yet unborn; but, nevertheless, I am well satisfied that four years spent in some good college or university would be his greatest asset in the wiggling process—provided he doesn't devote too much of those four years to seeing how many cigarettes he can smoke, or how many of the other fellow's ribs he can cave in under the guise of sport.

The next mistake was in passing up the thing I wanted to do because my friends didn't think it was "in me." I entered upon a vocation that is eminently respectable, and in which some of our best men have found grand opportunities.

The Sheldon course would be worth the price if it taught nothing more than self-analysis. By it I found out that I was a putterer; and having located the fault, it tells me what I must do to get out of that class of undesirables.

Spreading Myself too Thin

Being rather versatile, I could do a little of everything. That is what I did. There wasn't a thing in the shop that I couldn't to, from "starting" the engine to writing the alleged "heavies." I failed to concentrate upon some one branch of the work, in which I might have excelled. I lacked the necessary initiative to put my ideas to the test. I was too all-fired careful to take a chance; lacked the courage of my convictions. If the other fellow started to pull down my beautiful air-castles, I didn't rebuild the weak places he found in the walls, but let the whole structure totter and fall, though satisfied in my own mind that the foundation was solid.

I don't mean to infer that my efforts have all come to naught. In fact in a general way, I have been considered successful. In my interior department, the feeling exists that I haven't accomplished one-tenth of what I was capable of doing.

The Opposing Twins

Self-analysis has caused me to make a pretty careful study of my two personalities, and I am firmly convinced that the man who wrote "The Magic Story" was not imaginative, but stated absolute truth.

As this article is unnamed, you will pardon these personalities. They are my conclusions after a year's study of self, and I have no reason to believe that my problems greatly differ from those of the rest of you.

I am indeed twins. One of me was born in the sunshine of a midsummer day, the other in the gloom and chill of night.

Although the twins are apparently friendly, there is a constant and unrelenting struggle for mastery.

One day the positive twin is in possession, and the world is mine. I plan great schemes for the future, in which all mankind is to be benefited. The way is clear to the laurel wreath. It is not a dream, for I can reason it out to a logical conclusion. All that is required is to go ahead and do it.

The next day or perhaps the next instant, Negative Twin says, "What's the use? The world doesn't need your help and won't accept it if it is offered. Who are you, who deign to tell the more experienced and more capable what should be done? You were born to serve; not to lead."

Positive Twin says, "You can do nothing unless you try. You have the same positive qualities within you that any man had who ever lived. Use them and they will become better and stronger."

Thus the fight goes on.

In the presence of some persons I am jolly and quick-witted; with others, I am morose and dull. At times I speak my mind with force and convincing argument. Then again my tongue refuses to defend a cause that I know is just. When the negative is in control, I can hear the positive saying, "Cheer up; this a good old world after all. What's the use of being Jim Dumps when it is lots more fun to be Sunny Jim?"

The positive urges me to launch out; do something; be somebody. The negative says, "Stay where you are; remember that mistake you made in the dim past when you attempted something? Be satisfied with your twenty-five a week. You can't live very high on it, but you are sure of not going hungry or naked."

The negative says, "What's the good of faith and hope? Death ends all."

The positive bids me look at the sun, moon and stars, the flowers, the grass, the new-born child, the history of man, the emptiness of the world without the influence of the Christian faith.

The Two Ways

It seems then, that there are two ways to take. The positive leads upward; the negative downward. I haven't found even the survey stakes of a short-cut road to success. It's either the one or the other of the two main roads. It's so mighty easy to slip downward, and so hard to toil upward, especially after you have been even unconsciously on the downward grade. It's almost like trying to run water up hill.

However, there's only one answer to the question, "Which way shall I take?"

When the elevator comes along, yell, "Going up!" and climb on. If the elevator isn't running, there's another way to get there.

What I Will Do

Among the things that the past year has taught me, is one point that I want to pass along. Don't spoil the effect of your good resolutions by attempting to correct every shortcoming at one and the same time.

Your enthusiasm won't stand the strain.

Pick out one or two things and stick to them. It will be no snap even then.

When a man spends twenty or thirty years cultivating a patch of negative qualities, he shouldn't expect to graft on positive branches and have them all bear fruit the first year.

There is such a thing as a man being plumb full of theory, and never putting it to practical use. He can suggest to others how they can win success, and be a miserable failure himself.

With this thought in mind, I have decided to make twice as much money and do twice as much good during 1910, as I did in 1909, and the money must be made with due consideration of the "Law of Mutual Benefit."

If I fail, you won't be interested in hearing about it, but if I win, THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER may tell you how it was done.

Waking Up Nick Spratt

HELLO, there's Nick Spratt coming in," burbled Wiggins. "Shall I ask him over?"

The bunch from the office was just sitting down to the table at the club. Wiggins had so far overcome his hatred for Mammon as to sell a block of bonds to an Eastern investor and had invited us to dinner to help him celebrate the size of the commission. Wiggins felt happy, so he wanted to eat—and he wanted us to feel happy and eat with him. Food is digested best in the stomach of a happy man, I suppose—hence feasting at times of joy.

"Sure," laughed Fussberg. "Nick is a crusader against malefactors of great wealth, like yourself. It will do his soul good to reduce your present swollen fortune."

"Everybody have a good time in his own way," grinned Wiggins. "If it makes you feel any happier, Fuss, old man, to make a mock of my altruism, why come on in—the mocking is fine."

"Go ahead, Wiggins, call Nick over before he gets away. You can 'sarcastigate' me any old time," urged Fussberg.

So Nick was called and a place made for him at the table.

"What is the happy event?" he asked, after the greetings.

Wiggins modestly waited for someone else to tell of his financial exploit. So Fussberg took up the parable:

"This is Wiggins' farewell dinner to the proletariat, Nick. He has become a plethoric plute. Hereafter, instead of lifting up his archangel voice in behalf of the downtrodden, he will do plain and fancy oppressing from nine until twelve and from two until four. Widows and orphans a specialty."

"Uncle dead, Wiggins?" inquired Nick.

"No, Uncle is quite well, thank you," intoned Wiggins, quite seriously. "The fact is, Nick, a great deal too much is being made, by some facetious persons, of a relatively unimportant affair. I have sold a few bonds, received the commission, and am doing my best to make merry with my friends."

"Oh no," crowed Dubheimer, "twenty-five hundred dollars commission isn't much of anything! I pick up something like that every few days myself—in my dreams."

Nick Finds Cause for Grief

"Twenty-five hundred dollars commission on one sale of bonds!" gasped Nick. "My good grief! That is as much as my salary for a whole year! And of course Wiggins knows where he can put it so that it will just about double within the next three months. Gee, but some folks were born lucky!"

"You are in error with your unkind inference, Nick," reproved Fussberg, "Wiggins is a serious-minded student of economics, with an earnest desire to reform all and sundry that come within his purview. And if, in the study of the haunts and habits of the Millionairus Americanus he has discovered some of the tricks, he is not to blame if, for the advancement of science, he tries them to see whether they will work."

But Nick Spratt was sputtering again.

"It's all very well for you to make fun, Fussberg, with advertising contracts flying into your mouth like fried pigeons, but, my good grief, what chance has a man on a salary? About as much as a man with a baby carriage in a horse race. Every time my salary goes up a hundred dollars a year, my living expenses go up five hundred. Its fellows like me, Wiggins, that have to pay the interest on those bonds you just sold. Rents are so high now that the ordinary man is lucky to get a pair of rafters and a dinky row of shingles to put over his head. And if the price of grub keeps going up, hens' eggs will be worn as jewels, and the wives of the rich will be wearing small steaks on their hats. I'd like to get out and sell a few bonds, too. But while I was getting a line on the business, my family would be thrown into the street because I couldn't pay my rent. Talk about the folly of living from hand to mouth! You plutocrats have got the prices elevated so that we are lucky to get our hands to our mouths at all—with anything to eat in the aforementioned hands."

Finding an Advertising Manager

"They want an advertising manager down at your place, don't they, Nick?" was the way Socratic broke into the conversation.

"Yes, been looking for one for two months, now. Right there is another place where some lucky genius will carry off a neat little ten thousand a year. Have you heard of anyone to take the place, Socratic?"

"Well, that depends. I've been wanting to tell you about a man for some time, but I was waiting to see whether or not you had initiative enough to find him yourself. Ever give the matter any thought?"

"No, not much. You see, it isn't my business to find a man for the house, even if I am in the advertising department. Of course I'd like to see a good man at the head, but it isn't up to me to find him. Whom did you have in mind, Socratic?"

"A fine lad, Nick. The only trouble with him is that he is suffering from paralysis of the auditory and optic nerves. Now do you know whom I mean?"

"Why I don't know anybody like that, Socratic. Can't he hear or see?"

"Oh yes, he can see high prices and small salaries. He can hear the sound of his own calamity howling. But he can't see an opening as big as Silver Gate. And he can't hear Opportunity hammering on his door like Jim Jeffries at a punching bag. Have any suspicions now, Nick?"

Nick grinned delightedly and rubbed his nose as if he were trying to erase the tortured member—a way he had when he was excited or embarrassed.

Nick Thinks it too Good to be True

"You don't mean me, Socratic?" he staggered. "It's prodigiously flattering to have you say such a thing, of course, but I couldn't take that job. Why I should hardly make a noise when I rattled around in it. I'm only a fair copy-writer and lay-out man."

"How long have you been in the advertising department down there?"

"Five years this coming September."

"Then you were there when Amos Ferry started in, weren't you?"

"Oh, yes, Amos and I started in there together. He was as green as new lettuce, then, and I had the advantage of three years' experience with the Mack A. Lee Company. So I really taught Amos his first moves in the advertising game. Now, he has sprinted far ahead and is the advertising manager of the National Baked Beans Company, at twenty-five thousand a year. Another case of diabolical luck. Amos wasn't a bit smarter than I was; but he made some mighty lucky hits."

"Hasn't your copy made just as many 'lucky' hits as Ferry's?"

Nick's Limitations

"Yes, but I don't know anything about media, contracts, the allotment of appropriation, meeting and dealing with the agency men, digging an adequate appropriation out of the board of directors, and other such stunts."

"Why don't you learn?"

"I don't have the opportunity, the time, or the talent."

"Ferry learned all those things, didn't he?"

"Well, yes, I suppose he did, although I never could see when he did it. We were as busy as bees there from morning until night."

"He lived over at Coronado, didn't he?"

"Yes I believe he did. Why do you ask?"

"I was wondering whether or not he didn't study on the car and on the ferry, going back and forth. Remember anything about that?"

"Oh, he was always browsing over something. Perhaps that was the way he got his knowledge."

"You live out at La Jolla, don't you, Nick?"

"Yes, I do. My good grief! Do you mean that I might learn to be advertising manager of the Junipera Olive Company by studying on the train nights and mornings?"

"Well, how would that do as a starter? Couldn't you post up on advertising data that way?"

"Yes, I suppose I could. But what about the knack of meeting and dealing with people. That's the most serious lack in my equipment. No, Socratic, I'm afraid your kind-hearted dream about Nick Spratt is just a dream."

"Do you suppose, Nick, that you could study up on character analysis, practical business psychology, and the legal points connected with advertising, while on the La Jolla motor?"

"Yes, of course I could, but I don't know that I ever would. I've made up my mind a dozen times to do some studying, but never got at it."

"You really don't care very much about wearing a hen's egg in your scarf-pin or pinning a porterhouse steak to your wife's hat?"

"Well, I guess I do. It's the one big problem with me now, with prices where they are. If I don't do something about it pretty quick, I'll be in the bread-line."

"What do you do on the train nights and mornings?"

"Oh, there is a crowd of us gets together and plays bridge. Anything to pass away the time."

"And you really desire to play bridge more than you desire to keep out of the bread-line?"

Nick Wakes Up

Nick was violently rubbing his nose again, red in the face and grinning. Several times he opened his mouth to say something, and then went to rubbing his nose again. At last he burst out:

"Well, my good grief, I should say not! But that means that I am going to get busy and study like a soph the night before final examination. Of course I can do it if I will quit my kicking and jawing about 'luck,' get rid of my doddering procrastination, and get wide awake instead of dreaming of some impossible Utopia. Here comes Phil with the dinner. Everybody eat hearty. This is a double celebration—Wiggins' and mine. And Wiggins, I'll make your double-chinned commission look like a living skeleton inside of two years."

"And while you are celebrating, boys," added Socratic, "celebrate the successful close of the Junipera Olive Company's long search for an advertising manager. Wells told me several weeks ago that he would appoint Nick Spratt if the lad would only wake up and act as if he wanted the job."

Nick nearly rubbed his nose off his face with his left fist while he shook our congratulatory hands with his right.

The Secret Revealed

SOCRATIC, as secretary of the Nitro-Turbine Motor Company, had just finished reading the annual report prepared by Rhodes, the manager. The atmosphere of the directors' room was murky with unuttered wrath. The silence was sulphurous.

Finally the strain grew too much for the explosive nature of Old Sleddon:

"In other words, Rhodes," and he glared at the manager, "competition is cutting the ground from under our feet, taking the wind out of our sails, stealing the candy out of our baby fingers, winning from us in a walk. And you say you don't know why. Well, I know why: It's all plain enough to a man that wants to see. It's your own mismanagement. Other people are getting the business—taking it away from you—and if you don't get it, it is your own fault."

Rhodes' pale cheeks grew a little more leaden.

The Mysterious Factor in Costs

"I throw up my hands," he groaned. "I have done my best. I have worked night and day to cut costs, keep up the quality, give better service, stimulate sales, and find new and better ways of making and marketing our product. I have studied and analyzed our competitors' methods, equipment, service, product, advertising, and financial statements.

"The situation seems simple. There are four of us in this field. The Powers Company and Spencer & Kennedy are underselling us and making money. The Osseo Motor Company and the Nitro-Turbine are keeping their prices up, losing sales, and losing money.

"So far as I have been able to determine, the conditions in all four factories are practically the same. The Powers Company and the Spencer & Kennedy pay just the same as we do for their raw material and their labor. They have nothing on us in the way of equipment—in fact our factory is a little more up to date than theirs. And yet, somewhere, somehow, they have found a way to reduce costs so as to sell just a little below our prices and still make money."

"I may say," pronounced Ellsworth, the president, glancing sympathetically at the hopeless Rhodes, "that I have personally gone into the whole of this matter with Mr. Rhodes. And I am as much puzzled as he is as to the real cause of our failure—for it amounts to that unless we can find the disease and apply the remedy mighty quick. Point by point and item by item, we have gone over the whole business again and again, comparing ourselves with our competitors. But there is a mysterious factor in it somewhere that we can't locate."

"Just plain mismanagement—that's clear enough," bawled Old Sleddon, banging the mahogany with a belligerent fist. "Give us a change in the management, Ellsworth, and you'll soon be paying dividends."

Rhodes' face flushed. Suddenly swinging about in his chair, he faced his tormentor.

"Well, you can change the management tomorrow, Sleddon," he said in a quiet, tight tone. "I'm through. I can do no more for you."

A Rap at System

"Easy now, both of you," soothed Ellsworth. "We shall gain nothing by going off half-cocked. May I ask, Mr. Sleddon, whether you are prepared to make specific charges of mismanagement against Mr. Rhodes?"

"Yes I am," shouted Sleddon, jumping to his feet. "I've got more money involved in this thing than any one of you, and you can't scare me, Ellsworth. This man Rhodes is a crank and a fanatic on 'system.' He and his Willie-boys down there at the factory spend so much time in monkeying with red-tape and card index tomfoolery that they have no time left to turn out the goods we are supposed to make our money on.

"Every time a man spits on his hands down there, he has to go and write the record clerk a letter about it. Then the record clerk has to enter up the momentous event on a spit card, a hand card, a time card, a shop record card, a stock-room card, on the employe's individual card, and on a cost account card. Then the man has to record the time he took recording the spit business, and then the time he took recording the time. Half the bunch down there is kept busy recording things, and the other half entering up their records in the card files. No wonder the Powers Company can undersell us. Their men work and let the records go to Mombassa."

"All of which is very definite, Sleddon, but scarcely accurate," crisped Ellsworth, "even allowing for the natural hyperbole of a man distressed by the passing of a dividend. In the first place, your memory, upon being refreshed, will tell you that we lost money steadily until Mr. Rhodes took charge for us three years ago. Also that it was by means of this very system of records you are so caustic about that we were enabled to run down the leaks in our business, find our costs, cut down operating expenses—which were eating us up—and fix upon a profitable selling price for our product. It was his vigilance and his orderly methods that made us, for two years, almost invincible in this territory. And he has been more vigilant and more systematic this year than ever before. It's very puzzling, I'm sure."

Putting in the Probe

The president sighed and looked at Socratic, who had been making his usual preliminary contribution of silence. Then the rest of us looked at Socratic and waited for him to begin.

"Do I understand, Rhodes," inquired Socratic, kindly, that these two winning concerns have to pay the same for raw material and labor as we do?"

"Yes, just the same. That's authentic. I'm on the inside far enough to know that there are no rebates or special concessions. Both shops pay the same scale of wages, as I know from reliable representatives of the unions. If anything, they pay a little more than we do."

"And their overhead is the same as ours?"

"Of course I have no way of knowing what they charge off for overhead, but I do know that their executive salaries, superintendence, power, interest, deterioration of plant, insurance, taxes, non-productive labor, office expense, and commissions will run just about the same as ours."

"How about waste and spoilage?"

"Well, that's a very hard item to determine with any degree of accuracy. It is the custom to allow a certain percentage for it in every factory of this kind. We watch ours very carefully, and keep it down to a minimum, but 'to err is human,' and our people will make mistakes—costly ones too, sometimes. People do in all factories, and I suppose Powers' and Spencer & Kennedy's are no exceptions."

"The same thing applies, I suppose, to the matter of expensive office errors and shipping errors?"

"Sure. There is a loss there that every concern, no matter how well managed, has to bear."

"What is the cause of these errors?"

"Why I suppose—granting that supervision is what it ought to be—it is a lack of concentration, or memory, or judgment, or initiative, or thoroughness, or care, or industry, or something like that on the part of the employe. No one is perfect in these respects."

"Do you hire anybody that is absolutely lacking in any of these things?"

"No, of course not."

"Then they all have them to a certain extent?"

"Oh, yes—some more and some less. Those that have more are more valuable and occupy the better positions."

"Since they all possess concentration, memory, judgment, initiative, thoroughness, care, industry, and other such qualities to a certain degree, could they be trained so that they would develop these desirable traits to a marked degree?"

"Oh, I suppose so. And I do instruct them all I have the time for, and the foremen and superintendents are expected to teach their men. But what has all this to do with those other concerns beating us on price. Their operatives are not archangels, are they?"

The Nigger in the Wood-Pile

"Rhodes, you tell me you have an absolute check on every item of Powers' and Spencer & Kennedy's costs. You know to a certainty that their costs are no less than ours—except in this one item of loss through errors. Might it not be possible that they have found a way to train their employes, cut down their errors, and beat us in that?"

"No, I think not! It is pretty safe to assume that they are no better off than we are on that score, since humanity is pretty much the same everywhere."

"No, Rhodes, you're wrong," bit off Ellsworth, moved out of his usual calm. "Socratic has found the nigger in the wood-pile by elimination. There is just where they beat us, since we know that it can't be anywhere else. But how in humid Honolulu do they do it?"

"Remember Bushwalter?"

"Who," roared Old Sleddon, his white mane bristling, "that smooth young chap that tried to hold us up for five thousand dollars, a year ago, for some baled hay course in the Science of Sufficiency, or something like that, to give to our men? I put a heavy spoke in his shiny wheel, thanks be! We don't hire our men to educate. Let them get their education before they come to us. If they are no good—fire 'em. That's my idea."

And the old conservative glared significantly at poor Rhodes.

"Yes, that's the man," went on Socratic, quietly. "Do you happen to know, Mr. Sleddon, that the Powers Company paid seventy-five hundred dollars for courses in the Science of Efficiency for their men? And that Spencer & Kennedy paid six thousand for theirs?"

"More fools they, if they did!" growled Sleddon, a little taken aback.

"So that is it," Ellsworth ground through his teeth. "Well, you have no one but yourself to thank, Sleddon, for this passed dividend and the black cloud that glooms over our future. We should have had the same system of education in our factory, office, and sales force if you hadn't fought it to the last ditch, and finally swung Whiting over with you."

"Good thing I did, too," grunted the old man, obstinately. "We should have been just five thousand dollars poorer than we are now, besides having a lot of high-brows studying books and getting too all-fired smart to work with their hands. You can't make me believe that a lot of dinky little books by some man that never saw a power lathe or a drill press can have any effect on the profits and losses of the motor business. It's too far-fetched."

Men vs. Machinery

"Which costs us the most, Mr. Sleddon," Socratic wanted to know, "the machine, or the man that runs it—in the long run?"

"Why, the man, I suppose."

"And how do we increase the efficiency and output of a machine, if at all?"

"Why, by getting a better man to run it."

"What did we pay for that new automatic screw machine last January, when we scrapped our perfectly good but out of date old one?"

"Sixty-five hundred dollars, and a good investment, too. The new machine has saved its cost to us already."

"Yes. And if it is a good investment to put sixty-five hundred dollars into a mere machine, how much do you figure it would pay us to invest a little in improving the men that work the machines?"

"Case isn't parallel, Socratic. When a machine gets out of date, we scrap it. When a man proves inefficient, we fire him—or ought to," glaring again at Rhodes, who, looking better than he had for weeks, smiled back.

"You have been in business for forty years, Mr. Sleddon, and have been hiring and firing help all that time. Have you any better organization now than you had when you started?"

"No. It's worse, if anything. My experience has usually been that, when I fired a man, I got a worse and more hopeless and helpless imbecile to take his place."

"And if firing and hiring won't do the business, what will, Mr. Sleddon?"

For once, Old Sleddon was silent, except for his bearish grunt.

High Service Better Than Low Prices

"How many customers do you suppose we have lost in the last year, Rhodes, through poor service resulting from errors in the sales, accounting, and shipping departments?"

"Hard to tell exactly, Socratic, but every house loses considerable that way."

"If there hadn't been an error of that kind made during all last year, do you suppose we could have paid a dividend?"

"Well, a small one, anyhow. That would have swung the balance to the other side of the ledger."

"As a matter of fact, wouldn't perfect service, if we could have rendered it, have more than made up for the difference in price between us and our competitors?"

"Oh yes. A house that can and will give perfect service can almost set its own price."

"And how can we reduce errors and perfect our service, Mr. Sleddon?"

"By good maagement, I tell you," glaring at Rhodes again.

Rhodes had a hard time choking off a laugh.

"By the way, Mr. Sleddon," went on Socratic, relentlessly, "did you know that Powers' secret of advantage over us was no secret at all?"

"No secret at all? I should say not. Just a question of management," again that glare for Rhodes.

Rhodes did laugh this time.

"Have you ever seen this latest prospectus of the Efficiency School, Mr. Sleddon?"

"No. I never waste my time with such rot."

"Indeed! How great a waste of time would you have suffered, how much would the rest of us have suffered, if you had taken a few minutes to find this facsimile letter to the school from the Powers Company:

"The Efficient School.

"Gentlemen: We invested in your course in the Science of Efficiency for all of our office, sales, and factory force after a thorough canvass of the situation. We were being forced to the wall by our competitors, in a hot fight for the business in this territory. We figured that even a slight increase in the efficiency of each of our employees would give us the margin of advantage that we needed.

"The results have more than exceeded our anticipations. The reduction of errors in the factory and office has made it possible to reduce our costs and our selling price. This alone gives us a big advantage. To it is added a steady increase in business and profits through the better service rendered by the sales force, office, and shipping department.

"The tide of business in our territory has set very strongly in our direction since we invested in your course. And there is a better spirit throughout the whole organization—an esprit du corps—a feeling of harmony and mutual benefit that makes it a joy to do business."

Sleddon Buys a Dinner

Sleddon and his obstinacy were forgotten by the time Socratic had finished reading the letter. Ellsworth and Rhodes were almost dancing with excitement. They both began to talk at once.

"How long have you known this, Socratic?"

"If you had only shown that letter to me six months ago, you would have saved me a head full of gray hairs and throbbing aches."

"Why it's as simple as A B C when you know it, isn't it?"

But Socratic was silent until the noise had subsided.

"Bushwalter mailed me that prospectus a week ago, gentlemen. I ran across the Powers letter this morning while preparing for this meeting. Do you wish the Nitro-Turbine to be backed clear off the boards, Mr. Sleddon?"

And then Old Man Sleddon showed that he was a good sport, after all.

"Mr. President," he said, rising to his feet with a smile on his ruddy face—a little sheepish that smile, but it was there, all right—"I move you that the secretary be instructed to send for Mr. Bushwhacker, or whatever his name is, and that the president, the manager, and the secretary be authorized to purchase, at the earliest possible moment, a course in this Science of Efficiency for each permanent employe of the Nitro-Turbine Motor Company. I wish also to move that this meeting adjourn to the dining room of the Cuyamaca Club, where I will stand treat to as good a dinner as this august body ever gathered into their midsts."

Commercial Value of the Quality of Faith

By C. V. HARDING

Sales Manager The Toronto Carpet Manufacturing Co., Ltd.

A RELIGION without faith is no religion. A business without faith has no commercial value except for the assignee.

Faith and belief are closely allied, in fact they are almost twin brothers—belief being born a few minutes ahead of faith. As we believe so we have faith. We believe we can perform a certain duty, next we try to confirm this belief, and when the duty is accomplished we must have faith in our ability, for the deed has been done and can be done again.

The possibilities of this thing Faith, are practically limitless. Given a salesman who has faith in himself, his goods, his firm and his country, and there are really few things he cannot do. If he is consistent, he will back up his faith, first by trying persistently, and if success does not follow at once, he will get into the class with Bruce's spider and go at it again with probably a deviation of tactics. There can be only one result.

A Mother's Advice and What it Was Worth

Faith in human nature is a grand possession. I had an early lesson on this subject that might be interesting. I have almost completed my first score of years in the service of our company and one of my earliest associations was in connection with a man, generally unpopular, and with an undesirable reputation for meanness. Like most boys I rebelled at first and carried my troubles to that great clearing house of juvenile difficulties—my mother.

The advice I received was characteristic, even if it did appear to be unsympathetic. I was told that that man must have some good qualities or he would not be able to fill a good position, and that he was a man who could be replaced only with some difficulty, whereas, on the other hand, stop-gaps like myself could be replaced with the rapidity of a "breech loader."

I was advised that the best thing I could do would be to cultivate the friendship of the man in question, which I did, and spared no pains to assist him in his work.

Did you ever need fifteen dollars very badly when you did not have fifteen cents? I got into that class about this time and that very mean man came forward with the necessary fifteen. What is more, he did not want to accept its repayment unless I was quite sure it would cause no inconvenience.

I found out that the man had a heart. As time went on he told me many truths about myself. They were not always nice to listen to, but having faith in his good intentions I profited thereby.

This one association taught me many things of value in connection with salesmanship.

I learned to believe that he who uses rough words has sometimes good motives behind. I have a great deal of admiration for the man who says what he means while you are there and when you are looking at him.

Faith is a contagious thing. To quote a customer exactly—"I like that traveler of yours because he seems to be all wrapped up in your business and evidently thinks the world of you people down at the factory."

There's a lesson for every salesman!

Personal Advertising

By A. Gordon Ramsay

A FRIEND of mine has a card on his desk which reads, "How to Succeed: Work Like H—— and Advertise."

You all realize the importance of the first part of this injunction, and those who don't are simply lazy. Let them eat less and chew more for a month, and then read the balance. The "advertise" part is less understood.

My friend makes umbrellas, and some of you say, "Well, that's all right, he has something to advertise."

There is the whole point. We all have something to advertise. But the advertising that never shows in a magazine or on a sign board has more influence on individual lives than the wonderful publicity campaigns with which we are all familiar.

Many men say that the lawyer and the physician can't advertise. That comes from the fact that the word has become firmly associated with the bill board, etc., but the fact is, there is more legitimate advertising done in these two professions than anywhere else.

The work of a large majority of us is paid for in salaries. If we haven't umbrellas to advertise, haven't we ability to dispose of?

In the first place, my umbrella friend says he has to use proper "displays" in talking about his umbrellas, and has to talk about them in the right places.

The grocery clerk, too, must talk about himself with judgment and in the right places. If his habits are uncertain and loose, his displays are bad, and whether he uses judgment in his words or not, he will talk about himself where there are few customers for what he has to sell. If he is working as advised on my friend's card, he is finding and making use of ideas.

The grocery business he is in, possibly cannot pay him what his ability is worth. He, however, is advertising. He knows Mr. Bortell, the manager of a large farm implement house. He tactfully seeks a further acquaintance. No, he doesn't say he would like to make a change; that he feels he is worth more money. He gradually lets Mr. Bortell see how much he is interested in the business of the grocer he is with; how certain changes in policy have increased the business.

If his advertising campaign is well carried out, and "the goods" are behind the campaign, Mr. Bortell knows it and will want that grocery clerk at any price within reason. If Mr. Bortell doesn't, I do.

We are all looking for him and in many cases he is hidden for want of a little well planned advertising.

The Human Power Plant and Its Scientific Development : by Robert C. Hopkins

A TINY rivulet threaded its way down the mountain side. Halting, turning and again gathering momentum it carved a pathway among the rocks and pebbles.

From a little brook it grew in volume until down in the lowlands there flowed a great unceasing current of mighty impulse.

Each day witnessed the same steady, positive tide as it sought to smooth and straighten its channel in obedience to Nature's laws.

The Coming of the Master Mind

One day there came to Nature's storehouse a master mind; the stream was gauged; its drainage area determined and soon a wall of masonry was keyed between its shores. The rising waters kept pace with the builders; each course of masonry, as it grew upward, made possible greater depth and greater pressure, until there was confined within the enduring and positive walls a great storage of energy—Ability.

At the right elevation a channel was cut. This conduit starting with the flood gates at the reservoir extended down to the penstock, which, as part of the flume conveyed the water to the wheel pit below.

In this construction great care was taken to avoid loss of head by undue friction and every precaution to insure against leakage was carefully considered. In other words it must be a reliable conductor of the pent up energy stored within the reservoir.

At last the great turbine is installed; the gates are opened; the wheel turns, slowly at first but quickly gathering speed, it proves itself a thing of Action; its product—Power.

Thus from the source of the stream through the various processes of development to the product itself, the master mind has not violated Nature's laws. He has only checked the flowing waste of energy by confining it within walls of endurance where it grew in volume and pressure and thus became potential or stored up energy, the ability to do useful work.

The system is completed by the addition of a turbine or water motor so constructed that motion is imparted by impact of the high pressure current. Through this mechanism the potential energy becomes kinetic or active and the product of this action is power.

How Power is Wasted

To be sure many different materials have been used and numerous details worked out, but all depend upon and have to do with but four things, namely: Ability, Reliability, Endurance and Action.

The whole area of efficiency of the power plant is no greater than the weakest of these. If the dam or reservoir is of inferior construction there is loss from leakage; if it fails entirely, the plant is useless.

Should the canal or conduit be clogged, of insufficient area, or the embankments unreliable, there is low efficiency from this source. A poorly designed wheel built of defective materials with blades bent and broken has its attendant results in loss of power or low efficiency.

It is evident, therefore, that the greatest measure of power is possible only with the right arrangement and development of these four factors however simple or complex their structure.

With power as the product, each is useless without all the others. Insofar as this relation is harmoniously complete is there developed the complete measure of power.

The Four-Fold Man

The same rule applies to the human power plant.

The beginning of the prenatal period is the source of the little spring that trickles down the mountain gathering weight and substance in the journey.

On entering the parental period we find the stream with five additional branches or tributaries, sight, hearing, smell, taste and touch. During this part of life the power plant is begun.

The body grows in strength and endurance and with it the mentality develops, gaining pressure and volume.

Work is started on the canal, that is, the feeling mind unfolds, and often so well is this part of the individual begun that a successful life does not alter the ground work.

The activities of the child which are controlled by the will from the beginning and on through the years may be likened to the evolution of a water wheel. This evolution begins in a small way, first trying out for proper angles and shapes of blades or buckets, finding the right diameter, determining the gate opening, all the while getting more action, greater power, until the point of highest efficiency is reached.

Many there are who have failed in their efforts to achieve success and whose life work ended in low efficiency and disappointment. Their counterpart is found in the leaking reservoir with streams great and small pouring down through the cribbing; the clogged and partly filled canal here and there wasting its contents through low places in the embankment and perchance, meeting with but little resistance from the poorly constructed water wheel the current rushes out through the tail race having accomplished little in the way of power.

The Scientifically Built Plant

Contrast this power wasting device with an up-to-date product of science.

Note the strength and solidity of the masonry, the broad expanse of water gathered from the freshet and held in store for the season of drought; the easy lines and ample capacity of the intake canal as it reliably guides the water to the wheel. The wheel and accessories are products of science and skill and how well they have performed their duty is seen in the tail race where the current shorn of its mighty power reluctantly parts company with the wheel pit. The very hum of machinery is attuned to the key note of high efficiency—the product of positive quality material wrought into Ability, Reliability, Endurance and Action.

Getting Him to Say Yes

By JAMES W. FISK

RIDING on a crowded train the other day I was obliged to occupy a seat with a man who I learned later was a traveling salesman. I was interested in the subject of salesmanship, so our conversation naturally drifted in that direction. Soon we were telling of past experiences in the business game.

One thing that he said impressed me most forcibly. It was this: "When you go in to see a man in an endeavor to sell him goods make him say 'Yes' to every question if possible.

"Ask questions at first that you are sure he will answer with Yes and from those gradually swing around to the questions that you want him to answer in the affirmative. By that time usually he'll have the Yes habit and while of course the rule is not infallible, in the majority of cases it will work fine."

During our conversation a friend of Mr.

Traveling Man (another salesman) came down the aisle and dropped into the seat ahead. Overhearing our conversation and recognizing his friend's voice he turned around and joined in the festivities.

While many stories of successful schemes were related, the plan traveling man number two offered that seemed to have the most merit ran like this: "It's more or less of a gamble, this selling game, so I just make it a point to see as many as I can and consequently have more chances to sell. I have nearly doubled my previous records since I started this plan so I give the plan full credit for the increase."

Are these ideas any good to you? Can you use them in your business?

Stop and think a minute before you forget them entirely. If they are of value, try them out.

Maybe you'll want to make them permanent parts of your general plan of action.

Extracts from the Actual Correspondence between the Sales Manager of the Geo. F. Eberhard Company, San Francisco, and a Live Organization of Business Builders

The Salesman as a Manufacturer

*Being Part of a General Letter to
the Sales Force*

EVERY man everywhere is a salesman. He has his ability, service or personality to sell."

Not new at all, as it is a thought expressed by many a wise business "Medicine Man" or "Chief" for ages past.

Here is another thought—Every salesman is a manufacturer—turning out product.

With this idea in mind, honestly look over your own personal self.

Are you worth duplicating by a plant as a "finished man" product?

If not, what is restraining you from having better contents in the package?

Who is holding the quality down and preventing the delivery of a better finished product?

For instance, why don't you sell more of the items that are "slow" with you?

Again, why do you lose out on dealers' orders that should be yours and ours?

The reason is usually that we all hesitate to take our life, health and work seriously, sanely, earnestly and cheerfully, all of the time.

It's serious, of course, when we lose our health or job, and then most of us do get real earnest,—nothing cheerful about that. But why not avoid such a contingency by beating the issue to the possibility through preventing it with increased efficiency!

When you study the potentiality of the human mind and body, it's a wonder to me that all of us don't wake up and move ahead faster.

The Golden Minutes

To illustrate. Look at the time we waste, let alone the effort, money and opportunities lost through the errors of omission and commission.

One hour in a ten-hour working day is a small average waste with most of us. And, at that, one hour a day is at least 300 hours a year, or 30 ten-hour working days. I do not count sleep as time spent, except as sleep,—and it's good and absolutely necessary for its purpose.

Add together the time you're on the street cars, trains, waiting for customers and so on, each day.

There are few salesmen who do not waste sixty ten-hour days out of each year!

Now, to get wise and improve yourself. Carry your selling talks, bulletins and letters of instructions and study them at every opportunity. Use this odd time to outline and write out your working plan for the next day.

Another idea,—Keep a vest pocket dictionary with you and a good pocket-size book on some sensible man's life or subject, a copy of a good business or philosophical publication and read and reread. When one is mastered thoroughly, get another.

Read sense, write sense, study and memorize that which will help you to have a better sales value as a man.

I conduct some of my most valuable research on the subjects of advertising, selling, business philosophy and the major sciences as I travel on car, train or boat and at that I always find time to sit where there is fresh air and to see what is new as I pass by.

It's the habit of improvement.

Every manufacturer must pay to have a constant study made of ways and means to improve his product. If not, his salesmen cuss him for letting his competitor get ahead.

Cuss yourself into improving,—it's a good habit, if you cuss intelligently.

You are your own manufacturer. You direct the plant and the finished product is entirely in your control.

Make it right!

The Habit of Accurate Speech

I AM mighty glad that you realize the possibilities of appealing to human interest by featuring the athletics and other such activities at the factories. It is interesting to play upon these features to the trade. Anything to get off the beaten path and take advantage of that which will enable you to control and interest the mind of your customer so that you can create desire and formulate the resolve to buy and get the order.

I am glad that you are checking yourself up in the matter of calling the items in your line by their right names, instead of using the expressions, "the goods," "this stuff," and other such generalities. The habit of accuracy is a good one and will help you in dealing with both customers and the house. It will prevent many misunderstandings that now arise as a result of the pernicious habit of indefinite and careless speech.

Don't Blame the Territory— Look to Yourself

I AM writing this letter to discuss the prospective business for the month of May.

I have been taking stock, as it were, of all the units in the organization. It is a monthly custom of mine to spend an evening toward the end of each month weighing up each selling unit, the work that he is doing and the way he is doing it, with an idea of co-operating with him to better his work.

Business continues to increase. Of course, we are adding responsibility all the time. The building up of the various lines in our charge makes it necessary to increase our effort and apply our energy more intelligently every month.

Your principal complaint and the underlying tone in all of your correspondence is the poor showing you are making. I have made allowance and am willing to meet you further, just on your own analysis of the situation. But there is one element that comes before me that I am going to talk to you about, and that is the old subject of "yourself."

A Word About Personal Habits

I do not believe that anyone who smokes incessantly and is careless in the consumption of alcohol is an efficient unit. I cordially dislike cigarette smoking and never have I felt confidence in a man who smokes cigarettes regularly. I may like the man personally, but in my estimate of him, I always allow for that weak point in his character.

I am glad that you do not come under that heading; but you burn up enough cigars and worry the pipe often enough during the day to get in this condition. I do not think that you take yourself, your general health and your peace of mind as seriously as you should.

Of course, I know that you will come back mentally and oppose this idea. You will figure that I am assuming a great deal; that I don't know all of the good work you are doing; that I am unappreciative and possibly enjoying too good an estimate of myself and my own judgment. That is natural.

A friend called on me the other day. The first thing he said was that my old office coat made me look narrow gauged across the shoulders and hunched me up in the back. Now, I thought a great deal of that office coat and particularly its color. I smiled while the chap was with me, but what he said hurt my feelings. I thought my visitor rather impertinent, making unnecessary remarks, butting into my business. However, I have schooled myself to fight against that attitude of mind, so I looked at my favorite office coat. The result was that the next morning I carried over another coat.

A Valuable Kind of Ignorance

I have said that you have the best territory on the Pacific Coast and I believe it. You do not have the largest earnings. You know that.

Perhaps for a while you could blame your poor showing to the territory; for even the best territories go wrong at times. I am willing to concede anything reasonable to work with you, and help you. But the territory has got to show up better. If it is still the territory's fault and not your fault I shall eventually be forced to put somebody into that territory who does not know enough to kick intelligently; somebody who really believes that a little more effort on his part, a little more attention to detail and a little more watching of himself and more serious attitude will produce results; one who has not reached the point where he can see that it is the fault of the customer and the territory that we are not getting business.

There is such a thing as knowing too much about that sort of thing; knowing about too many kinds of complaints; too much experience in explaining why things cannot be done, and not enough clean, red-blooded, enthusiastic effort to do things, even though the trade and the territory are not favorable.

The fact that your account is a little over-drawn does not bother me. I stand ready, as I did once before, to pay up your balance, give you a clean-cut way-bill and let you venture where possibly you will be better appreciated and have a better territory and a better line.

I do not claim to be infallible, but I do believe that the case I present and the thought that I have suggested is worthy of attention and earnest consideration from you. In fact, I feel that if you wanted to you could produce bigger results on every item. If you cannot do so, I, unfortunately, am in the position where I cannot accept your word for it and there will have to be someone else traveling in your territory before long, unless there is a change for the better.

You have worked with me for a long time and you know me well, my ideas, aims, hopes, etc. You know your territory and you certainly know yourself. Now size them all up, think it over and then do something. You don't have to say much to me. It's results, actions, habits, and your efforts that I want to see.

Salesman Acknowledges a "Ginger-Up" Letter

FRIEND EBERHARD: Acknowledging your comment on the small sales—it is easily possible to convert a dose of the nastiest medicine into something really palatable and still not destroy its efficiency.

Lately I have been much troubled with shooting pains followed by a sinking sensation in the region of my pocketbook. This trouble has become so persistent that I have been making some special effort to effect a cure, with the result that while, at times, I thought I detected signs of permanent improvement, I yet find that on an average of about once a week that low-down sensation returns.

This appears to be particularly noticeable coincident with receipt of statement of sales and earnings to date. I am convinced that there is a direct connection between the two.

As a general thing, I am opposed to medicine and have taken a comparatively small amount, but lately I have deviated some from my customary rule and have absorbed quite a little. At present I am taking some "business tablets" which, while not exactly nasty, are far from pleasing to the taste. However, as I first remarked, it is possible to reverse this. Inasmuch as you are a friend of mine, I will let you into the secret.

If you should ever have to take a tablet under ordinary conditions, just shut your eyes, hold your breath and let her go—quick! Don't think of it before or after. You will find it comparatively easy. But if you should require a dose at a time when you happen to be in a country such as I am now in—do this:

Take the first road or trail you see—it doesn't matter where it leads—and walk. Then walk some more. Throw out your chest, open your eyes and use them, open your lungs and use them also.

When you reach an extra high spot, stop and bite off a great big chunk of fresh, clear atmosphere. It's free, and if it tastes good, take another bite. If (as is often noticeable) after this you feel like you wanted to holler, go ahead—let out a yell like a Comanche Indian and follow it up, if you feel so inclined, with a war dance.

Follow up with a long, cool drink of water from a mountain stream. Then go back to your hotel and do whatever work you have in hand.

Making a Mechanic of Slezak

By THOMAS DREIER

Editor "The Caxton Magazine"

OF COURSE all parents desire their sons to succeed. They want them to win fame and fortune. But oftentimes they attempt to drive them into work for which they have no liking—assuming that the natural liking of a boy for a certain profession is wrong and that the experience of the parents is better than the boy's inner voice.

Leo Slezak, one of the greatest dramatic tenors ever born, was destined by his parents for the machine shop. He wanted to sing more than he wanted anything else. He didn't think about fame nor did he long for wealth. All he wanted to do was to sing. His parents opposed him and sent him to a locksmith's school. So opposed to his desire were they that they wouldn't even allow him to sing at home. It was only when he joined the army that he was free to express himself.

His desire to become a singer was too great for all the opposition brought against him. In spite of parents, poverty, lack of education, he fought his way upward step by step until today his income in money is away up in the thousands and his fame is world-wide.

And the secret of his success is Love—love for his singing. He has succeeded because the small voices kept whispering to him that his mission was to sing. Unlike thousands he listened to the inner demand and conquered external obstacles. He did what he wanted to do with all his heart. He desired greatly and the means to gratify that desire were given him.

Society is a conspiracy against individual expression. It seeks to bring men down to a level.

Those who rise above the majority do so only after overcoming the inertia of the majority.

Only big men rise. Those only with big desires become big men.

Slezak, Tiffany, Wanamaker, Field, Roosevelt, Hill, Harriman, La Follette, Folk—all these became big men because they had big desires. And not only did they have big desires but had the courage, the initiative, the ability to gratify their desires in spite of all opposition.

No man does great things without overcoming great opposition.

No man has climbed to the top and found himself assisted by Fate at every turn of the road.

Ask any man who has done big things and you will discover that the road to success was not asphalt covered and straight, but that it was covered with jagged rocks and behind its many crooks and curves the enemy was discovered hidden.

Your best loved desire is the inner voice that is speaking to you.

Listen to it.

Do what you want to do.

If you want to do that which does not serve the majority, you will find yourself courting failure.

But do not repress yourself.

Evil desires sometimes can best be overcome by gratifying them. The wise man takes but one bite of the fair seeming but bitter fruit, and the child carresses but once the lovely candle flame that attracts and holds its attention.

Wisdom is not sold to all men for the same price. Therefore pay the price demanded and take what you desire.

Experience will teach what nothing else ever will.

Your life and your problems must be attended to by you.

But this is true: Equip yourself with a good desire like Slezak and success, either great or small, will be yours.

Gratify your honest desires and you will at least be honest with yourself.

The Half-Billion-Dollar Fire Loss in America—How to Reduce It : by C. R. Lippmann

WHY LET your house, store, shop, or factory catch fire?

Sounds brutal, but you will thank me for asking.

The fire protection of your home and business property is well worth thinking over; for every three minutes a building catches fire in this country—165,000 of them in 1907, almost as many as were built in that year.

Our fire epidemic is increasing every year. In 1908 it amounted to $237,000,000, according to the Fire Underwriters. This is property actually gone up in smoke.

In addition, we paid about $342,000,000 for insurance premiums—making a total fire burden of $579,000,000.

Do not blame the insurance companies for that. They are business institutions entitled to a reasonable profit. And their's is mighty small, considering that conflagrations like the Baltimore and San Francisco fires wipe out the earnings and surplus gathered for a generation. The blame rests entirely with the builders for using combustible material.

The insurance companies paid back for fire indemnities some $135,000,000. But this is more than offset by the incalculable death loss through fire, the cost of fire departments or other fire protection, and the tremendous loss through interrupted plans and business.

"$579,000,000 fire burden! Incredible!" you say; "there are not many fires in our town during the year. I don't see many. I don't read of many."

This attitude is natural. But remember—

You are not apt to hear of any but big fires elsewhere. It takes only a few seconds to snuff out human lives; only a few minutes to destroy the savings of a lifetime; only a few hours to burn up property worth millions of dollars.

Fires Cost More Than Government

Our annual fire burden is so enormous that we can grasp its very immensity only by comparison.

It exceeded in 1908—

The running expenses of the Federal Government for the same year—$555,000,000;

The combined assessed property valuation of Arkansas, Alabama, Nevada, New Mexico and Oklahoma;

The production of gold in the last eight years—about $500,000,000.

The value of new buildings during the year was about $1,000,000,000. We paid about one half of that for fire burden.

Nor do we learn by experience. The number and value of our buildings increase with the years. So does the fire loss.

In 1880, it was $94,000,000, and the population was 50,000,000.

In 1908 it was $237,000,000, and the population was 87,000,000. The increase in population since 1880 is seventy-three per cent. The increase in fire loss was one hundred and thirty-four per cent, or almost double the increase in population.

What the Fire Loss Means to Your Pocket Book

Who has to pay this $500,000,000 fire burden every year? The public at large—which means you and me.

C. R. LIPPMANN

It is not only the insurance premiums you pay. On every article you buy, you pay three insurance premiums.

The manufacturer must include the cost of his fire insurance in the cost of his goods. So must the jobber when they reach him. So must the retailer.

If you pay rent, the latter is high enough to reimburse the owner for the insurance.

According to insurance statistics, the annual fire burden in this country averages three dollars a head. That means that the father of a family of five is taxed fifteen dollars a year for fire loss.

Of course, the figures are only a partial indication of fire damage. Mere dollars and cents can give no idea of the thousands of cases of heart-rending anguish and suffering caused every year by death or injury through fire.

The United States Geological Survey reports from this cause in 1908, 1,449 deaths and 5,654 people injured. This is only a partial list; for the report says:

"These figures are incomplete and do not represent more than one-half the persons who were victims of the fires. Many fire chiefs of large cities fail to report any deaths because they could not be properly included in their annual reports. The number of persons killed and injured here is from five to seven times greater than in Europe. The cause of this gain is faulty construction of buildings in many instances."

What makes this danger all the more terrible is its suddenness. No one can tell when and where it is going to strike next. Even the dreadful Black Hand gives warning. Fire does not.

The Remedy

The yearly per capita loss by fire averages twelve cents in Italy, forty-nine cents in Germany. Here it is three dollars.

The reason for this difference is flimsy, combustible construction. The lumber habit is so prevalent here that even with the cost of wood doubled in the past ten years, sixty-one per cent of all new buildings in 1907 were frame.

Sixty feet of lumber is used each year for each person in Europe.

Five hundred feet of lumber is used each year for each person in the United States.

In Europe, combustible walls and roofs are not permitted,—even in small communities. Why not also here? This would considerably relieve the situation; for most of the fire losses are due to "outside fire contagion" (exposure hazard).

See Bulletin 324 of the United States Geological Survey:

Page 153: "Of the building's entire fire risk that from fire within the building is estimated on an average at forty per cent; the other sixty per cent of the risk being from exterior fires."

Page 154: "While the fire danger from exterior fires to buildings is originally estimated at sixty per cent, the risk practically becomes one hundred per cent in the course of a great conflagration."

Page 157: "Roofs, roof appurtenances, and skylights should be given ample protection from fire without."

Fire Protection for Those About to Build

Your architect would much rather design for you a fireproof or fire-resisting building than a fire-feeding one. The difference in first cost seldom exceeds twenty per cent for the former, and is more than made up by the lower insurance rates, freedom from repairs, better rent, etc.

Fire-fighting buildings are built of incombustible material, and as far as possible designed so as to afford only the minimum of draft for fire. Your architect will be able to guide you in this matter.

Suffice it to say that no matter how small your means, at least the walls and roof should be incombustible.

Hollow spaces in partitions and under floors should be avoided, or counteracted with "fire stops" that shut off the draft.

The chimney should be used for chimney purposes only, and not as a column to support beams or any other load.

Wherever possible stairways should be broken at each floor; that is, they should not form a fire-inviting flue from the ground to the top floor. Elevator shafts should be equipped with automatic fire-proof doors that will close in case of fire.

Every Day Fire Precautions

You will find it worth while to keep this handy for frequent reference by the occupants of your building.

Avoid ashes in wooden boxes, bins or on wooden floors; matches near stoves, ranges, gas jets, etc. Preferably use safety matches. Have metal or non-combustible receptacles for receiving burnt matches. Keep matches so that mice, rats and children cannot get at them. Do not keep matches in the attic.

Avoid open lights. Even candles should be enclosed in a glass chimney or lantern.

Do not carry lamps unnecessarily from one room to another; lanterns are safer for such purposes. Fill, trim and clean lamps by day-light, or else by electric light. Keep lamps away from stoves, ranges or furnaces.

See that curtains or draperies cannot be blown against the lamp, candle or gas jet.

In case of gas jets see that side brackets are not too close to wall nor chandelier burners too close to ceiling. If the walls or ceilings are thus blackened it is a danger sign.

Avoid kerosene, gasoline, etc., in the house as far as possible.

Don't use kerosene to help start the fire in the range or stove.

Don't use benzine with artificial light, except with electric light, nor in a room where there is a stove or range-fire.

Do not illuminate Christmas trees with anything but small electric lights.

Wires for electric lights should be carefully inspected by experts from time to time.

When you smell the gas leaking (unless it be very minor), do not strike a match until the room has been thoroughly aired, letting out the liberated gas. Shut off the gas immediately at the meter and send for the plumber or the gas company. Leaks in gas pipes can be temporarily stopped with soft soap.

Do not place lamps or candles near the edge of tables or stands, and see that they are out of the reach of children.

Do not leave children alone in the house with fire in stove or any artificial light,—except electric light.

The range shouldn't sit against any woodwork, and (unless the sides are exposed), should be backed and sided by brick or tile. Metal covered woodwork is not sufficient protection, as the heat conducted by the metal might char the woodwork and set it on fire.

The range should be set on metal or stone base, and preferably be equipped with a flue to take care of the heated air.

Avoid using stove polishes containing benzine or oil.

When wearing garments with loose sleeves, keep away from open lights or fires.

Do not keep clothing or wash near the fire over night.

The furnace in the cellar should be sufficiently clear of the woodwork so that the latter will not char. It should stand on the ground or on a metal, stone or cement base.

A wooden cellar floor should not come within five feet of the furnace.

Do not overheat furnace, range or stove.

Where flues enter the walls, see that the pipes fit tightly, and are provided with non-combustible collars.

Holes in the walls, partitions or chimneys should be promptly closed up.

In case of fireproof walls between departments in stores or factories, fireproof doors should also be provided.

On every floor should be one or more fire buckets filled with water and other liquid and dry powder extinguishers. Any ordinary bucket will answer. But it is important to always have it filled and in the same place, so it can be found readily. The biggest blaze could have been put out with one bucket of water at the right time. If these buckets stand convenient to the stairways, they are easily available on any floor.

To make them more sightly they may be painted or covered to harmonize with the general color scheme of furnishing.

Unless there is a substantial fire escape in good working order, a rope with a suitable hook that readily fastens on the window sill should be in every room above the ground floor.

If you have a telephone in the house, see that every member of the family is familiar with the call number of the fire department. Also see that every one is familiar with the nearest fire call box.

Fire drills in offices, factories, schools, public institutions, on board ship, etc., are recommended as a necessity. Why not also in private residences?

Even the smallest families will benefit from fire drills by giving the members cooler heads in time of emergency. Disasters are generally the result of minds confused by danger.

What to do When Facing Fire

In case of fire, shut the doors and windows, to avoid drafts.

When using fire extinguishers or fire buckets, pour the water at the highest point of the fire and work downwards; which will also be the natural course of the water.

When curtains or draperies catch fire, pull them down quickly and smother the flames with woolen rugs or blankets.

When your clothes catch fire, do not run, as the draft thus created will only feed the flames. Wrap yourself or have somebody wrap you in woolen blankets, carpets, etc. Flimsy cotton material is unsuitable as it quickly blazes up.

Oil fires cannot be quenched with water, but should be smothered with dry powder extinguisher, sand (from a handy flower pot) rugs, carpets, etc.

In a smoke-filled room the air is clearest near the floor. In many cases crawling will enable you to live through it.

"What can I do to stem the fire danger?" you will ask; "I am only one."

It will pay everybody to help, both from a selfish and unselfish point of view.

And here's how you can help:

Talk about it to your friends, to house-owners, etc., particularly when about to build, to rent or when repairs are necessary.

Bear these facts in mind when you re-roof or build.

Memorizing the Selling Points

By GEO. H. EBERHARD

I WAS asked by a salesman a few days ago: "How do you keep in mind the great variety of selling talks on your lines that you continually use as illustrations when lecturing?"

For a few seconds he had me "stalling" as I did not quickly appreciate that he wanted to know how to memorize the selling points of the line he sold.

And, honest, he was several weeks past thirty-eight years old. The way to memorize was put before him when he first sat up and took notice. Just think—

How did he learn to say Father and Mother?

How did he learn to say A, B, C, D, and etc.?

To spell "Cat" and "Rat"?

I asked this chap and he said by repetition. It was more than that. It was by written and verbal repetition, and by association. Our remembered facts, words, and figures are like pearls on a string. Pick up one and those on either side follow—and their fellows follow them. We can so arrange and classify ideas in our minds that each, as it is brought forth naturally suggests those that should follow. One mighty good classification for selling points is to keep them in their logical order. Then you can remember them more easily and so can the customer. But it takes repetition, written and verbal, to fix them in their order.

Now, at thirty-eight years past, this man did not know that to be a real, efficient salesman he must read and read aloud to himself and others, time and time again, each selling argument, feature, point or idea in the advertising literature and letters of instructions, as well as talk to the trade.

Go to your room and read aloud all the advertising circulars, forms, sales talks and letters you have with you now and I will gamble a five-dollar hat with you if you do it that you will find a wealth of good helps that you are unconsciously overlooking, and you will not forget them again as quickly as if you read without the verbal help.

Write, read, talk, think, live and act the things you want to make good on. You can improve a little with every effort.

Think on this fundamental idea,—that you go forward on what you say and do, and as all men are but boys grown up, the old A, B, C way is the best to memorize intelligently what you want to know and should know.

Imagine a man who started to learn a foreign language by reading it once, like some "meaty" letters I have seen read.

Every sales help the house sends you is "foreign language" until you can repeat it readily, understandingly, and at the right time.

It's easy to be efficient and to succeed. Keep clean, eat sensibly, drink like a man who respects himself, breathe fresh air, rest, study, memorize intelligently, laugh and work.

Take advantage of your opportunities and time as the other fellow should who is not making good—the fellow that you can criticise so easily.

I know it's simple to tell what some one else should do, but don't let my telling stop you. Some people put on airs because they do not make more money out of their work. Don't let them deceive you into wrong ways.

Play at brain-directed life and work. It's more fascinating than A, B, C's and more interesting.

You—The Selling Target

By LUTHER D. FERNALD

Western Representative, The Housekeeper

WRITE the word you—and then go ahead."

A genius in the advertising business once gave me that piece of advice in writing advertising copy. He said it was the most valuable advice he could give. I agree with him; it was.

Try it yourself whenever you want to write something that will do the business. Write you—and go ahead.

The only thing, after all, that the reader of what you write is going to be interested in is what concerns him. So the sooner you get down to business and tell him how what you're writing concerns him, the better it will be for your response from him.

If you'll study the most efficient advertisements you'll see how true this is. It's you all through. The men who write them simply make themselves think of the men they're writing to, not of themselves or of the men they're writing for.

Turn the Thoughts Around Yourself

The aim of all salesmanship, written or spoken, is to make the prospective buyer feel as you want to have him feel about your goods. To do this you've got to translate your point of view into his point of view.

You want your thoughts in his mind. But to do this you've got not only to put into his mind the thoughts which you want to have there, but you've got to put them into his mind as you want to have them there.

So don't ask him to turn your thoughts around and make them his own; do the turning around yourself, and put them into his mind turned around for him.

Drop the word I in selling and write or talk you instead.

Don't write "I am selling," but "You can buy." There's a world of difference between the two. It doesn't interest him that you are selling—except that he can buy. So you're getting down to brass tacks when you use you.

Try it on any selling phrase you have and you will find that phrase immensely more effective when given from the you point of view than from the I.

And the best part of the "you point of view talk" is that you unconsciously hew to the line of the customer's point of view with a certainty and exactness otherwise difficult or impossible. Having his idea of things constantly before you, you forestall objections, as well as make your aggressive points more forcibly.

The you line is the shortest distance to travel in selling; here actual selling travel begins and ends. Preliminaries and discursive talk may be necessary connections to get upon this main line; but the sooner you get there, the sooner you'll sell.

Small Change for the Mental Cash Register : minted by Dr. W. A. Mackenzie

THERE is a difference between mere activity because of necessity and "getting there." You get there because you like to. Stick a pin in a man and he will burn energy in uncontrolled activity. Start a fire in town, and he will get there because he likes to see it. Moral—Set afire to something out on the hill of ambition and chase yourself that way instead of moving just because the boss' looks stick pins in your laziness.

The woolen goods salesman who knows his line so thoroughly that he can tell the way a sheep will wag its tail and likes an Ethiopian waiter because his hair reminds him of his line, though he may be classed as eccentric by the "less-works" will likely be a partner in "Cloth 'Em & Sons," when his addleheaded brother salesman of the same line, who "cottons" to every "piece of calico" he sees instead of having an all-wool character, will be holding down the job of selling dill-pickles in a saccharine-loving territory. Stick to the lamb chops, please; they are easily digested.

The traveling salesman who devotes most of his time to winking or leering at a pretty girl (who though race-sister to his mother, is unprotected from his impudence) is liable to so strain his eyes that he can't see a big salesmanship opportunity when it looms before him.

Billiards and pool are all right, per se. However, while snooping around in the night gown of the sub-conscious, I have seen so many wasted lives grinning out of the table pockets, that every time I hear a billiard made, I think it is the crack of one of those grinning skulls.

The Hindus tell us that a bar room is peopled with the astral selves of its departed devotees, and yet the "young sport" characterizes a non-habituate of such places as a "dead one." Guess his astral focus is wrong somewhere for the Hindu usually philosophizes correctly.

The habit of painting the town red is synonymous with painting the next morning blue, opportunities gray and the future black.

There is just as much difference between prominence and conspicuousness as between a well-developed brow and a pimple on the forehead.

It is more to a man's credit nowadays to be the immediate ancestor of a happy family than to be a seedy descendant of the Pilgrim fathers.

No one ever knew what a cactus could be good for until it gave Burbank a great work to do; similarly, we opine that the prickly dispositioned man simply lives and grows to give the Lord some transformation work to do in a better sphere.

Bill Slackpants, when a young man, 'lowed that "paw's farm was just so run-down, it would'nt raise a fever." Eddy Earlymorn's paw owned the adjoining farm, and Eddy just racked his brains out digging up new stuff to try on that land in a strenuous endeavor to instill in the panorama of red clay a pleasing contrast with shadows of luscious producing loams. Now Bill cleans autos for Eddy and opines that "some men are jist born lucky," for he "knew Eddy all his life and never thought he would amount to nothin'. But you never kin tell."

Say, brother, feel as if you could succeed if you only felt good all the time? Take down the will-saws and rip off the breakfast hour, trim down the luncheon and divide the dinner. Key-hole out the drinks and smokes, inlay a bit of exercise and health suggestion, varnish up with positive enamel, and before you know it you will have the success cabinet all furnished for your life-room.

A man who is always busy building body, soul and mind, frequently can't even hear "Old Man Death" knocking at his body's sanctum, and only admits him when he finally feels that having thoroughly worked his claim in this world, he has business with the "old man" as to successful transportation to the next.

Now, young man, can the photo-conceiving power of your mentality strain itself enough to imagine Abe Lincoln tied to the butt end of a cigarette? If it can, then smoke 'em. A man has to live according to his mind's lens, even if that's foggy; however, if such is the case, better let that old optician, Dr. Soul, take a squint into your "think kodak."

Politics may be all right—for the other fellow; while you're sitting in Hotel Hard-tack arguing with the whiskey drummer as to high tariff on penuchle decks, there may be some other fellows thinking out a cheaper American process that will knock the smithereenes out of any tariff argument that was ever popocatepetaled. You may think that last word is wrong, but most argument is volcanic and leaves little behind it save woe, ruined friendship and wasted opportunity.

The finger that will stick to an employer's stamp is a reliable indicator that its owner will stick in the rut of failure and hang to his poor old job until a better man kicks it from under him.

Watching the clock is liable to strain the success-sight.

Anything that can't be multiplied or added to so that it equals a stair-step to progress you'd better let alone.

I've heard men criticize the way the Government was running things when their wives made the family living.

A rolling stone is all right if you can only make it roll up hill.

Don't be discouraged if you're not of a Jeffries build. You can succeed just as well if every part of your body is small if the soul and mentality are large. If you doubt that good goods and much force is concealed in small packages, try touching the end of a live wire. Be a live wire—and you'll shock the very foundations of life into successful attraction to you.

No, young man, there is no state or national law against a bartender becoming President, but there's a greater law intervenes, that of compensation.

Consider the lilies of the field—the strongest thing they drink is dew.

There's a difference in results from the shine on the seat of a man's trousers caused by pegging away at the old office stool and the shine on the knees put there at a "crap" game.

Leaven means a little thing that'll everlastingly send a big thing swelling skyward. Leaven a big batch of the blues with a bit of earnest work, and watch the batch get light with the laughing gas of happiness. Smile when you are vexed; whistle when you are mad; breathe deep when you are sad, and work when you are blue, and if a Judgment Day ever does come, St. Peter will take you for an angel because of your soul-shine.

There is a difference in the potency of mottos. I learned that at the village barber's house way back in Kidville. Brother Bob—now trying to find souls by sawing off folks' legs up in Ann Arbor—and I were fond of playing with the barber's boys at their home—counting difference in social status as a thing beneath notice. Over the door in their sitting-room swung a vari-colored motto—"What is home without a mother" and Mrs. B. had the longest and keenest tongue that ever dissected an unsuspecting character. One evening, we were playing "I spy" in the bedroom, which was likewise ornamented with the design "God Bless our Home," when the village tonsorialist hove into view all decks submerged in alcoholic exuberation. He had about 25 cents worth of chuck steak with him, supposedly for supper, but forgetting the fact that he carried the bulk of the evening meal with him, it made him sore because Mrs. B. hadn't things all ready, so he let fly with the steak, missed her and caught Bob square in the eye. Beef steak is fine, properly handled, but as an eye salute, it's poor—besides we've mentioned the fact that it was "chuck." Bob and I sailed for home with all faith in mottos lost. Since then I've learned that the true motto is not etched with zepher on tinselled card-board but etched on the soul by the acid of work and the retouching of love and humanity.

Marital love and fidelity are two of the most potent adjuncts to character, business and success building. When you hear the blatant would-be humorist shouting "marriage is a failure," you may be sure it's likely to be true in his case. The greatest trouble with marriage is that the average man handles love as if it was made of pig iron. Love is a fragile and wonderful thing. A violet is none the less beautiful, fragrant and useful because it will wither in the frost, likewise marital love if watered by the dew of tenderness, nurtured by the sunshine of gentleness, and cultivated by true fidelity will blossom in sweeter radiance than any other flower in the garden of success.

Extracting All the Gold

By JOHN E. BULLARD

IN ONE process of extracting gold, sand containing gold is thrown into a sluiceway containing running water. The water washes the sand over little pools of mercury. The mercury dissolves the gold and allows the sand to pass on. If there is just the right amount of mercury distributed over the right area, practically all the gold is taken out. If there is nothing but water, no gold is removed.

What we read or hear is largely sand but in it there is a deal of gold. Some minds seem to possess the judgment or, as we would call it in the process just described, the right amount of mercury to extract all the gold. Other minds seem to contain nothing but water.

Criticism and advice is wealth-bearing. Much of it is of no value, yet it all contains gold. If our mind has the right amount of mercury this will be extracted.

An education does not mean learning things by rote or becoming a living encyclopedia. It does mean so equipping the mind with mercury that it will extract all the gold from the sand thrown into it. There is not a man, a woman or a child from whom we can learn nothing. All the sand made up of conversation or writing contains gold. Some kinds, of course, are richer than others, but all of them contain gold.

If we take all criticism and advice in good part and carefully store it away in our memory to run through the refining process, we greatly benefit by it. On the other hand, if we take it angrily, we upset the mercury, waste our energy and gain nothing.

We should endeavor to give advice and criticism constructively rather than destructively. Destructive advice and criticism is poor sand. It is more likely to clog the refining apparatus than to yield any great amount of wealth.

Constructive advice and criticism, on the other hand, is very rich in gold. It always proves profitable both to the criticizer and the criticized. That is the reason the salesman who never mentions his competitor's goods but who always makes his sales on the merits of his own goods seldom has an order cancelled or a dissatisfied customer. His advice is constructive and shows the customer how he will benefit materially by his goods. As I have already stated, some minds contain a larger area of mercury than others. The less the capacity of the mind you are dealing with the more the need of constructive work. All other work is likely to be wasted.

Extract all the gold from everything entering the mind. The perfectly educated man is he who does extract all of it.

Self-control, good books, conversation with better men than we are and constructive criticism will help.

Will and His Cows

WHO'S WILL? Well, never mind—he's an old friend and schoolmate of mine, and I go around to see him every time I am in the neighborhood of his dairy farm. And, while I'm there, I learn all I can about business. No, not the dairy business particularly, but just business.

Will has fifteen or twenty cows—all more or less Guernseys. Some of them are pure-bred Guernseys—can trace their lineage back through both parents to the finest stock on the little Isle of Guernsey. The others are of all degrees of purity. But every time I go there, the herd as a whole is a little more nearly pure-bred than it was the time before.

As rapidly as possible, Will is selling off the mixed-blood cattle and replacing them with the pure-bred heifers.

But that isn't all.

A cow has to make good to stay in Will's herd.

He weighs what each cow eats, then weighs the milk she gives, and then tests her milk to find how rich it is. This is determined in pounds of butter fat. He knows to an ounce how many pounds of butter fat each cow produces for each hundred-weight of feed that she eats.

The cows whose proportion is lowest he sells, no matter how pure-bred they may be. Those whose proportion is the highest, he keeps, and they become the mothers and grandmothers of the rest of his herd.

But Will has still another way of increasing the profits from his cows. He feeds them scientifically. He has experimented with each cow until he has learned just what proportions of different kinds of feed will enable her to produce the largest result.

He found that he could get better results with most if not all of his cows by feeding bran in place of oats. And bran costs but a fraction of what oats do.

He found that his cows produced more butter fat when fed on clover hay than when fed on timothy. And his land will grow more tons to the acre of clover than of timothy. Incidentally, the clover is better for the land than timothy. These are examples of some of the things Will has found out about feeding his cows for profit.

Then he has experimented to find what effect shelter, ventilation, light, cleanliness, and comfort through protection from insects has on the production of butter-fat. What he learns he puts into practice. He doesn't just find it out and then go off, saying, "That's mighty interesting. I'll bet a fellow could make a pile of money by handling his cattle that way."

Scientific Methods of a Farmer

Another way Will makes money on his cows is by the careful use of by-products. He knows to a cent which is the most profitable, to feed his skimmed milk to pigs, chickens, or calves. He gets his manure out on the land where it will do some good before the rains have leached all the value out of it.

But Will isn't satisfied just to dig out things for himself. He subscribes to and studies the best dairy journals, he keeps in touch with other dairymen—and especially Guernsey breeders—through correspondence and visits. He attends the conventions and institutes, the dairy shows, and lectures and demonstrations at the agricultural college of the university of his state. He buys and reads the best books written on the subject of dairying. And he secures and studies the reports of the Federal and State Departments of Agriculture on the dairy business.

What he learns, he knows, because he uses it in his own work.

The Meat of the Nut

For all this, what does he get?

Here's the place, my good friend in the business world, where you and I had better sit up and take very special notice.

Will has fifteen or twenty cows. They represent a certain investment of capital. The land necessary for their maintenance represents a certain investment of capital.

Will has a neighbor who has a herd of about a hundred and fifty cows, representing at least five times as great an investment of capital as Will's herd. The land necessary to keep them represents at least three times as much capital as there is invested in Will's land.

And yet, Will's actual cash profits are bigger than those of his neighbor, to say nothing of the lighter responsibility, the greater joy in doing the work with a consciousness that it is being done well, and the feeling of power Will has in knowing the truth.

Will's neighbor breeds, feeds, milks, and cares for his herd just any old way to get the work done.

Now really, old man, I've said enough, haven't I? Isn't the moral of the tale sufficiently obvious?

Buying at Ernsting's

I RAN across Robson out West and saw that he belonged. He saw me at the same time and said he felt the same way about it. So we spent a night over our routing for the next two months, with the result that the "skeedoodle" I sent my house the next morning was a carbon copy of the one he mailed to his sales manager.

Afterwards, I was almost tempted to be sorry, at times, that I had committed myself. Robson was most excellent company except on those moonlit occasions when he rhapsodized about "Her."

I got so I would fake up an evening appointment with a customer on the days when Robson drew a thick, gray envelope from Uncle Sam. But, by and by I began to get interested, in spite of myself, and even grew sentimental enough to let the lad read me discretely chosen passages from Her letters.

The result of it all was, that as we began to close in on Los Angeles, where She was spending the winter, Robson would drag me off to the jewelry stores, about three nights in the week, to look over and price solitaire diamond rings.

Now, let it be understood that, while Robson was in alternate deliriums of joy and despair, he could still sell goods, morning, noon, and night. And there was no wobbling of his keen business sense. In this matter of buying a diamond ring, he was as astute as if his brain and heart had been as cool as a frog on a lily-pad. For a long time, he didn't see anything that suited him as to size, color, and setting.

"You see, this is probably the only engagement ring I'll ever have the delicious anguish of buying," he told me, "so I'm going to get all the fun out of it I can. Besides, since this is to be Our engagement ring all our lives, I want it to be just right."

Why the Price Cutter Lost a Sale

Finally, at Riverside, he saw a ring that struck his fastidious fancy. "How much?" he asked the jeweler.

"One hundred and eighty-five."

"H'm—isn't that a little steep for a stone of that size and quality?"

"No. That's my price," answered the merchant. And then he began to extol the beauty and value of the stone and its setting.

"But I can get better stones than this in Los Angeles for a hundred and seventy dollars," objected Robson.

And so they haggled back and forth.

Finally, the seller of gems weakened.

"Well, I'll tell you, Mr. Robson, you will have a chance to speak a good word for me with the boys on the road, so I'll let you have that ring at a hundred and seventy-five dollars."

"Nothing doing," observed Robson.

Having once broken away from his moorings, the storekeeper came down with a crash.

"Well, take it at a hundred and seventy, then. Your good will is worth something to me."

"No, I guess I'd better wait until I get to Los Angeles, after all," said Robson. "I might see something there that I would like better."

"What I don't know about the value of a diamond, Mort," said Robson as we left the store, "is a great and precious store of knowledge. I want the best diamond for its size obtainable. And the only way I can tell about the value is by the price. When the price totters and won't stay put, then I'm all at sea. I'm not going to waste any more time on it. I'll wait until I get to Los Angeles."

Ernsting's Unshakable Policy

So it was that when we went into Ernsting's, in San Diego, two days later, it was on business of mine, and not because Robson was looking for a diamond.

While we were waiting to see Ernsting, a fine-looking old gentleman came in and asked to see some solid silver tableware. After he had chosen what he wanted, he asked the price.

"Forty dollars for the complete set," answered the courteous salesman.

"Is that the regular retail price?" the old gentleman inquired, condescendingly.

"Yes," said the salesman, "that's the price to everyone."

"Yes, yes, of course," assented the customer, "but you see I'm an old friend and business associate of Mr. Ernsting's. And it's customary, you know, in such cases, to give a discount."

"Our rule is one price to all, Mr. Torwick," said the salesman, courteously, but firmly. "Mr. Ernsting permits no exception to it—and makes none himself."

"Well, I'll see him about it," returned the old fellow, pompously. And he strutted back to the office.

Well, do you know, it took that dear old man just three quarters of an hour of taffy, cajolery, pleading, demanding, threatening, and blustering to get it through his thick head that Ernsting meant what he said when he told him that his rule was one price for all, and that he would not break it for the best friend he had in the world, even if he never sold another dollar's worth of jewelry until doom cracked clear across in three plac s.

And, when it was all over, the old man planked down his forty dollars.

Just then I happened to glance at Robson. His face was beatific.

"Right here's where I buy my ring, Mort," he crowed.

* * *

"Yes," said Ernsting, as he handed Robson the dainty little package and took his two hundred dollars, "notwithstanding the panic of the last two years, I have done more business than I ever did before—and made a bigger profit on it.

"When I told the other merchants here that I was going to adopt the one-price policy, two years ago, they gave me six months to get into the hands of the sheriff. They said that the public was so accustomed to little concessions in price on such things as jewelry that it was hopeless to try to change.

"But I believed in the native good sense of the people. Besides that, I have been educating them—beginning by educating my salespeople. They are heart and soul with me in the new system. It makes them more independent and self-reliant when they know that no customer can go over their heads to me and get a better price than they quote.

One-Price Policy Wins Customers

"I find that my customers like it better. They know that they are getting the very best price that I can make them at the very start. That saves them time and worry. Formerly, when a man had beat me down two dollars on a twenty-dollar watch, he was in an agony because he wondered afterward if I wouldn't have knocked off three dollars if he had been a little more persistent.

"Then, too, I get a great many customers who wouldn't trade with me before, because they couldn't be sure of my prices. They are the kind of people who, either from principle or by inclination, will not haggle with a dealer over prices. They are a valuable clientele—and their numbers are growing. They are the busy men and women who haven't the time and can't afford the nervous energy to struggle through a long argument with a dealer in order to get their jewelry at a fair price.

"Then there are people from other cities who are beginning to come to me because they know that they will get fair treatment here.

"So, instead of going into bankruptcy on account of adopting the one-price policy, I am making more money than ever before—and I can assure you I get a great deal more pleasure out of doing business. There's a satisfaction in it I never knew before."

How a Retail Salesman Succeeded

HONESTLY, I sometimes wonder what some retail "salesmen" imagine they draw their pay for. The opportunities for the real thing in this kind of work are glorious—there is so little competition.

The other day, I wanted a collar—needed one. My laundryman's lady assistant had marred my otherwise irreproachable attire.

I went into one of the "swellest" of the stores on State Street, Chicago, and stepped up to the neckwear counter. My idea was to give the "salesman" there a little test.

"I wish to buy a dollar necktie," I said, looking him in the eye. "A narrow four-in-hand in green silk will be about right. There, that one next to the end will do."

He took it out, and I paid for it. While I was waiting to have it wrapped up, I said to my subject of experiment, "Now I have bought something of you—how would you like to sell me something."

He stirred sluggishly in his sleep.

"Sure thing!" he said, beginning to show some signs of animation, "what'll it be? Pair of gloves? Or what shall I show you?"

"Well," I said, "let's see; do you think of anything I really need?"

"Why no," he said, looking at me as if he thought I had taken a drop too much or had broken away from my keeper.

"Well then, tell me—have you ever heard of the Science of Salesmanship? Do you believe that observation is a quality that helps a man to sell goods?"

"Huh?"

Will you believe it, even then he didn't wake up to the fact that one wing of my collar was torn for over a quarter of an inch.

How much do you want to bet that that order-taker is not discontented—that he doesn't think that he has no chance for advancement—that he can't think of any way in which he might increase his sales and his salary? Oh, I wouldn't take your money. It's a sure thing.

A Real Salesman

But I must not leave you with so bad a taste in your mouth.

I was still looking for a retail salesman, so I left my inanimate friend and sought another store. There I repeated the experiment—at least I started out to. But, before I had got to the point of asking my question about his wanting to sell me something, the wide awake salesman—the real thing this time—had called my attention to a collar so built that it reduced the total output of profanity by about thirteen per cent because it let a fellow's tie slip easily. Tactfully leading me along, he demonstrated how the thing worked, let me try it myself to see how easy it was, and finally wound up by selling me a dozen collars where I had intended to buy only two.

The difference between the two wasn't so great, was it? It was only the least little bit more trouble for the second one to sell me that dozen collars. He wasn't any smarter or any better looking than the first one I called upon. Perhaps he didn't know any more about his goods—although it is a safe bet that he did. But he was awake, alive, enthusiastic, cheerful, and showed that he wanted to do his best for me.

So he added a dollar and a half to his total sales that day—on my purchase alone, and probably on many others. Not only that, but his evident desire to serve me has taken me back to him a number of times since. The last time I was in the store, he had been promoted to management of the department.

All because he was willing to keep alive and take a little pains to do his best. Easy, isn't it?

Whoever is satisfied with what he does has reached his culminating point; he will progress no more. Man's destiny is not to be satisfied, but forever unsatisfied—not to succeed, but to labor.

Nature's Laws for Keeping Young and Vigorous : by H. Lindlahr, M. D., D. O.

WHY GROW old? "What a question!" you exclaim. "We grow old because we cannot prevent it; because Nature has decreed it so."

Of course, we shall grow old in years, but if we live in harmony with Nature's laws, we need not grow old in mind or heart, or lose our energy and suppleness of body.

Animals in freedom retain their full vigor and beauty of form almost to the end of life. Among antelope, deer, and elk, the oldest bucks are usually the leaders of the band. In order to maintain their supremacy, they must continually fight and vanquish their younger rivals.

Mental Magic

In order to grow younger as you grow older, practice mental magic. The body is a materialization of your mental images. "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he."

See yourself, in your mind's eye, always as beautiful, active, and vigorous as in the prime of youth; for "a man is never older than he feels, and a woman never older than she looks."

"But," you ask, "how shall we keep our feelings and our looks young?"

That is simple. Bathe daily in the sparkling waters of cheerfulness and in the milk of human kindness. Learn how to relax completely in body and mind. Never entertain discordant and destructive thoughts and emotions.

Mental magic alone, however, is not sufficient to prevent the aging of body and mind. We must also live in harmony with the laws of the physical plane.

No matter how good a watch you have, if you allow it to fill up with dust, dirt and corroding acids it will soon lose time and finally stop entirely. This is exactly what happens to the human clock when it "grows old."

Growing old consists in the accumulation of waste, and morbid matter, earthy deposits, destructive acids and alkaloids, causing the stiffening and hardening of joints, bones, veins and arteries and the gradual loss of physical and mental energy.

Do you ever stop to think how this clogging and corroding of the wheels of life is promoted and accelerated by wrong habits of eating and drinking? Food chemistry as taught by the school of Nature Cure clearly shows that excessive use of starchy and proteid foods is the most prolific cause of disease and of premature old age. These classes of foods create in the body a large variety of destructive acids and alkaloids, such as uric acid, sulphuric acid, oxalic acid, xanthin, creatine and other poisons.

Some Foods that Hasten Old Age

Flesh foods especially favor these morbid accumulations because they are already saturated with the waste products of the animal carcass.

The poisonous xanthins of coffee and tea are almost identical with uric acid. While at first they over-stimulate the organism, the second and lasting effect is to benumb and paralyze heart and nerves and to retard elimination, thus causing directly and indirectly retention and accumulation of waste matter in the body.

For these reasons, we realize that the only way to keep the system pure and sweet and its vibratory activities vigorous and harmonious, is to reduce in the daily dietary the allowance of starchy and proteid food and to use a larger proportion of fruits and vegetables, whose alkaline elements tend to dissolve and eliminate the acid crystallizations and deposits in the tissues.

This becomes more imperative as we grow older. A young and growing body physically active in play and sport, needs a great deal of proteid to build and replace the rapidly changing and growing cells and tissues.

Some Foods that Help Renew Youth

When we pass the meridian of life growth ceases; there is much less physical activity and therefore much less need of starchy, fatty and albuminous foods. Therefore, as we advance in years these foods should be reduced in amount and replaced by the dissolving and eliminating fruits and vegetables. But conventional habits and some doctors' advice usually favor the opposite course.

"You are growing older," says the tradition-bound doctor. "You must have plenty of strengthening foods—meats, eggs, fish, and fowl. You need some form of stimulant. Coffee or tea, and an occasional glass of beer or of Somebody's Old Malt, won't hurt you."

Frequently we hear the statement, "All the young people in the house are now living on the natural diet. But, you know, father and mother are getting old, and they must have their soup and meat to keep up their strength."

Reverse the prevalent ideas on right living, and you are just about right.

The older we grow, the less we need of the heavy, clogging foods, and the more of the light and purifying.

Economy of Vital Force

The majority of people eat too much anyway. Habitual stuffing, practiced through many generations, has made it second nature. Many consume the best part of their vital force in endeavoring to digest and eliminate superfluous quantities of food and drink. Every ounce of food in excess of actual needs wastes vital force. That is why the ancients said, "Plenus venter non studet libenter," a full stomach does not like to study.

Vital energy required to remove useless ballast cannot be transformed into mental or physical energy. Vital force is a primary force. It cannot be eaten. It comes from the source of all life, and is independent of the physical body just as electricity is independent of the bulb which it fills with light.

Food can only furnish fuel material for the flame of life and keep the human organism in such condition that vital force can manifest itself in it and through it.

If food and drink could give "life" they should prolong it indefinitely. In that case the glutton and drunkard would live the longest. But common experience teaches us that the man temperate in all things, best preserves his physical and mental vigor and lives the longest.

How to Grow Younger

Keep in the light. Cultivate the air and light bath. Nothing sweet or beautiful grows or ripens in the darkness.

Avoid fear in all its forms of expression; it is responsible for the greater part of human suffering. The only thing to fear in the world is fear.

Don't live to eat but eat to live. The cook is the chief executioner of King Death.

In the morning do not say, "I am another day older and so much nearer the end"—say, "I feel one day younger."

How can we grow old with all eternity before us?

The great masters or teachers tell us that in the future life, the blessed always appear in the vigor and beauty of mature manhood and womanhood.

Be as a child. Live simply and naturally. Steer clear of avarice and worry.

Cultivate the spirit of content. Nothing ages and furrows the brow so quickly as nagging discontent, suspicion, and jealousy.

Before going to sleep, throw off all the cares and anxieties of the day, and attune your physical and mental vibrations to harmonies of rest and peace and love.

Imagination in Business

By John L. Hunter

IMAGINATION in the lives and thinking of people is one of the most needed qualities of the human race today. Imagination is nothing more nor less than the ability to see things before they are actually brought about.

Imagination of the right kind sees things so real and sees them to so much purpose that the person doing the imagining can bring things to pass, can create, can make out of little or almost nothing the real things of this world.

You can talk about ambition and hope and courage, and stick-to-it-iveness, and a whole lot of these very fine qualities but they amount to absolutely nothing without imagination to show what these qualities ought to bring out.

You go to work day after day, and if you are one of the unfortunates with little imagination, your life is one continual grind, you are a drudge, you are a slave, you have no hope, you are losing your courage, your red corpuscles are oozing out of you.

If you have imagination to picture to yourself the future either in what you are doing now, or some other line that might suit you better, these other qualities that are talked and preached of so much would come to you of their own accord.

Imagination has a good deal that makes it seem like a divine power. It must not be confounded with the capacity to build useless air castles. It must not be mixed with the idea that a great many have of clairvoyancy. We must remember, however, that it is this capacity to see far into things which has made it possible for the great commercial industries of the country to be built. We must not forget that the heads of these industries had the picture in their mind long before the industry had fairly started. Ambition without imagination of the right kind and controlled and kept in proper channels, will lead to vain efforts in countless directions; and the possessor of overwhelming ambition is to be pitied unless he has trained his ambition to see some one course ahead of him, some line of work to follow, some road to travel. Of course, he needs the persistence to stick to it as long as he draws breath.

Without imagination, to what would Washington, Lincoln, Wanamaker, Marshall Field, Rockefeller, Harriman and Roosevelt, amounted either to themselves or to the world. Bring it right close home; where would the head of this establishment have been if he hadn't had pictured in his mind a business of his own. It was the capacity to imagine true that enabled him to see the future ahead of him.

Imagination of the right kind doesn't come of stagnant air, and overstuffed bodies and dissipated energies. It comes from association with out-door creation, from plenty of oxygen, from plenty of exercise, from deep breathing and from thorough chewing and cleanliness.

No one could be shut up a four square box and develop an imagination that is worth a picayune. If you have been trying to do it that way, get out of the box. Give your imagination sunlight and water and warmth, let it sprout, watch it and tend it and see that it grows.

Confidence and Courage

By W. H. Tennyson

ALL SUCCESSFUL business is based on confidence. The men in any business who are most eminently successful are those who, other things being equal, are able most naturally to inspire confidence.

Down in Bristol, Tennessee, there is a life insurance man, William Dickson, to be exact, who makes it his business to inspire confidence. In sending in a $10,000, ten pay life application, recently, he wrote to his superior:

"This is the hardest fight I have had. There were three other companies working on the case. The ——— was talking straight life. I took the ten pay from the start and stuck to it.

"I stood so firm, said nothing reflecting on any company, that the applicant took me into his confidence, and made me his advisor in helping him compare all contracts. I let him draw his own conclusions, and each conclusion brought him around to the ten pay.

"I then swung to a letter from a personal friend; and the applicant said: 'I never heard of such a result before; I am ready to take a policy in your company.'

"He stated, however, that he was talking to so many that he would like to have some off of the first premium. This I was not expecting. However, looking him straight in the eye, I said, 'I cannot do it. It is strictly against the law, would place me liable to a fine, to loss of my license, and render my company liable to a fine, and the contract would be null and void.'

"Then I asked him whether he would consider me capable and faithful as an advisor if my advice was to controvert the law and render the contract void? Or would he consider me capable if I jeopardized my own future?

"The applicant said, 'I admire you for standing by your guns in such a manly and high-toned way. I will take your policy.'"

This experience teaches some valuable lessons.

First and foremost, it shows the commercial value of a confidence-inspiring talk.

Second, it shows that it is better to build up than to tear down; that is, more will be gained by talking for your goods and your house than by talking against competitors.

The institution you represent is only one, but there are many competitors.

Let your arguments be constructive, not destructive.

Again, this experience demonstrates the need for courage—courage to back up one's convictions against all temptation, courage to take a high stand and to hold it without weighing the possible loss.

There is a dialogue in one of the popular dramas now playing in New York illustrating what is coming to be acknowledged as a general truth, that the fear of a thing rather than the thing itself is what depresses men. Had Mr. Dickson feared his competition or the request for the rebate he would have lost out. As it was, courage conquered, and he won.

Finally, his letter demonstrates that he who succeeds is he who goes prepared. Mr. Dickson had studied his prospect's need, and was therefore in a position to offer him the contract that would best serve him and satisfy his own peculiar needs.

Plan your work; then work your plan. Let it be said of you: "This man succeeded because he went prepared"—prepared in every way, mentally, physically and in respect to will.

Spark Plugs for the Success Motor

By LOUIS LEHMAN

INDUSTRY and perseverance can be summed up in the saying I learned when a little shaver. "Grit makes the man, the lack of it the chump. Boys who win, catch hold, hang on and hump."

Every time a man accomplishes his object through perseverance he gets an "increase of strength" which will help him all the more in the next work he runs up against. The more a man, who is really energetic, works, the more he wants to work. Everyone admires a man who is not afraid of work. When we want a man badly, the first one to enter our mind is the one who "tears out the biggest bone."

The first genuine lesson I ever had in concentration was given me by a U. S. Army officer in tactics class when attending a tin soldier school. He was explaining the Battle of Chickamauga and he said, "Young men, a lot of you go slouching and slopping around here as if you had no object in life except to answer mess call or sneak off of the grounds into the tall timber and smoke cigarettes. One of the first things in life you want to do is to get some fixed idea into your heads about what you are to do or be in the future. In this battle, Gen. Thomas said, 'I will hold this line until hell freezes over and then on the ice.' You young men cannot do better than follow this general's example when it comes to concentrating your minds upon a fixity of purpose."

In former times it may have been "shrewd" to sell wooden nutmegs, to "sand" sugar and practice many of the virtues of the "merchants of the old school." Did it pay? How many of these merchants made a genuine success of their business? I am only a young fellow, but every dishonest merchant of whom I have any recollection has been through bankruptcy. A merchant may succeed for a time through dishonesty, short weights, misrepresentations, etc., but Abraham Lincoln's golden saying of "You can fool all of the people," etc., has never been known to fail.

Last week I saw a town go up in smoke. The fire was still burning brightly when the owner of one of the buildings destroyed took a shovel and excavated a foundation for a new building among the hot ashes, although all he had left was his character. This is courage and a great big wheelbarrowful of that.

Tie Your Advertisement Up to Your Prospective Customer : by Edward Booth

THERE are two persons in every good ad-writer: the man who knows what to say and the man who knows how to say it.

Too much cannot be said of the "what to say" part of ad-writing, but for the present we will take up the "how" of saying it.

Advertisements are Siamese Twins

Every advertisement is composed of two general parts—the "attention getter" and the sales talk matter. These are linked together like Barnum's famous freaks.

The securing of attention is the most vital and at the same time most difficult part of the work. Not but that it is an easy matter to arrest attention by a glaring display—by either big type or startling pictures. But what you are after is attention favorable to the proposition. Mark that down in black ink in your note book—attention favorable to the proposition.

Your ad should proclaim in terms, strong, firm, pleasing, convincing: You want it!

The Coupling Link

Nothing should be put into a head-line or illustration that does not pointedly refer to one or all of three things—the name of the article, the nature of the article itself, and its desirability to the reader. The more successfully all three ideas are coupled in the "attention getter" the better. If all cannot be told at once in the picture then the rest should be told in the head-line if that is possible.

Head-line and illustration should be so strongly coupled together that both flash into the mind on first sight of the advertisement. Moreover, these attention getters must be strongly coupled up with the opening lines of the text matter, which must be of type so legible that the arrested attention will be caught without effort—without even realizing that one is reading.

To meet these demands is what every scientific ad-writer is striving to accomplish. Seldom can this ideal be fully realized, but it must always be approximated.

A successful realization of these demands is illustrated in a recent magazine advertisement of the Porosknit underwear. A considerable amount of the full page copy was taken up with a picture of two boys clothed only in the Porosknit "summer length," vigorously boxing. The picture bespoke "comfort" in every movement of active exercise. Across the top of the page appeared in large black script the familiar trade mark name "Porosknit." Under that in smaller print, but large enough to be read at a glance appears, "Summer Underwear," and under that "For Men—For Boys." These were all read at a glance and the last word carried the eye right into the text. The points were all well coupled up.

Advertisements that violate these rules are so familiar as scarcely to need mention. The grocer's advertisement announcing a sale of canned corn with the picture of a pretty girl or a jumping jack is representative.

The Lynx Eye of the Adwriter

Every live advertising man is watching right and left for suggestions on attention getting. It is a subject that should be studied deeply.

A dear old grandmother balancing a pie suggested a fine attention getter for Kingsford corn starch.

Your object can usually best be accomplished by a common sense picturing of the article in use. Let the picture tell the story. A recent ad of the Prophylactic tooth brush did this by showing the corrugations fitting into the crevices between the teeth—the view looking down upon the tops of the teeth.

To know how to get and hold attention and indeed to make any part of an advertisement vital you must know people.

Fully nine tenths of the failures in the writing of advertisements and selling letters is due to the fact that they are written from the viewpoint of the writer, not the reader. And of these failures cleverness is the poison that kills about seven tenths.

Recently among the ads sent for criticism and improvement to the institution with which I am connected, were two form letters which fell to my lot.

The aim of the letters was to sell cedar posts treated with a preservative.

One letter started off with a paragraph on the preservation of the statue of Diana at Ephesus by the ancients and the other began with mummification of the Pharaohs. This might have attracted the attention of college professors and high brows, but one must talk business lively if he would interest a business man looking over his morning's mail.

An excellent way to get attention is to appeal directly to the reader. Tell him to do things. Give him a direct command. "Use Pears Soap" has started many a life-long customer for that concern.

"Don't be an Adding Machine—Buy an Adding Machine" has done loyal service for the Burroughs.

There is a psychological reason for these effects of the command. It somehow hits the mind. Know the mind of your reader and you will find a way to attract his attention. Let us search then for the

Tricky Habits of the Lazy Mind

One great law to hold constantly in view:

The laziest thing nature ever made is the human mind—it will not give you attention unless you compel it.

The next point almost in contradiction to this is:

The mind likes to be taught, but it hungers for the unusual, the new. Let your advertisement teach new things or old things in a new way. The lesson must be a simple and easy one.

Don't try to teach too many things. The mind will shirk if you do. Besides too much begets confusion instead of concentration.

One of the cleverest clothing ads I ever saw taught by a simple picture that all good blue serge cloth was woven from two-strand yarn and that one could easily find out whether the yarn were one-strand or two-strand by untwisting a raveling.

Again remember that the mind in its laziness forgets as easily as it remembers. Frequently a thing has to be repeated again and again before the mind will notice it and almost always it must be repeated for the mind to remember it.

Royal Baking Powder made the people of New York get into the habit of thinking Royal whenever they thought about baking powder, by advertising it at every elevated railroad station. As the New Yorker climbed the stairs to the platform his eye was caught by a blue enamel Royal sign on the riser to each step.

The Gold Dust twins and Cream of Wheat ads cleverly combined the idea of repetition with that of newness. The copy changes each month but the twins and the negro chef are in each ad. A series like this frequently awakens human interest—witness the Campbell Kids.

Suggestion, the Match That Kindles the Fire

Another point about your attention getter—it should be a powerful mental suggestion.

Now a suggestion is defined as anything that arouses thought. Your attention getter should do more. It should arouse imagination; it should arouse the lazy mind. No salesman can sell a person half asleep. But one with imagination kindled—ah! that is different. Your suggestion should start your customer imagining himself enjoying all the conveniences, comforts, savings and gains obtained by possessing the article advertised.

A recent floor varnish ad represented a glistening, varnished floor being struck with a hammer. The head line "Test it With a Hammer" followed by a catch line, "You can dent the wood but you can't crack the varnish," awakened the imagination actively. This also, is the value of the Porosknit illustration.

The force of the direct command is accounted for by its suggestivity, for it is a psychological fact that the body tends to perform the act upon which the mind is thinking. The command "Reach for your pen! Send me a postal!" sets up a strong inclination to follow out the suggestion.

The Talk That Sells

At this point the greatest skill of the ad-writer is called into play. With imagination aroused, the mind shakes off its sluggishness and becomes an exceedingly active traveler. Get busy!

Before attention can vacillate to something called up out of memory by the suggestion, lead the mind to read farther into the ad, by some brief sentence that will appeal to his interest—just as the catch line did in the varnish ad. Speak to your prospect in the shortest, crispest, Anglo Saxon terms. Avoid generalities. Talk to him in particular terms describing something about the article that appeals to his own desires.

Short phrases, a mere telegraphing of a point or two, set in clear type of a size easily read is all that the reader will stand at this point.

Wear the Other Fellow's Shoes

To know what to say, do just what you did when you studied the method of obtaining attention, sit down and picture yourself in the shoes of your customer. Of course the name of your customer is Legion. Nevertheless you can pretty well picture him in your mind's eye as an individual—a composite representing the class.

Imagine yourself working at his work, earning his salary, living his life, rearing his family, paying his bills and above all being busy as he is busy at the moment your advertisement strikes his eye.

Then imagine the things that under the circumstances would attract and please you. Imagine how your goods would appeal to yourself under such circumstances.

The more successfully you fit your personality down into your prospect's identity the more successful will be your advertisement, letter, or prospectus.

Talk to your prospect directly—make use of the pronoun "you." Avoid as much as possible any reference to "I," or "we."

You must please, flatter, attract by an alert presentation of new or unusual thoughts or combination of thoughts.

Thus you lead your man into the reading matter, where you repeat and magnify the effects already produced. Now you are arousing desire.

Your description must usually appeal to the reader's reason, showing him it is to his interest financially or otherwise, to possess the goods; or if a luxury, it must paint the enjoyment of possession in so bright colors that he either desires it more than the price or forgets altogether about the price.

Recall the fact that the mind is willing to be taught. Teach your reader. Show him the wherefores and then the whys and do it in terms that appeal to his self-interest.

If the ad be strongly and simply written attention will have passed the involuntary point before now. From now on, the reader will voluntarily give his attention. The type may be smaller and the description or selling talk more in detail now, but even yet you cannot—mind I say "cannot," not "must not"—impose upon good humor or infringe upon self-interest.

At first the reader will not give you a great deal of voluntary attention. You cannot force him to read on but you may lead him on by gently teasing from point to point.

Concentration is now the watchword. For this reason your copy cannot usually carry more than one or two strong points. It is better to drive one point strongly into the mind than to tap on a dozen points and drive in none. This, however, must be determined by the nature of the thing advertised. The detailed and specific selling talk of the Winton Six Automobile advertisement is good copy for that proposition—it would take too many ads to tell the story a few points at a time and no one prospect would see and read all.

Convince Your Prospective Customer

Throughout, the ad must be written with the air of conviction. Don't be content with merely arousing interest. Carry conviction. Go after orders.

If you are advertising silk underwear, convince the man who believes he can afford cotton only, that silk is his real money saver. Talk business. Talk it with enthusiasm. Make him realize that you haven't said half you can say. Lead him to believe (and let it be the truth, too) that you have scores of good arguments yet to use.

Don't write an ad that will work a reader up to the wanting point and leave him guessing where he can get the article. Some "general publicity" copy is lacking in this. If the article cannot be procured from any retail store handling that line, either state directly where it can be bought or do so in follow-up literature. Try to clinch the sale, have a terminal, as Sheldon says.

The return coupon, conveniently placed, is the best terminal yet devised. It carries a strong suggestion for action.

The Atmosphere of the Advertisement

Equally important to the copy is the set-up and general appearance of the ad. It should attract and please the eye like the personality of the living salesman. And like his personality it should carry with it a suggestion as to the reliability of the article offered and of the house behind it.

Beware of freaky set-ups. Use a good plain legible type—some variety of old style is good—and of a size easily read.

Don't use more than two or three styles of type in one advertisement; remember the value of white space; avoid a number of black display lines; be cautious in the use of rules and fancy borders. Also remember that the set-up must harmonize with the subject advertised—must aid in carrying out the general suggestion of the article—must, so to speak, create atmosphere.

A set-up that would be just the thing for a Galloway Manure Spreader would kill an advertisement for a Tiffany diamond tiara and vice versa.

In conclusion let me suggest that before writing a word you sit down and sell the article to yourself. Sell it so strong that you would buy it if it cost twice the price. Become so enthusiastic over the proposition that you know that every one who can possess or use your article ought to have it if he has to go without meals to get it.

Make up your mind just what you would say to him face to face.

Then imagine him reading that paper or magazine.

Imagine what would catch his eye. Make up your mind on the story you want to tell. By this time the ideas will be popping through your brain like a Fourth of July celebration.

If you are like me, you will be busy now scribbling, rewriting, erasing, and writing over again in the perplexing but fascinating task of "coupling up" your ideas.

You will have to write the ad many times before it will stand all tests and many of your pet phrases will land in the waste basket.

Now it is complete.

Lay it away for a week or two and let it cool. When you come back to it you will be surprised to see how you can improve and strengthen it.

And now get it in before "forms close" and watch the sales grow.

Try

The earth starts every morning on its year long journey round the sun as truly as on the first day of January, and each new dawn, therefore, offers a fresh opportunity to do right. It is for us to determine what the year shall be. The demand on us is not that we shall succeed, but that we try; and to try manfully every day and all day long is inevitably to attain in the end a supreme success.—Youth's Companion Calendar, 1910.

I love sunshine, the blue sky, trees, flowers, mountains, green meadows, running brooks, the ocean when its waves softly ripple along the sandy beach, or when pounding the rocky cliffs with its thunder and roar, the birds of the field, the waterfalls, the rainbow, the dawn, the noonday, and the evening sunset; but the children above them all. Trees, plants, flowers, they are always educators in the right direction, they always make us happier and better, and if well grown, they speak of loving care and respond to it as far as is within their power; but in all this world there is nothing so appreciative as children—these sensitive, quivering creatures of smiles, sunshine, showers and tears.—Luther Burbank.

Criticism is either an asset or a liability. Never listen to a critic who can not suggest something to take the place of the thing he would tear down.—Seth Brown.

How Retailers Should Meet Mail-Order Competition : by George H. Eberhard

From a Talk Before the Convention of the California State Retail Hardware Dealers' Association, Palace Hotel, San Francisco, March 11, 1910

THROUGH the very nature of my profession I am compelled to be a close student of actual business, particularly in that branch of economics known as "Distribution," which in the study of economics comes between production and consumption.

From this work I bring you a few words of caution: Do not forget in your study of the retail hardware business, either as proprietors, workers, or association members, that the trade of the ultimate consumer is what your success must rest upon.

Some jobber or manufacturer desires your trade. He quotes prices. You find you can purchase cheaper elsewhere, and you do so. This is in accord with one of the fundamental laws of doing business for profit. But remember that if this law tells you to buy in the cheapest market as a retailer of hardware, the same law must tell the intelligent consumer to do likewise—buy in the cheapest market.

You Can't Turn Back the Tide

If the mail-order house and parcels post serve the consumer cheaper and better on any item, whether it be hardware, groceries, drugs or clothing, you can rest assured that parcels post is bound to come and the success of the mail-order house is bound to grow. This is the law of progress.

You can no more stop this change or evolution in distribution than the banking interests can stop the final establishment of a postal savings bank; no more than the public service corporations can stop municipal ownership of public utilities; no more so than can the timber and other interests stop the ultimate conservation of the public domain.

All these and many other vital changes must be anticipated by the business men of today. Just because you are a retailer is no reason why the problem should not be studied. Turn the seeming disadvantage into a real advantage.

You and I must adjust ourselves to the coming of the postal savings bank, the parcels post, the city and government ownership of public utilities, a stringent policy of conservation and of government supervision of our affairs. It is going to affect some of us, but it will not drive any of us out of business because eventually that which is good for the majority, the many, is good for the few.

If your community thrives and another competitor comes in, the chances are you will do better—owing to the growth of your community—and that your competitor will find business. Both of you will do a better business than you would if either of you had the field alone.

You Can Take Advantage of the Movement

How can you prepare for these coming changes?

Give more attention to the law that he who serves best profits most. Build your business between your employe, your customer and yourself in accord with the law of harmony and mutual benefit.

Remember that the consumer must better his condition and go ahead in accord with the fundamental laws you utilize in buying and selling or you will not go ahead. Your business depends on the growth and the prosperity of your community. The chances are that the parcels post would benefit you as much as it would the consumer. It would be well to assume that attitude, anyway, and try and make it do that if you cannot stop it.

Another thing for you to do is concentrate your energies on the law to have it made with provisions that will protect you by eliminating the uniform rate throughout the United States, particularly on American-made and sold products.

Please bear in mind that I am not advocating parcels post, nor do I have any direct interest in the parcels post. But it is a condition that you should view from a broad standpoint. Meet it as it exists. This is what I have endeavored to bring out on that particular subject.

About Private Brands

Another thing that you should study without prejudice is the tendency of the retailer and the wholesaler to adopt private brands, to market goods against the standard advertised commodities, because there is a little more profit by assuming the proprietorship of the name or brand. I do not advise against it. When you market something under your own name or when the wholesaler sells you a product under his own brand and name, however, the selling problem must be studied and analysis made with the understanding in mind that you have assumed the position of the manufacturer.

To make a little more money by controlling a product or a trade through controlling a brand calls forth a different selling plan, advertising, and promotion; and you must approach it, if you assume the position of the manufacturer, from somewhat the manufacturer's standpoint. If you try to sell as a retailer or wholesaler, many things will develop that will surprise and disappoint you because you are working out your selling problem upon the wrong basis.

One other point that occurs to me is that you should not forget that you can employ canvassers to advantage in your business. You can work your territory closer and to better advantage than most of you do. In this way, if you have the right kind of canvassers, you can counteract, at a profit, the inroads made by the catalogue house and possibly by your local competitor.

Winning a Shorthand Speed Contest

By MARON WATSON

JUST TO show you that A R E A development is an all around winner, I want to tell you about Fred Gurtler. Or better, I'll set down here what the Gregg writer says about him:

"In the Fifth International Shorthand Speed Contest, held at Washington, D. C., March 26, the famous 'Miner Gold Medal,' the trophy that has been the source of the fiercest stenographic battles ever fought in the history of the art, was won permanently by Mr. Fred H. Gurtler, a member of the Chicago Law Reporters' Association.

"Mr. Gurtler wrote 173 words a minute in the 180-word class dictation. His transcript showed thirty-eight errors, which reduced his possible score seven words.

"In awarding Mr. Gurtler the medal, Mr. E. N. Miner, the donor, commended him for his excellent record, and offered him the congratulations of the Association.

"The Miner Medal has been contested for in five cities and this year was awarded permanently to the winner of the International Shorthand Speed Contest.

"Mr. Gurtler is twenty-five years of age, and began the study of shorthand at Zion City, Illinois, in September, 1904, under the direction of Mrs. L. M. Judd.

"After three years' experience as stenographer and as teacher of shorthand, he entered the reporting field in May, 1908, and two months later was admitted to membership in the Chicago Law Reporters' Association.

"With but a few months' reporting experience, he entered the contest for the Miner Medal in 1909, making a record of 218 words a minute, net, for five minutes on testimony—the highest speed ever attained by any writer of his experience on that kind of matter in a contest. In this same contest on solid matter he made a record of 177 words per minute, net. This remarkable record attracted widespread and favorable attention."

The point to this story is that Mr. Gurtler is a devoted student of A R E A science—and lives it. He always reads his BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER faithfully and says it helped him win the medal.

Evolution of the Salesman—The Beginner —His Limitations : by James D. Kenyon

The Vice-President of The Sheldon School Tells Why Men Attempt Salesmanship, Why Some Fail, and Others Succeed

IF WE could gather together all the salesmen in the world and then separate them into the classes of business in which they are engaged, we should find that there would be only four classes—wholesale, retail, specialty and promotion; and if we should classify them according to their ability, we should find again four classes—beginners, students, adepts and masters.

In the first class, beginners, there are included many men who have spent a number of years in the field of salesmanship, as well as those who have only just started. Unfortunately this class comprises a very large number of those engaged in this profession. There are, however, in the twentieth century, a larger number of adepts and masters in salesmanship than the world has ever before known, and to these masters of salesmanship we owe a large part of the commercial supremacy of this nation.

Why They Begin

First, let us see why it is that people take up this occupation. On close analysis we find that it is exceedingly rare that anyone is early impressed with the belief that he is a born genius in this direction, as is sometimes the case with musicians, artists, poets, etc. The vast majority of those who enter salesmanship do so purely as a means of livelihood and have taken up this line of work for the following reasons:

First: It seems easy. There are so many people engaged in selling who seem to be making a fairly good living that it is attractive.

Second: Apparently but little preparation, if any, is required. The demand for sales-people being much greater than the supply, employers have been eager to hire almost anybody that possesses a presentable appearance. In other professions, and, in fact, in almost every other line of work, a long apprenticeship or schooling has been a requisite prior to employment, but until recently not so with the salesman. In some cases the employers send the man out with very little instruction, to sink or swim, "root hog or die."

Third: The compensation is larger than in most other occupations.

Fourth: The opportunity for advancement, liberty and freedom is greater. Almost anyone can readily see that opportunities for advancement in this occupation are almost limitless.

For these reasons, some or all of them, the young man starts in. Having looked around him and seen others making a good living, apparently with ease, and being self centered, he pats himself on the back and says, "What Bill Jones can do, I can do," and like Don Quixote he charges on the windmill, and also like Don Quixote he soon is crumpled up by the merciless arms of the windmill of antagonism. He soon learns that there is more in salesmanship than he ever dreamed, that he cannot depend upon the small amount of native genius, knowledge or development that he possesses. He begins to realize that salesmanship is a profession and that there is a science of salesmanship. If he has the right kind of pluck, he will carefully pick himself up and begin studying the situation and find out the cause of his defeats and learn how to prepare for the combat. If he has a yellow streak in him, he will probably turn tail and run or join the great army of indifferents, which army is composed largely of veterans.

He may be a very timid man in entering the field, so timid that he runs at the first sound of the guns in battle, and if he does not overcome this, he keeps running until he runs out of the field of salesmanship. If he has pluck he will return cautiously but bravely, gradually mastering more courage and acquiring more and more knowledge of how to proceed, and he will constantly grow; nor will he be content to be a "private" all his life in the army of indifferents, and be satisfied with simply making a living. These indifferents are merely order takers, men who simply wait upon people; and since there are too few real salesmen and the customer must be seen, they are for the present at least continued on the pay-roll, but the time is not far distant when they will be mustered out.

Four Kinds of Prospects

Those who start out to sell something discover four types of prospective customers.

First, those who have the desire to purchase, but have simply procrastinated in acting. All that they need is for somebody to call for the business. The beginners can generally get this business.

Second, those who really desire to purchase but want some special concession in terms, price, etc. The beginner can secure some of this business without making the concession, but he is liable to lose more than he gets.

Third, the prospective customer who is entirely indifferent. The beginner may get some of this business also, but here he has to carry the mind of the customer up through the four steps of attention, interest, desire and decision, and as a rule he has to be stronger than a beginner to do this.

Fourth, the prospective customer who has decided that he will not purchase. It takes a very strong salesman to handle a type of this kind.

The beginner in confronting the second, third and fourth types mentioned is liable to become discouraged or indifferent, with the resultant loss of business. If he is destined to become a real salesman he will begin to study, first, himself, to develop his power of persuasion; second, the customer, to know how to read him and best appeal to him; third, the goods, so as to understand all the points in reference to them and how to explain those points in a logical way; and fourth, the mental effects that he must create in the mind of the customer.

Salesmanship involves the challenge of brains, it means a mental combat, it means that the power to persuade people to purchase at a profit must be possessed and exercised by the salesman. It is not something that grows on a person, as a branch grows on a tree, or the wild weeds grow in the field. It requires most careful nursing, the most careful study, the most careful training. He who realizes this and enters into the student class finds a new world, a world that enables him to unfold himself, that reveals unlimited opportunity, that inspires him with hope, that fills him full of ambition, that makes him conscious of a steadily growing power, and to him is revealed this great truth, "The man who is master of himself is a master of men and a master of conditions."

Have Faith in Yourself

By Milton Bejach

THE CONSTANT aim of a management worthy the name is to lend a hand to the men in the field, to make their way easier, to spur them on to better, bigger and finer deeds. They aim to make the successful man more successful, to help the experienced man who has fallen into a rut, out of it; to inspire hope and confidence in the new salesman. Especially is this true of a new salesman who has not met with the success he or the company anticipated.

It does not matter how much help is extended from the house, no matter how many inducements are put forth, they will not be worth a tinker's cuss if the salesman does not have faith in himself.

"I Will." That's the Alpha and Omega of salesmanship.

The man who starts out with a sample trunk and that alone, had better never start. He had better start out without his trunk and samples and carry confidence—he'll go farther and accomplish more.

The man who starts without confidence, who fears he will not be successful, will have his fears realized. He'll come home without a scratch in his contract book.

In talking with a prospect, the slightest feeling on the part of the salesman that he is not going to get the order is instinctively felt by the prospect—and you know what that means.

Remember, every time you sell a man you are helping him as much as you help yourself. It is—or should be—a privilege to buy your goods and service.

The View Point in Advertising and What Determines It : by Frederick W. Pettit

TO BE able to see is good—to be able to see at long range is better—to be able to both see and grasp a situation from afar is best.

It is the far-seeing mind that is able to grasp more easily the problems of life—be they of diplomacy, commerce, or what we are now specially considering, publicity.

To see afar—to widen one's horizon—suggests an elevated point of view; if one wants to look over the crowd one must get above it.

Great minds succeed because of their ability to take the right point of view of a proposition; they see it as it really is and not blurred by preconceptions as in the case of the many.

Hence has it become a by-word among the few giants of the advertising world that they practically admit that they know very little, and are ever on the alert to learn more.

It has been ever thus with true greatness. He who knows and knows that he knows will say "Thus have I heard"; while he who knows not and thinks that he knows, will say "Thus do I know."

Advertising and Art

Criticism of publicity is like looking at a masterpiece of art—there is just one view point from which light and shade will blend and show the work to finest advantage.

So with advertising, even though it be on a lower plane—there is just one way of looking at a proposition and to find the exact point of view has to be sought.

And why not? Is not the better class of advertising an appeal to the artistic in human nature? If not, why all this ado in matters of elaborate booklets (some of which are works of art), pages in the higher grade of monthlies resplendent with all that goes for taste and culture?

If all this be a fatal error—too artistic—out of place as some aver—then let us return to our muttons and the cold, chilly, unbroken typographical announcements of goods that did the work in earlier days—a style still to be seen in many of the foreign publications across the Atlantic—but from which even they show some signs of emerging.

The point of view in advertising finds an echo in the attitude of a critical buyer towards goods on sale. Will not a woman spend hours in getting the right view point of a gown being fitted on a model? Will she not sit for long hours selecting a Kidderminster rug or carpet or some limoges bric-a-brac or the latest effects in wall paper?

Buyers are ever seeking the view point of an article. Let the same attitude be applied to the announcement of that article, seeing that it is a pen picture of it.

Always Better Advertising

The artistic advertisement carries with it a real value to the responsive artistic mind.

Cheap, scanty, commonplace copy reflects a corresponding grade of goods, while dignified and artistic announcements inspire confidence and loosen the purse strings.

The world is ever seeking bargains, and the plebian buyer regards her chiffons as quite the equal in artistic appearance to those of her patrician sister. They each of them have their view point and the humble sister still plays at high life below stairs.

The tendency of all advertising is towards the better best: no artist, it is said, ever painted his ideal, no sculptor ever chiseled his ideal form and no true advertising man ever wrote or designed his highest conception of what a truly artistic advertisement should be.

Why? Because the view point has no limit of range—one height may give a majestic sweep, just as the hill which gives a broad outline is dwarfed into significance by the view obtained from the summit of a mountain peak.

Aim high. It is better, runs an old saying—one hoary with age—to have aimed at the sun and missed than to have aimed at a tree and hit it. But, cries the man of the street, wherein lies the gain? How shall all this profit us pilots of the advertising craft?

Primacy of Knowledge

Possibly—probably—certainly there is nothing like knowledge of whatever vocation one has taken up. To study—become saturated with all the details bearing on the question one has in hand. The far-seeing student of the day despises nothing as being too small nor anything too great that may throw light on the problems he has been called upon to solve.

So should it be with advertising—an art that is fast approaching a science and calling forth all that is broad and cosmopolitan in minds bent on making it their life vocation. American advertising is good—nay, it is among the best in the world today—but other lands can furnish food for thought to the advertising man in a perusal of the pages of magazines and similar publications.

The view point in advertising will command a broad sweep or a circumscribed one, as the mind is little or great. The ability to grasp the greater lies with the few stars of the advertising firmament who can carry the interests committed to their charge to successful heights—who see things in right proportions, that most difficult of all attainments here below.

A Miracle of Genius

YES, HE is a miracle of genius, because he is a miracle of labor; because, instead of trusting to the resources of his own single mind, he has ransacked a thousand minds; because he makes use of the accumulated wisdom of ages, and takes as his point of departure the very last line and boundary to which science has advanced; because it has ever been the object of his life to assist every intellectual gift of Nature, however munificent and however splendid, with every resource that art could suggest and every attention that diligence could bestow.

SYDNEY SMITH

The PHILOSOPHER AMONG HIS BOOKS

The effect of any writing on the public mind is mathematically measurable by its depth of thought. How much water does it draw? If it awakens you to think; if it lifts you from your feet with the great voice of eloquence; then the effect is to be wide, slow, permanent over the minds of men; if the pages instruct you not, they will die like flies in the hour. The way to speak and write that shall not go out of fashion is to speak and write sincerely. All the gilt edges and vellum and morocco, all the presentation copies to all the libraries, will not preserve a book in circulation beyond its intrinsic date. It must go with all Walpole's Royal and Noble Authors to its fate. Blackmore, Kotzebue, or Pollok, may endure for a night, but Moses and Homer stand forever. There are not in the world at any one time more than a dozen persons who read and understand Plato—never enough to pay for an edition of his works; yet to every generation these come duly down, for the sake of those few persons, as if God brought them in his hand.—Emerson.

THE CORPORATION MANUAL—Statutory Provisions Relating to the Organization, Management, Regulation and Taxation of Domestic Business Corporations, and the Admission, Regulation and Taxation of Foreign Corporations in the Several States and Territories of the United States, Arranged Under a Uniform Classification, Corporation Laws of Alaska, Philippine Islands and Porto Rico, Federal Statutes Affecting Business Corporations, and Digest of Business Corporation Laws of Mexico, and Cyclopaedia of Corporation Forms and Precedents. Edited by John S. Barker, of the New York Bar. Sixteenth Edition. Corporation Manual Company, 34 Nassau Street, New York.

To own the corn right at the outset, I don't know much about the technique of corporation law. But, after sizing up this nineteen-hundred-page book, I think I could learn something about it by devoting a year or two to its study. Of course, I know, the book wasn't prepared as a text-book on corporation law, but as a book of reference. As such, I can see how it would be of great value to lawyers, public officials, legislators, promoters, officers and directors of corporations, writers on legal subjects, credit and collection departments, and other people who control or deal with business corporations. If there is anything necessary to know about the legal side of corporations that has been left out of this book, it will be useless to apply to me for it, because I don't know what it is. As a book, this work is also worthy, being arranged in such a way as to guide the seeker after knowledge to the thing he wants with the least possible waste of time and energy.

FAITH AND HEALTH—By Charles Reynolds Brown, Author of "The Young Man's Affairs," etc. 12mo, cloth, 240 pages. Thomas Y. Crowell & Company, New York.

Dr. Brown, who is pastor of a prominent California church, puts himself in line with progressive evangelical thought in this study of mental healing methods. He has peculiar qualifications to speak upon this subject, as he has specialized in it for a period of years.

He says, in a vigorous discussion of Christian Science, "I began the study of Christian Science twenty-three years ago, in the city of Boston, and under Mrs. Eddy herself. I have in my home a diploma certifying that I am entitled to practice as a Christian Science healer."

With the Emmanuel movement leaders he is more or less in sympathy, but believes that the movement itself could be extended to churches generally only at serious risk. A minister must have very especial qualifications for this sort of thing, he contends. This profession has no more right to encroach upon that of medicine, than the latter has to arrogate spiritual duties. The broad field of co-operation between the two forms the ideal ground of the future. The final chapter on "The Church and Disease" is especially valuable and thoughtful, outlining as it does a broad working creed which the church of the future could adopt with profit to itself and uplift to the community at large.

THE SPIRIT OF THE GHETTO—Studies of the Jewish Quarter in New York. Revised Edition. By Hutchins Hapgood. Funk & Wagnalls Company, New York.

This interesting and almost wierd human record was written about ten years ago, after the author had spent some time in the poor resorts of Yiddish New York. In the preface to the revised edition, which appeared last year, he says that, "in spite of constant fresh immigration, the New has gained over the Old. The theatre has become more 'American,' the newspapers have grown more journalistic and 'practical,' the 'quarter' has been scattered over larger areas, the superficial picturesqueness has diminished, and an integral relation to American conditions has been relatively developed. . . . It may therefore truthfully be said that this book, as the date of its appearance recedes into the past, becomes more and more an historical monument. It records a strange eddy in the current of things American—an eddy which even now is tending to become absorbed in the deeper and broader flood, and which, in the future, is destined to become wholly so absorbed."

Here then is a "life" that is soon to swept out of existence—or, rather, to be replaced by something different. Well it is for literature and history, then, that Mr. Hapgood, caught by its charm, lived where he could get the spirit of it, and pass it on to us and to posterity.

The book itself is a series of studies and sketches of life, customs, and institutions in the Jewish quarter of the East Side, New York City. It is candid, delightful, and beautifully simple in its treatment. This is no record of vice and unloveliness, but of piety, poetry, idealism, and beauty.

THE BIOLOGY OF SEX—By Gideon Dietrich. Samuel A. Bloch, 1332 North Oakley Avenue, Chicago, Illinois.

The argument of this little volume, based on evolution, histology, embryology, physiology, and anatomy is that sex is only secondarily a reproductive function; that fertilization, which is so intimately associated with sex, is not a life-creating, but a life-saving act. The discussion is scientific and logical. Having made his case, the author closes with the words: "A further discussion of the interesting and important social principle must, however, be left for some future occasion."

There is no doubt of the growing interest of the race in what is called "the sex-problem." Just why there should be any such problem it is a little difficult to see. That the functions and laws of sex should be properly taught to the young, so that they may not come to grief through ignorance, is pretty well settled in the minds of all progressive people. There may be some grown-ups who are so ignorant as to need instruction, too. But why there should be a "problem" is a question too deep for me. But, anyhow, there seems to be one, and this little book claims to give the scientific basis upon which discussions of this "problem" can be conducted. It would seem that a knowledge of the subject under consideration might be of some value to the disputants. In that case, it seems to me that Mr. Dietrich has supplied some information that is fundamental, and elementary.

Just what conclusions the author himself would draw from the facts he has presented, it would be a little difficult to say, but I imagine that they would be somewhat unconventional.

THE WISDOM OF RALPH WALDO EMERSON—Being Extracts from His Prose and Verse, Selected and Arranged, with Introduction. By William B. Parker. Brentano's, New York.

THE WISDOM OF SHAKESPEARE—Being Extracts from His Prose and Verse, Selected and Arranged, with Introduction. By Henry Copley Green. Brentano's, New York.

Here are two rich and handsome little volumes that ought to appeal to every booklover, student, editor, and writer. Because here are the best things from these two most quoted writers in the English language, arranged according to topics, and carefully indexed. The books are fine specimens of paper-maker's, printer's, and book binder's art, being gilt-edged, bound in smooth, dark-red leather, with an ornate design in gold leaf on the front cover. There are nearly two hundred pages of the Shakespeare quotations and one hundred and sixty-three of Emerson's.

"The Worthy Self"

By Mrs. Earl Pollock

There never was a life so void
Of all that's good and true,
But kindness, trust and tenderness
Would not new hope imbue.

There never lived a man, so gruff,
That in some gentler mood,
Could not persuade some weaker friend
To do some deed of good.

There never played a happy smile
Upon a friendly face,
But helped to cheer some lonely heart,
Or add to life, new grace.

Our worth of self we hold at hand,
Our value lies within,
Our honest efforts, filled with love,
Make of us noble men.

Smile, cheer and bless, as on you go,
Be noble, manly, true,
Some one is waiting for your strength
To aid them on, anew.

Learn first of all, to know thyself,
Then dare thy best to do,
Come forth, thy work attend, strong-heart,
Mankind hath need of you.

Brevity

Brevity is often the bond between effort and success.

The use of too many words is waste of double time---your own and the man who reads.

A long letter says: "Read me later on."
A short pithy one: "Read me now and note what I say."

Busy men live every minute in the day---reading superfluous matter is not living: it is trifling.

Men who won't trifle won't be trifled with.

Get to the point at once when you've got a point to emphasize; if you've got several, keep them close company.

You must be concise to be understood; you must be brief to get a hearing. That's just what it means: brevity gets a hearing. Many words get passed by.

Brevity is economy.

In an advertisement every word costs money; don't spend words rashly. Your advertisement not only costs more, it is less valuable---double waste.

A clever illustration is brevity idealized: one glance will tell a tale; one glance will make an impression on the mind.

WALTER GOODWIN STORER

The Other Side

"The House That Has a Hoover is a Home"

THERE are two sides to the question of economy.

As a business man, you have studied Business Economy—perhaps reduced it to an exact science.

But haven't you overlooked or neglected the other side of the question, that equally important side, Household Economy?

Figure up what it costs you annually to keep your home clean.

Add to the amounts paid to cleaners and renovators the wages of extra servants to come in and clean once a week or so. Consider the loss through breakage and wear and tear; and don't overlook your wife's doctor's bills, traceable to the strain and overwork.

As against this, put down $125 for a Hoover Sweeper, which will do all your cleaning for twenty-five years. Add from $2 to $3 for the annual cost of electric current to run it, and you have the entire expense. There will be no "extras" to crop out from time to time.

HOOVER
ELECTRIC
SUCTION SWEEPER

Is not a "suction alone" device. It combines Vibration and Brushing with Suction, affording the only thoroughly practical and effective cleaning principle.

It is strong, durable, efficient, convenient, the only machine a woman can and will use for every day cleaning.

Only a moment is required to put it into operation, and the lightest touch will move it.

Hose and nozzle attachments for every sort of cleaning are included in the equipment.

The Hoover Suction Sweeper Co.

NEW BERLIN, OHIO

GET TOGETHER PAGE

In this page our subscribers will have the free use of a four line space for one insertion. In this space they may advertise themselves for sale or may advertise for the services of some one else. Others—not subscribers—to THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER will be obliged to pay 25 cents per line for classified ads. In sending in yours ads you should figure seven words to the line so that there will be no trouble over the insertion.

START AN EASY AND LUCRATIVE BUSINESS.

We teach you how to establish a successful collection business and refer business to you. No capital required. Little competition. Rare opportunities. Write for Free Pointers today. American Collection Service, 165 State St., Detroit, Mich.

SALESMAN COVERING MARYLAND AND PART of Virginia, calling on retail drug and grocery trade, desires a good side line. Address A. Frank Turner, Box 6, Station "B," Baltimore, Md.

WANTED—FIVE SHELDON STUDENTS OR graduates for high grade specialty which appeals to all classes. Opportunity for advancement as salesmen to those who make good. Address A. D., care Business Philosopher.

GOOD LIVE LINE WANTED FOR COLORADO. Nothing but first class proposition will be entertained. R. T. Fox, 134 West 10th St., Denver, Colo.

PRIVATE SECRETARY—CAPABLE YOUNG MAN with experience desires position as private secretary. Sheldon student. Now employed in large railway office. E. S. A., care Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Ill.

SALESMEN, TRAVELERS, MAKING TOWNS where newspapers are published—teaching retail store advertisers, greatly improving their newspaper advertisements. Will educate salesmen understanding newspaper advertising. $75.00 weekly. F. L. R. Silvey, Sales Manager, 1312 Manhattan Bldg., Chicago.

WANTED—SALESMEN WITH RED BLOOD AND determination to sell the Commercial Account Register and Duplicating Books. Territory guaranteed. References and bond required. Commercial Register Company, Buffalo, N. Y.

ONE OF THE LEADING OLD LINE LIFE INSURANCE companies, issuing exceptionally attractive policies, will grant liberal contracts as agency managers to two or three men having records as producers, in the states of Missouri and Illinois. Address Dept. 108, Business Philosopher.

SALESMAN WANTED FOR A PAINT SPECIALTY of singular merit which appeals to jobbers and dealers. Only A-1 trade acceptable. Address Box 26, care this magazine.

AGENTS MAKE BIG MONEY SELLING OUR new gold letters for office windows, store fronts, and glass signs. Anyone can put them on. Write today for free sample and full particulars. Metallic Sign Letter Co., 431 N. Clark St., Chicago.

SALESMEN WANTED—IF YOU ARE A CLERK with natural qualifications as a salesman, I have an exceptional opportunity to offer you. If you are a merchant going out of business and looking for an opportunity to go on the road, my proposition will appeal to you. I want two or three capable men with the work habit, and who have energy plus. I want men with ability to sell goods all day long. I require references, also send an abstract of your qualifications. I have an advertising specialty proposition that interests all progressive retailers. Hundreds of the best retailers have endorsed my plan because they have found it profitable. Samples will go in coat pocket. My best salesmen are making from $500 to $1,000 a month. I want men who can do just as well or better. If you are of the right caliber, think you can handle a high-class, ready-selling proposition, write me immediately before all territory is assigned. W. F. Main, Dept. 117, Iowa, City, Iowa.

125 Brain-Power Business Manual

EDITED BY W. C. HOLMAN

A BOOK made up of the finest business building ideas of presidents, vice-presidents, general managers, sales managers or star result-getters of one hundred and eight leading American concerns. Formerly this work was sold in three volumes for $9.00 a set. We have, merely by using thinner—and better—paper, condensed every word of this into one volume of nearly 1,000 pages. Every paragraph that appeared in the three-volume set is printed in this big book of brains.

Here are the titles of some of the articles: Necessary Traits of Salesmen, What Salesmanship Is, Selling a General Line, Systematizing Information About a Prospect, Planning a Campaign, Preparation Before Approaching a Prospect, Getting The Prospect's Attention, Selling Stocks and Bonds, Tactics of Introducing Yourself, Sizing Up The Prospect, How To Answer Objections, and scores of similar articles. A complete list of the table of contents sent on application.

Price, Postpaid, $2.00

SHELDON UNIVERSITY PRESS
Libertyville, Ill., Dept. 34

Enclosed is.....for.....
Send me your Brain Power Manual.

Name.....

Address.....

For $3.50 you can have the Manual and one year's subscription to The Business Philosopher

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

The Microbe, Discontent

By HAROLD A. HOLMES, President

DISCONTENT is a microbe that does great injury to some people, and is exceedingly beneficial to others. Its action depends entirely upon the condition of one's mental attitude.

¶ If it sours the disposition, breeds jealousy, unbalances sound judgment, ferments the mind into a mad passion for quick riches; or if it urges you to undertake things, overnight, that need years of mature effort to accomplish, then it is doing you great injury and should be banished from the system. ¶ If it kindles a healthy ambition, if it inspires you to do good work today so that better things can be accomplished tomorrow; or if it gives a clearer vision of the great future to be attained, coupled with a willingness to do the necessary climbing, then it is exceedingly beneficial to you and should be nourished and encouraged.

The Caxton Magazine is a periodical for discontented folks, and is filled with inspiration for ambitious minds. ¶ It is not intended for lazy people, and the indolent ones do not enjoy it. It prints straight-from-the-shoulder stories about men and women who are rendering quality service—Tells What they are doing—How they are doing it—Why they are succeeding—and How you can learn from them and apply your knowledge. ¶ Discontented folks can get more real help out of The Caxton Magazine than they can obtain for a hundred times the cost anywhere else.

Send us one dollar, and receive The Caxton Magazine for twelve months. Read the first number, and if you do not get ideas that are worth more than the cost for a whole year, tell us, and your dollar will be promptly returned. You run no risk—so send the dollar today. This is the magazine that you will eventually subscribe for.

The Caxton Society, Pittsfield, Mass.

The Caxton Society

1910

Pittsfield, Massachusetts

Enclosed find one dollar for which send The Caxton Magazine for twelve months. It being understood that if I do not like it, you are to return my dollar promptly.

SHEL

A Travel Number, Delightfully Illustrated

The Book News Monthly

FOR JUNE, 1910

"Oxford the Beautiful"
"The Pardon of St. Jean du-Doigt"
"Summer Days with Bjornson"
"The Pledge of Oberammergau"

"I have read THE BOOK NEWS MONTHLY for a number of years, and I have found it intelligent and entertaining. In my experience, the comments have never been dull; they have seemed to me extremely competent. I regard THE BOOK NEWS MONTHLY as a useful medium of communicating literary intelligence, and as presenting judicial opinions on many of the books of the day."
Hamilton Wright Mabie.

The Book News Monthly
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

$1.00 a year    Sample Copy Sent on Request

ONE DOLLAR BRINGS YOU

"The Rational Life"

By WILL J. ERWOOD

☛ The latest word on: Love—Marriage—Divorce; The Sex Question; Social Evils; The Rational Life; The Conquest of Self, etc. It is as fascinating as a romance. It is live thought on live issues.

It is written for you . . . EVERYMAN!
And for you . . . EVERYWOMAN!

☛ And you too, mother and father, it has ideals for you! Send for it! Read it together! It will help to make "Home, Sweet Home!"

☛ Finely bound, cloth and gold, about 200 pages; just from the press. Postpaid, only One Dollar.

Address: WILL J. ERWOOD

Dept. B.

717 East 22nd Street, Baltimore, Md.

SALESMEN WANTED

The ability to sell to responsible business men, the energy and determination to keep everlastingly at it and references proving your claims are what we ask of you. What we offer you is an opportunity to make from $200 to $500 per month or better. We are selling an advertising campaign that appeals to every progressive retailer, especially the larger merchants. The proposition is high-grade in every respect and can only be successfully handled by salesmen of sufficient caliber to present it intelligently to the better class of trade. Our best salesman has earned as high as $300 in one week. If you feel confident that you can do justice to a proposition of the highest merit, write us now and give references.

A. M. Co., 908 Bisbee Bldg., Jacksonville, Fla.

Are You Going

from Toronto or any other Ontario point to spend the two weeks' vacation from July 27 to August 9 at Sheldonhurst, near Libertyville, Illinois, at

The Sheldon Summer School?

Then join the happy crowd of good and pleasant people who will leave Toronto at four o'clock on the afternoon of Tuesday, July 26th, by the

Canadian Pacific Railway

That way you will get the best accommodations, the most pleasant traveling companions, and special rates. If you want further particulars about the train or the School, or if you want to know about those special rates, write at once to

Milton Bergey

12 Richmond Street, East Toronto

Phone Main 7319

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

SAVE YOUR OLD RIBBONS

MULTIGRAPH OR WRITERPRESS

They're Worth Money

There's no more reason for throwing them away because the ink is exhausted than there would be for throwing away your fountain pen when it's empty. Will you let us prove it and save you 50 per cent.?

Write at once for complete information and "Take No Risk" Trial Offer.

ROCHESTER RE-INKING WORKS

(Incorporated)

18 EXCHANGE ST., - ROCHESTER, NEW YORK, U. S. A.

French Lick Springs

is an all year round resort, famed for its healing waters and the out of door attractions of its climate and scenery. The thousand acres of natural park, walks, drives, golf and other outdoor amusements are charming any season. Hotel is modern in every respect, affording accommodations for 700 guests, with home comforts; all sleeping apartments are outside rooms, light and airy. The winter climate, while crisp and bracing, is dry, sunny and thoroughly enjoyable, and a stay of two or four weeks will prove very beneficial.

French Lick Springs Waters

possess medicinal properties unequalled for the treatment of stomach, liver, bowel and kidney diseases.

Pluto Concentrated Spring Water

is recommended by Physicians everywhere and sold at all Drug Stores, in half pint and quart bottles, costing 15c and 35c.

Write for booklet giving full information concerning the hotel, waters, etc.

French Lick Springs Hotel Co.

THOMAS TAGGART, Pres., French Lick, Indiana
ON THE MONON AND SOUTHERN RAILWAYS

SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

He Smiles!

Because for Him those Wrinkled Trousers will be a Thing of the Past
He's Now Using

"Well Prest"

What are they? Perfect trousers creasers! One for each leg, each one made up of two hardwood pieces, rounded and shaped properly and polished to a finish, waterproofed and joined together by a clever toggle joint arrangement. They are easily adjustable.

TO USE THEM

you slip one into each trouser leg, spread them by the center rod, dampen the trousers along the crease, front and back, and hang them up by the ring for an hour or so, or over night.

That's All—The Deed is Done
No Hot Iron—No Shine
No Springs or Clamps or Monkeying.

YOU SAVE

Pressing Bills
Time and Worry
Wear and Shine

YOU GET

The creasers free after a few times use in tailors' charges saved. Pressing when you want it. Increased wear.

You Need a Pair—You Know It—Get Them Now One Dollar Only

Elmira Machine Works, Union, Broome Co., N. Y.

"Wellprest" is Welldrest

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Own a Home in Area

HOW WOULD you like to live on the shores of one of the most beautiful of all the famous lakes of Northern Illinois, surrounded by hills and forests, near the campus of a growing university, and yet near enough to Chicago to attend to your business in that city every day?

How would you like to own a home where you would have all the quiet, comfort, cleanliness, and beauty of the country?

How would you like to invest a few dollars in real estate in a growing suburb, within thirty-two miles of the second greatest city in America—a city whose past growth and present prospects make it certain that it will be the greatest city on earth within two or three decades?

How would you like to live where your children can have the advantages of a school where they will be educated the Area way?

Well, now is your chance.

Last summer I opened up to private sale the Ravine View Subdivision of the Village of Area, Illinois. This subdivision is bounded on the north by the grounds and buildings of The Sheldon School, on the east by the campus of Sheldon Commercial University, on the south by the Libertyville road and the Libertyville branch of the Chicago & Milwaukee Electric Railway, and on the west by a portion of the village of Area. A number of lots were sold to my personal friends, but I reserved some of the best for this sale. In all, however, there are only a limited number. First come, first served.

These lots are fifty feet wide on broad streets, and run one hundred and fifty feet deep to a commodious alley. The land is slightly rolling, high, and well drained. Your home will be served with gas and electricity.

Area is about an hour's ride from Chicago by the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway or the Soo Line. Many people live in this neighborhood and go into Chicago to business every day.

Now Here is the Proposition

You can buy one of these lots at a very low figure and on easy terms. Then you can either hold it for the rise—and it will be a rapid one—that will surely come, or you can build your home on it and live in God's country.

Write and ask me about it, and I will tell you the particulars. But do it NOW. Tomorrow may be too late.

A. F. Sheldon, Libertyville, Illinois

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

A $100 Typewriter for 17 cents a Day

Please read the headline over again. Then its tremendous significance will dawn upon you.

An Oliver Typewriter—the standard visible writer—the $100 machine—the most highly perfected typewriter on the market—yours for 17 cents a day!

The typewriter whose conquest of the commercial world is a matter of business history—yours for 17 cents a day!

The typewriter that is equipped with scores of such conveniences as "The Balance Shift"—"The Ruling Device"—"The Double Release"—"The Locomotive Base"—"The Automatic Spacer"—"The Automatic Tabulator"—"The Disappearing Indicator"—"The Adjustable Paper Fingers"—"The Scientific Condensed Keyboard"—all

Yours for
17 cents a Day

We announced this new sales plan recently, just to feel the pulse of the people. Simply a small cash payment—then 17 cents a day. That is the plan in a nutshell.

The result has been such a deluge of applications for machines that we are simply astounded.

The demand comes from people of all classes, all ages, all occupations. The majority of inquiries have come from people of known financial standing who were attracted by the novelty of the proposition. An impressive demonstration of the immense popularity of the Oliver Typewriter.

A startling confirmation of our belief that the Era of Universal Typewriting is at hand.

A Quarter of a Million People
Are Making Money with

The OLIVER
Typewriter
The Standard Visible Writer

The Oliver Typewriter is a money-maker, right from the word "go." So easy to run that beginners soon get in the "expert" class. Earn as you learn. Let the machine pay the 17 cents a day—and all above that is yours.

Wherever you are there's work to be done and money to be made by using the Oliver. The business world is calling for Oliver operators. There are not enough to supply the demand. Their salaries are considerably above those of many classes of workers.

"An Oliver Typewriter in Every Home"

That is our battle cry today. We have made the Oliver supreme in usefulness and absolutely indispensable in business. Now comes the conquest of the home.

The simplicity and strength of the Oliver fit it for family use. It is becoming an important factor in the home training of young people. An educator as well as money maker.

Our new selling plan puts the Oliver on the threshold of every home in America. Will you close the door of your home or office on this remarkable Oliver opportunity.

Write for Further Details of Our Easy Offer and a Free Copy of the New Oliver Catalog. Address—

The Oliver Typewriter Company
The Oliver Typewriter Building : Chicago, Illinois

WHEN IN DETROIT STO AT HOTEL TULLER

New and Absolute Fireproof

Cor. Adams Ave. and Park S

In the center of the Theatre, Shopping
and Business
District.

Has large Convention Hall.

Has grand Roof Garden Cal

Music from 6 P. M.
to 12:30 A. M.

Every Room has Private Bath

EUROPEAN PLAN

RATES: $1.50 PER DAY AND UP

L. W. TULLER - - Proprietor

THE ALAMO

Colorado Springs' New Fire-Proof Hotel

Strictly First-Class—American
and-European Plan

RATES:

American Plan—$2.50 to $4.00
per day and upwards.

European Plan—$1.00 per day
and upwards.

150 Rooms—Fifty Elegant Suites
with private baths.

Golf and other Outdoor Sports
accessible to guests.

Colorado Springs, Colorado

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

STATIONERY

For Salesmen and Professional Men

Letterheads, envelopes, etc., for salesmen, physicians, druggists, etc. Finest quality Engravureprint process at about one-half the price usually charged for ordinary printing. Samples and price-list sent free upon request. Write for them today!

Eugene Smith Company
161 FOX STREET :: AURORA, ILLINOIS

$100 in Gold Given Away

A GENUINE bona fide offer. Read our proposition. Are you a smart speller? We give $100 in gold and other prizes named below to those able to make the largest list of words from the words The Rountree Publishing Company. You can make at least twenty, we believe, and if your list is the largest you will get the greatest prize. In case of a tie, prizes will be divided between highest contestants. Here are the rules to follow: Use only words in the English language. Words alike, but with different meanings can be used but once. Use any dictionary. Pronouns, nouns, verbs, adverbs, suffixes, adjectives, proper nouns, allowed. Anything that is a legitimate word will be allowed. This is the way: Heart, temple, rain, only. Use these words and arrange alphabetically. The following is a list of the prizes:

$25.00 for the largest list of words as above. $20.00 set of Encyclopedia, second largest list. $15.00 third largest list. $12.00 set of dishes, fourth largest list. $10.00 Mission Lamp, fifth largest list. $10.00 cash, sixth largest list. $5.00 cash, seventh largest list. $2.00 each to the next twenty-two highest. Subscriptions to the Dixie Home one year to the next hundred highest.

We want you to know The Dixie Home, which is one of the brightest and best illustrated magazines in the world, and it is for this reason that we offer these premiums. We make no extra charge for the privilege of entering this word-building contest. To enter the contest it is necessary for you to send us fifty cents or subscription to the Dixie Home for one year, with your list of words. List should be sent at once. The lucky names will be published later. This is a great offer to those who take an interest in such contests.

Address

"Contest Editor," Dixie Home, Dept. 13, Birmingham, Alabama

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Improved 1906 Edition, 160 Pages, 6½x3½ Inches

ROPP'S New Commercial Calculator & Short-Cut Arithmetic

Is from beginning to end a greatly improved, enlarged and thoroughly revised publication. It contains an entirely new system of unique Tables, Short-Cuts and up-to-date Methods. It is unquestionably the most complete, useful and comprehensive Calculator ever published. It has more than twice the matter, scope and capacity of Ropp's former editions, of which

Nearly 1,500,000 Copies Have Been Sold

It is the most convenient and practical Labor-saving work ever used in the business world. It will make every one independent, sure and self-reliant in all practical calculations. It will prevent mistakes, relieve the mind, save time and labor, and often loss and trouble. Its Tables are adapted to all the trades and occupations in the city and country, and Show the Answer as Quickly as a Watch Shows the Time.

It also explains and simplifies the principles of Arithmetic, Mechanics and Mensuration. It will make the study and use of Figures easy and interesting for young and old. It will enable every progressive mind to become an expert, sure and rapid calculator. It will prove a boon to all whose education in arithmetic has been limited or neglected. Its 48 new cuts clearly illustrate the elements of Mechanics and Mensuration. It defines about 70 points in "Commercial Law" which every man and woman should know. It is the result of devising, and improving system after system; of spending thousands of dollars in experimenting; of making millions of miscellaneous calculations, and of doing some vigorous thinking during 38 years, by an analytic, practical and preserving mind. It is especially designed for Farmers, Mechanics, Business and Professional Men, Bankers, Manufacturers and Dealers in Grain, Stock, Cotton, Coal, Lumber, Produce, etc.

|                                                                                |        |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------|
| OFFICE EDITION—9½ x 5¼ inches—Cloth binding, gold stamp, large type.....       | $1.00 |
| POCKET EDITION—6½ x 3¾ inches—Cloth, with pocket, flap and silicate slate..... | .50    |
| Leather, with pocket, flap and silicate slate, gilt edge.....                  | 1.00   |
| VEST POCKET EDITION—5¼ x 2¾ inches—Cloth, round corners, red edges.....        | .35    |
| Leather, gold stamp, burnished edges.....                                      | .50    |

*The Standard for Store, Farm,
Bank or Factory*

Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Ill.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

THE Quinn-Campbell Conservatory of Music has a home-study course that is so far ahead of any other method that there is no comparison—time, cost and results considered. A pupil goes farther, the instruction costs less, the time is shorter, the results are certain.

There are a lot of parents who think that one teacher is as good as another. The deciding point is price, forgetting, if they ever knew, that low prices and poor teaching, the two go together.

Most fathers and mothers pay the price for first-class instruction in music and get worse than none. Their indolence in looking into the matter beforehand is one of the reasons why there are so many poor teachers. You can't afford a poor teacher; lessons would be expensive if given away.

We pay your tuition in the Quinn-Campbell Conservatory of Music in exchange for a few hours' work among your relatives and friends.

Send for particulars! Fill out coupon and mail today.

The People's University

P. O. BOX 1178 UNIVERSITY CITY, ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI

-----CUT HERE-----

THE PEOPLE'S UNIVERSITY,
P. O. Box 1178, University City, St. Louis, Mo.

Please send me, without obligation on my part, full information about your Course in Music.

My Purpose .....
Name .....
Street and Number .....
City ..... State .....

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

THE VERY LATEST THING IN DUPLICATORS

"CANTYPE" SPRING-FRAME DUPLICATOR

1000 Perfect Reproductions per Hour of Hand-writing, Typewriting, Music or Drawing

Circulars can be taken direct from the Duplicator, and laid one copy on top another without off-setting or blurring. No other duplicator possesses this advantage. Circulars and samples of work on application. The only makers in America of all descriptions of ribbons, clean carbon papers, duplicators, stencil papers, inks, etc. Agents wanted in all unoccupied territory.

A Rapid, Medium-Priced Duplicating Machine

Simple, durable, rapid, clean, perfect work. Portable, inexpensive, practical, compact, noiseless.

Cheaper to Buy Cheaper to Run

CHAS. E. ARCHBALD, PRESIDENT

PEN-CARBON MANIFOLD CO.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.

Originators and Only Manufacturers of Non-Flake Carbon Paper for Typewriter, Pen, Pencil and Stylus

The Practical Value of Mental Training

Henry Dickson

Principal Dickson School of Memory. The largest and most successful School of Mental Training in the world.

WHAT James H. C. A. Jones needed was a practical course of Memory Training; with that behind him he might now be in partnership with the merchant, instead of hiking for another job. No matter whether you are employer, employee, student, business man or Book Agent, you are not Making Good if your Memory is on the Job only Halt the Time. The man

Read what WALT MASON, the Poet-Philosopher has to say about it:

STOP FORGETTING

The merchant said in caustic tones: "James Henry Charles Augustus Jones, please get your pay and leave the store; I will not need you any more. Important chores you seem to shun; you're always leaving work undone, and when I ask the reason why, you heave a sad and soulful sigh, and idly scratch your dome of thought, and feebly say: 'Oh, I forget!'" James Henry Charles Augustus Jones, this world's a poor resort for drones, for men with heads so badly set that their long suit is to forget. No man will ever write his name upon the shining wall of fame, or soar aloft on glowing wings because he can't remember things. I've noticed that such chaps as you remember when your pay is due; and when the noon-time whistles throb, your memory is on the job; and when a holiday's at hand, your recollection isn't canned. The failures on life's busy way, the paupers, friendless, wan and gray, throughout their bootless days, like you, forget the things they ought to do. So take your coat and draw your bones, James Henry Charles Augustus Jones."

Walt Mason

Copyright, 1909, by George Mathew Adams.
Reproduced by permission from the Chicago Daily News of Feb. 15, 1910.

with the Wandering Mind is a drug on the market—he has too many competitors. The Great Men of all ages are those who grasped the ability to Concentrate. You can acquire this ability. How? Send coupon for my free booklet.

The Dickson System has been highly recommended by Elbert Hubbard, Professor David Swing, Dr. Latson and many others.

Send this coupon for my free book (or a postal will Prof. Henry Dickson, 938 Auditorium Building, Chi
Send me your free booklet, "How to Remember"

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____ STATE _____

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

The author speaks from first hand of the decade in which Chicago reached the maturity of its first growth—Chicago Daily News

Bygone Days in Chicago

By FREDERICK F. COOK

THE COURT HOUSE, CHICAGO, IN 1860

THE WORLD is interested in Chicago, and there is no one who will not be interested in this, the most fascinating and informing book ever published dealing with the early life of Chicago. The prominent part that the city took in war preparations; the picturesque incidents and personalities of war-time days; the life of the "Under-world," then graced by a type of gambler which has disappeared forever, and a hundred and one vivid stories of the "Garden City," are here presented in a fresh and vigorous style by an old newspaper reporter, who writes for the most part from intimate personal observation.

Mr. Cook's pen pictures of the down-town life of the '60's are much more dramatically picturesque than the hectic survival of the same element that exists in the down-town life of today.—Chicago Journal

Illustrated from rare prints and photographs. 8vo, $2.75 net

Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Ill.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

3000 GUMMED LABELS $1.00
 SEVERAL SIZES AND STYLES
 PRINTED TO ORDER, IN ONE AND TWO COLORS
 AT THIS AND EVEN LOWER PRICES. SEND FOR CATALOG
FENTON LABEL CO. NINTH & THOMPSON STS. PHILA. PA.

Make the Farm Pay
 Complete Home Study Courses in Agriculture, Horticulture, Floriculture, Landscape Gardening, Forestry, Poultry Culture and Veterinary Science under Prof. Brooks of the Mass. Agricultural College, Prof. Craig of Cornell University and other eminent teachers. Over one hundred Home Study Courses under able professors in leading colleges.
 250 page catalog free. Write to-day.
THE HOME CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL
 Dept. 132, Springfield, Mass.

A GOOD SHORTHAND REPORTER
 is the only kind you can afford to employ. I am well prepared to handle all kinds of law and general reporting.
FRED H. GURTLE
 SHORTHAND REPORTER
 Phone Randolph 3038 810-811 Reaper Block, CHICAGO

The Magazine That Dares

to print the news that's vital to human advancement. An absolutely fearless monthly, the exponent of constructive reform for the betterment of all. You never have seen such unless you know THE TWENTIETH CENTURY MAGAZINE. The editor is B. O. Flower, founder of The Arena. Among the contributors are Edwin Markham, Lincoln Steffens, David Graham Phillips, Hamlin Garland, Prof. Charles Zuehlke, Charles E. Russell, Brand Whitlock and Carl S. Vrooman. You should see this new periodical. It is beautifully illustrated and handsomely printed. It entertains and illuminates. One copy will convince you that there is no other magazine of equal strength in America, but to clinch your interest in the glorious work that Mr. Flower is leading, we will send you three sample issues, postpaid, all for only 10c. Get this intellectual stimulus and literary treat and realize there is a new force in the magazine field. We'll refund your remittance without question if you say we have exaggerated the value of this great monthly.

75c.
FOR 10c.

The Twentieth Century Co.
 52 PARK SQUARE • BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS

The More Business You Do by Letter —

The more you need to weigh quality and price when ordering stationery.

You'll be sure of high quality if you specify Construction Bond; its unusual strength, bone and crackle satisfy the most exacting. And its cost is kept down by a modern, economical method of distribution that assures even the largest firms

Impressive Stationery at a Usable Price

Here's the idea: Construction Bond is distributed and sold direct to responsible printers and lithographers (instead of thru jobbers) and only in quantities of 500 lbs. or more at a time (instead of in ream lots. You see the economy. Profit by it.

Your printer or lithographer can supply Construction Bond if he is big enough to buy in 500-lb. lots and wants to give you the utmost value in fine business stationery. If he refuses, write us for specimens of "Impressive Stationery at a Usable Price" and the names of firms in your vicinity who are ready to supply it on Construction Bond—sent free if you write on your business letterhead.

This is the Watermark Get Envelopes to Match

CONSTRUCTION

BEST AT

THE PRICE

BOND

W. E. WROE & CO.
 308 Michigan Boulevard, Chicago

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Financing an Enterprise

By FRANCIS COOPER

TWO volumes that have helped hundreds of men win fortunes by showing them how to successfully finance and promote their business or their discoveries. Highly endorsed. Only successful work on promotion.

Volume 1 describes conditions necessary for successful financing; how to investigate, protect and capitalize an enterprise; experimental work and model making.

Volume 2 tells best methods for securing money, privately, or publicly, by advertising; how to advertise, how to write a winning prospectus. Important chapters on stock, bonds, incorporations, etc.

Invaluable knowledge gathered from fifteen years' experience. Save you hundred times its cost. Full descriptive circular if you want it.

600 pp. 1909 ed. Buckram binding. Two vols., $4.00 prepaid. Either vol. separately, $2.00 prepaid.

SHELDON UNIVERSITY PRESS
LIBERTYVILLE, ILLINOIS

SPINAL IRRITATION

An elegantly illustrated booklet explaining the cause and cure of the disease that produces the following

SYMPTOMS:

HEADACHE or pains in the head, especially in the Back part or Base of Brain; Nervous or Biliary Headache; sensations that feel like the pulling or stretching of
CORDS in the Neck; trouble with the
EYES connected with pain or aching in back part of head or neck or upper part of shoulders; aches or pains in the eyes or back of them; specks or spots before the eyes or blurred vision; a frequent desire to
SIGH or YAWN or take a deep, full breath, and in some cases, an inability to do so;
PALPITATION or irregularity of the heart; pains, oppression, difficult breathing, or very peculiar and disagreeable feelings in the region of the
HEART, LUNGS, STOMACH, or other parts of the body that doctors often call Neuralgia, Rheumatism, Indigestion, Heart trouble and various other names, but fail to cure: aches or pains in the region of the
KIDNEYS; BACKACHE; sensations of oppression or constriction like a
BELT AROUND THE BODY, or part way around;
PARTIAL PARALYSIS of arms, shoulders, hands, lower limbs or feet, causing pains in these members, or a
NUMB FEELING or sensations of coldness, heaviness, or a tingling or feelings resembling the
PRICKING OF PINS or needles or as if the parts were asleep;
SORE, TENDER OR BURNING points along the spine or in the limbs or feet; pains in the face, arms, back, lower limbs or feet, resembling those of
NEURALGIA OR SCIATIC RHEUMATISM (physicians often treat these symptoms as ordinary neuralgia or rheumatism, but such treatment will not cure them);
CHILLS UP OR DOWN BACK;
CREEPING sensations, coldness or numbness; pain
BETWEEN SHOULDERS.

If you have the above named symptoms, or any of them, you probably have SPINAL IRRITATION, a very serious disorder that but few physicians can cure. Yet it is very easily cured by proper treatment. Our elegantly illustrated booklet explains how. It also describes the disease and explains what causes it.

Price, 10 Cents

OHIO STATE PUBLISHING CO., 93-5 The Birmingham, Cleveland, O.

"BOY WANTED"

By NIXON WATERMAN

A Book of Cheerful Counsel

A book that every father should give to his son—after he has read it. It's full of the kind of good talk that helps a boy or man on the road to Success.

The boy or man who truly reads the book cannot help but get a world of good from it. It's the kind that holds you from the frontispiece to the end of the last chapter.

Is it good for a girl too? Why, bless me, it is good for both the little girl and the girl grown tall.

The Price is Only $1.25, Postpaid

The Sheldon University Press
LIBERTYVILLE, ILLINOIS

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

NORMAL COURSES

Our Home Study Courses for teachers prepare for Certificates of every grade. Special courses in Pedagogy, Psychology, Primary Methods and Kindergarten.

We assist in securing positions.

Over one hundred Home Study Courses under Professors in Harvard, Brown, Cornell and leading colleges. 250 page catalog free. Write to-day.

THE HOME CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL

Dept. 78, Springfield, Mass.

Dr. Campbell
Principal

MAKE MONEY In Advertising or Mail Order Business.

Send name and address and twenty-five cents and we will mail you three issues of the popular Advertisers Magazine. Each issue contains articles on Mail Order Business, Ad Writing, Business Correspondence, Selling Plans, Office Systems, Business Short-Cuts, Follow-up Literature, etc. Write today, as this is a very special offer. Address, ADVERTISERS MAGAZINE, 720 Commerce Building, Kansas City, Missouri.

Are You Looking for a Home

IF SO, don't buy before seeing a copy of the Real Estate Journal. It has hundreds of farms, city property and stocks of goods advertised in it and reaches 60,000 readers a month; 24 to 36 pages, colored covers. Ad rates 15c per line. 2c a word. 75c a year.

Two-Month Trial Subscription 10c

Farm and Real Estate Journal, Traer, Iowa
DESK K

What Some Well-Known Authors Say About

The Book News Monthly

"I have read The Book News Monthly for a number of years, and have found it intelligent and entertaining. In my experience, the comments have never been dull: they have seemed to me extremely competent. I regard The Book News Monthly as a useful medium of communicating literary intelligence, and as presenting judicial opinions on many of the books of the day."—Hamilton Wright Mabie.

"The Book News Monthly gives a sympathetic view of what is best in current literature, and renews interest in the good books of the past. It more than fulfills the modest promise of its title, and in that way is helping to make more readers and more intelligent readers."—Henry Van Dyke.

"The Book News Monthly probably surpasses any magazine in America in the number of books discussed and in the honesty and integrity of the criticisms. It is varied, comprehensive and sincere, and no other American monthly periodical is in this respect quite its equal."—Thomas Wentworth Higginson.

$1.00 a Year. Sample Copy
Sent Upon Request

The Book News Monthly
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Books that have Helped Thousands Develop Power to Make Greater Profits

THESE books will help YOU develop more power. Will teach you how to control your forces. Will show you how to inspire confidence. They are uniformly bound in green, printed on heavy book, contain over two hundred pages of helpful, inspiring, scientific, man-building advice. The simple, direct, concise language drives the lessons home at the first reading. Than these three the famous author of "As a Man Thinketh" has written nothing better.

SEND THREE DOLLARS TODAY

SHELDON UNIVERSITY PRESS, Libertyville, Illinois:

Enclosed find $.....Dollars.

Send me.....Copies (Mark the number).

....."From Poverty to Power"

....."All These Things Added"

....."Byways of Blessedness"

Name.....

City.....State.....

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

A CORKING HIT

Letters from a Baseball Fan to His Son

By S. DEWITT CLOUGH

Illustrated by C. A. Briggs, the famous cartoonist of The Chicago Record-Herald.

Every person interested in Baseball will want a copy. Here is a book which if well displayed, is more than half sold. The price is small, only 50 cents, and the profits are big.

Hot Cakes

Did you ever see a bunch of hungry people clean up a big pile of hot wheat cakes served with real maple syrup? You may have been one yourself—well, that's the way "Letters from a Baseball Fan to his Son" disappear. Everybody says: "Gee that's good" and comes back for more.

What Is It?

These letters are written by an old-time baseball player to his son in college trying for the varsity team. They are not only clever and amusing, but are chock full of practical pointers and hints as to how baseball can be made a backbone bracer. The cartoons by Briggs and the pen sketches are worth the price of the book alone.

Price Fifty Cents Each, Postpaid

Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Illinois

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Dr. Lindlahr's Sanitarium for Nature Cure

offers complete sanitarium facilities to patients from a distance and to those who wish to live the natural life in natural surroundings. We successfully treat all forms of so-called incurable diseases without the use of poisonous drugs or surgery.

Nature Cure by Mail

In this department we are prepared to take care of patients at a distance who cannot have the benefit of instruction and treatment in our sanitarium. Free literature and diagnosis blank furnished on application.

Send for Valuable Free Health-Culture Literature

A LIMITED NUMBER OF VOLS. I. and II. of the NATURE CURE MAGAZINE, cloth bound, are now for sale. Price $1.50 per volume, postpaid.

Dr. Lindlahr's Sanitarium

525 Ashland Boulevard, Chicago
Telephone, Monroe 2246

Down town offices and Treatment rooms:
84 Adams St., Rooms 404-406
Telephone Harrison 6130

Automatic Paper-Fastener

Fastens 25 sheets
with one blow.

Cash with order
$1.50
post paid.
This price
includes
500 staples.

The Hotchkiss Automatic Paper-Fastener uses a single strip on which there are 25 staples. These staples when inserted into the machine are automatically cut off and fed forward, accurately and without failure. The staple is always ready to be driven and a single blow will suffice to drive it through 1 to 25 sheets of paper, and with the same movement feed forward the next staple.

Useful not only for papers, but for fastening samples of silks, laces, dress goods, etc., being neater than any other method of binding.

Place the machine on a solid foundation, insert the papers to be stapled, and strike the plunger a quick, sharp blow with the hand.

Agents wanted to sell our line of office supplies
Send for Catalog

National Office Supply Company
ZION CITY, ILLINOIS

"Health-Wealth" Method

Book form, 25 cts. Formerly, typewritten form, $25. 27 powerful lessons. 40,000 words. Teaches scientific upbuilding of physical, mental and moral faculties. Develops "plus" men. Eclectic. No fads. Strong, reliable points of many systems presented and explained. All in Fred G. Kaessmann's inimitable, succinct, sincere, gingery way. You will like it. It will help you. Experts pronounce it world's greatest health culture course. Equal to any health culture course, no matter what the price, because purchasers are entitled, FREE OF CHARGE to SPECIAL INSTRUCTION—if course does not already cover every requirement of his or her particular case. Certainly a big bargain, this, so send that quarter today.

Health-Wealth Publishing House, 68 Bennington Street, Lawrence, Mass.

ELGIN WATCHES ON CREDIT

17 Jewel Elgin—Our Great Special $13.75
Sent Anywhere on FREE TRIAL

Guaranteed to keep accurate time. Fitted in double stock gold-filled case, warranted for 25 years.

You do not pay one penny until you have seen and examined this High-Grade 17-Jewel Elgin Watch, in hand-engraved case, right in your own home. You are to be the Judge. Let us send it to you, all charges prepaid. If it suits you PAY ONLY $1.50 A MONTH

We trust every honest person. No matter how far away you live, or how small your salary or income, we will treat you for a high-grade Elgin Watch, in gold case, warranted for 25 years, and guaranteed to pass any Railroad inspection. Write for our big free Watch and Diamond Catalog. It tells all about our Easy Payment Plan—the "Loftis System"—and how we send Elgin B.W. Raymond and Waltham Watches.

LOFTIS
BROS. & CO.

THE OLD RELIABLE ORIGINAL DIAMOND AND WATCH CREDIT HOUSE

Dept. G.811, 92 to 98 STATE ST., CHICAGO, ILL.
Branches: Pittsburg, Pa., St. Louis, Mo.

anywhere in the world, without security or one cent deposit. Send for the Loftis Magazine, Free.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

The Illustrated Review

A magazine of inspiration and beauty for Authors, Artists, Craftsmen, Collectors and Devotees of the Art of Physical Expression

---

Reproductions of paintings, etchings and drawings by American Artists.

Studio stories and Art notes from near and far.

Unconventional snap shots of Authors at work and at play.

Illustrations of Handicraft work.

The Connoisseurs' Guide, giving advice to buyers of Objects of Art and Rarities.

---

"Its atmosphere is homey to those who work with the fine tools of words and pigments," says Will Levington Comfort, author of Routledge Rides Alone.

One Year—One Dollar

“Don't Sleep! Napoleon won Austerlitz by knowing the value of time. He lost Waterloo by staying in bed too long. Moral: Don't sleep on your job!” This motto in colors on hand made paper and four recent issues of the Review sent for twenty cents.

The Illustrated Review

Steinway Hall Building, Chicago

Are You A Thinker?

OR ARE YOU JUST DRIFTING ALONG WITH THE CURRENT?

"Thought"

A Magazine of Practical Psychology

The Largest and Best
Magazine in its Field

We know that THOUGHT is the best magazine in its field and we want an opportunity to demonstrate this fact to you.

We will stand the expense of this demonstration—Can we do more?

If you are a thinking, wide awake, ambitious person, with a broad mind, seeking knowledge, this magazine will appeal to you. If you are not ambitious and energetic, you certainly need it whether you want it or not.

Mind is Everything

What is "New Thought"?

By Benjamin Fay Mills

SENT TO YOU FREE!

To all who follow out the directions given in this advertisement, and mention the name of "Business Philosopher," we will mail this book

Absolutely FREE!

You can't be progressive without being broad-minded and open to conviction.

"Thought" will Develop You if You Give it a Chance

Send 2-cent stamp to this company, stating you saw this "ad" in "Business Philosopher," and we will post-pay sample copy and this special-offer book.

Magnum Bonum Co., 4663 Lake Ave., Chicago

Working for Himself NOW

Owes Success to our Teaching

THIS man now dictates to his own stenographer instead of taking dictation himself from an employer. Our instruction is responsible for the change

The first lessons enable you to start a collection business of your own. The full course gives you complete mastery of it. We built up our own successful Collection Business by the same methods we teach you. Don't neglect this opportunity to get the fruits of your own work. Fill out and send us attached coupon. Do it now while this article is before you. If you delay it may be overlooked and you may doom yourself to a life of drudgery by neglecting it.

The American Collection Service
314 State Street Detroit, Michigan

Fresno, California. Sept. 8, 1909
The American Collection Service,
Detroit Mich.

Gentlemen:—I am gratified with my progress in the Collection Business and now have about 180 clients. My collections in July paid me $350 profits approximately. This is very good considering that I was deplorably ignorant of the collection business when I began last year. Your course of instruction deserves all the credit. Very truly yours,
S. M. Ballard

385

Send me your book of "Pointers on the Collection Business" and full information about your course.

Backbone A Bouncer for the Blues

BY J. DEWITT CLOUGH

¶ This book sprang instantly into favor because of the cheerfulness and optimism of the Good Stuff it contains. It surely is a bouncer for the blues. It is filled with poems and paragraphs that drive Gloom into its hole and fill one with sunshine. Thousands have been sold and not one has been returned. Backbone contains 80 pages of gloom-dispelling philosophy, and hundreds of the good sayings, orphics, mottoes and aphorisms of our ablest men.

¶ A few backbone bracers are the chapters on Character, Cheerfulness, Purpose, Success, Opportunity, Progress, Worry, Persistence, Self-Improvement, Courage, Self-Confidence, Thoroughness, Love, Work and a score of others.

¶ Eighty pages with art cover and silk cord.

Backbone Publishing Company

Ravenswood, Chicago, Illinois

Address Dept. BP7

TREASURES OF TRUTH

A MASTERPIECE

BY DR. GEO. F. BUTLER

In this work Dr. Butler deals with the more cheerful philosophy of life in his inimitably gentle and helpful way. Every page is an inspiration, a message of good cheer and encouragement.

There are chapters on "How to Live," "Some Thoughts on Work," "The Successful Life," "Worry and Trouble and How to Overcome Them," etc.

The mechanical production of "Treasures of Truth" will appeal to the most artistic.

The binding is simple yet striking and beautiful. The title page and borders, in two colors are most artistic. This is a book which has met with immediate approval and one which all will enjoy.

This book is especially suited as an all-the-year-round Gift Book. Thousands have been sold as such.

Retail Price 75c in Art Board Covers and $1.00 in DeLuxe Limp Purple Leather

Backbone Publishing Company, Dept. BP7, Ravenswood, Chicago, Illinois

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

PRACTICAL BUSINESS BOOKS!

Examine the List—Select Those That Will Help You—Mail Your Order Today

Authorized American Edition of DICKSEE'S AUDITING

Revised and Enlarged
By Robert H. Montgomery, C. P. A.

The acknowledged authority in both England and America on all subjects connected with auditing. The present edition retains all the valuable matter of the first edition, revised and brought up to date, and in addition over 200 pages of entirely new matter. The subject treatment is (1) Auditing—Up to the Trial Balance; (2) Methods of Account; (3) Special Considerations in Different Classes of Audit; (4) Auditing—From Trial Balance to Balance Sheet; (5) Forms of Account and Balance Sheets; (6) What Are Profits? (7) The Attitude of the Auditor; (8) The Liabilities of Auditors; (9) Investigations; (10) Interest; (11) Professional Ethics; (12) C. P. A. Examination Questions. Contains 100 pages of model forms of Balance Sheets, Income and Profit and Loss Accounts, etc., etc. 6 x 9. 586 pages. 1909. Durable cloth, gold stamped. $5.00 delivered.

CORPORATE FINANCE and ACCOUNTING

By H. C. Bentley, C. P. A.

Every corporation treasurer and accountant should possess this book. It is a complete working manual covering the daily duties of these officials. In six parts, as follows: (1) The corporation treasurer, his legal status, the requirements of his office, his duties, powers and liabilities, his relation to corporate affairs in general, his bonding; (2) An extended exposition of the methods and forms for practical corporate accounting, describing the various forms of books and entries; (3) Corporate finances, including funds in general, bank deposits, checks and dividends; (4) Negotiable instruments, their nature and requisites, their general and special liabilities, their collection; (5) Corporate securities; (6) 44 model legal forms for signatures, checks, receipts, resolutions and certifications. 6 x 9. Buckram. 500 pp. $4.00 delivered.

A Manual of CORPORATE MANAGEMENT

By Thos. Conynghon of the N. Y. Bar

No corporation official can really afford to be without this book. In it can be found immediately a clear, accurate, non-technical answer to any question concerning the legal side of corporate management. Tells the purposes, scope, and uses of the Charter and By-Laws: the rights, duties, powers and liabilities of Officers, Directors, and Stockholders under all circumstances; explains fully the issuance, sale, record and transfer of stock; tells how to conduct meetings; how to keep all books of record; and discusses such important matters as Committees, Dividends, Consolidations, Re-organization, etc. A safe guide in any state. Contains also over 200 model legal forms, covering practically every matter in corporation work requiring a form. Third Edition. 1909. 6 x 9. Buckram binding. $3.50 delivered.

CONDITIONAL SALES

By F. B. Haring of the Buffalo Bar

No concern which makes credit sales should be without this book. It states clearly the requirements for a valid contract of conditional sale in every state of the Union, whereby title to goods sold is retained in the vendor until payment has been made. This information is arranged under uniform headings giving Legal Status of Contracts, how to execute them, acknowledgement or proof required, recording or filing necessary, recording fee, renewals, discharge, Landlord's lien, criminal liability of vendee, action for money judgment, claim on fixtures, when vendor or vendee loses, etc. Approved forms of contracts, acknowledgements, etc. Used as a guide by hundreds of the largest concerns in the country. "Send us another copy," say Lyon & Healy, Chicago. 6 x 9. Buckram. 1909. $5.00 delivered.

A Manual of CORPORATE ORGANIZATION

By Thos. Conynghon of the N. Y. Bar

Explains clearly and in detail every step necessary for the organization and incorporation of a new company or the reorganization of an old one. Describes ends sought by incorporation: stock subscription lists and contracts; tells where to incorporate and the expense; detailed explanation of capitalization and the stock system and the status of stockholders; describes the nature and functions of the Charter and By-laws; tells how to conduct meetings; how to elect officers and directors, and defines their duties, powers and liabilities; full information for the protection of minority interests, protection of an inventor, underwriting, promoters, etc., etc. Accurate, authoritative, up-to-date, and entirely free from legal technicalities. Second Ed. 1908. 6 x 9. Buckram. $3.00 delivered.

FINANCING an ENTERPRISE

By Francis Cooper

A practical two-volume work telling how to secure capital and successfully promote a business enterprise of any kind. Vol. I describes conditions necessary for successful financing; tells how to investigate, protect, and capitalize an enterprise, discusses experimental work and model making. Vol. II tells best methods for securing money, privately, or publicly, by advertising; how to write a prospectus. Important chapters on stocks, bonds, incorporation, underwriting, etc. Written from 15 years' promoting experience. Only reliable work on the subject. Third edition. 1909. 543 pp. Buckram. Both vols. $4.00 delivered. Either vol. singly $2.00 delivered.

Complete Descriptive Circular of Any Book on Request

THE RONALD PRESS COMPANY

Publishers of Business Books, and of
THE BUSINESS WORLD, a magazine of Practical Business

Rooms 14-20
229 Broadway, New York

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

FIFTY CENTS

SECURES THIS GREAT REFERENCE BOOK

An entirely new, up-to-date, down-to-the-minute reference book, for bookkeepers, cashiers, accountants and business men.

This magnificent volume weighs nearly 6 pounds; contains over 500 pages, 200,000 words and 700 illustrations of forms and tables; beautifully printed on fine paper; handsomely and strongly bound; produced and presented to the business world at a cost which brings it within the reach of all; easiest for reference, plainest for acquiring information, and most economical when compared with all other publications of like nature.

It is Yours on Payment of Only Fifty Cents

down and the balance in monthly instalments of 50 cents or $1.00 as you prefer.

Monthly instalment price, $4.00 per copy; introductory special cash price (less 10 per cent) only $3.60.

In either case the expressage is prepaid to your address in the United States and Canada.

E. H. BEACH, Publisher, Detroit, Mich.

Will You Accept This Business Book if We Send it Free?

Sign and Mail the Coupon Below.
Send no Money! Take no Risk!

One hundred and twelve of the world's master business men have written ten books—2,079 pages—1,497 vital business secrets, ideas, methods. In them is the best of all that they know about

- |                |                     |                                                             |
|----------------|---------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------|
| —Purchasing    | —Salesmanship       | —Position-Getting                                           |
| —Credits       | —Advertising        | —Position-Holding                                           |
| —Collections   | —Correspondence     | —Man-Handling                                               |
| —Accounting    | —Selling Plans      | —Man-Training                                               |
| —Cost-keeping  | —Handling Customers | —Business Generalship                                       |
| —Organization  | —Office Systems     | —Competition Fighting                                       |
| —Retailing     | —Short-cuts and     | and hundreds and hundreds of other vital business subjects. |
| —Wholesaling   | Methods for every   |                                                             |
| —Manufacturing | line and department |                                                             |

A 9,059 word booklet has been published describing, explaining, picturing the work. Pages 2 and 3 tell about managing businesses great and small; pages 4 and 5 deal with credits, collections and with rock-bottom purchasing; pages 6 and 7 with handling and training men; pages 7 to 12 with salesmanship, with advertising, with the marketing of goods through salesmen, dealers and by mail; pages 12 to 15 with the great problem of securing the highest market price for your services—no matter what your line; and the last page tells how you may get a complete set—bound in handsome half morocco, contents in colors—for less than your daily smoke or shave, almost as little as your daily newspaper.

Will you read the book if we send it free?
Send no money. Simply sign the coupon.

The System Co., 151-153 Wabash Ave., Chicago

If there are, in your books, any new ways to increase my business or my salary, I should like to know them. So send on your 16-page free descriptive booklet. I'll read it. BP-7-10

Name _____

Address _____

Business _____

Position _____

Save your Pocket and Insure your Keys

Key Insurance—Good for one year, insures Keys and Identifies Owner; this with Genuine Morocco Combination Key and Knife Purses—Above, plus a Limited Accident Policy for $1,000, renewable each year—$1.00

|                                  |                                    |
|----------------------------------|------------------------------------|
| Key Purses, { Cowhide.....25c.   | Combination { Cowhide.....40c.     |
| (Key Chains { Morocco.....35c.   | Key and { Morocco.....50c.         |
| 5c. extra. { Seal, Russia, .50c. | Knife Purses { Seal, Russia, .65c. |

Special Prices in Quantities for use as Advertising Novelties

MURRAY S. CHISM, Patentee and Manufacturer
224 N. Camac St., Philadelphia, Pa.

Relieve Your Memory

Depend on this convenient, useful, gentleman's memo book to keep your dates, figures, names, memos, etc., in better, neater style.

Bennett Everlasting Memorandum Book

—leather cover, 3.4 x 8 inches, pocket for cards, removable pads—the most convenient. Price complete with your name stamped in gold on the cover and four inside pads, only . . . . . $1.00

Send no money Simply send us your name and we will forward the book with your name printed. If satisfied, send us our $1.00. If not, return the book. Send today.

W. W. BENNETT CO.

Box 146, East End

Pittsburg, Penn.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Keeping Our Tailors Busy

A BLUE SERGE SUIT with Extra Trousers of the same or Striped Material—Twenty-five Dollars

NICOLL The Tailor
Wm. JERREMS' SONS
CLARK AND ADAMS STS.
CHICAGO

HOME STUDY COURSES

Over one hundred Home Study Courses under professors in Harvard, Brown, Cornell and leading colleges. Academic, and Preparatory, Agricultural, Commercial, Normal and Civil Service Departments.
Preparation for College, Teachers' and Civil Service Examinations.

Prof. Genung
English

250 page catalog free. Write to-day.
THE HOME CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOL
Dept. 105, Springfield, Mass.

Embossed Business Stationery

Printed from Steel Dies
Send for Samples

*Engraved
Cards*

We engrave a one-line plate and furnish 100 engraved cards, postpaid. Engraved in script, $1.25; block, $1.50; solid Roman, old English or French script, $1.75; shaded old English or block, $2.00; shaded Roman or French script, $2.25. Cash to be sent with order.
Best stock used. Monogram stationery. Wedding and business announcements.

The American Embossing Co.

192-69 SENECA STREET, BUFFALO, N. Y.

HOW TO BUILD A BETTER BRAIN

FREE

FREE

Make your Mind a creative, convincing, commanding power. You have about 90% more Mental force than you now know how to use. Reading essays is one thing; studying this book of actual methods is another—and far more important to you. It also gives a lengthy analysis of the Seven Great Powers of Human Success — Will-power,
Physical Energy, Intellectual Supremacy, Sense-culture, Self-conquest, Personal Influence, Brain-power. It will lead you into the most elaborate and powerful education known to the literature of Self-development.
Send 4 cts. in stamps for pocket edition of "How to B. B. B."

Albert Lewis Pelton, - Meriden, Conn.

THESE

SIX BOOKS

Tell How $2.00 Grew
Into $250,000.00; Yours
for $4.50

The men who wrote these business books have built up the largest business of its kind in the world, and when they were doing it they were everlastingly applying the very same principles that they have driven home in the chapters of these books.

And you are to get all the benefits of their years of experience for $4.50.

Now, if these men built up a quarter of a million dollar business by knowing how to make every letter they sent out an order clincher and if they are willing to impart their methods, why can't you profit by their experience? Wouldn't a little more of this letter-writing skill be beneficial in your business? It would accomplish the very plans you have in view.

FOR THE BUSINESS MAN: It will open his eyes to the possibilities of more business.

FOR THE ADVERTISING MAN: It will increase the percentage of orders from the inquiries his advertising has brought. FOR THE PROFESSIONAL CORRESPONDENT: This work will be a constant reference. Send us a money order, P. O. order, or check for $4.50, with your name and address plainly written. We will send the five books immediately, prepaid. If you don't find them worth their weight in gold, send them back.

Publicity Pub. Co., Dept. 24, Page Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

The Largest Staff of Salesmen in the World

that is what Advertisers command in

"The Traveling Man"

We have a paid in advance subscription from members of the fourteen great orders in which the Salesmen of the United States have banded themselves—that should make advertisers think—our Magazine represents the Greatest Commercial Force in the World — "Word of Mouth" Advertising by our Subscribers. Think it over—Our Rates by Mail—You've Thought.

Strong Endorsement

The following large and important Organizations of Traveling Men, representing hundreds of thousands, approve of "THE TRAVELING MAN" and wish it God Speed!

Christian Traveling Men's Association
"Gideons," Chicago, Ill.
The Commercial Travelers' Life and Accident Association, Cleveland, Ohio.
Commercial Travelers' Accident Association, Utica, New York.
Illinois Commercial Men's Association,
Chicago, Ill.
International Travelers' Association,
Dallas, Texas.
Iowa State Traveling Men's Association,
Des Moines, Iowa.
Minnesota Commercial Men's Health Association,
New Ulm, Minnesota.

Northwestern Traveling Men's Association,
Chicago, Ill.
Travelers' Health Association,
Omaha, Nebraska.
Traveler's Protective Association of America,
St. Louis, Missouri.
Toledo Travelers' Health Association,
Toledo, Ohio.
United Commercial Travelers of America,
Columbus, Ohio.
Western Travelers' Accident Association,
Omaha, Nebraska.
Western Commercial Travelers' Association,
St. Louis, Missouri.

Subscription Price, $1.00 Per Year

THE TRAVELING MAN

VALPARAISO, INDIANA

How to Increase Your Mental Wealth at Small Cost—

TO BECOME a better Speaker of Words—and to be a scientific salesman one must know how to speak wisely and well—one should have a thorough acquaintance with the great classics of literature.

¶ The Caxton Brochures are exquisitely printed in two colors on high-grade paper—protected with a heavy cover—tied with silk—brightened with a special portrait of the author by Hillberg—and possess the great merit of fitting the pocket both in size and price.

¶ By special arrangement we have secured a limited quantity of these beautiful Brochures and while they last they will be sold for Fourteen Cents each or Ten for One Dollar.

¶ Of course you know we wrap all our goods with Satisfaction—which means that you can have your money back absolutely without question if you are not perfectly satisfied.

The Caxton Brochures

¶ A collection of Little Masterpieces, published one each month, by the Caxton Society, the aim being to present the most significant essays and short stories by the world's best authors, in a form that will appeal to all bookish people.

No. 1—CHARLES LAMB'S ESSAY, "A Dissertation upon Rast Pig," also "Detached Thoughts on Books and Reading."

No. 2—RALPH WALDO EMERSON'S "Essay on Compensation."

No. 3—"THE CHINESE PHILOSOPHER'S SON," by Oliver Goldsmith. This number is now out of print.

No. 4—"BIBLIOPHILE AND BIBLIOMANIAC," by Henry Houssaye and Henry Ward Beecher.

No. 5—"COLLECTANEA," being certain verses written by Rudyard Kipling.

No. 6—"POOR RICHARD'S ALMANACK." Shrewd wit of Benjamin Franklin as compiled by himself. With facsimile reproductions.

No. 7—"HENRY DAVID THOREAU, His Character and Opinions," by Robert Louis Stevenson.

No. 8—"BACON'S ESSAYS," being those contained in the first edition, published in 1597. With facsimile reproductions of some of the pages.

No. 9—"WISDOM OF CHESTERFIELD." Being extracts from letters of the Earl of Chesterfield to his son.

No. 10—"LOVE LETTERS OF HENRY VIII TO ANNE BOLEYN." The authentic love letters of a real king.

No. 11—"RUBAIYAT OF OMAR KHAYYAM," by Edward FitzGerald. This is a careful reprint of the first edition, introduction and notes.

No. 12—"SELF-RELIANCE," by Ralph Waldo Emerson. "Let a man know his worth, and keep things under his feet."

No. 13—"WILL O' THE MILL," by Robert Louis Stevenson.

No. 14—"RABBI BEN EZRA," by Robert Browning. This number contains a special analysis and study.

No. 15—"THE LEGEND OF SLEEPY HOLLOW," by Washington Irving.

No. 16—"THE ATHEIST'S MASS," by Honore de Balzac.

No. 17—"ODES OF ANACREON," as translated by Thomas Moore.

No. 18—"EVERYMAN," the great Morality Play. Facsimile reproductions from old editions.

No. 19—"ADDRESS ON ARTS AND CRAFTS," by William Morris.

We believe these Brochures are a little better than anything ever before attempted in special editions at a popular price. The numbers now ready are No. 1 to 19, inclusive; and with exception of No. 3 which is out of print. We will supply them at fourteen cents each, or ten for one dollar.

Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Ill.

DEPARTMENT 87

• DRUDGERY is the right hand of Genius. He who Sticks it Out is the true miracle worker

SHELDON

The BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

ARTHUR·FREDERICK·SHELDON
EDITOR

SHELDON·UNIVERSITY·PRESS
LIBERTYVILLE·ILLINOIS

Ginger Talks

235 PAGES—15 FULL PAGE CARTOONS

Sales of Two Millions a Month

The Course in Salesmanship that Built Them for the National Cash Register Company

Yours for Two Dollars

THINK of a course in practical salesmanship, written straight out of the heart of the greatest selling organization in the world, by a Director of that organization; a course that does not merely describe the selling system of this colossal concern—but IS THAT ACTUAL SYSTEM ITSELF—the word for word Ginger Talks of that world famous company to its 1,000 salesmen—the verbatim coaching, the exact specific instruction, the very selling pointers and arguments and inspiration and enthusiasm that built up, through those 1,000 red-blooded salesmen, a business of over two million dollars a month in monthly sales.

The Pabst Co. bought it for its 1800 salesmen. The Quaker Oats Company invested $450 in it. 1682 other giant concerns have taken it for their entire sales forces, many taking from 100 to 1000 each.

Ask us to send you a list six feet long of these concerns which employ nearly 50,000 salesmen

GINGER TALKS are a complete text-book of instruction and pointers on the art of selling goods. They simplify the whole of practical salesmanship; make clear with wonderful illustrations and exact explanations how to make approaches, how to secure attention, how to create desire, how to stimulate to immediate action and walk out with the order. They tell the salesman how to turn enmity into friendship, cold indifference into eager interest, casual inquiries into actual buyers, actual buyers into permanent customers. They touch on a thousand salesmen's difficulties and perplexities and show a way out of each one.

GINGER TALKS is the only business book ever written that is as brilliant and fascinating in style and has the same human interest as George Ade's "Fables in Slang," Billy Baxter's Letters," or Mr. Dooley's famous conversations with his friend Hennessy. The sentences are crowded with epigrams, sharpened with penetrating wit, lighted up with humor, and made fairly alive with the tones of a masterful personality. It is this wonderful combination of solid instruction and brilliant expression—"beef-steak nutriment and champagne style"—that has brought Ginger Talks their tremendous sales.

SEND YOUR GINGER

SHELDON UNIVERSITY PRESS, Libertyville, Illinois.

I am enclosing Two Dollars. Send me a copy of Holman's "Ginger Talks."

Name.....

Address..... State.....

You can enclose $3.50 and receive a copy of Ginger Talks and The Business Philosopher for one year

ARTHUR F. SHELDON
EDITOR-IN-CHIEF

CONTENTS

ARTHUR W. NEWCOMB
MANAGING EDITOR

SHELDON'S BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER AND SALESMANSHIP

AUGUST, 1910

|                                                       |                     |
|-------------------------------------------------------|---------------------|
| THE GLENWOOD BOYS' REGIMENT ON DRESS PARADE.....      | Frontispiece |
| EDITORIAL .....                                       | 449                 |
| By A. F. Sheldon                               |                     |
| MAKING THE MAN OF TOMORROW OUT OF THE GLENWOOD BOY    | 457                 |
| By Arthur W. Newcomb                           |                     |
| JENKIN-LLOYD-JONES AND HIS "LENGTHENED SHADOW".....   | 467                 |
| By Thomas Dreier, in "The Caxton"              |                     |
| SOME ERRORS THAT LEAD TO COMMERCIAL FAILURE.....      | 471                 |
| By One Who Knows                               |                     |
| A LESSON FROM THE FOOTBALL DAYS OF "DINK STOVER"..... | 474                 |
| By Clyde Gibson                                |                     |
| LETTERS OF A SALES AND ADVERTISING MANAGER.....       | 477                 |
| By Geo. H. Eberhard                            |                     |
| THE KIND OF EDUCATION THE NEXT GENERATION NEEDS.....  | 479                 |
| By Franklin H. Collins                         |                     |
| GLEANINGS FROM BUSINESS FIELDS.....                   | 481                 |
| By Thomas Dreier                               |                     |
| WHAT'S IN A NAME? SOME PEOPLE WHO COULD ANSWER.....   | 484                 |
| By Fred G. Kaessmann                           |                     |
| THOUGHTS ON SALESMANSHIP AND BUSINESS BUILDING.....   | 489                 |
| By A. F. Sheldon                               |                     |
| THE QUESTIONS OF SOCRATIC.....                        | 493                 |
| By Arthur W. Newcomb                           |                     |
| HOW WOULD YOU COME OUT OF A THOROUGH SIFTING PROCESS? | 498                 |
| By F. L. Oilar                                 |                     |
| THE ALL-AROUNDNESS OF THE HUMAN AND ITS DEVELOPMENT   | 500                 |
| By H. D. Brasefield                            |                     |
| LEAVES FROM MY ORDER BOOK.....                        | 509                 |
| By Morton Mayne                                |                     |
| THE PHILOSOPHER AMONG HIS BOOKS.....                  | 513                 |

¶ Two dollars a year will bring the magazine to anyone in the United States or its possessions, $2.25 in Canada, and $2.50 in foreign countries. Requests for "change of address" must reach this office before the tenth of the month in order to insure the proper mailing of the current issue of this magazine. In sending in the new address please give your previous location.

Published by the Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Illinois

Entered as Second-Class Matter, December 15, 1908, at the Post Office at Libertyville, Illinois, under Act of March 3, 1879. Copyrighted by Sheldon University Press.

Seventeen Cents a Day Buys an Oliver Typewriter

This amazing offer—the New Model Oliver Typewriter No. 5 at 17 cents a day—open to everybody, everywhere.

It's our new and immensely popular plan of selling Oliver Typewriters, on little easy payments. The abandonment of longhand in favor of clean, legible, beautiful typewriting is the next great step in human progress.

Already—in all lines of business and in all professions—the use of pen-and-ink is largely restricted to the writing of signatures.

Business Colleges and High Schools, watchful of the trend of public sentiment, are training a vast army of young people in the use of Oliver Typewriters.

The prompt and generous response of the Oliver Typewriter Company to the world-wide demand for universal typewriting, gives tremendous impetus to the movement.

The Oliver, with the largest sale of any typewriter in existence, was the logical machine to take the initiative in bringing about the universal use of typewriters. It always leads.

Save Your Pennies & Own an Oliver

This "17-Cents-a-Day" selling plan makes the Oliver as easy to own as to rent. It places the machine within easy reach of every home—every individual. A man's "cigar money"—a woman's "pin-money"—will buy it.

Clerks on small salaries can now afford to own Olivers. By utilizing spare moments for practice they may fit themselves for more important positions.

School boys and school girls can buy Olivers by saving their pennies.

You can buy an Oliver on this plan at the regular catalog price—$100. A small first payment brings the machine. Then you save 17 cents a day and pay monthly.

And the possession of an Oliver Typewriter enables you to earn money to finish paying for the machine.

Mechanical Advantages

The Oliver is the most highly perfected typewriter on the market—hence its 100 per cent efficiency.

Among its scores of conveniences are:

- the Balance Shift
- the Ruling Device
- the Double Release
- the Locomotive Base
- the Automatic Spacer
- the Automatic Tabulator
- the Disappearing Indicator
- the Adjustable Paper Fingers
- the Scientific Condensed Keyboard

Service Possibilities

The Oliver Typewriter turns out more work—of better quality and greater variety—than any other writing machine. Simplicity, strength, ease of operation and visibility are the corner stones of its towering supremacy in

- Correspondence
- Card Index Work
- Tabulated Reports
- Follow-up Systems
- Manifolding Service
- Addressing Envelopes
- Working on Ruled Forms
- Cutting Mimeograph Stencils

Can You Spend 17 Cents a Day to Better Advantage than in the Purchase of this Wonderful Machine

Write for Special Easy Payment Proposition or See the Nearest Oliver Agent

The Oliver Typewriter Co., The Oliver Typewriter Building Chicago, Illinois

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Ring the Bell Every Time

WHAT is it worth to you to be able to ring the bell every time you strike for a customer's order? What is it worth to you to be able, when he puts forth an objection, to knock that objection sky high with the irresistible force of a selling argument that has been tried and proven by the best salesmen of the best concerns in the world—concerns whose names are household words by reason of the enormous sales these very selling arguments have brought them?

What is it Worth to You:

—To know in advance the objections your prospect will make and the best answer to each that has ever yet been discovered.

—To have a number of answers (in some cases as many as twenty to thirty) to each objection—all irresistible—600 irresistible selling arguments?

—To know that every one of these arguments has been evolved by years of hard experience—improved and made stronger by constant successful use?

—To know that many of these arguments cost thousands of dollars in experience before they were discovered and perfected—and that many of them have sold millions of dollars worth of goods?

Every Page Coinable Into Money

A chemical formula written on the back of an envelope may be worth a fortune; a few figures giving the combination to a safe may unlock a door with millions behind it. Every page of this book contains a selling formula that you can coin into ready money. Every one of these 600 irresistible arguments opens a door that will lead you to more sales and more commissions. You could well pay, if you had to, a greenback for every page of this book; but the cost to you is slight.

Sign This Coupon —Can you afford to pay one-half cent for an argument that has sold thousands of dollars worth of goods—an argument whose discovery cost hundreds or even thousands of dollars in time and experience and actual money of star salesmen and great concerns.

—An argument that will surely close sales for you—that may clear you a hundred dollars in commissions the first day you use it, and hundreds or even thousands of dollars as you use it over and over again, throughout the entire year and for years to come.

Can you afford to pay one-half cent for what is worth anywhere from $10.00 to $1,000.00 in actual money-making power to you?

Then Sign This Coupon and Mail Today

THE SHELDON UNIVERSITY PRESS, Libertyville, Illinois

Enclosed please find $4.00 for your Two Big Volumes of Six Hundred Talking Points and Selling Arguments.

Name.....

Address, etc.....

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

The Salary Question

YOUR "salary question" is at once and forever solved the moment you become a trained man. Once you enter the ranks of the men who are trained for modern business, the salary question takes care of itself. It is no longer necessary to "go through the mill" for a business training. The days of long apprenticeship, long years of waiting for promotion are past.

If you will put a postage stamp and a little of your time against The Sheldon Book—which we will send you FREE—we can show you how more than 40,000 men have been helped to decide their salary questions through the medium of The Sheldon School. Let the burden of proving that we can turn your spare time at home into a high class business training rest entirely upon us. Merely inscribe your name and address on this coupon and leave the rest to our literature.

The Sheldon School
1033 Republic Bldg., Chicago

The Sheldon School, 1033 Republic Bldg., Chicago

Please send me a FREE CO
Book without cost or obligation.

Name .....

Street .....

City .....

Public Bldg., Chicago
COPY of The Sheldon

State .....

STIFFEN UP YOUR BACKBONE!

The Backbone Monthly

"A Serum Against Softening of the Moral Spine"

It will help you develop more power, teach you how to control your forces and stiffen up your backbone. You will find its pages brimful of helpful, inspiring, scientific and man-building advice.

Tom Dreier edits it!

It's so different—both editorially and mechanically—terse, brief, pointed and powerful in all departments. Men who usually criticize have only good things to say about it.

A remittance of 50 cents will start your subscription with the next issue. The price will be $1.00 after August 15, 1910—better use this coupon now!

SEND ME YOUR BACKBONE

THE BACKBONE SOCIETY, Aurora, Illinois:

I am enclosing 50 cents. Please enter my subscription to THE BACKBONE MONTHLY for one year, beginning with the next number.

Name .....

B.P. 8 10

Address .....

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

The Sheldon Business Normal

Is in successful session at Lake Eara, in the beautiful new building at Area, Illinois. (Present postoffice address, Libertyville, Illinois.)

You saw the announcements in The Business Philosopher. You wish you were at the Business Normal now.

The course of instruction consists of:

First—Personal study and class instruction in:

(a) The Science of Business Building, which is the fourth edition of the Science of Successful Salesmanship.

(b) The Science of Industrial Success.

(c) The Science of Service.

Second—An extensive series of personal lectures by Mr. Sheldon and a corps of assistants in Salesmanship and Business Economics.

Third—A course of twenty lectures by Katherine M. H. Blackford, M. D., on Character Analysis, or the reading of Human Nature.

Fourth—The complete course of instruction at the second session of the Sheldon Summer School, between July 27 and August 9.

Fifth—Frequent drills in the Art of Salesmanship and Sales Management.

The regular course began July 1, and ends October 1, 1910.

This course of study leads to the appointment of those students who desire to take up our work and who are selected by Mr. Sheldon as being worthy and qualified, to immediate positions in connection with the work of the Sheldon schools.

The gross earnings of those who prove successful in these positions will be not less than $3,000 a year. Experience indicates that earnings of $5,000 or even double that amount are a reasonable expectation for men thus trained and employed.

You who are now well placed in a congenial line can obtain here the training you need to intensify the work of your sales department. The class is open for service to employers who find the training of competent sales managers a problem.

You find here the quick, sure, sane, tried, plain, direct, scientific road to success in the great field of sales management.

You can come now and earlier study of the Sheldon course will enable you to catch up with the class. Quick action secures the prizes of life—this is one of them.

THE SHELDON SCHOOL,

Area—P. O. Libertyville, Illinois

1910

Gentlemen —Will you please forward full particulars regarding The Sheldon Business Normal School, as advertised in THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER for August.

Name.....

Local Address.....

CUT OUT AND MAIL THIS COUPON TODAY

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

JELLY vs BONE

Which do you think would win in a battle royal?

GET AMONG THE STIFF RIBBED CLASS

BACKBONE

A Bouncer for the Blues

Hints for the prevention of jelly-spine curvature and mental squint. A straight-up antidote for the blues and a straight-ahead sure cure for the grouch.

Ten Thousand Copies Sold to Date

The optimism and Healthy Good-Cheer of Backbone gives the inspiration to look on the "Sunny side of things." Everyone needs a little encouragement at times and all will benefit by its reading. Backbone contains 80 pages of gloom-dispelling philosophy, the best of the "Keep-a-pushing" poetry and hundreds of remarkably good sayings, mottoes and aphorisms of our ablest men. A few of the Backbone Bracers are the chapters on Character, Cheerfulness, Purpose, Success, Opportunity, Progress, Worry, Persistence, Self-Improvement, Training, Little Things, Courage, Self-Confidence Mistakes, Thoroughness, Enemies, Love, Criticism, Duty, Work, and a dozen other subjects.

These chapters are introduced with splendid original articles by Dr. W. C. Abbott, Dr. Geo. F. Butler, J. D. Albright, A. S. Burdick, W. F. Waugh, and others.

Every person you sell this book to will become your fast friend. It's a repeater and a trade puller.

Eighty pages printed attractively in two colors and tied with silk. Retail price in art binding, 50 cents each. De Luxe, limp brown leather copies, $1.00 each. Add one dollar and seventy-five cents and receive the Business Philosopher for 12 months.

Sheldon University Press

Area P. O., Libertyville, Illinois

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Sherwin Cody's Latest Book
How to Do Business by Letter
and Training Course in Business English Composition

The most successful book on letter-writing ever published, now in its 47th thousand, eleventh edition, though but recently published.

Contains over 125 model letters of all kinds, including a number of the more successful pulling letters used by prominent houses.

Also the Rules of Grammar complete, with all common errors; the Rules of Punctuation, Words Often Misused, Rules and Regulations of the Postoffice (correct to 1910), etc.

Price, postpaid. $1.00. See table of contents.

Sherwin Cody's Form Paragraph Letter-Writer

An indexed and gummed blankbook, full letter size, loose leaf, in which to paste form paragraphs to be used in answering all kinds of correspondence.

By this system an $8-a-week girl can write better letters than a $25-a-week correspondent, because she simply copies into her book the best paragraphs in the regularly dictated letters of the head of the business, and all letters are in his language, perfect in every detail of punctuation, grammar, etc., and may be signed by his name though he never sees the letter himself. This is a wonderful means of raising the quality of correspondence, as well as saving much time and expense. 80 gummed pages, 20 index pages, 100 pages in all; price, postpaid, $3; subject to approval and return at my expense.

Sherwin Cody's Compendium of All Card Systems

An instruction book on loose-leaf and card systems (the only book ever published clearly stating the simple fundamental principles of these systems), accompanying a neat box of 500 cards, size 3 x 5 inches, printed from specially engraved wax plates in the best style, representing 18 complete systems all ready for use, including forms for mailing lists, advertising, salesman's report and route cards, perpetual inventory forms, cost systems, school forms, and loose-leaf and card ledgers of all kinds, for wholesale, retail, mail-order, instalment, and specialty businesses. Electrotypes of plates sold and directions given for printing systems at one-third the usual price. Price, complete, $3.00.

How to Make Advertising Pay
How to Write Letters that Pull
Office Salesmanship & Business Psychology

I have made a detailed personal study of forty-six leading lines of business: Manufacturing, wholesale, retail, mail-order, and specialty, and have taught presidents, secretaries and advertising managers how to make a success of their publicity—I know what will win in forty-six different businesses, yours among the number, and this information I give in my complete course, together with all the books and special features described above, with scores of others—everything I have for only $30, including twenty personal lessons. Write for complete catalogue.

SHERWIN CODY, LIBERTYVILLE, ILLINOIS

CONTENTS:

Using Words So as To Make People Do Things.
 How to Begin a Business Letter.
 How to Close a Business Letter.
 The Body of the Letter.
 Applying for a Position.
 Sending Money by Mail.
 Ordering Goods.
 "Hurry-up" Letters.
 How Money is Collected.
 Letters to Ladies.
 Professional Letters.
 How to Acquire an Easy Style in Letter Writing.
 Two Kinds of Letters—Buying and Selling.
 When to Write a Long Letter and When to Write a Short Letter.
 Answering Inquiries.
 Talking in a Letter—Colloquialisms and Slang.
 Complaint Letters.
 Condensation—Writing Advertisements.
 Advertising and Follow-up Letters.
 Display in Letter Writing.
 Salesmanship in Letters and Advertisements.
 Customs and Regulations of the Post Office.
 Social and Official Forms; the Rules of Grammar, with Common Errors; the Rules of Punctuation for Business Office Use.

THE GLENWOOD BOYS' REGIMENT ON DRESS PARADE

Making the Men of Tomorrow out of the Glenwood Boy—Page 457

The Business Philosopher

A. F. SHELDON, EDITOR

VOLUME VI

AUGUST, 1910

NUMBER 8

On the Front Porch

Where We Talk Things Over

HERE IS a story so old that it surely must be good, because it has survived through so many years.

An Irishman and a Frenchman had a serious disagreement. Hot words passed between them. Each thought his honor assailed. They fought.

But before beginning the scrap, Pat said to Gaspard:

"Now look ye here, Frinchy. Wan of us is goin' to get licked, shurre. And whin a man knows the other felly is the besht man, 'tis toime to shtop. So, if ye think ye're gettin' the worsht af it, holler, 'Enough!' And Oi'll do that same if I think ye're bateing me."

And so it was agreed.

They punched away at each other like mad for a few minutes. Pat had the longer reach and soon began to paint the tricolor on the Gaul.

Gaspard knew that he was no match for the Irishman, and wanted the mill called off. But, try as he would, he couldn't remember that crazy English word he was to yell when he wanted to quit. His English vocabulary was short on both ends anyhow.

Finally he thought he had it.

"Hur-r-rah!" he shouted, wildly.

Up to this time, Pat had been thinking that he had the best of it. But when he heard his antagonist cheer, he thought, "Howly Mither, but this frog-eater is a glutton fer punishment. Oi'll have to be handin' him some bigger wallops."

When Pat speeded up, Gaspard was scared.

"Hurrah!" he yelled, louder than before. And that only made Pat fight all the harder.

Then the French gentleman began to think:

"Diable! Zis Monsieur le Irissman, he fight like ze cyclone! And he iss worser w'en I give ze word to make stop. He weel keel me if I do not leek heem."

With that, Gaspard fought desperately, and soon had the Hibernian going fast. Pat saw what was coming, so he yelled "Enough!"

"Eenofe! Eenofe! Zat is ze vort," exclaimed Gaspard, delighted. "Merci. I haf been trying to sink of zis wort for feeftteen meenutes!"

And there are several morals to this story. One is that even when a man thinks that he is doing his best, he can always do a little better. Another is that a seeming disadvantage can always be turned into a real advantage. Still another is that it is the man who hangs on just a moment longer than the other fellow that wins in competition.

THINK OVER that first moral just a little. You know that it is true. You have seen it exemplified hundreds of times. I recall one instance now that has stuck in my mind ever since I was a boy.

In the days when lumbering was more of an industry in the north country than it is now, they used to run logs down the river in rafts. This was sometimes an exciting pastime, especially where the river narrowed down and the current was swift. When these fun-makers were complicated by a crooked course, there were lively doings on the raft.

Old Bill Clinton was one of the best known raftsmen on the river in those days, and steered many millions of feet of big pine logs from the woods down to the mills. One spring he was coming down with an extra big raft, handling the forward sweep, while Mart Weatherwax presided aft.

The water was high and the current swift. There was a good deal of narrow and crooked navigation, nearly all the way down.

Now it takes grit, determination, and no small skill to keep a big raft of logs from piling up in the mud on a sharp turn where the water runs swift, and Bill and Mart knew that they were not a house-boat party at afternoon tea.

There was one bad place on the river that was the despair of all the rivermen. Bill and Mart approached it with lively anticipation. When they reached it, Bill was working his sweep like a marine engine, and managed to keep the head of the raft just about right. But Mart, though he worked hard, saw that his end was getting away from him. As soon as Bill had a moment to breathe, he looked up and saw that the after part of the structure would be aground in a minute or two unless Mart put a little more steam into his stroke.

"Pull harder, Mart, you ——— ———! Pull! Pull! Pull, you son of a sea-cook, pull!"

Thus gently admonished, Mart dug his sweep in heroically.

Still the raft swung toward the bank.

And still Clinton yelled:

"Pull, you pike-nosed, old river hog! Pull, you polka-dotted Indian! Pull, dad-burn ye, pull!"

Mart worked like a dog digging out a woodchuck, but the danger grew greater every second.

Bill was shrieking by this time.

"Pull, Mart! Pull as hard as you can!"

Weatherwax was getting mad.

"I am pullin' as hard as I can, you leather-lunged lummo!"

"Pull harder than you can, then. You've got to!"

And Mart, mad as a hornet, did pull a little bit harder than he could, and the raft was saved.

This is no exaggeration, no figure of speech. Men everywhere have found that they could do more than they thought they could. But always with an added incentive. There's the secret of it.

The Frenchman sailed in and licked the Irishman when the added incentive of desperation gave him strength to do more than he could possibly have done without it.

Mart Weatherwax told the truth when he said that he was pulling as hard as he could. He couldn't have pulled another ounce without the added incentive of Old Bill Clinton's brutal taunts and agonized shrieks.

The scientific fact of the matter is that people do not use more than a fraction of their real physical and mental powers. Some psychologists say that the average man uses only about one half of his physical power, and only about one-tenth of his mental power.

I have known many athletes of great size and huge muscles to be beaten by men greatly their inferiors in physique. Why? Because the big fellows didn't use their strength. They would come out of a contest beaten, but as fresh and vigorous as when they went in. Their conquerors would finish nearly exhausted but triumphant.

In the terrible hardships of the Yukon marches, experience has shown that the Anglo-Saxon, although frail and comparatively unaccustomed to hardship, struggles on and reaches camp, while the burly semi-savages give up, lie down, and freeze to death.

Why don't the big athletes and the tough Indian guides use all their strength?

Because they lack the incentive.

In the mental realm, some of the most wonderful achievements have been made by men of mediocre mental acuteness and power, while some of the most brilliant men that ever lived have died without achieving anything worth handing down to posterity.

Professor Walter Dill Scott, in an article in the System magazine, cites the case of Charles Darwin. The great scientist was a man of weak body and easily tired brain. But he was driven by a powerful will, intensified by a burning desire to know, and he used all his power.

Now, LET'S be frank with ourselves.

Why not pull just a little harder than we can? Why not get an added incentive, go at it systematically to increase our A R E A, and use a bigger percentage of our physical and mental powers?

Don't be afraid to plunge in. It is a scientific fact that it isn't work that kills people, but worry and bad habits of living. Other things being equal, the man that does the most work keeps in better health and lives longer than his less active fellows. For one thing, he has a greater desire to live, his circumstances being so much better.

The next thing is to get the incentive to effort.

I have already discussed this several times in these talks. But it is worth stating again.

An incentive is a feeling that increases the desire for accomplishment.

The Frenchman desired to whip his antagonist from the very beginning of the fight, but his desire became so strong that it put new power into his fighting when the feeling of desperation backed it up.

Mart Weatherwax desired to save the raft from going aground at the very first, but his desire was fanned into a white-hot flame by the feeling of anger at Bill's tongue-lashing.

The winning athlete has a greater desire for victory than his stronger but less desperate opponent.

So it is our business to get a strong feeling that will intensify our desire to accomplish.

And the way to get that feeling is, first, by thinking right thoughts, meditating on the feeling you want to possess, painting mental pictures of yourself with that feeling developed, holding in mind the kind of thoughts you know tend to awaken the feeling you want to possess.

Another way to get the right thoughts in mind and awaken the right feeling is by the study of the biographies of those who have succeeded by reason of the very incentive you are seeking.

Study your environment. Find what places, what books, what associations, what subjects of conversation tend to give the right feelings.

Compare yourself with other successful men and women. Imitation is a great incentive.

When you do get the feeling aroused, act. Do this every time. It is of the utmost importance.

Keep it up. Expect to win. Cultivate your faith and hope. Be in dead earnest about it. Here lies the difference between mediocrity and excellence.

A SEEMING disadvantage can be turned into a real advantage.

Let me give you something specific and timely on this.

This is midsummer. Many people are on their vacations. It is the "dull season" for many lines of business. And, with many, it is a time for letting down that eternal vigilance, for relaxing efforts, for laying off help and cutting down advertising expenses.

Many salesmen, and particularly specialty salesmen, say to themselves at this time of the year, "Oh, well, it's hardly worth while going out after business just now, so many people are away on their vacations or cutting down expenses. I might just as well lay off until fall."

Let me tell you two stories.

I once knew a specialty salesman who communed thus with himself:

"Lo, now is the time of summer vacations, and business is poor. I will shut up the office, lay off the stenographer and clerk, go abroad in the land in an automobile with my wife, and have a good time generally. Then, when fall comes I will be fresh and full of sap for Big Doings. Thus shall I more than make up for the summer's idleness."

And so he quit work for the summer.

He had a pretty good time, although idleness began to pall on him long before the first of September. He got back to his office feeling no worse, physically, than when he left it. But all his mental powers had been relaxed so long that it took him some days to key them up to concert pitch.

Then he found that the business had lost its momentum. Prospects that had been coming along well had to be sold all over again, and some of them had backslidden so far that they couldn't be brought into the fold at all.

The public had lost the habit of going to his office, and, not seeing his advertising, had begun to overlook him. Confidence, which he had been years in building up, had waned on account of his long absence. People were beginning to forget that he was on earth.

Certain customers already on the list had needed attention during the summer, and some of them were peevish because he had not been there to look after them.

All in all, it took him several months to get back the business speed he had when he closed his office. Not only that, his office rent and personal expenses had been running on just the same, and it took him some little time to make up that loss.

It is needless to say that this man's office has been running full tilt every summer since that time.

Now here is the other story. It is also about a specialty salesman.

After a year's successful business, this man came to the first of July with a feeling that he would enjoy a rest. But he was in business to win, he needed the money, so he stopped and considered a little. And this is the way he reasoned:

"Now I can get all the rest I really need by spending a week on the old farm with the folks. After that, what shall I do? It isn't usual for a man in my line to go out on the road during the summer. And, now that I think of it, that is just the reason why I shall go. Of course it will be a disadvantage to find so many people away on their vacations, but I believe that I can turn that into a real advantage because those who are left will be much easier to see—no competitors being in the field at this time of the year—and will have a lot more time to give to me. I believe that, notwithstanding the vacations, I can find plenty of people to talk with, and, there being so little competition,

I shall do more business than in the regular season."

And, when he tried it, he found that it was even so. For several years, until he was promoted, he found the summer season his best and most profitable.

When others let down, then is the time to redouble your efforts.

When others are resting, work.

When the difficulties are great for you, remember, they are just as great for your competitor. If you feel like lying down, so does he—and perhaps he does. If you have many competitors, some of them are sure to retire in the face of the difficulty. Then is your time.

Ellis Brayton was a farmer near my boyhood home. And he was prosperous. One year, a late spring, bad storms, insects, and drought nearly ruined the corn crop in our neighborhood. The result was that corn was high that fall and winter. The farmers got more for what little they did harvest than they would have for an ordinary crop.

Next spring, everybody in the county was putting in big acreages of corn—that is, everybody but Ellis Brayton. He was ignoring the high price of corn and making a specialty of oats.

It proved to be a good season for corn, and the big fields yielded amazingly. Corn was a drug on the market. But oats were higher than they had been for years, and Brayton made a handsome profit.

The next year all the farmers, having been stung on corn the year before, were planting oats. But wise Ellis Brayton, seemingly flying in the face of the ruinous prices of corn, covered his broad acres with the rustling maize. And he won again.

These are only some of the ways in which a seeming disadvantage can be turned into a real advantage. A little of the same forethought, courage, originality, and initiative can be applied in every case. And there are very few cases in which the turn can not be made.

---

PERSISTENCE is one of the greatest lessons in success that the young man or young woman has to learn.

Some decades ago, a member of the British Parliament rose and offered a bill reforming the abuses in the insuring of ships. He said that owners were being permitted to insure their vessels for much more than their worth and then neglecting them until they became unseaworthy and were wrecked. This, he held, caused needless loss to the insurance companies and, what was worse, a waste of the lives of British seamen. But his colleagues thought that the insurance companies and the seamen ought to be able to take care of themselves. Ship owners had great influence. Many of the members of Parliament were ship owners. So they did nothing about the bill.

At the next session of Parliament, the same member arose in the House of Commons, presented the same bill, and made the same arguments. His measure was again ignored. He seemed to be fighting a lone battle against overwhelming odds.

For years, that same member stood up among his jeering fellows on every possible occasion and called for a reform of the same abuses. And for years, nothing came of it.

But, finally, his persistence had its effect. Other members of Parliament took up the cry. The newspapers began to pay some attention to it. The public became aroused. The fight was on.

At first, the interests attacked were so strong that the fight seemed hopeless. But our quiet, persistent member kept right on the path he had marked out for himself.

You know the outcome, of course. He won. And British sailors have been safer in their hammocks ever since.

Garfield, when in college, was studying to win a prize. He noted that his nearest rival put his light out every night at midnight. Garfield kept his study lamp burning every night until one o'clock—and won.

There are many other stories like this in history. They are happening today.

Then there are the thousands we may never have heard of, toiling away at the seemingly humdrum duties of everyday work, but keeping everlastingly at the task of developing their ability, reliability, endurance, and action to higher and higher degree. They are the people who "grow not weary in well-doing."

You know and I know that there are thousands who begin some course of study or training with great enthusiasm and high hopes. But after a time they discover that there is no royal road to fortune, fame, glory or learning; that the law of compensation has not been repealed; that if they ever get anything worth having, they will have to work for it, work hard, and keep on working. "Too much trouble!" they sigh, and drop out of the race.

Such are the ninety-five per cent who fail of success in anything like the true sense of the word. They are leaners, not lifters. They are the folks who whine about their "luck."

And what fun they get out of it who stick!

First of all, there is the feeling of power, the consciousness of the winning force within. That is something unknown to the man who weakly gives up in the face of difficulty. Although he is clever in framing up excuses, the quitter, deep down in his heart, despises himself. And that makes it all the easier for him to quit next time he runs up against a snag.

But the man who has met a difficulty and, by sheer persistence overcome it, feels the high elation of certainty that there is no obstacle in the course he has mapped out for himself so great that he cannot find some way around it, over it, under it, or right straight through it, if he only keeps at it long enough.

When a man feels that way, obstacles seem to melt away before he has touched them.

Then, there is the feeling that success always brings—the desire to do even greater things—to render greater service. This desire, together with the feeling of power I have spoken of, constitute the joy of living. The man who does not possess them only exists. He is not growing, but decaying.

Yes, those are the only two classes, my dear—those who grow a little every day, and those who decay.

Where are you? Be honest with yourself, now.

And then remember this: No matter how long you have been on the decadent list, you have it in you to begin to grow. And no matter how much you have grown, there is room for you to grow some more.

HAVE YOU GOT the three lessons of this talk?

Here they are:

No matter how well you may be doing, you can do a little better.

Every seeming disadvantage can be turned into a real advantage.

Keep on just as long as you can—then keep on a little longer—persistence wins.

Good stuff, isn't it?

You see the truth, don't you?

What are you going to do about it?

What are you going to do now?

Now is the high-tide of the year,
And whatever of life hath ebbd away
Comes flooding back with a ripply cheer
Into every bare inlet and creek and bay.

LOWELL

A GRADUATING CLASS OF GLENWOOD BOYS

Making the Man of Tomorrow Out of the Glenwood Boy : by Arthur W. Newcomb

A FEW years ago, in Chicago, a man was led out to the gallows to be hanged. As he took his place on the trap, the officials and reporters saw a young fellow in the early twenties—a boy with some promise in the shape of his head, but brutality in his face.

Before the black cap was slipped on, he was asked whether he had anything to say. And this is what he said:

"I never had a chance!

"My father was a murderer. The less I say about my mother the better.

"I was starved, beaten, kicked, and neglected from the day I was born.

"I was taught to lie as soon as I could talk, to steal as soon as I could walk, and knew the bottom of vice and crime before I ever heard of virtue or honor.

"I was a drunkard from the time I could toddle. You are hanging me for killing my best friend when I was so drunk that I remember nothing about it.

"I die game. I have no kick coming—except that I never had a chance in this life."

And a few seconds later, Society had snuffed out the life of the boy, its double victim—victim of Society's neglect—victim of Society's inadequacy to deal with the result of that neglect.

One Who Had a Chance

Now another story:

A few weeks ago, in that same city of Chicago, a boy received his diploma from a high standard technical school. He had not only earned his way through, but had contributed to the support of some of his relatives while doing it. He now has a good position with a progressive firm, and is making good. He is adding to the wealth of society.

A few years ago that boy was a dependent—had no wholesome home life; no one to feed, clothe, and shelter him; no one to train and educate him.

And it is the starved, ill-clothed, poorly-sheltered, and neglected boy that grows up to be a criminal. That is the way he was headed.

But right here is where the subject of my story comes in—the Illinois Manual Training School Farm, at Glenwood.

This boy went to Glenwood. And, instead of becoming a criminal, he had his chance.

Glenwood stepped in when the boy became dependent and before he became a "delinquent" or criminal.

Instead of becoming a social and economic menace, the boy became an asset.

Instead of becoming a burden—poverty and crime in this country cost us not less than a billion dollars a year—the boy became one of the bearers of the burden.

Glenwood did it.

What Glenwood Is and Was

I stood in the big, bright, beautiful dining room at Glenwood, at noon. Everything was spotlessly clean, but homelike. White table linen, china dishes, silver table ware, artistic china on the plate rail and historic pictures on the walls, made the place look more like the café of a family hotel of the better class, than the mess-hall of an "institution."

At the door, four abreast, stood the boys, waiting for the signal to enter. Erect, sturdy, rosy-cheeked, bright-faced, clear-eyed, well-dressed, quiet, and orderly, they marched, by companies, to their tables, keeping perfect step to the music of the piano. Then they stood, motionless at their places. A bell tinkled and they sat down. A chord from the piano, and three hundred and fifty boys' voices rang out "grace." The matrons served the plentiful, wholesome meal, boys assigned to that duty waiting on the tables.

Seventy-five per cent of these three hundred fifty boys would be homeless or in bad home surroundings were it not for Glenwood or some other philanthropy.

That, in a word, is what Glenwood is—a home and school for dependent boys, on a three-hundred-acre farm, twenty-four miles south of Chicago. And by dependent,

I mean dependent not only for food, raiment and shelter, but for good training, good influences, and love.

The history of Glenwood runs back into obscurity. A good man, named Dudley, who often had the heartache, began, about twenty-five years ago, to take dependent boys from Chicago to his own home in Norwood Park, a suburb. There he cared for and taught them, keeping them as long as their own home conditions made it necessary. About the same time, another far-sighted man, in a near-by suburb, began to do the same kind of conservation work in his home. The work of both grew a little. Other good people began to take an interest in it.

On May fifteenth, 1887, a number of these people met to organize and elect officers, preparatory to establishing a home for dependent, homeless boys. And the total endowment and plant of the home on that May day was a great desire to save the boy.

That desire worked out as every really great desire always does. On June twenty-ninth, a temporary home was found in an old hotel building at Norwood Park, and given a regenerating baptism of soap and water. A kitchen range, some dry goods, and a few mattresses were sent out from Chicago. H. H. Kohlsaas, the baker, now proprietor of the Chicago Record-Herald, donated a basket of bread and cakes.

And the next day, ten boys were sent out from the county court in Chicago—not bad boys, but homeless boys.

Two years later, a number of women saw a place where they could take hold and do something worth while. They organized the Auxiliary Board, with Mrs. Milton Jay as president. Today, more than twenty years later, Glenwood boys are wearing clothing and sleeping in beds supplied by these women. And Mrs. Jay is still president—and more interested in her boys than she was at the beginning.

Many other things these women have done to make the home-school the success it is. I'll tell you about some more of them at the proper place.

A Farmer With a Seer's Vision

Milton George was a farmer who lived twenty-four miles south of Chicago. He and his wife had toiled for years acquiring a three-hundred-acre farm of some of the finest land in the state. Both were getting along in years. And they were childless.

What would become of the great farm after they were gone? What had their lives been worth, anyway, spent in getting a bit of land that they could not take away with them when they left the world? Serious questions. A great many people wonder about the same things.

And then Milton George and his wife saw the Illinois Manual Training School in the old hotel building at Norwood Park. They thought the thing over and they talked it over. They saw deep and far. Looking into the future they saw thousands of boys taken out of debauching surroundings and growing up to clean, useful manhood on their farm. They saw these boys out among their fellows—men of uprightness and industry—part of the forces of progress.

And so the farm of Milton George and his wife—their all—became the property of the Illinois Manual Training School Farm within a year after its organization. Mr. George lived to see twenty brick buildings erected and nearly six thousand boys cared for at the school for shorter or longer periods. Mrs. George is still living, and is a member of the Auxiliary Board.

THE MAN OF TOMORROW

Come now, who got more satisfaction out of their property, the Milton Georges, who gave it away, or the folks who kept it to "enjoy"?

The farm now has eleven cottages, accommodating about thirty-two boys each, equipped with hot and cold water, steam heat, electric lights, and bath rooms; the main or administration building and dining room and kitchen; the grammar school, with accommodations for five hundred boys; the manual training building, Clancy Hall, the chapel; a bakery, a swimming pool, the power plant, the greenhouse, and the farm buildings. These and their equipment with the farm, represent a value of about half a million dollars. And there is an endowment that pays interest of about six thousand dollars a year.

Some Master Servants

All this is under the control of a corporation, composed of those who have contributed one hundred dollars or more to the school, and is managed by a board of directors elected by the votes of these members of the corporation.

Mr. Edward B. Butler, of the firm of Butler Brothers, is the president of the board—has been for fifteen years. He misses his noon-day meal every Sunday of the year, no matter what the weather, that he may visit Glenwood and give his business acumen and experience to the solution of the problems of the school and home. He does a great deal more, too, but I am told that he is very modest about it, so I spare him.

The other members of the board are nearly all prominent business men of Chicago and other Illinois cities.

Glenwood is by no means a one-man institution, and this is a story of ideas, not of personalities, but I can not tell it properly without a tribute to Leo A. Philips, superintendent, and V. P. Randall, his right hand man.

I have sat at meat with this man, Philips, walked about the farm with him, have sat up at night in his office, have seen him with his boys—and have seen his boys with him. I am going to see him again, and so I don't dare to tell you all I think of him. But read what I shall have to say of the work of the school, and then remember that I said here that it reflects, in large measure, the bigness and tenderness of heart, the keenness of intellect, and the power of will of its superintendent.

Not that I want you to believe that this man has done all that has been done at the institution—for he has been there only a year—but if ever a man fitted into the atmosphere of a place, Mr. Philips fits into that at Glenwood.

Without departing from the fine traditions of the school, Mr. Philips has breathed their spirit into the many improvements that he has made and is making. His work has been, not to overhaul and make over the institution, but to develop it toward perfection in the character given to it by its founders.

Next to Mr. Philips stands Mr. Randall, who answers to the official title of military instructor. But the label names but a very small part of the duties of the man. He works hand in hand with the superintendent—and they are a well-matched team. Not alike, you understand, but adapted each to the other. I won't try to tell you all that Mr. Randall does, but some of the important things, aside from his military duties, are editing the monthly school paper, "The Glenwood Boy," delivering lectures on the work of the school before churches, clubs, and societies, and assisting in the social work with the boys themselves.

LEO A. PHILIPS, SUPERINTENDENT

And just a word about that "Glenwood Boy." If you are interested in work for boys—and who isn't?—send to Mr. Randall, at Glenwood, Illinois, for a sample copy. You'll find something well worth the reading.

Mr. Randall has had some years' experience in social service in New York and other large cities, and traveling about the country. His heart is in the work—yes, more than that, the work has gripped him and gripped him hard. This picture shows the strength of the man, but it does not show the sympathy, gentleness, geniality, happiness, and keen sense of humor that make him a prince of good fellows, a delightful companion, and a popular hero among the boys.

Boy Finder and Home Finder

Then there is Captain West, who has been probation officer of the school for several years—almost from the very first. He looks up dependent and neglected boys, makes arrangements for their stay at Glenwood, sometimes with a parent or other relative, sometimes with the Juvenile Court. He also finds homes in good families for the boys, when that seems the best thing for them. There are eleven hundred Glenwood boys now living with foster parents in all parts of the country. Captain West visits them all every year, as they are under the care of the school until they are eighteen years old.

Developing Self-Respect, Individuality, and Initiative

The basis of all work with the boys in the school is the development of manhood.

Now I'm going to be frank about it, and admit that when I walked up from the station to the farm, I was expecting to find several hundred pale-faced, furtive, rat-eyed, shuffling, hang-dog, "institutionalized" little boys. You see, I have visited some orphanages and "reform" schools—and I didn't know much about Glenwood.

When I saw the boys, I was jolted pretty hard. They looked like boys in attendance at the public schools in some section of a large city where good homes predominate.

Get that! Think what it means. Remember that most of these boys come from homes ruined by poverty, crime, ignorance, drunkenness, and other social evils.

Call to mind the condition of boys in the average "institution."

Then stop to think that these boys average close to the top in appearance and behavior.

Let me tell you how that was accomplished.

The boys live in cottages that are not chill, cheerless, sleeping barracks, but bright, comfortable homes.

Each boy has his own good bed, with white sheets, big motherly pillow, and dainty white spread. He has his own locker and treasure chest, his own towels, wash-rag, comb, brush, and tooth-brush. Each boy has his own distinctive clothing—there is no uniform garb except the dress uniform of khaki, which is worn only on Sunday afternoons and gala occasions. And all clothing is in the mode, well fitting, and of good quality.

In each of the cottages, there is a large basement play room and a cosy, cheerful, home-like living room, well stocked with books, pictures, and toys. The finish of these rooms is artistic, the draperies, books, and pictures of the best. The dining room and food I have described as high grade.

V. P. RANDALL, MILITARY INSTRUCTOR

In fact, everything is good. Glenwood has none of the "cheap and nasty" effect of "Charity skimped and iced,

In the name of a cautious, statistical Christ."

Everything is spotlessly clean—kept so by the boys themselves. The boys take pride in their quality environment and take good care of everything.

All this gives the boy not only individuality, but self-respect.

And figures show that it costs one-third less than the "economy" practiced in most institutions.

Each cottage is presided over by a matron or cottage mother. I met several of these women. They were of different types of womanhood, but strong in every one of them was the maternal instinct.

I saw them with their boys. And then I saw that the element of mother-love, the lack of which will starve the very best part of a boy's nature to death, was also a part of the answer to the big question that took possession of my mind when I saw how different the Glenwood boy was from those I had seen in other institutions.

School Life

Nearly all the boys spend half a day in the graded school, the work of which corresponds to that in other graded schools in Illinois. The other half of the school day is spent in manual training. The very littlest boys, who are too young to begin manual training, put in a full day at the school house. The big boys, who have graduated from the eighth grade, put in a full day at manual training.

The manual training work includes forging, machine shop practice, wood working, printing, shoemaking and shoe repairing, laundering, baking, gardening, and farming.

The aim in all of these is not only to educate hand, eye, and brain together, but to do work that has an intrinsic value, such as making and repairing all the tools and machinery used in the institution, doing all plumbing and steam-fitting, making and repairing shoes, furniture, bird-houses, architectural wood work, and cabinet work; printing the school paper, booklets, circulars, and stationery; doing the washing and laundry for all the cottages and buildings and their four hundred inhabitants; baking all the bread and pastry for the school dining room, growing flowers for the grounds and cottages, garden truck for the tables, and fodder for the live stock on the farm.

LIVING ROOM IN ONE OF THE COTTAGES

When boys remain in the school long enough, they are taught trades. I met one boy who has been there eight years, and is now just about to go out to take a good job as machinist. I saw others who are learning to be printers, launderers, cabinet-makers, bakers, and farmers.

Making Work a Pleasure

Boys are also assigned to domestic work, such as making beds, keeping the cottages clean, sweeping and scrubbing in the school house and other buildings, helping in the kitchen, waiting on tables in the dining room, and mending the boys' clothing. And they do all this work willingly, gladly, and well. I watched them at all of it, and I saw nothing but smiling faces, and heard nothing but happy talk, laughing, singing, and whistling.

That was odd to me.

Unless the years have dulled the keen edge of my memory, the boys of my town and time didn't like to do housework—or much of any kind of work for that matter. We usually growled a good deal about it, and rushed through it, slap-dash—anything to get away and go fishing, hunting, or swimming, or to the base ball diamond.

LEARNING TO BE MACHINISTS

And so I wondered about these Glenwood boys. And then I found that they were all working with an end in view—something definite and desirable.

"No boy—or man either—will work well just for the sake of working," said Mr. Philips. "They demand an object—something to be achieved, some goal to be attained. So we never ask a boy to do anything without pointing out to him some reason for doing it that will appeal to him."

Mr. Randall voiced the same idea when he said, "We do very little abstract teaching here. The boy mind grasps what is concrete and tangible. We don't teach them to be good just for the sake of being good, but to be good for something—to do right because it pays, always and everywhere. And we do all in our power to let the boy see that it does pay to do right."

He said further, "There are two things every healthy boy demands: action and results. Supply the opportunity for action and show him results, and the rest is easy."

Military Training

While the school is not a military school in the strict sense, yet the boys are given a military training, and are handled in military organization.

Each cottage houses a company, with its captain, lieutenant, sergeant, and corporals. Some of the captains are also majors, serving in that capacity when the school is drawn up in regiment formation. One of the captains is colonel of the regiment on such occasions. Just now, the colonel is the oldest boy in school, both in years and attendance. But all promotions are by merit, plus seniority, as I will explain a little further on.

All drill is conducted by the captains and other officers. The military instructor pays no attention to the company, battalion, and regimental drill, except to look on. The boy officers themselves give all the orders and work out the perfection of their companies.

There is a semi-weekly meeting of the officers with the military instructor. There he gives them the theoretical work, leaving them to work it out with their commands.

All the work of the school is also done in the same way. I saw a squad at work in one of the cottages making beds. They were in charge of one of their own number, a boy who was placed in command because he had shown that he was an adept at making beds.

In another place I saw the farm boys at work in the dairy. They were in charge of one of the boys.

In the dining room, in the manual training shops, in all the cottage work, everywhere, the boys were not watched and guided by instructors, attendants, or guards. They were organized into squads, each in charge of some boy who had proved his ability and power to think and decide for himself—to bear responsibility.

The boy who makes good as a private is soon promoted to a corporalship. When he has shown his ability there, he is made a sergeant. And so he goes up the ladder.

One of the companies is organized as a band, which plays for the dress parades on Sunday afternoons and at other times. The band is also sometimes hired to play in parades and at celebrations in near-by towns. On Decoration Day, the boys played in the parade at Harvey, Illinois.

Thus is developed self-reliance, confidence, and initiative.

Religious Training

The school is non-sectarian. Every Sunday morning, the boys meet in Clancy Hall, their chapel, where the Sunday school lesson for the day is briefly reviewed by the superintendent. Another short service is held in the afternoon. Often there is an address by some visiting speaker—either clergyman or layman.

But the most powerful religious influence is in the daily lives and work of the officers and instructors of the school. I have already told you about the superintendent, the military instructor, and the matrons. I also met several of the other teachers and instructors. And my thought was, "either the work with these boys makes character, or else the board has been very happy in making its selections." No doubt both are true.

Recreation

Each boy has about four hours a day for play, not counting the military drill, which the boys regard as play. They ought to have a gymnasium and an out-door play ground, and an endowment to keep them up. Here is my guess that they will have them before very long. For, as I intend to show you, the business world is fast waking up to the fact that the fundamental and most important conservation of our national resources is the saving of the boy and the making of the man of tomorrow. There are many other things that the school needs—and it is going to get them, too.

When the weather is bad, the boys play in the basements of the cottages. When it is cold, there are plenty of skates and sleds. But as soon as old Winter reluctantly gives way to Spring, they are out with their kites, their marbles, tops, swimming togs, and base ball outfits. Each cottage has a base ball team, and the contests are great fun.

Some of the boys are good walkers and runners, and now and then they organize a cross country "hike."

Almost every week, there is some kind of entertainment, either out doors or in Clancy Hall. The Auxiliary Board—those blessed women—see that this is well supplied.

So there is plenty of play, that greatest of all developers of child life.

Discipline and Records

The biggest question most parents and teachers have to solve is discipline. You would naturally think that the problem would be at its highest difficulty where there are so many boys together, and where most of them come from street "gangs" in the worst sections of Chicago and other large cities.

And yet, discipline is so easy at Glenwood that it is almost automatic.

Does that astonish you? It did me.

But it's easy when you know how. Mr. Philips and his assistants know how.

In the first place, every boy starts in at Glenwood with a perfectly clean record, no matter what his past has been. He has nothing to live down. His chance is as good as any other boy's.

In the second place, he is placed largely upon honor—made to think and decide for himself. There is no code of "rules and regulations."

In the third place, there is no corporal punishment, no imprisonment, or any cruel or unusual punishment. The boy is taught that he is a member of the community, and that he must respect himself and the rights and property of the community. If he wishes to share the privileges and pleasures of community life, he must fit into it harmoniously. If he doesn't do this, he ostracises himself—loses his privileges and is denied his pleasures until he gets back into harmony.

THE PROBLEM

There you have an application of the universal principle of harmony. There is a true sense in which every "sin" is disharmony and its real punishment the resulting jangle with the forces of the universe. These boys are being well trained in the fundamentals of moral philosophy.

Finally, there is the certain reward for well-doing. A record is kept of each boy's school work, manual training work, cottage life, military progress, and general deportment. These marks are given by five or six different adult persons, without consultation, each on a scale of twenty. A perfect mark in each of the five items would give the boy a total record of one hundred.

Every boy that stands eighty-five or more has his name printed on the honor roll in "The Glenwood Boy," and receives a neat "honor pin." This is better than a prize or prizes, because, if a boy does not wear an honor pin, it is his own fault, and not because some other boy was brighter than he.

Every time there is something in the nature of a lark or an outing, it is the honor boys that have the fun.

For instance, when Ringling Brothers' circus was in Chicago, the management sent out fifty tickets as a compliment to the Glenwood boys. And only honor boys went to the circus. Not only that, but they had the privilege of spending half a day in Chicago visiting places of interest. The fine thing about it all was that they did their visiting and attended the circus in charge of their own boy officers and returned to Glenwood without disorder or mishap.

On the Fourth of July, when Uncle Sam's soldiers gave their big exhibition in Grant Park, in Chicago, the honor boys from Glenwood were there. And that meant about two hundred and fifty boys out of a possible three hundred. The relative number of honor boys is steadily increasing, as you might suppose.

High marks mean promotion in military rank. They mean choice of work. And they mean special privileges.

Think what it means to a boy to be the captain of his company and to wear a sword at drill and on parade. Think what it means to be given office and clerical work, to be office boy at the city offices of the school, to be mail orderly, to accompany Mr. Randall on his lecture tours. High marks get all these things.

"Noblesse Oblige"

And yet, the boys are actuated by other motives than a selfish desire to get these privileges for themselves. Take the case of Sam, an Italian boy I met. He was in line for promotion to the office of captain. In a few weeks, he would lay aside the wooden gun and buckle on the sword. He had been in the school for several years, slowly and patiently working toward this coveted goal. Now it was almost in his grasp. Then he happened to think that the boy next in line for the captaincy had also been in the school a long time and would leave within a year. If Sam became captain, that boy would have to leave Glenwood without ever having worn the longed-for sword. And Sam knew by his own feelings just how eagerly the other fellow desired the honor. So Sam went to the superintendent and asked that the other boy be made captain instead of him.

"You see," he said, "I'll probably be here after he has gone, and then perhaps I can be captain."

Another very strong factor in maintaining harmony and good order is the grading of the cottages. Each cottage, as a group of boys, has its standing, based upon the marks of the individual boys, and upon their performance as a company. The cottages with good standings have various rewards and privileges. As a result the boys demand peace, good order, and high grade work of one another. The boy who would bring disgrace on his cottage finds himself brought up standing by his fellows.

Such is life at Glenwood. I hated to leave the place, the atmosphere was so clean, so cheerful, so full of optimism and hope.

What Has Been Accomplished

And what are the results? Who can measure them? Six thousand boys have been in the school in its twenty-three years of existence. No adequate records have been kept of their doings after leaving Glenwood, but few are known to have fallen down. Many have gone on with their education in high schools, colleges, technical school, colleges of agriculture, and other institutions. A large number have become successful tradesmen, some are in business and professional life. Every little while Superintendent Philips gets a letter from some former Glenwood boy who is making good somewhere and writes to tell how great has been the influence of the school on his life.

The boys love Glenwood—an unusual thing in institutions like this. Many of them weep when they leave. And they do not lose their affection for the school in after years.

About sixteen years ago a little boy was brought to Glenwood to be cared for. After some training, he was placed in the home of a farmer in North Dakota. Part of the agreement was that, when he left this farm, he was to receive a team of horses as part pay for his work there. In due time he finished his period of service and received his team—a splendid pair of colts that he had cared for and trained himself. But, in the meantime, he had decided that he would go on with his education in an eastern technical school.

What was he to do with his team? The farmer wouldn't buy them back, as he already had all he needed. The boy wouldn't sell them to anyone else, because he feared that they would be mistreated. So he hitched them to his wagon and drove overland to Glenwood, where he gave the horses to his beloved school as a present. I saw the team when I was there, now getting old, but still big muscular fellows.

A Business Proposition

I have written this strictly as a business story for business men.

Glenwood is a business proposition.

Your business and mine depend for their success upon the wealth, health, morals, contentment, culture, producing power, and purchasing power of the community.

Someone has to pay the billion dollars a year that poverty, vice and crime cost. And that someone is you and other honest producers.

It is about time that we were remedying causes rather than effects.

It is better to spend a few thousand dollars a year training boys at Glenwood and similar schools, than to spend millions of dollars a year catching, trying, and punishing criminals.

I believe that the business world is finding this out.

Glenwood was founded, built, endowed, and is supported and managed by business men. The Chicago Commercial Club, composed of the wealthiest and most prominent business men in Chicago gave a hundred thousand dollars to the school a few years ago.

Glenwood needs more money for its work—room for more boys.

The country needs hundreds more of schools like Glenwood.

I believe that Business, looking into the future beyond today's balance sheet, will invest heavily in Glenwood and other schools.

The signs all point that way.

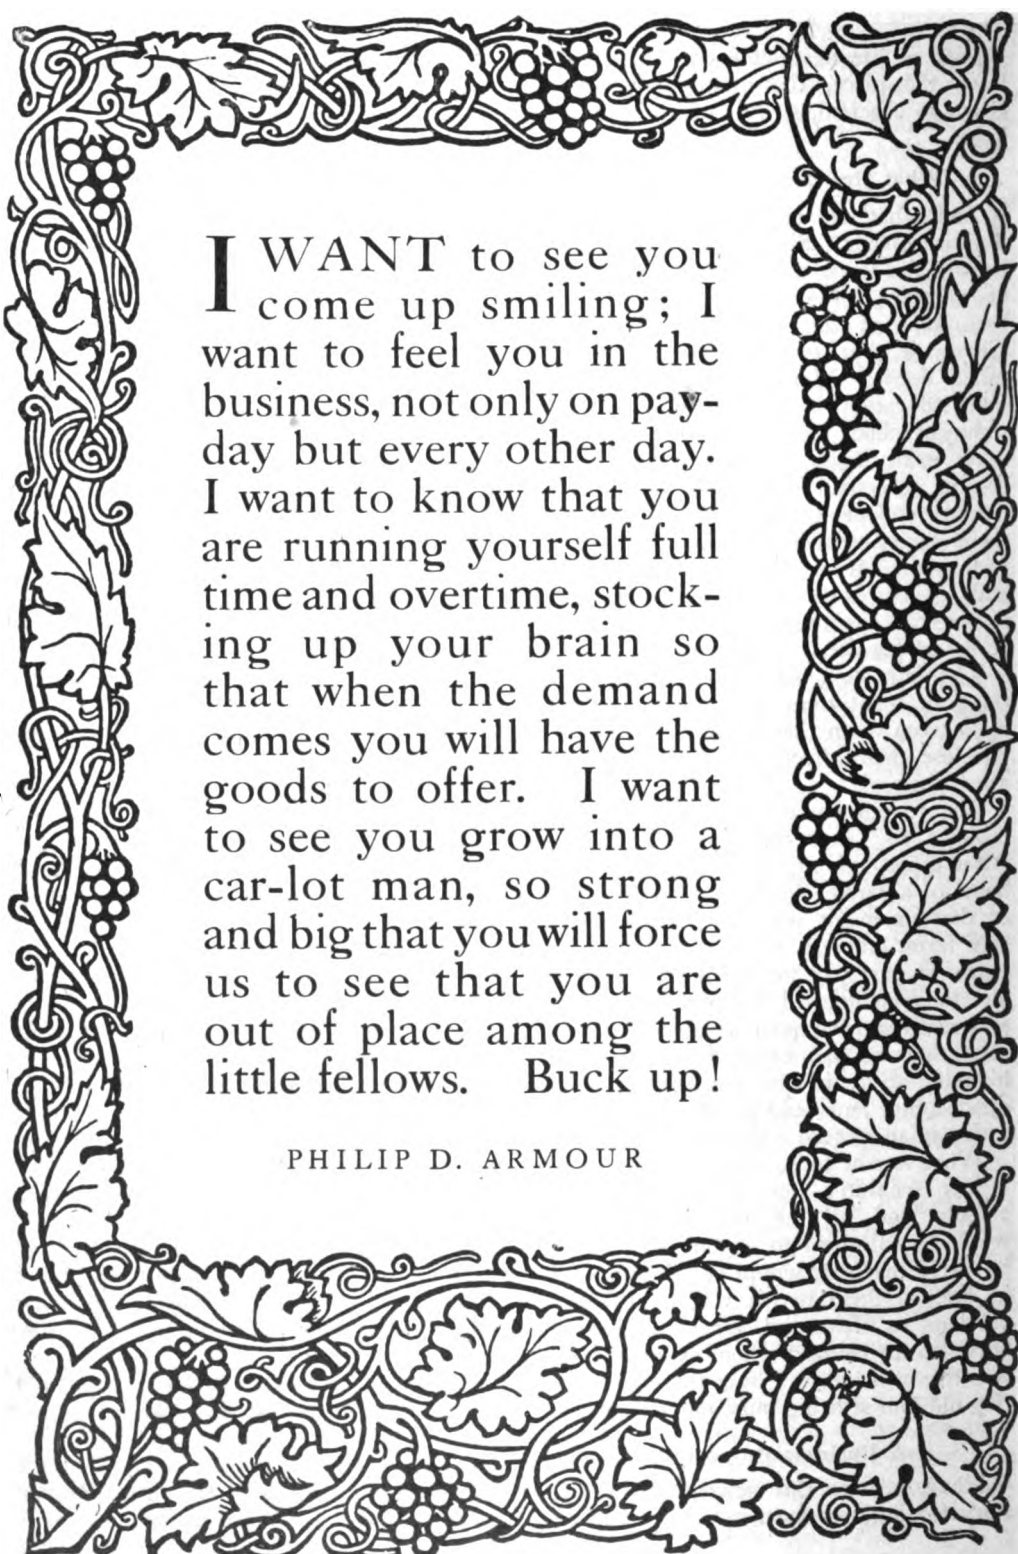

I go even further. I believe that when Glenwood boys and other boys similarly trained, become fathers, they will care for their own sons and daughters, giving them good homes, training them scientifically, with the aid of expert teachers. Then, when these schools have multiplied and done their work, they will no longer be needed, because there will be no dependent boys.

Yes, I know that seems like an angel's dream. But the more I study poverty and what grows out of it, the more I think that it is a preventable disease of the race.

The best place to criticise is before a full length mirror.—F. L. Oilar.

"The best way to train a child in the way he should go is to skirmish along in front of him."—Mark Twain.

I WANT to see you come up smiling; I want to feel you in the business, not only on payday but every other day.
I want to know that you are running yourself full time and overtime, stocking up your brain so that when the demand comes you will have the goods to offer. I want to see you grow into a car-lot man, so strong and big that you will force us to see that you are out of place among the little fellows. Buck up!

PHILIP D. ARMOUR

Jenkin Lloyd-Jones and the "Lengthened Shadow" of Him : by Thomas Dreier

From "The Caxton"

IT IS only for fear of erring on the side of conservatism that I hesitate to call him the Edward Everett Hale of Chicago. One can scarcely confine this man and his work to Chicago alone.

Yet it is in Chicago that he has concentrated his forces and it is there that he has built a Social Center that stands as a monument to True Neighborliness.

His name is Jenkin Lloyd-Jones. His age is—what difference does it make? His creed and his faith cannot be condensed into a paragraph, but he will not object if we say that the world is his country, all men are his brothers, and to do practical good in the world is his religion.

Away back in 1880 Jenkin Lloyd-Jones went to Chicago and hung out a shingle, just as a young lawyer or doctor would do. He announced that his business was to help men and women get more real enjoyment and more true happiness out of life on this earth.

He did not announce that to spend time in talking about hell and heaven after this life was a waste, because he was too busy attending to the little matter of fitting folks to do good here.

He believed then, just as he believes now, that the best preparation for doing better work is by the doing of good work, and he has a sort of an idea that those who arrive at the stage where they do better work will keep right on until they reach the stage where they will do the best work.

The Day of Small Things

I say he hung out his shingle. Business was slow. About eight persons came to his first meeting—the majority out of curiosity.

It is said that Heinz got his idea of Fifty Seven Varieties by counting the different kinds of true religions advocated by atmosphere agitators on Boston Common.

In Chicago there are almost as many kinds of philosophies. So when this man, Jones, hung out his shingle only eight persons were interested enough to investigate.

And about three of these came back again bringing others with them. Upon this slender and almost heartbreaking foundation Jenkin Lloyd-Jones began his work.

Today his great homelike office is found in a $200,000 structure at the corner of Oakwood Boulevard and Langley Avenue.

Five years ago in a little town in the North Country, I heard Mr. Jones give his fine lecture, "The Three Reverences." That was my first introduction to him and to his work. After that I followed his movements by reading his sane little weekly, "Unity," and ended it all by making a little vagabond visit to his home and loafing with him in his study.

My good pard, Sir Arthur, one of God's true noblemen, was with me. And Art has learned in all his wanderings over the world to judge men. He has studied them in their pews in church, in their offices, homes and places of pleasure, and he knows what it means to dodge the brick and stone hurled by a mad Australian mob.

When we went away he jerked his head in a nod toward the building and said, "In there we met a man."

"Who is My Neighbor?"

Jenkin Lloyd-Jones is a man. He is doing a man's work in a man's way. He started with no capital except that of a trained mind in a strong body. With his mind he manufactured ideas. His ideas concerned themselves with the betterment of other people. He did not care for himself. But he demonstrated that he that loseth his life shall find it. He expressed himself in doing things for others and others, in self-defense, began doing things for him.

But he refused to accept anything for himself, insisting all the time that those who desired to do things for him could best serve him by helping him do things for his neighbors. And to Jones everything is a neighbor.

As he looks back he sees himself presiding at that first meeting in Vincennes

Hall on November 4th, 1882. Before him was a handful of people. Truly this was a small beginning.

But even then Jones realized that the acorn is never large. Four years later he had his first church at the southeast corner of Oakwood Boulevard and Langley Avenue.

But with this modest home he was not satisfied. His dreams were big. He wished for a center that would prove itself a real educational home that would make for greater neighborliness. His dream materialized in Abraham Lincoln Centre in 1905. This six-story building represents an investment of over $200,000, all of which has been paid.

Mr. Jones calls it a spiritual powerhouse from which radiate many human helps: physical, intellectual, artistic, social, ethical and religious.

Here is a home that is never closed. Its doors swing wide to welcome all kinds of humanity. No one is excluded because of one's race, religion, politics or previous condition of servitude.

Roman Catholics, Baptists, Unitarians, Jews, Congregationalists, Free Thinkers, Atheists, Presbyterians—these and others here mingle as neighbors. Children from the avenue hold the hands of the children from the slums.

The desire is to make of Abraham Lincoln Centre a great Melting Pot where these foreigners and those who are separated by divergent religious beliefs will become True Americans who will preach and practice the one true religion—the Religion of Service.

Teaching Through Self-Expression

Here the girls are taught domestic science and the boys manual training. Both learn how to be useful. The girls not only learn that cleanliness is godliness, but also how to keep themselves clean personally and how to make their homes more homelike.

The boys have heaps of fun making things for their rooms, or perhaps work out some improvement that will save their mothers many steps and much labor in her kitchen. The little tots are placed in charge of a trained kindergartener and learn, as Froebel would have them learn, how to express themselves and develop themselves by playing.

Down in the basement are the amusement rooms. During the winter evenings these are crowded with the waifs of the streets—Italians and Jews, Roumanians and Poles, Irish and Germans, Norwegians and Swedes—all learning to play together as they will later have to work together—and all learning to become Americans.

"I gave birth to an idea a little while ago," said Mr. Jones, his eyes twinkling, "and the child has grown up and has gone to work. He is already self-supporting.

"The idea was this: Public libraries are for the use of the people. Unless the people use them they are of no use. Of course the city cannot afford to build big libraries in every section of the city, but there is no reason why the libraries should not establish branches in good social homes.

"That is what I thought. So I proposed to the library folks that they use Abraham Lincoln Centre as a branch library. They accepted. I tell you it is fine to see the people coming after books and using them. When people won't go after education it is our work to carry education to them."

On the main floor, therefore, is found the library, Unity editorial rooms, Mr. Jones' office, reception hall, Lincoln Centre Shop and the offices of the business management.

The second and third floors are given over to the Auditorium, gallery, organ room, picture room, where always hangs one loan picture of high merit; the rest room for women, Sunday school secretary's desk and the directors' room.

On the fourth floor is Emerson Hall, with a seating capacity of two hundred and fifty, and an adjoining special room of equal size; the Browning room, partly furnished; the Civics room, fully furnished; the middle room, unnamed and unfurnished but often used, with the necessary accompaniments of kitchen and toilet and cloak rooms for men and women.

The fifth floor is given over to the workers in the building for living apartments. The sixth floor contains the fine gymnasium, fully equipped; the domestic science, sewing and kindergarten rooms. The half story above a portion of the sixth floor contains the home of the engineer, janitor and elevator men. The whole building is thus kept alive from one end of the day to the other.

Giving Himself

Of course it is impossible for me to tell all about this great institution. No man can.

Even Mr. Jones himself, whose dream it represents in material form, cannot tell all. It has grown so great that no single person can keep track of the details. Yet so solidly has it been built, and so business-like has been its management, that on the face of its founder you will find no lines chiseled by worry.

He will never see his sixtieth birthday again, but to look into those keen, twinkling eyes, to watch that snappy, alert, vigorous action, to hear that powerful voice that seems to fairly spring out, one would never suspect him of having passed the forty mark.

He has preserved his health because he knows that no man with a weak body can accomplish great results. He has always kept busy, he has made his movements count for something, he has concentrated upon the doing well of the task in hand, realizing that the best way to provide for a better future is to produce a good present.

He knows that if the present is handled wisely the foundation for the future will be strong enough to support any structure that may be reared upon it.

Although this man has spent his whole life in America, he has in him all the religious fire of the people of Wales. Yet this native fire and intensity has been tempered by the training of an American.

He has burning in him the flame of liberty. In his love for freedom he is another Robert Ingersoll, a Tom Paine. He is a student of sociology and ethics rather than of dogma and tenet.

And that is why he is called "an uncomfortable preacher." He is continually showing the need for doing things right here on this earth. He shows the wrongs that have been inflicted upon the House of Want by the House of Have, and insists that the House of Have right that wrong, not alone by giving money but by giving men and women of keen minds and warm hearts who will help those who are ignorant to stumble a little farther into the light.

It is easy to give money. But to give one's self! Ah, that is something that calls for true generosity.

Making Himself Unnecessary

You ask me what bond of union those sign who become members of this church where this uncomfortable preacher sends out his messages of inspiration, of cheer, of helpfulness? It is a bond that all of us can sign.

"We join ourselves together," it runs, "in the interest of morality and religion, as interpreted by the growing thought and purest lives of humanity, hoping thereby to bear one another's burdens and promote truth, righteousness and love in the world."

Truly that is a glorious bond with which to be bound. It is the philosophy of the Golden Rule—a rule that the wise men of the ages have not been able to improve with an amendment. It is a bond which cements men and women together for improving themselves by actually doing practical work for the benefit of their fellows.

The day is past when one could win a reputation for holiness by going off into the fastnesses of the mountains and mortifying the flesh.

The true holy man of today is the man who renders the greatest service to the greatest number. The world is crying out for men and women who do things better—men like Jones and women like Maude Ballington Booth, Jane Addams and Kate Barnard.

Jenkin Lloyd-Jones is no ascetic. He is a manly man, warm hearted, generous, with a sense of humor highly developed, eyes that see and appreciate the best in men and things, a hearty laugh that is contagious—he is a radiating center of cheerfulness, inspiration, commonsense and efficiency—being the epitome of Abraham Lincoln Centre, which Emerson would call his lengthened shadow.

This man has a constructive imagination. He sees things in his mind long before there is a possibility of materializing the dream. He is an executive who knows how to throw responsibility upon others. He doesn't bother himself with detail, leaving that to others who cannot do the big work.

Today Lincoln Centre is so organized that Mr. Jones might leave it and it would still move forward.

The true teacher trains the pupil to do without her. Jones is a true teacher. He has built for the future. He wants to live for generations in the work he has initiated. He has tried to make himself unnecessary—the goal of every true organizer. He desired to construct a machine that would perform its duties without the supervision of the inventor. He has succeeded.

The Real Social Center

The greatest social center is not a structure made of steel and stone, but is the truly efficient man and the truly efficient woman. Abraham Lincoln Centre is a great institution.

But if Jenkin Lloyd-Jones had not been a great social center himself, with the power to attract to him other social centers, the great building on Oakwood Boulevard would never have been erected. Into that building has been put something more than money. In it has been invested the lives of Mr. Jones and those who have helped him. Alone he could have accomplished little. With his friends he has accomplished much.

He has demonstrated what one young man with an Idea backed by brains, earnestness and enthusiasm can do by persevering. What he has done others who will pay the price can do also.

Opportunities exist only for those who create them or who have prepared themselves to grasp them. Mr. Jones has combined creation with preparation and has achieved greatly.

I am not sure that Mr. Jones wrote this, but it is a prayer that expresses much of the philosophy of the man. It is a prayer in the repeating of which we can all unite. It makes for greater kindliness and more brotherhood and more love expressed in doing things now. Let this be read aloud:

Give us grace and strength to persevere. Give us courage and gaiety and the quiet mind. Spare us to our friends and soften us to our enemies. Bless us, if it may be, in all our innocent endeavors. If it may not, give us strength to encounter that which is to come, that we may be brave in peril, constant in tribulation, temperate in wrath and in all the changes of fortune, and down to the gates of death, loyal and loving to one another."

The Crime and the Punishment

By GLENWOOD S. BUCK

YES, I know—I'm buckling to it mighty hard now, but wait, my boy—just you wait until I have corralled the shekels. Then I'll show 'em all how to enjoy themselves. When I'm fifty I'm going to quit, vamoose, get out absolutely, shake the dust from my feet, wash the dirt from my hands, face the world with a clean and smiling countenance and go in for the things I'm missing now. Just watch me."

I've watched. His half-century run was finished with a spurt long ago and he is still buckling to it harder than ever. But instead of hurrying around after wealth, he is now worrying around after health—and he does the one quite as strenuously as he did the other.

Prison bars are not stronger than habit.

The most cruel and diabolical prisons are those we build for ourselves. That the bars are made of gold does not make prison life any more enjoyable.

Perhaps it is an unconscious recognition of this fact that gives us leniency for our criminal rich. A life sentence to a self-made jail, with Habit as the jailer, is punishment enough for almost any crime.

Some Errors in Judgment that Lead to Commercial Failure : by One Who Knows

The following lively and cheerful account of financial shipwreck was written by a young man still in the twenties. It tells of a gallant fight for life in the shallow, rock-gashed waters of Lack-of-Capital. It is valuable in charting some of the hidden reefs of the commercial seas. There is inspiration, too, in the vein of optimism that runs through the story of ruin, and in the hope, faith, and courage with which the writer faces the future. It is also another example of the working out of the unchanging law of compensation.—Editor's Note.

SEVEN years ago, my cousin, who had been employed in that line for ten years, started in the commission business on borrowed capital of four hundred dollars. He took in a partner with equal capital.

After a year of slow business, during which a good slice of the original capital was wiped out, my cousin's partner became dissatisfied and wished to pull out.

With high hopes of the future, I left my position in an entirely different line, joined my cousin, and between us we borrowed enough to buy out the partner, paying him his original investment.

This was our first great mistake, as there was practically nothing left in the business with which to pay the retiring partner, and he had gone in as an equal partner assuming half of the risk.

We were very young and optimistic then.

Some Early Mistakes

We showed the same lack of judgment when a short time later, we were doing more business than we could swing, and as we had no good collateral we borrowed $900 at a rate of interest that I would be ashamed to tell to my best friend for fear of losing his respect. This interest we are still paying.

This put a millstone about our necks which we have not been able to throw off. It has done its part toward pulling us down.

After two years of see-sawing between profits and losses, we went into a joint account deal with a large concern that agreed to furnish us with capital and goods to do a large jobbing business.

The first year we made $5,000 between us.

Then the big fellows took a notion that they would like to swallow us up. We were not sufficiently masticated up to that time, so we refused to go down. We have since been thoroughly Fletcherized.

Instead, we again borrowed money, $5,000, to buy them off. This would have sent us promptly to the bug house if there had been a couple of bug doctors there to examine our heads.

Our business had enlarged so that we were doing between two and three hundred thousand dollars worth of business a year on a capital of a little over $5,000, all borrowed money, on which we were paying interest.

Another mistake we were making all this time was in trying to do our bookkeeping with one young girl and ourselves. Though we worked from half past four, and sometimes as early as two or three o'clock in the morning, till seven or eight at night at some seasons, our books were always a month or two behind. In fact we took a trial balance only about once a year and that one was mostly guess work at that.

A Disastrous Deal in Apples

Well, we worked along hit and miss, paying all our bills (our credit was good or we would not have lasted so long), and doing what seemed to be good business until the fall of 1907, which ushered in the panic, and for us the beginning of the end.

You know what a rush and bustle there was in business during the three or four months immediately preceding the crash.

Everything was rosy.

The railroads were hauling more stuff than they had ever hauled.

Everybody was doing more business than ever before, and making good profit.

Every business man's paper was as good as cash.

The temptation to speculate was strong. Money was easy to get, goods were apparently scarce (especially in our line) and there seemed to be a certain profit on everything that could be brought into market.

We were handling apples in car lots, making a dollar a barrel. Instead of looking for buyers we were besieged with people every day who fairly begged us to take their money.

I don't know how it was in other lines, but in ours at least there did not seem to be a possibility of loss.

Every apple man in the country began scrambling for apples for storage. Of course we had to join the procession.

We might even then have shown a grain of common sense and have done our own buying, confining ourselves to a limited amount. But we were inoculated with the "big deal" bug, and made arrangements with one of the largest produce men in that part of the state to buy on joint account. We supposed that being an old dealer, he would have more judgment than ourselves. We have since found out that almost everyone has good judgment when his bank won't let him have anything to test his judgment with, but when money is easy to get, judgment is usually spelled about the same as is caution. And there was very little caution in business circles, until the banks forced people to wake up and rub their eyes.

When we brushed the cob-webs from in front of our peepers, we found that we had on hand in barns, cellars and rolling, upwards of four thousand barrels and forty-five hundred bushels of apples. A few days before we had buyers and buyers clamoring for them. When the apples began to arrive they had to be put in storage, as the prospective buyers had troubles of their own.

As you are no doubt aware, the people were lucky if they had a job that would pay them enough money to buy round steak or a piece of the neck, and thought they could get along very well for one winter at least without eating apples to improve their appetite and digestion.

The garbage wagons were very busy that winter hauling apples from the storage houses, ours among the rest.

The peddlers were also very busy buying apples for fifty cents a barrel that the optimistic apple man had begged the privilege of buying a few months before at prices ranging from $2.50 to $3.50 on the tree.

The peddler trade did not slight us. We got our share. In fact, we got to like the peddlers so well that winter that my hand goes to my hat instinctively every time one passes me on the street.

The high class grocery trade, however, to whom in previous winters, price was no object, seemed suddenly to develop a strong dislike for the sight of an apple barrel or an apple salesman.

A Benefactor to the Rescue

To shorten up the post mortem a little, the end of that winter found us with our regular trade all shot to pieces, and a debt of upwards of $10,000 hanging over our heads.

The old saying, "Hope springs eternal in the human breast" held good in our case. Instead of doing the sensible thing at that time and making an assignment, we would not give up the ship but held on.

We got hold of a man who was selling a line of goods in our territory and secured the agency for it and also a loan of $5,000.00. This, as you will see, was practically robbing Peter to pay Paul. But we thought we could do enough business to get our old debts gradually cleaned up and pay new debts out of new profits.

Strange to say we continued fooling ourselves and fooling our creditors until last January, when the show down came.

We had paid about $10,000 on old debts during the year, but profits did not come fast enough to take care of new obligations. The panic had taught everybody a certain amount of caution, so when our collections came in rather slower than usual during the holiday week, we had a couple of checks come back that we could not make good.

Well, we saw that we had made the last fight and would have to accept the inevitable, either turn over our business to our heaviest creditor if he would take it or go into the bankruptcy court and let the lawyers eat up what little there was left.

We did what we thought would be fair and just for everybody concerned. We appointed a trustee outside of the court to take charge of our affairs in favor of all our creditors. We also notified our heaviest creditor, to whom we owed about three times the amount we owed to all our other creditors put together.

Our heaviest creditor stood our friend and offered our other creditors forty cents on the dollar, which was about twice as much as the business was worth unless he was counting on the future. This liberal offer coming from a man to whom we apparently owed so much, surprised our other creditors. One or two of them who had interviewed a lawyer, not knowing the kind of man who was making the offer, threatened to throw us into bankruptcy and get rid of the trustee whom we had appointed. They thought they were dealing with the kind of man who would not offer forty cents unless a thing was worth eighty cents.

They figured wrong. The man they had to deal with was on the square and could not be bluffed.

A meeting was held between ourselves, our benefactor, and the lawyer who led the opposition. If you have ever seen character sticking out all over a man you would have seen it that day, when our friend stood up and coolly told the lawyer for the opposition that he had spiked his guns and had just settled with three of the largest of his (the lawyer's) clients.

I made up my mind right there that I would rather work for that man than any man I knew. And right there I became resigned to the fact that the firm name which I had given some of the best years of my life to establish and which we had hoped to make a power in business circles would drop out of existence and we would be considerably worse off than when we started seven years ago.

Some Compensation

I say worse off, but I don't know whether I am right or not. The situation as it stands is this: The business has gone on. True it is under another name but just the same it is the same old business and we are doing business with the same old people. My cousin and myself have full charge of the buying and selling end of the business although the financial end has been taken out of our hands—for which we are thankful.

Our creditors have been settled with on a basis of forty cents on the dollar and although we do not feel that this clears us of the remaining sixty per cent, we will have plenty of time to make it good. As it is only about $3,000 we are not worrying. This left the bulk of our debt with the president of the present firm, about $10,000. He has given us a chance to make the business pay back our debt. Have you ever seen a better application of the golden rule?

We are both working on salaries barely large enough for our living expenses. Although we could get more money elsewhere, we both preferred to stick to the ship and make good. And make good we will.

With the capital we have at our disposal and the experiences that caused our failure staring us in the face, I think we are even better off than we were seven years ago, although we have seven years less time in which to accomplish what we all start out to be—successful in every sense of the word.

We are still young, and I believe before another seven years rolls by we shall have a different story to tell.

I get my little pay envelope every Saturday now just like the rest of the boys. And I'll tell you what, after all, it seems good to think that while it is pretty small, just the same I have earned it and it belongs to me.

Many and many a time I have left this same office after paying off the help, and not had a nickel of spot cash in my pocket although my credit was good anywhere.

Now my credit is not so good, and I am taking mighty good care that I have the money to pay for a thing before I buy it, if it is only a yeast cake.

I am beginning to think that, for everything we miss in this life, we get something in return.

"The habit of expression reacts on the man who speaks. The habit of exaggeration in speech distorts the observation and makes the conscience itself unreliable."—Edward Everett Hale.

A Lesson in Teamwork from the Football Days of "Dink" Stover : by Clyde Gibson

STOVER,' said the dreadful voice, loud enough so that every one could hear, 'you seem to have an idea that football is run like a slaughter-house. The quicker you get that out of your head the better. Now do you know why I fired you? Do you?'

"'For slugging,' said Dink faintly.

"'Not at all. I fired you because you lost your head; because you forgot you were playing football.

"'If you're only going into this to work off your private grudges, then I don't want you around. I'll fire you off and keep you off.

"'You're here to play football, to think of eleven men, not one. You're to use your brains, not your fists. Why, the first game you play in some one will tease you into slugging him and the umpire will fire you. Then where'll the team be? There are eleven men in this game on your side and eleven on the other. No matter what happens don't lose your temper, don't be so stupid, so brainless—do you hear?'

"'Yes, sir,' said Dink, who had retired under his blanket until only the tip of the nose showed and the terror-stricken eyes.

"'And don't forget this. You don't count. It isn't the slightest interest to the team whether some one whales you or mauls you. It isn't the slightest interest to you, either. Mind that!

"'Nothing on earth is going to get your mind off following the ball, sizing up the play, working out the weak points—nothing. Brains, brains, brains, Stover!

"'You told me you came out here because we needed some one to be banged around—and I took you on your word, didn't I? Now, if you're going out there as an egotistical, puffed-up, conceited individual who's thinking only of his own skin, who isn't willing to sacrifice his own little, measly feelings for the sake of the school, who won't fight for the team, but himself—'

"'I say, Cap, that's enough,' said Dink with difficulty; and immediately retired so deep that only the mute, pleading eyes could be discerned."

This is the way Cockrell, captain of the Lawrenceville eleven talks to Stover in the story, "The Varmint," by Owen Johnson, published recently in the Saturday Evening Post.

How Do You Play Your Games?

'Take it home to yourself, gentle reader—or don't you feel gentle after taking a hot shot like that?

How do you play?

In your family, does everything have to revolve around you, no matter what are the interests of the family?

How is it in your business?

How do you play the game as a citizen? As a member of the great human family?

Do you imagine that you can make grandstand plays, carry grudges, trip up your team mates for your own benefit, shirk your part in advancing the ball of progress, and still be a success?

If you do, you'll get fired off the team by the Captain, and you'll have to stay off. It is one of the rules of every game that those who don't play it right soon can't play it at all.

Now here is some more practical wisdom from Garry Cockrell. It fits the game of business, the game of life—or any other game—like a glove:

"And now one thing more. There's all sorts of ways you can play the game. You can charge in like a bull and kill yourself off in ten minutes, but that won't do. You can go in and make grandstand plays and get carried off the field, but that won't do. My boy, you've got to last out the game!"

"I see, sir."

"Remember there's a bigger thing than yourself you're fighting for, Stover—it's the school, the old school. Now, when you're on the side-lines don't lose any time; watch your men, find out their tricks, see if they look up or change their footing when they start for an end run. Everything is going to count. Now, come on."

Why the Team Loses

But, in spite of it all, the team played like a round-up from the grammar schools. Here is the way one of the students on the side-lines sized it up:

"Trouble with us is," said the voice of Fatty Harris, at his elbow, "our team's never gotten together. The fellows would rather slug each other than the enemy."

"Gee, that fellow at tackle is a monster," said Dink, picking out McCarty's opponent.

"Look at Turkey Reiter and the Waladoo Bird," continued Fatty Harris. "Bad blood! And there's Tough McCarty and King Lentz. We're not together, I tell you! We're hanging apart!"

Take the lesson home.

The editor won't give me this space just to tell football stories.

You, yourself, don't buy this magazine to read what is merely interesting.

But if every business institution and business man, every salesman and every other employe that reads this were to get the spirit needed in that football team, balance sheets and bank accounts would look twice as big at the end of the year.

If every citizen got the spirit, political, industrial and social problems would dissolve in its warm glow like snowflakes in a bonfire.

There is something for you, too, in the stinging words of Captain Cockrell to his men, between the halves. Just listen to it sizzle:

It was a hangdog crowd that gathered there, quailing under the scornful lashing of Garry Cockrell. He spared no one, he omitted no names. Dink, listening, lowered his eyes, ashamed to look upon the face of the team. One or two cried out:

"Oh, I say, Garry!"

"That's too much!"

"Too much, too much, is it?" cried their captain, walking up and down, striking the flat of his hand with the clenched fist. "By heavens, it's nothing to what they're saying of us out there! They're ashamed of us, one and all! Listen to the cheering if you don't believe it! They'll cheer a losing team, a team that is being driven back foot by foot. There's something glorious in that, but a team that stands up to be pushed over, a team that lies down and quits, a team that hasn't one bit of red fighting blood in it, they won't cheer; they're ashamed of you!"

"Now, I'll tell you what's going to happen to you. You're going to be run down the field for just about four touchdowns. Here's Lentz being tossed around by a fellow that weighs forty pounds less. Why, he's the joke of the game. McCarty hasn't stopped a play, not one! Waladoo's so easy that they rest up, walking through him.

"But that's not the worst, you're playing wide apart as though there wasn't a man within ten miles of you; not one of you is helping out the other. The only time you've taken the ball from them is when a little shaver comes in and uses his head.

"Now, you're not going to win this game, but by the Almighty you're going out there and going to hold that Andover team. You've got the wind against you; you've got everything against you; you've got to fight on your own goal line, not once, but twenty times. But you've got to hold 'em; you're going to make good; you're going to wipe out that disgraceful, cowardly first half! You're going out there to stand those fellows off! You're going to make the school cheer for you again as though they believed in you, as though they were proud of you! You're going to do a bigger thing than beat a weaker team! You're going to fight off defeat and show that, if you can't win, you can't be beaten!"

The Team Gets Together

Well, after that, would you grit your teeth and do a little red-hot fighting? Not if you were still nursing a private grudge against the fellow playing shoulder to shoulder to you. Before you could really do anything effective, you would have to let the fire of zeal for the common good burn the last nasty bit of resentment out of your heart. That was what happened to that team under the inspiration of "Dink" Stover's playing. He had been a substitute and had only come in during the last few minutes of the first half.

Get this description, by Johnson, of the last few minutes of play, Stover playing side by side with his ancient enemy, Tough McCarty:

Cockrell was pleading with them. Little Charlie DeSoto was running along the line, slapping their backs, calling frantically on them to throw the blue back.

And gradually the line did stiffen, slowly but perceptibly the advance was cut down. Enmities were forgotten with the shadow of the goalposts looming at their backs. Waladoo and Turkey Reiter were fighting side by side, calling to each other. Tough McCarty was hauling Stover out of desperate scrimmages, patting him on the back and calling him "good old Dink." The fighting blood that Garry Cockrell had called upon was at last there—the line had closed and fought together.

* * *

No longer scattered, but a unit, all differences forgot, fighting for the same idea, the team rose up and crashed through the Andover line, every man in the play, ten—fifteen yards ahead.

"Again!" came the strident cry.

Without a pause the line sprang into place, formed and swept forward. It was a privilege to be in such a game, to feel the common frenzy, the awakened glance of battle that showed down the line. Dink, side by side with Tough

McCarty, thrilled with the same thrill, plunging ahead with the same motion, fighting the same fight; no longer alone and desperate, but nerved with the consciousness of a partner whose game-ness matched his own.

• • •

Stover played on in a daze, remembering nothing of the confused shock of bodies that had gone before, wondering how much longer he could hold out—to last out the game as the captain had told him. He was groggy, from time to time he felt the sponge's cold touch on his face or heard the voice of Tough McCarty in his ear.

"Good old Dink, die game!"

How he loved McCarty fighting there by his side, whispering to him!

• • •

He was in every play it seemed to him, wondering why Andover was always keeping the ball, always coming at his end. Suddenly he had a shock. Over his shoulder were the goalposts, the line he stood on was his own goal line.

He gave a hoarse cry and went forward like a madman, parting the interference. Some one else was through; Tough was through; the whole line was through flinging back the runner. He went down clinging to Goodhue, buried under a mass of his own tacklers. Then, through the frenzy, he heard the shrill call of time.

He struggled to his feet. The ball lay scarcely four yards away from the glorious goalposts. Then, before the school could sweep them up, panting, exhausted, they gathered in a circle with incredulous, delirious faces, and leaning heavily, wearily on one another gave the cheer for Andover. And the touch of Stover's arm on McCarty's shoulder was like an embrace.

Do you knock? Do you kick? Is there anyone in your organization you "can't get along with?"

If so, your team is hanging apart—you can't win. You need a Garry Cockrell to talk to you like a Dutch uncle. You need a little "varmint" like "Dink" Stover to go in and show you how to play the game.

When, like "Dink" you can throw your arm over the shoulder of your bitterest enemy, "like an embrace," then you are beginning to know how to win—to win big.

Stover might possibly have found a way to do up his ancient foe, Tough McCarty. He might have "won" an advantage over him. But it would have been a mighty small victory compared to the one that glorified him when he loved even old "Tough," fighting there side by side with him in that heart-breaking but joyous finish.

Life is too short, and you are playing for too big a stake to waste any strength and time hating or fighting your team mates.

And we humans are all team mates.

Our interests are mutual.

Luck—the Imaginary Factor

By MILTON BEJACH

Assistant Advertising Manager, in The McCaskey Bulletin

I DON'T remember now who said it and said it this way, but he knew what he was talking about when he said: "There aint no such thing."

The unsuccessful man says the successful one has been "lucky." Not at all, he has been "plucky." It is only the difference of a letter, but that makes all the difference in the world.

Ruminate on this a moment: a man will say he is down on his luck and surely as the sun is coming up in the morning his luck will be down on him. So long as he is in that frame of mind he will not put through anything he strives to accomplish.

But some morning the birds will sing, the sun will shine brightly, Nature will welcome the man who is "down on his luck," and he will pick up in spirits. His mood will take on the complexion of the day. That's the day he will do things, if ever.

"But," some of you will say, "the sun doesn't shine every day in my territory. What'll I do in the winter time?"

That's the point: store up enough sunshine in your heart to carry you over the dark days. Fill your lungs with good air, your eyes with sunshine and your head with optimistic thoughts; you'll never be "down on your luck" long.

And make it a point to give out a little of the milk of human kindness that will be generated by the sunshine within you.

Extracts from the Actual Correspondence between the Sales Manager of the Geo. F. Eberhard Company, San Francisco, and a Live Organization of Business Builders

Stick—Momentum

*Being Part of a General Letter to
to the Sales Force*

THERE is a whole series of talks suggested by these two words. They can be viewed in many ways and the thoughts which suggest themselves to the writer's mind are legion.

One of the troubles—the cause of slow progress—lots of worry—the destroyer of peace of mind—is the inability of the majority to stick—to pull steadily and finish the work at hand.

This one phase even manifests itself when some great firm devises a plan and then, after arranging the details and outlining the policy, changes the details every little while in an apparent desire to hurry results. It is the watch-it-grow, impatient attitude.

To stick calls for balance—for patience—for confidence in your own decisions. To accomplish anything, even small works, you must create momentum—accumulate force.

In other words, after a plan is laid out or a policy adopted, or after you set out to accomplish securing certain trade in given territory, you should stick to it until you finish. This will give you added momentum as you go from place to place or store to store, and you are bound to win.

Retain Your Self-Confidence

Another view of the idea. A salesman gets up, he bathes, shaves, dresses and then surveys himself carefully and is satisfied that he looks right before he goes to his breakfast. He feels he looks right for the morning at least but, can he stick?

Well, look around you. You will find one fellow fixing his tie every little while, another pulling down his coat and looking at his cuffs and running his hands over his hair. He loses the momentum that his feeling of confidence in his own ability to start right should give him as he goes from customer to customer.

Here is another. A salesman knows from experience that there is a potential business volume to a given number of customers. The salesman knows that he has made good paying trips through certain territory—he knows that business is there.

However, if a few customers go wrong or a visit turns out bad, see how it affects his view-point and the enthusiasm with which he approaches his further work.

If he slows up he loses momentum that he should have accumulated from his past effort—from his past knowledge. Instead of giving any evidence of his own accumulated experience, he loses patience, sees the worst side of it and may possibly "holler."

The whole idea, behind the above, is to remind you that all business institutions, including ours, are like a railroad train; its momentum is a sum total of the pull we give it in our work plus the accumulated force of the last year or mile, figuratively speaking, it has traveled.

If you stop—if you do not pull steadily—stick to the work every minute of the business hours, the business in your immediate vicinity will slow down and you lose the help of the accumulated momentum or force of past history, effort, experience and service.

It calls for great expenditure of power to speed a train after it slows down or stops.

The same applies to business effort.

This has been good mental exercise for me—I hope you profit also.

A Gleam from a Mountain-Top

Being a General Letter to the Sales Force

SATURDAY evening I sat at home again before my desk, where some of my most pleasant evenings are spent, studying and writing.

I write so many things that I never let anyone see and even though I send forth but little, it's real pleasure to conceive and write a mass of stuff, no matter how poorly it may impress me, for some day I shall be able to make it read right, I'm sure.

In the interval, it shows what I cannot do and forces me to see just how clear or hazy my thoughts are.

To make up this bulletin, as I had been in the mountains—re-creating, as it were—I decided to do something extra and drive home a new message more clearly—more pertinent to the day's work, than ever before.

Say! You should have seen the copy I turned out, pages and pages. But through it all ran the idea of growth, of building ourselves and the business, our health, our efficiency, our service; not new, but what we have talked of many times.

Finally I laughed, for, somehow, I felt stronger for the attempt and I decided to send this to say I am here at the office and absorbing the detail to see just how much better things have gone than I expected.

Getting the Right Perspective

Funny how, in spite of an honest, hard-working, sanely directed effort to realize our own value, we must feel somewhat like they say the Rooster does in Rostand's play, "The Chanticleer," that the sun would not or could not come up without his crowing each morning; that the world was made for chickens; men merely furnish the grain!

It's so easy to overwork our self-esteem, confusing it with our self-confidence. Then, we feel we may be doing too much, we are not appreciated. The results may not be there, but the work was done and no one else could have done or does it quite as well. We are sure we are right, just like the rooster.

I slept one night last week on the top of a mountain with a piece of canvas between me and the rocky ground—face towards the heavens; watched Halley's comet cross the sky, heard the coyotes yelp again, saw the hawk's nest above me shadowed in the pine, looked out on the great Immensity when it was dark but for the thousand stars, and beheld the sun as it rose.

When the sun's rays displayed every tree, rock, stream and meadow plainly in its riot of May color through the country below me, I realized that outside of our little organization's work I was small indeed!

Somehow, I feel more anxious today to work, to take up my studies, to help in the work of our organization. It's all of added interest for that night's uplift—the bigness of it all. Confidently added to that is the fact that everything moved smoothly here while I was away.

It makes me want to help, and to ask you to help me; and, say, when you pass a good, quiet resting place, make it on an occasional Saturday and Sunday as you go along this summer. See nature, get on a mountain and watch the sky. Do it in our way, live a bit sensibly and healthfully as you go.

Then make up with added zest in the day's work. It's well-placed advertising and sales, new customers, that make you contented when you do rest.

The day's work—that is our job right now.

Let's do it and see that no customer, prospect, item or detail is overlooked.

Do it now.

Don't stop the parade.

Do it right, and home will come the dollars to all of us.

What is the use of feeling out and tabulating the pulse of the people when every good red-blooded American, in office or out, has a pulse of his own which tells him how the rest of the people feel?—Theodore Roosevelt.

Of all the cankers of human happiness none corrodes with such a silent, yet so baneful an influence as indolence.—Thomas Jefferson.

The Kind of Education that the Next Generation Needs : by Franklin H. Collins

YOU HAVE often heard a father tell his son what he had to do when he was a boy or young man, but how often have you heard the paternal guardian tell his son what is expected of him when he gets to manhood?

Every patriotic citizen should realize that not only is it his duty as a father, but also as a patriot, to train his son along the highest ideals in life, that he may help share the burdens of the commercial, social and governmental world. He should be trained to be more in life than his father has been; he should be made a companion from childhood and taught early in the ways of the world.

In these strenuous days of competition, the man who is properly prepared is the man who wins.

If a boy grows up to manhood with no ideas of commercial activity and is thrown on the seething sea of business life, how long will he last? Such a boy has been brought up totally ignorant of everything except home and social duties, with possibly a higher education in arts and literature.

The strain of business activity is often too great for him and he can not stand against it.

On the other hand, a boy of the same class of parentage, who has been guided carefully in all lines, will come into the business world with a good preparation. He will have talked business with his parents; he may have worked in summer vacations to gain insights into the industry he expects to follow. This boy will be prepared, and know the life work he wishes to follow, and will not waste his first few years in business trying to get settled.

What is a Liberal Education

In this period of the world's history, it is time for action and not hesitation. It is the man who thinks quickly and acts first who comes out ahead.

The men of today should plan for the future. On whose shoulders will these giant industries and interests fall? Whosoever they be, they must be competent, or the long established organizations will be shattered. No business interests can be so established as to be secure from all danger and harm, if placed in the hands of incompetent management.

The captains of industry should begin to train their successors early, that they may be more than competent to handle the reins when called upon.

The world is continually advancing in ideas. Our great and glorious country is doing the same, probably faster than any other nation.

The young men of today must realize that their responsibilities of tomorrow are great and numerous and must prepare themselves accordingly.

The young man must not think that his education is complete after leaving college or the preparatory school; he must strive for a liberal education, which is never finished.

Sir Thomas Huxley says, in regard to a liberal education:

"That man I think, has had a liberal education who has been so trained in youth that his body is the ever ready servant of his will and does with ease and pleasure all the work that, as a mechanism, it is capable of; whose intellect is a clear, cold, logic engine with all of its parts of equal strength and in smooth working order, ready like a steam engine to be turned to any kind of work and spin the gossamer as well as forge the anchors of the mind; whose mind is stored with a knowledge of the great and fundamental truths of nature, and of the laws of her operation; full of life and fire, but whose passions are trained to come to heel by a vigorous will; the servant of a tender conscience who has learned to love all beauty, whether of nature or of art; to hate all vileness and to respect others as himself. Such, and no other, I consider, has had a liberal education, for he is, as completely as a man can be, in harmony with nature. He will make the best of her, and she of him. They will get on together rarely. She as his ever beneficent mother; he as her mouthpiece, her conscious self, her minister and interpreter."

If the young man is patriotic, he will start early to study this great nation; its resources, its natural conditions and its people. He will watch the progress of the nation and the actions of its governing body; he will mix early in political affairs and try to overcome any evils that may exist.

The Place of the College

Such is the young man who must constitute the next generation. He must be stronger than his father, because he will have harder duties to perform. Therefore, it is imperative that he be better trained. Don't let him dawdle away some of the best years of his life in college, when he should be working in your mills, learning the practical end of your businesses. If you think he needs a college education, let him have one or at least a sample of one.

Most young men of today think they should go to college and perhaps they should, but do not overdo it.

The college education depends upon the man himself, not the education.

For one who intends to follow a profession or an engineering vocation, probably such training is essential. As to the young man entering the commercial world, it depends upon the man. Some men need it to prepare themselves; some do not. The men who can succeed without it, have a handicap on time.

While we see our colleges and universities graduate some wonderful men, at the same time they turn out some miserable failures.

There is a feeling prevailing throughout the country against the higher education, claiming that it develops the "Rah Rah" spirit and fosters extravagance and idleness.

If the boy can stand the mental and physical strain of college life and education, it is well for him to have one or two years of it, but to spend four or five years "hanging around" college is an absolute waste of time and money. That is the reason the boy must be trained properly.

Contentment and Satisfaction

Have him put his nose down to the grindstone early. Play for better conditions and higher ideals.

Drill into the boy's mind the principles of honesty, justice and righteousness.

What pleases the old veteran of business more than to have a young man of sterling qualities come into his office and talk well and knowingly on any good business proposition? And, many young men such as these are in the business world today, fighting fairly for higher ideals and honors. It is to these men that the world looks to carry the big burdens of tomorrow. It behooves every older business man of today to teach and assist the younger generation, so that their latent qualities will be well developed.

The young man of today should be invested with an overdose of ambition to take care of the opportunities of tomorrow; he must not think that the words "satisfaction" and "contentment" are synonymous, because they are not. They have two entirely different meanings. To obtain the best meaning out of the words, he should adopt the motto, "Satisfied with nothing, but contented with everything." Following out these teachings would keep him always happy among his surroundings and circumstances, but ever forging ahead with an ambition that has no limit.

Thus we have the young man who is to make up the next generation. We must guard him and guide him well, for upon him our posterity depends.

Higher ideals, honesty of purpose, equal justice to all, living by the Golden Rule and square deal are the virtues that await the young men of today who will constitute the next generation.

Do you ask what was the great principle in the depth of Christ's character, that on which his wonderful sympathy was founded and which endeared him to his high office of universal Saviour? I answer, it was his conviction of the greatness of the human soul.—Channing.

Physically, mentally and often morally a good hobby is a business man's salvation. When his mind has been strenuously at work for many hours he has used up a large quantity of life force. If he then turns to his hobby for a change his brain experiences a relief and the jaded parts get rested.—The Master Printer.

THE SALES manager of a big western business institution started to earn his living not so many years ago by means of curious marks of which only stenographers know the secret. He started right down at the bottom and climbed up his post as private secretary to the president. He took all the detail work away from his employer at the start and eventually began doing some of the big things. He was courteous, careful, ambitious, honest and possessed initiative. When the president was not on hand and immediate action on affairs was required, this stenographer acted. One day, after the stenographer had made such a decision—a big one—the president came into the office and said:

The Shorthand Ladder

"Mr. Smith, you have not been connected with this institution for many years but you have climbed rather rapidly for a youngster from the bottom to a place where you had my entire confidence. You have been the most efficient secretary I have ever employed, but I must tell you that I am sorry that I must dispense with your services as secretary and have already chosen your successor who will enter upon his duties tomorrow morning."

"But, Mr. —," broke in Smith, pain, disappointment, chagrin showing on his face—

"You will please prepare the new man for his work this afternoon," went on the president, apparently not noticing the interruption, "do not come near the office again —(and here the president's eyes twinkled)—until next Monday, when you will become sales manager of this business of which I have the honor to be the head. How does that strike you?"

My good friend, Stewart Anderson, of Springfield, Massachusetts, has just written a simple little booklet in which he tells of seven young men who started with one insurance company as stenographers and eventually climbed to positions of greater reward and greater responsibility. He tells the story of these seven, without flourishes and without elaboration, just a simple statement of facts. But he succeeds in driving home the great value of a knowledge of stenography to young men who are ambitious to get close to the top.

The day this Anderson booklet dropped into my hand a young man called on me and in the course of our conversation he told me that he was studying to be a lawyer, but that before he thought of getting right down to the study of law itself he had mastered stenography.

"I did this so that I could work with the lawyers themselves. I made up my mind that as a simple law clerk I had but little chance to do anything but ordinary clerical work, but that as a stenographer I would be working right with the man in the office who was doing the big things. I argued that the better stenographer I became the better would my employers be. I mean by that that the biggest men require the biggest assistants, and I determined to be the best stenographer in my town so that I could work for the best lawyer.

"You see," he went on, "the stenographer always works with the brains of the concern—with the men who are doing things. Your bookkeeper or clerk has the little details to look after, but the stenographer not only has the details to attend to but also learns how the executive thinks and, by watching the results of his thinking, why he thinks that way. If the stenographer is wide awake and masters every subject he should master in order to hold the position he wants, he can get the position he wants. Getting in with the brains of the concern is the great thing."

Hugh Chalmers, who later became general manager at a salary of $72,000 a year, was a stenographer in a branch office of the National Cash Register Company.

To him stenography was not an end but the means to an end.

The young man or young woman who masters stenography and has no greater ambition and no greater desire will end as he or she starts. Some stenographers are as expert in shedding ideas that come their way as a duck's back is fit for shedding water.

Employers everywhere are crying out for expert stenographers. They are scarce. The trouble with most of them is they do not think. They have learned how to make their hen tracks and how to punish a machine, but they have never learned how to use constructively the great machinery lying idle in the factory of the mind.

Sloppy, slovenly work—idleness—lack of attention—forgetfulness—inability to initiate—all these come from wrong thinking. And wrong thinking is only the absence of right thinking.

For a stenographer to rise, the first requisite always is love for the work in hand and the second a desire to rise to something better. One may have a desire to rise and no love for the work in hand and never get a promotion. There are few employers who will promote to a higher position one who has proven a failure or an inefficient in a low one.

The third requisite is: The actual daily bettering of the work being done. I would cry out to all who would climb: "Better the work you are doing."

Develop more speed, greater accuracy, more neatness, better appearance, show a desire to help—always be on the lookout for chances to serve the man and institution for whom you are working.

Promotion cannot fail to come to the worker who increases in efficiency by bettering the work he is doing.

And in a big institution there are few who have greater opportunities for climbing than the stenographers.

A GOOD woman became angry at me the other day. It happened this way. She said, "Our minister, Mr. Blank, is such a holy man. His sermons are so good." All was lovely so far, because I agreed that Ministers and Merchants Mr. Blank's sermons were fine. Then I said, wearing my Brete Harte "Heathen Chinees" expression, "And aren't McCormick & Joyce such holy men. Their groceries are so good."

"But our minister feeds the souls of the sheep of his flock," said the good woman.

"That's fine," was the answer, "but the merchants, farmers, workers in all departments of the world are engaged in the equally important work of feeding bodies. A preacher would have a merry time preaching his fine sermons to disembodied spirits, but that is the kind of congregation he would have if folks didn't eat, clothe and protect themselves from the elements."

This talk was not sacrilegious. It was commonsense. The real minister is the man who does helpful things for his neighbors. It doesn't matter whether he is a digger in the ditch, a drain-man, banker, lawyer, merchant, miner, brakeman, clerk, telephone operator, stenographer or Pope of Rome, if he is engaged in serving his fellow men he is a holy man and his work is every bit as sacred as the finest sermons ever spoken.

We don't use enough of that uncommon article called commonsense. We go to a butcher-shop and buy meat and find ourselves cheated either in weight or quality. We buy clothes and secure neither fit nor wearability. We buy an automobile and it qualifies for the scrap heap before the season is over.

Do we continue to patronize the butcher, the clothier and automobile manufacturer who didn't minister to our wants in a quality way? We most certainly do not. We quit when we get stung. We quit when we are not served.

But do we use as much commonsense in dealing with churches? We do not. We listen to a sermon that is the most damnable drivel and rot and go away with our eyes turned heavenward, putting up a bluff of being satisfied. We have the biggest bunch of unscientific hot-air turned into our ears and we stand for it because we get it in our church and from our minister.

Now I am not saying that all ministers and priests preach sermons that are unscientific and filled with rot. But I have attended church often enough to know that too many ministers succeed only in showing a broad and most comprehensive ignorance of commonsense, not to mention those things which might be classified as uncommonsense.

We ought to be as eager for the best mental and spiritual food as we are for the best physical food. But it is a cinch that we will not get it so long as we are satisfied with spiritual teachings that are about as wholesome as an ancient sample of hen fruit that had been forsaken for months in a compost heap.

Too many ministers are nothing but spiritual valets. They lay out the spiritual shirts and socks approved by conventional society and are not expected to think except when they can do so with the mind of the mob. If one of them has the temerity to point out the incongruity of wearing a flaming red puff tie with our evening clothes, we kick him down stairs and think ourselves justified in our act by calling our insanity righteous indignation directed against a vile varlet who presumed to know more than the payer of the pew rent.

It strikes me that a minister should look upon himself as a manufacturer of his special kind of service and that he ought to be allowed to advertise his wares with as much freedom as others are granted who sell us breakfast foods and boxed biscuits. His business is just as dignified, just as valuable, just as necessary as the business of the merchant and manufacturer, and no more. He should look upon himself as a man doing a man's work in a man's way.

The sooner we get over the notion that some useful work is God's work and some is not, the better. All useful work is divine.

Our mental and spiritual eyes need a washing.

Truth is a cork; it is bound to come to the top.—Willis George Emerson.

ACCORDING to the evidence at hand, Mr. Judas was the gentleman who took part in a business transaction involving thirty pieces of silver, and who, after he had awakened to the fact that he hadn't obtained what he paid for, went out into a quiet spot and hanged himself.

Mr. Judas

It matters not to us whether Mr. Judas was after money or revenge, or whether there ever was such a man. The only point we care to make is that any man who will sell his self-respect and the respect of his associates for money is fitted to trot in the Judas class.

Judas got his name on the Unfair List by his somewhat saffron method of doing business.

Ananias also got what was coming to him because he was somewhat careless in his handling of the truth. His wife backed him up in his statement and she shared her husband's fate.

In our more modern times a man gets the notion into his head that he wants to flit about in a Packard. In order to get the Packard and the rest of the things that go with a Packard standard of living, he must have money. He must get gobs of it. If it can be gotten honestly, well and good. If, to get a barrel of it in a hurry, a few shady things must be done—well, Mr. Modern Judas sells his ideal, his self-respect, his common decency, the respect of white folks (who are in the know) and does things a la Morse.

Mr. Modern Judas gets his automobile and his cottage by the sea and has the pleasure of listening to his inner voice asking, "How did you get it?" Sometimes he gets caught and it is then that he realizes that it is wiser to travel toward Poverty than toward the Penitentiary.

The Judas of today annexes no more respect and confidence than the Judas who hanged himself with a halter in the long ago.

Sheldon is right when he says that success consists in having health, long life, money and honor. He knows that the man who does not do business in strict accord with the philosophy of the Square Deal is slated for Failure.

A man who knows tells me that money is worthless as a happiness producer when the public or the inner voice insists on asking, "How did you get it?" and the answer has to be made with eyes on the ground.

“What’s in a Name?”—Some People Who Could Answer : by Fred G. Kaessmann

BUSINESS men, pretty generally, accept as an axiom, that “Confidence is the basis of trade.” There, however, they stop. They do not let the thing sink in. They fail to grasp the full significance. Their knowledge, because not observant, because not given to reflection, savors of the superficial.

Thus, when some good publication says, “Confidence is the basis of trade,” they nod acquiescence—and then, in practice, they fall down miserably.

“Because We Know You”

However, in an eastern city, a young man can tell you that confidence is the basis of trade. He has had emphatic proof that the saying is not merely an axiom. He knows that it is more—that it is a fact. Also, it may be said, he now, perhaps for the first time, realizes fully the value of a good name.

This young man for years suffered from consumption. It cost him a small fortune to get well. Yet slowly but surely he paid every bill. To many he paid more than the bill—“for keeping you waiting.”

While recovering, this young man canvassed for a local history. Prominent citizens back of it—as usual.

The thing collapsed.

Young man dug down into his own pocket that none whom he induced to subscribe might lose a cent.

Then he undertook to build up a trade paper—with $1.79 in pocket as capital.

Just as the paper was beginning to pay, old trouble, consumption, came on again. Lost $2,500.

Paid off stockholders as fast as possible—plus ten per cent for interest—and “for the worry I caused you.” During all this time, worked mainly among people of German nationality or descent.

Now this young man represents a house selling a curative device. While a high-class device, the people must distinctly be shown before they will buy. Used to drugs, they—or it—the world—can see good in nothing but drugs. Therefore it must be shown.

To stimulate business, the young man advertised in the best daily, a paper reaching approximately 8,500 each issue. To supplement this, he advertised in the local German paper, a weekly of about 1,200 local circulation.

The daily, with just as good a clientele, of good standing, well edited, and clean, brought no business. The weekly, reaching just about one-fiftieth the number of persons weekly, brought splendid results. Advertisements, in each case, the same.

What marked the difference?

The German people knew the young man—the others did not. They bought because they had confidence in what he said, both in the printed announcements and his spoken word.

Many purchasers told him, “If any other person attempted to sell me this I should not buy it. I cannot comprehend its principle—but—I know you.”

The harvest was a long time coming—but it has come.

“What’s in a name?” asked the wise one. Somebody laughingly asks the same question. Then we laugh.

Yet the success of every man, of every institution depends upon its name. Some seem to “get by,” but in the long run they do not.

A good name means friends, and friends make or unmake a man or an institution. Incidentally, it may be said, they make or unmake any article of commerce.

If you should have any doubt about this, just consult page 420, April issue of System. There you will see, “There were five times as many votes cast through the influence of friends as from all the other mediums combined.”

The Value of Friends

A remarkable tribute to the value of friends, that, yet it is only an exemplification of the law. Once you have the people with you, your success is assured.

Have you any doubt about this? Listen to the young man of whom mention has already been made:

"Against the advice of my superiors, I put out every machine on the basis of 'No cure—no pay.'"

You retort, "Why, that's nothing new."

"No," says the young man, "it is not new, but I mean 'No cure—no pay,' live what I say, put myself out considerably to get results—and win friends thereby. So active in my behalf are the users of my device, that my list of prospects is always long—and excellent."

Great is the value of a good name.

In an eastern city you will find a barber with a fine name for skillful hair-cutting. Perhaps you think that that is nothing of which to brag. In that event, try your hand on your fourteen-year son—who has just stepped into long pants. Undoubtedly, you will find his remarks pertinent.

Well, this barber's business flourished—because of his hair-cutting ability. Soon, unless he changes his present policy of leaving the shop in charge of an assistant while he loiters along the main street, to the detriment of particular persons who would have himself do the work, and whose time is too valuable to wait, it will be the reverse. Even now the word is being passed along, "He's never there. You can never find him in his shop."

Business is falling off—and will fall off more.

"Such are friends," you cynically remark.

"Such are friends," replies the optimist. "While you deserve it, they say all they can for you. When you no longer deserve it they say it for the next best fellow—for the one who does."

Perfectly just and proper this is, too. Shows that civilization is advancing. Incidentally, it may be said that this shows clearly that it is not enough to get a good name—but that this good name must be maintained.

Some Who Paid High for the Answer

"What's in a name?"

Ask the saloonkeeper who tried to flim-flam his customers by substituting "schooners" made of much thicker glass.

It did not take these customers long to learn that while the new schooners were outwardly the same size the contents were materially less.

"What's in a name?"

Ask the milkman who has been fined for having milk below the standard.

"What's in a name?"

Ask the coffee distributor who advertised sixteen-ounce packages—but gave only fourteen.

Friends—of fair play—"hammered the life" out of him.

"What's in a name?"

Ask the labor agitator who, regardless of the wishes of either capital or labor, constantly agitates. Usually his story will be something like this:

"I had to move to ——. Couldn't get a job in — any more. Even those whose pay I tried to get raised were against me."

"What's in a name?"

Ask some manufacturer who has been convicted of violating some state or the national pure food and drug law, and whose conviction has been given wide publicity. The writer knows one whose business, following such a conviction, was given a severe jolt.

"What's in a name?"

Ask the advertiser who lied to the people. His business never got to the point of "diminishing returns." It never grew enough to suffer resistance of any kind.

"What's in a name?"

Ask the salesman of many promises—and little performance. Talk of Peary discovering the North Pole! Why, this salesman discovered it long ago.

"What's in a name?"

Ask the employer who "drives" his employees. Ask the man who sucks them dry of ideas and then turns them adrift—a fashionable habit of cotton and woolen mill executives in dealing with the force of designers. As for the designers, well, they will talk.

"What's in a name?"

Why, ask the man who wishes to borrow money.

He knows.

Great is the value of a good name. When most needed it serves best. When in need a friend indeed. Always it is based upon previous right action. Always it depends upon present right action.

Some More Costly Experiences

An eastern store uses the slogan, "This Store Undersells Every Competitor." From this store, a young man bought certain small pieces of hardware at ten cents a dozen. He bought many other things there. Soon thereafter, needing some more of the ten-cents-a-dozen article, and being short of time, he bought the articles from a competitor. "What price, please?" he asked.

"Five cents a dozen," was the answer.

Very suspicious of the store that undersells all competitors is this young man now. Yes, he feels so bad about it that, somehow or other, he cannot seem to refrain from telling it to everybody he meets. Strange, isn't it?

Another young man bought an advertised pair of suspenders. After wearing them fully a year, a small part gave out. This the young man sent to the factory, enclosing ten cents as payment for a new part. Promptly the new part came back—and the ten cents. You would think that there was some value to a good name if you heard that young man talk. You would think that Napoleon had scaled the Alps. His experience with others could not have been particularly gratifying, otherwise he would hardly have thought it worth while to say so much about the action of the suspender maker. Have you anyone talking for you?

Whether it is a reputation for getting printing out on time, for never substituting, for giving generous measure, for courteous treatment, for being able to do something better than somebody else, or for living up to agreement, it is all the same. A good name advertises well. Always, the reverse is true of that which displeases.

"What is the price of pinks today?" came over the telephone to a florist.

"What's your name?" came the answer.

"What difference does that make in the price of pinks?" came the retort.

Result—the receiver was hung up without explanation.

The inquirer firmly believes now that this store has two prices—as the store had previously admitted having the pinks. Upon mentioning the incident to an acquaintance, the latter told of an experience he had had with this store. Both persons are now wholly satisfied that Mr. Florist is irretrievably bad. Likely to happen, this, at any time, when customers are not treated rightly.

A young auditor, while looking over an inventory of a wholesale grocery house, was told that one gallon in bulk was equal to five quarts, "Full quarts" the labels read. It was bottled goods. That young man has done some tall thinking since then.

Expensive Discourtesy

A western office supply house advertised for salesmen. In response to this advertising, some excellent salesmen inquired for particulars. Soon these were forthcoming. Application blanks were included amongst the literature. Shortly these application blanks, properly filled out, and having excellent endorsements, for all these young men were really of sterling character, were sent in. To this day, no reply has been had.

"See that?" said one of these young men, pointing to a write-up in a trade paper, "That tells why we got no answer."

Sales had been so large that the factory could not fill orders. Under the circumstances it would seem as if the slight courtesy of notifying applicants would not have ruined the institution. This courtesy would have won friends, and the name of the concern would not have suffered thereby.

"What's in a name?"

The writer would be interested to know what a goodly number of advertising men think of a certain house that advertised certain prizes for selling ideas. After keeping them waiting long past the appointed time, this house notified the contestants that in that body of trained men not one had been able to present a usable idea. Considering the comparative smallness of the prizes, this house could much better have afforded to give the prizes than not to give them. It is just possible that the ideas were there—and that the gentleman or gentlemen back of the contest were not clever enough to see and apply them.

Many is the man who has not been able to see a good point until it was hammered into him with a sledge hammer.

As for the impression obtained by all these contestants, it certainly can be nothing but bad.

In selling to retailers, advertisers often promise much in the way of advertising help which afterward does not materialize. Naturally, this incenses the retailers. Thereafter, when fortune occasionally brings forward the advertiser's name, these men curl up their lips in contempt.

Does it pay to play the great game of business in this way?

All men slip up at times. The writer has done so. His friends have done so—and their friends—and friends of theirs.

Even the best-intentioned persons fall from grace occasionally or once in a long time. The thing to do is to reduce the number of these times to the minimum. When that has been accomplished, the question of the value of a good name will no longer exist. There will no longer be any question about it. It will be fully understood that a good name has great value.

Our Colleges Need Reforming

By ELEANOR LATHAM

WHILE I believe that the following editorial from the San Francisco Argonaut is a little too strong, there is enough of sober, solemn truth in it to make every friend of the cause of education stop and think.

The editor of the Argonaut has been most unfortunate in his acquaintance with college-bred men. I have personally known several who could write clean English—and in legible handwriting—when they graduated from college. In fact, I have known several who have had some well-deserved fame as writers before they got their sheepskins.

Several college-bred men—to my personal knowledge—have begun at the bottom of the newspaper business and have worked up by the same kind of merit that has marked the rise of their less degree-decorated fellows. And I have known college-bred men who plunged so deeply into their work that they forgot that there were any such things as fraternities and athletics.

The editor of "Who's Who in America" states that nearly sixty per cent of all the people named in his book are college graduates, and that about seventy per cent had had some college or university training. And people must have done things to get their names into this book.

On the other hand, I do believe that colleges need reforming. A much larger proportion of their graduates ought to be "trained men." And the way to accomplish that desirable end is, as the Argonaut suggests, to reform their practice and discipline.

Let me add a word of constructive criticism. In their practice, let them educate for efficiency and not for show. Let them show their students how to develop all of their latent powers and possibilities. Let them insist that the student earn his own living by producing wealth in a practical way.

But here is the Argonaut's editorial:

"AS TO 'TRAINED MEN'"

"President Hadley's remark in his address at the University Golden Jubilee on Tuesday that the problems of the time call for trained men is one in which all men of affairs will concur. But there are differences of judgment as to what constitutes a trained man.

"Surely our colleges, whatever else they may yield, are not giving us trained men, and in the opinion of the Argonaut they never will do it until they reorganize and reinspire the teachings and influences of collegiate life.

"The Argonaut has always been pre-disposed in favor of the college man. Its work in all departments calls imperatively for discipline, judgment, and some culture. In recruiting its service trial has again and again been made of the college-bred youth, but never with any approach to success.

"We have never yet been able to find a college-bred youth, without a long subsequent practical drill, who could write clean English, or who could even write a hand which the printer could read.

"We have never yet found one whose knowledge even within the lines of his special study was dependable or ready.

"We have never found one who did not wish to begin at the top of the ladder, nor one who did not find it imperatively necessary on the very busiest day of the year to cut his duties for the sake of attending some kind of an athletic or fraternity meet.

"Not one of those from Frank Pixley down whose work in the Argonaut has been an element in its character and influence has been a man of college breeding. This remark applies not only to the Argonaut, but to many other publications of the country representative of journalism in its higher rank.

"It is only a few months ago that there was assembled at a dinner table in the Century Club at New York a little group representing the very highest forces in American journalism—including the editor of Harper's Monthly, the then editor of the Century, and others of equal note—when through a chance inquiry it was developed that only one present was a college-bred man.

"In other spheres, too, the college-bred man is not found to be a trained man—trained in the sense of being equipped above others for the larger duties of social and other kinds of progress.

"Luther Burbank has reluctantly borne testimony to the fact that he has never yet been able in his work to make use of a college-bred youth. Those that he has tried, he declares, are so wedded to theories, so instructive in their mental attitude, as to be an obstruction rather than a help in his operations.

"All of which may be taken to indicate that the young collegian is not always, if ever, a trained man in the sense of being prepared beyond other men for the higher opportunities and duties of life.

"The trouble with the ordinary college career is that it tends through its diverting side issues—athletic, social, and other—to vagrant habits both physical and mental.

"Our colleges, it is true, ought to give us trained men, and this is only another way of saying that they should reform their practice and discipline."

The "Touch of the Shoulder"

By A. St. P. Reynolds

THE SCIENCE of war develops curious traits among men, and none more curious than the "touch of the shoulder."

A battle cry, full throated and awful in its meaning, such as "Remember the Maine," "Remember the Alamo" and other deep, vengeful slogans, the shrill bugle call urging men on when the cries of the officers are lost amid the din of the battle, are all of them but fleeting, passing inspiration when compared with the solid, comforting, resolute, firm pressure of a comrade's shoulder against your own. It has won more battles than any other factor and it helps men to put up more stubborn defense against tremendous odds than any other thing that can be done.

The brilliant, flashing charge against the enemy is like the lightning of genius, spectacular and uncertain of success, but the old reliable, plodding advance, shoulder to shoulder, with elbows touching is the maneuver that bears the brunt and wins the day in time of strife, and it is these same tactics which "bring home the bacon" in these piping times of peace.

It is "co-operation," this "touch of the shoulder," co-operation, the knowledge that there are others beside, before and behind you to see you through, to pick you up when you fall, and to bear the brunt of the load if you get down.

It is the secret of organization-success. In the ranks of any institution this practical sentiment thrives like a green bay tree, and welds the scattering units into one stout whole.

It is like a pile of fine steel filings, useless and impotent in their divided condition, yet strong enough to drive a giant steam engine, or a great ocean liner when welded into a solid shaft, and each part made to co-operate, or to touch the shoulder of each other part.

Some Random Thoughts on Salesmanship and Business Building : by A. F. Sheldon

The True Basis of Profit

IT IS necessary for us as business men to analyze the concept "profitable" with some care. I know merchants, or rather storekeepers who seem to fail to realize that profit is the difference between the total cost and the selling price, and they forget to figure in the totals in the cost.

A man at a furniture convention in Minneapolis not long ago said, "Mr. Sheldon, there is something wrong with my business. It's sick. I wonder if you can diagnose the case."

I said, "What's the matter?"

He said, "I work year after year, and it seems to me I am making money all the time, but when the year rolls around I don't seem to have any more than when I started in."

I asked him what rent he paid.

He said, "I don't pay any rent. I own the building."

"Don't you charge up anything to rent?"

"No," he said, "I tell you, I own the building."

"Suppose you were going to move out, would you give somebody the use of it for nothing?"

"No, certainly not."

"What does that dresser cost you?" I asked.

He replied, "$11.50."

"What do you get for it?"

"$15.00."

"What do you make?"

"$4.50."

"How do you get that?"

"Why, that's the way they used to figure when I went to school."

I finally got at the total gross sales of that man's business and the total expense, and I showed him that on that dresser he was making just thirty cents instead of $4.50, and then he felt like thirty cents.

There are thousands of merchants, or rather storekeepers, in whose business there is no more system than there is to a dog fight.

Great men and great institutions reflect Nature's laws; and one of Nature's chiefest laws is the law of order, system. Those who violate that law must pay the penalty in the sacrificing of profits.

The Interdependence of Business Departments

There is a false concept abroad in the land to the effect that the salesmen of the world are about the whole thing when it comes to business, using the term "salesmen" in the technical sense of that term. If the profits are not what they should be, business men are prone to place most of the blame on the shoulders of the salesmen.

It is difficult indeed to over-estimate the importance of efficient salesmanship in the technical sense of that term, but it is a truth that the profit-making power of an institution as a whole depends upon what we may term the business economics of that institution.

I use that term, not in the sense of judicious saving alone, economy, but rather in a sense analogous to the definition of political economy—"the science of the production and conservation of the material wealth of nations." Thus we may define business economics as "the science of the production and conservation of the material wealth of business institutions."

There are four grand divisions: first, the general management; second, the finance—the raising and disbursing of funds; third, the producing or providing; and, fourth, the sales.

But, after all, why does the manager manage? That finally the good stuff may be sold at a profit.

Why is that sedate and conservative financier financing? That ultimately the good stuff may be sold at a profit.

And why is the provider providing? For the same reason.

In final analysis, therefore, on this continent of commerce, in the land of trade, all roads lead to the sale.

The departments are not independent, neither are they dependent; but they are all inter-dependent. And just as no chain is stronger than its weakest link, so is no business stronger than its weakest department.

I have known the otherwise possible profits of splendid salesmen to go glimmering through the inefficiency of the people in the other three departments.

The Light of Wisdom

When man comes to the full-orbed day, the full light of intelligence, namely, wisdom, he comes to see that the square deal pays. He sees that, aside from all questions of right or wrong or where we are going to when we die, there is money in ethics in trade. He sees that there is more in business building than in mere business getting. He comes to see that the science of business is the science of service. He sees that it's a literal truth that he profits most who serves best.

The zone of service is the zone of profits.

Our master merchants are master servants in their line.

In one of your great neighboring cities you have probably the greatest living retail merchant, John Wanamaker. One day he said this to me: "If I can serve the public better than any other merchant in this community, the people will make a beaten path to my door."

Not long ago an ex-employee of John Wanamaker's said to me, "Mr. Sheldon, Mr. Wanamaker once got us together, and among other things said, 'When the customer enters my door, remember he is king. Forget me.'"

The danger is in passing the pivotal point. Occasionally you will find a man who gets a wrong concept of this.

I know salesmen, or rather order-takers, who want to serve the customer so well that they cut the throat of the transaction and spill the life-blood of profit. It may be a service, in a way, to the buyer, to sell him goods at a very low price, but the servant is worthy of his hire. We cannot serve very well or for very long unless we make a profit. It's all clear when we see that the profit we make is but the pay we get for the service we render.

About the Power of Persuasion

I love Emerson, but, do you know, I sometimes think that his mouse-trap philosophy is getting out of date. No matter how good the mouse-trap is, in the absence of publicity to make the world know about it, the people will not tear down the tall timber trying to get to the factory out in the woods.

Don't misunderstand me. All the publicity in the world, either by the spoken word of the personal salesman or by the written method — advertising — will not make permanent and profitable patrons in the absence of merit in the goods. But we must have publicity.

And what is salesmanship?

It is the power to persuade people to purchase product at a profit.

Now, that power does vary in different men. It varies in different aggregations of men in institutions. And it behooves us then as business men to inquire, "Whence comes that power? Can it be developed? Can it be strengthened?"

Of persuasion there are two kinds—the direct and the indirect. The more I study this great problem of trade in all its phases, the more am I inclined to place more and more importance upon indirect persuasion — the unselfish advice of satisfied patrons.

I believe in advertising. It's the great fire under the boilers of business. It does help to make things warm. Advertising of the right kind will sell goods.

But the best advertisement in all the world is the wagging tongue of the satisfied patron—the endless chain idea—each patron the first link in an endless chain of patrons. And in saying that I do not under-estimate the value of the spoken word of the personal salesman, the power of direct contact between buyer and seller.

Sauce for Goose and Gander

I once went into a store to see the manager. He hadn't come in when I arrived, so I went up to the balcony, at the back of the store, where he had his office. I found out afterwards that the men call it the "animal cage." When he finally came in, I noticed that he didn't look to the right or left, didn't have a kind word for anyone; had a "monarch of all I survey" sort of an expression.

I began to talk to him about the education of his people.

He said, "Do anything for these blankety, blank people? I guess not. They don't do anything for me. Some of us business men in the town wanted a certain ordinance put through. We asked our employes to vote for it, but they wouldn't do it."

I looked at him a moment and said, "Well, I don't blame them. If the situation were reversed and you were working for a man in whose heart was the spirit of hate, you would do the same thing. Sow to the wind and you reap the whirlwind. Sow hate and you reap hate."

On the other hand, those employes were wrong. I will tell you what I would do if I worked for such a man, and it isn't because I am better than other folks; but from a purely selfish standpoint, I would serve him with all my might while I served him. And one of two things would happen. Either I should make him ashamed of himself or else some good employer would find me out.

If you are serving an unappreciative boss, serve him the more—and I am talking from your standpoint.

The time is coming, indeed, with many it is here, when employers and employes see that their interests are absolutely mutual.

What we need in business is the star team, not the team of stars.

When Hugh Jennings took over the Detroit American team, he had a team of stars, each one working for himself, not willing to make a sacrifice hit to advance the other fellow to second.

But Jennings was a great organizer—he would make a great business man, a salesmanager. He was an organizer and harmonizer. He got the boys to playing as a unit. Then he had a star team instead of a team of stars. They won the pennant three years in succession.

When all the players in a business team pull together, then the institution makes so much money that it can afford to do more by those who are helping that big game, and will.

Value of Character Analysis

Almost all business men say, "Well, I am a pretty good judge of human nature by intuition."

That's a good side-stepper. I said the same thing too for a good many years, but I am beginning to wish that earlier in my business life I had studied how to judge men a little more carefully. I make mistakes yet, but not as many as I did before I got down to the basic principles of reading men.

Bignell, Superintendent of the Omaha Division of the Burlington Road has made a big record. I once asked him: "How do you account for your more than ordinary success?"

He replied: "More than anything else, to my ability to read human nature, to put square pegs in square holes and round pegs in round holes."

"How do you get that?" I asked.

"By studying the science of it. I have purchased everything I can find on the subject. I want to know railroading, yes, but I want to know human nature as a branch of knowledge which I can apply to the railroad business."

Psychology in Business

I believe that all too long the dear old science of psychology has been up in the clouds. Yet you find many people still laughing at it. They are mostly in the backwoods.

As a matter of fact, all trade is a mental process. This writing of the order and the check is merely the clinching of the deal. The meeting of the minds of the buyer and seller is the real transaction.

Ask the next ten salesmen you meet this question: "What happens in the mind of the customer before the sale is made?" and then write me a letter and tell me what reply you get.

There are four mental conditions that must be induced in the mind of the prospective patron before the deal is made.

From the viewpoint of business building, there are six, and the first of these is favorable attention. Please mark the emphasis on the "favorable."

It is a law of mind as certain as the law of gravitation is a law of matter that favorable attention properly sustained will change to a feeling of interest. That's no theory; it's a fact.

And it's another law of mind that the interest born of favorable attention, when properly sustained, will change to a feeling of desire—wanting. And it's another law of mind that desire made strong enough will change to action, which in commerce is the act of purchasing your goods.

If those four mental states are induced in such a way that the feeling of confidence enters the mind of the other fellow; after the goods are shipped, if the quality is so good and the service so excellent that the feeling of satisfaction happens in the mind of the customer, you are a business builder.

It's so strange to me that so many men, understanding the science of it, fail to practice the art; that a man seeing the law, does not apply it.

But the term "psychology in business" is sometimes mistaken by the ignorant to mean "hypnotism."

If I had the power, if you had the power, to go and hypnotize a man and get his order that way, you would be just as big a criminal as you would be if you would bind his arm and take the money out of his pocket.

But it's one thing to paralyze the will, which is hypnotism, and it's quite another thing to guide the mind through logic to the conclusion that you desire so that you may serve the person persuaded. One is intelligent persuasion and the other is paralysis of the will. It is only ignorance that necessarily links up hypnotism with psychology.

Don't Lose Momentum, Keep Advertising

By LUTHER D. FERNALD

THE habit of buying your goods is the big thing you're aiming at in your advertising. There's no profit in first sales.

"Season advertising" for a couple of months at the best selling-time of the year may start a lot of people to buying your goods; so far, so good. But just at the very time when a lot of people are almost won over, the "season advertiser" stops—and a lot of potential buyers are lost just as they are almost won.

The advertiser who breaks his advertising into seasons when he could profitably advertise the whole year through is like an engineer shutting off steam every alternate hour—slowing down, stopping and starting up again after a while. (You know it takes four times as much energy to start a limited train as it does to run it a mile.) The spasmodic engineer (and advertiser) doesn't use as much steam in a given period of time; but he uses more steam in getting where he wants to get—and it takes a whole lot longer.

And that's only for travel on the level ground.

It's even greater folly for the engineer to stop when he is almost at the top of a hill; he loses all his momentum, and if his brakes aren't good he slips back.

The man who's almost won over by your advertising gradually slips back, and you've practically got to begin all over again with him—you're back at the bottom of the hill.

Keep your advertising going all the year 'round if you want to keep your goods moving; don't shut off the power during the summer—or any other time. Win over the consumer you've almost won over; and keep the consumer who has begun to buy—keep him in the habit of buying.

And don't forget that advertising all-the-year-'round—creating a consumer-demand all-the-year-'round—wins over the dealer who isn't quite won over by spasmodic demands. Most dealers don't notice spasmodic calls for advertised goods; but when calls come right along, day after day, week after week, the trade will fall in line and buy and sell all-the-year-'round.

And this reacts again on the consumer, keeping him in the habit of using your goods.

When you advertise continuously instead of spasmodically, you'll spend less for advertising in the long run—and you'll "get there" sooner.

There is also some food for thought in this idea for the salesman—for anybody who wants to make the most of his momentum.

Flaidom Gets a Watchword

WIGGINS' kid brother was graduating from the high school, so we all went around to the commencement exercises. We shouldn't have had any peace in the office if we hadn't. Wiggins had been talking about it intermittently for months and chronically for weeks.

The high school was "classy," Wiggins had told us. The infants there had their tea-fights, functions, receptions, balls, proms, frolics, and jinks just like society. And, though he admitted it with the soft pedal pressed down hard, Wiggins had to own up they had their frats, cliques, sets, crowds, jealousies, heart-burnings, sensations, and scandals—also just like society.

We all felt some misgivings about taking our drabness and pokiness into such brilliant company, but Wiggins promised that we shouldn't be the only "old stiffs" in the crowd, as many of the graduating class were going to let their fathers and mothers attend. So we kept close together, tried to look as gay and careless as possible considering our responsibilities, and got into the seats that Wiggins' kid brother had graciously reserved for us.

It was a brilliant scene, as the papers pointed out the next morning. Fussberg and Dubheimer got restless early in the evening and tried to break away, but Socratic and I held them quiet, and we all survived the entire program without mishap.

For a full report of all the things they did to us, you will have to see the papers of the morning after. I should expect nothing more gentle than a thorough boiling in oil if I were to tell you how the most of it affected us.

A Promising Youth

But there were some redeeming features. Among them was the valedictory. The young fellow who did it had no more than begun before we all hunted him up on our bedizened programs. And we all made a mental note of the name, John Charles Flaidom. Then we all sized up the lad on the platform again. He looked good to us. His address was straightforward, simple, terse, and free from any affectation of cleverness.

"Know Flaidom?" Socratic wanted to know of Wiggins, as we were drifting forward in response to Wiggins' invitation to go up and congratulate his brother.

"Oh yes," jubilated Wiggins, "he has often been out to the house with Reggie." "Reggie" was the label that had been tied to Wiggins' kid brother.

"Will you do me the honor of presenting me?" Socratic begged.

"Sure thing!" patronized Wiggins. "Just as soon as we have congratulated Reggie."

Reggie was blasé about it all, so we turned hopefully to the valedictorian.

"What are you going to do, now that you are through high school?" Socratic asked Flaidom, after Wiggins had solemnly intoned the introduction.

"Why, I haven't decided on anything yet, Mr. Socratic. I've been so busy with my school work that I haven't had a chance to think much about it."

"Would you mind coming around to the office to see me some time soon?"

"Glad to, I'm sure," the lad smiled. "I'll be in tomorrow."

"Thank you," bowed Socratic. "Shall I look for you at about nine in the morning?"

"Nine o'clock shall be the hour," agreed the newly-fledged graduate. Then we found our way out of the theater.

"Brilliant boy, that Flaidom," remarked Wiggins, as we walked up Fifth street hill. "I predict a great future for him."

"I always disagree with you as a matter of principle, Wiggins," objected Fussberg, "but this time I can't. Just as the exception to prove the rule, I'm not going to start an argument."

Don't you see any room for it?" demanded Socratic.

"Why no, I don't. It's a long time since I have had the joy of giving my blessing to so promising a youth. Why did you ask him to come and see you unless you thought he was a find?"

"He has unusual promise, I'll agree, but didn't you all see that, up to the present, at least, he has failed to acquire the very foundation stone of success?"

Well, we howled and protested. Then we demanded to know what he meant. But he only said, "Wait and see."

Whither Bound?

So we were all on hand, busy at our desks, next morning at nine o'clock. At half-past nine, young Flaidom came in with a courteous and apparently sincere apology. He had been unexpectedly delayed at the theater, where he had gone to see about taking down the decorations of the night before.

"Want a job?" inquired Socratic, after the opening remarks.

"Yes sir," replied the youth, respectfully, but with tones as clear and direct as his gaze. "Even if I should decide to go to college this fall, I shall want something to do this summer."

"What kind of a job had you thought of taking?"

"Oh, anything that will give me a chance to earn fair wages."

"Prefer something in the line of your chosen profession, I suppose?"

"Why, I haven't chosen my profession yet, Mr. Socratic. Of course, Mother wants me to take up the law, because my father was a lawyer. Prof. Latham thinks that I should be a success as an engineer.

Sis wants me to go in for medicine. My uncle, Mr. Dewey, thinks I ought to take up business as a career. I hardly know which to take up—or whether to take up any of them. I have thought of the government consular and diplomatic service. I've done pretty well with my French, German, and Spanish. Then I've done a good bit of writing, and have been told that I could make good in newspaper work. Anyhow, I've got lots of time to look around and make up my mind. If I go to college, I'll not have to decide until I get through, and that will be four years yet."

"Let me see, you said something last night about life being strenuous, didn't you?"

"Yes, sir, I did."

"Many obstacles to be overcome, many enemies to conquer, many hardships to endure, many Alps to be battered down?"

"That was the idea."

"Ever notice the pools north of the high school in the city park?"

"Yes, sir—they're there after every rain."

"Beautiful, clear, soft water, isn't it?"

"Yes, when it first falls. But it soon gets slimy and green, and smells bad."

"Ever see the Missouri River?"

"Yes, sir. We used to live in Dakota."

"Water flows along all right, doesn't it?"

"Oh yes. But you never know where to find it. It will sometimes shift its course several miles in a night."

"Does it accomplish anything? Batter down any mountains, turn any mill wheels, irrigate any fields?"

"No sir."

"Ever been through the Royal Gorge, in Colorado?"

"Yes, sir. Came that way about a year ago."

"What has the Arkansas River done there?"

"Cut a gash two thousand feet deep and miles in length through solid granite."

"Gorge very wide?"

"No sir, it's very narrow. The water has been cutting away at one narrow strip of rock for thousands of years."

The Fitting Foundation

"Well, Flaidom, apply the lesson. What's the answer?"

"Do you mean that I ought to decide what I want to do right now, and then keep plugging away at that one thing?"

"Think you'll get very far if you don't?"

"But I'm not like the water in the pools—I keep moving. I'm not like the fellows that have so little purpose in life that they spend hours idling in pool rooms, saloons, on the docks, in cigar stores, and on the street corners. I want to get more education and a broader view of life before I decide on my profession. If I don't go to college, I shall finish my education either in some practical work or by travel."

"Think you ought to go into any profession or business unprepared?"

"Why, no. Of course not."

"Same preparation serve for medicine and for business?"

"No, I suppose not. But ought not one to have a broad, general foundation upon which to build his special preparation?"

"Perhaps, in a sense. But would you lay the same foundation for an art gallery as for a sky-scraper office building?"

"I see. Both should have broad and deep foundations, but the foundation should be adapted to the superstructure. I'm going to give the matter some careful thought during the next few days and decide what I am going to do."

Some Successes that Failed

"Know Pickdale?"

"Who—Lawyer Pickdale? Yes, know him too well."

"Did you know that he began to study law when he was twelve years old, and has devoted all his time to it ever since?"

"Yes, I had heard that. But he's so mean and crooked that no one trusts him. He's a regular shark in the law, but his knowledge and skill only make people fear him more."

"Know Lyoncarp?"

"Yes, they say he's one of the smartest and most skillful surgeons on the Coast. But he puts in so much time with his golf, hunting, and fishing, that he's always poor and in debt."

"Know Brownlyn?"

"Oh yes, everybody knows poor old Brownlyn—rich as mud and getting richer every minute, but as miserable and hopeless as a sick pauper."

"But all these are successful in the professions they chose for themselves, aren't they?"

"Well, I should say that they are successful as lawyer, surgeon and financier, but not as men."

"Keen work!" approved Socratic. "Now, why do they fail as men?"

"Well, there are many causes, I suppose. It would be hard to say unless we knew all the circumstances?"

"Let me ask you another question. What is your purpose in going into a profession or business at all?"

"Why, to make a living, of course."

"Yes, you want to do that. But Brownlyn does that, doesn't he?"

"Well, I suppose he does. But I want to do more than that—I want to enjoy life as I go along."

"Yes, that is worth while. But Lyoncarp does that, doesn't he?"

"I should say he does. But I want to have the honor and respect of the people around me."

"Yes, that's a good thing, too. But doesn't Brownlyn have that?"

"Sure he does. For all his riches, he's strictly honest, even if he is so selfish that it makes him wretched. What I want is the combination of all these things."

"Yes, that's a good combination to go after. But don't you suppose that all these men wanted that very same combination when they started out on their careers?"

"Well, it would be hard to imagine their not wanting it."

"Then, why haven't any of them won it?"

"Well, they didn't go after it right, that's all."

"How are you going after it?"

"Why, by keeping those things in mind and taking care not to do anything that will cause me to lose any of them, I suppose. That doesn't seem to fit the case very well, either. Because it is so hard to know beforehand just what the result of an act will be. But there must be some way of making a success of life."

The One Fixed Purpose

"How about Irvane, Flaidom? Do you call him a success?"

"Yes, he certainly is. And he's a man to pattern after, too. I know him well. And his great word is service. Why, say, I do believe that's the secret! Funny I never thought of that before!"

The lad was laughing with pure delight in his discovery.

"That's it—that's it!" he went on, slapping his knee. "If Pickdale, Lyoncarp, and Brownlyn had only used the yardstick, 'Will it serve the public?' to measure all their doings, they would have succeeded as men, as well as in their professions. Great stuff, Mr. Socratic! Isn't that what you have been leading up to all the time?"

"You are even better than I thought, Flaidom. Now that you have the idea, what are you going to do with it?"

The young fellow sobered down instantly. And for a moment he was thoughtful. Then he said, "Now I see why I have felt all up in the air about my career. I was like the Missouri River, wandering all over the plain, with no fixed purpose. I knew, in a way, what I wanted, but I had no idea how to get it. But this straightens everything out for me. Now it will be easy to decide whether or not to go to college, and what profession to take up, because I will have a principle to guide me.

"Mr. Socratic, I want to thank you. Service! Irvine's watchword—and mine."

Make the Dog Trot

I WISH to goodness I had a man in my employ I could trust to look after the business for a few days while I go up to San Francisco and attend the hardware dealers' convention," growled Myop. "But there isn't a man in the store that can think for himself."

"Have to do all their thinking for them, do you?" Socratic wanted to know.

"Even to telling them when it's time to have their hair cut," was the snarl.

"Ever see that dog of Crawson's?"

"What, that fat beast that rides on the front seat of his auto?"

"Yes! Ever see him walk?"

"Now you speak of it, I don't believe I ever did. Can't he?"

"Crawson says he can scarcely crawl—has been riding so long that he has lost the use of his legs."

"'Nuff said, Socratic. Do you think that I have let my clerks' power of thought atrophy because I haven't let them use it?"

"Think it over, Myop, and then answer it for yourself."

"Seeing" an Opportunity

By ALBERT SIDNEY GREGG

IT HAS been said of a general who failed that he was unfit to command because he waited for somebody to tell him what to do. He lacked insight and initiative.

The same holds true in business. As one man aptly expressed it in speaking of a very successful publisher: "He can see further into the brick than other men."

The mind to see and the will to act determine failure or success.

A few years ago a young man started a business in a way that may be suggestive to other young men who yearn for independence, but who cannot "see their way."

He was a country school teacher on small pay. If anybody had told him that in a few years he would be at the head of a big, prosperous and growing concern, he would have laughed at the suggestion. But that change actually took place, and this is how it came about.

The teacher was frequently asked by the wives of the farmers to bring various household necessities from the village store when he went to town.

Eventually it occurred to him that he could make an honest dollar or two by taking orders for groceries, tea, coffee, and spices, among the farmers. His plan was successful from the start. He bought at wholesale and sold directly to the farmers, making his deliveries on Saturdays.

He next worked out a plan for selling groceries, tea, coffee, and spices by mail, to farmers, shipping the goods in car load lots to a town and arranging for the farmers to come after their goods.

Now the E. C. Harley Co. of Dayton is pointed out as one of the strong concerns of that city. E. C. Harley was the country school teacher who had a mind to "see" and the will to act, and he won success.

A Successful Account and Collection Device

In the same city of Dayton, famous for cash registers and airships, a system for preventing bad accounts has been developed within the last two years. Those who got in right at the start will make a fortune.

Ingle Brothers are the heroes of this little business venture. They were grocers, and had the usual list of bad accounts.

Finally one of the firm developed a plan which practically put the credit business on a cash business. It was done, in brief, by issuing brass money which could be used by the customer in paying for groceries.

When the customer opens an account he is asked how much credit he wants a week. If he says ten dollars, he is handed ten brass dollars, and charged with $10. When he makes a purchase he pays with a brass dollar and receives his change in brass nickles and dimes.

As the end of the week approaches and his supply of brass is running low, he realizes that he must find the real coin and pay for his first installment of brass money before he can get another supply. The plan is death to running accounts which are so hard to catch. The inventors say it cut their bad accounts to almost nothing in a short time.

The brass money is kept in an ornamental case with glass tubes for the various denominations of coin, a drawer for each clerk, and a simple system of accounting.

When a company was formed last year to finance this enterprise the stock was sold almost as soon as it was offered.

The young grocers are on the way to fortune because they had the "seeing mind" and did not have to be told.

The sure test of the "seeing mind" is: Do you have to be told or do you strike out for yourself.

If you are leaning on somebody, quit it now.

Learn to lead by standing alone, by relying on your own resources.

It will do you good to make a few mistakes and take a tumble now and then.

You will be wiser when you get up.

Believe in yourself. A firm conviction that you are able to do the thing will help amazingly in "seeing" things.

If you are confident and persistent in your efforts you may find a pot of gold laying around loose on which you can put your brand.

Improving "Each Shining Hour"

By C. R. Lippmann

A TRAVELING salesman who called on me the other day, said: "I make two kinds of sales, my regular sales and my 'all velvet sales.' What do I mean by 'all velvet sales?' I'll tell you. They are sales picked up unexpectedly and between the minutes.

"For example, the other day I was riding in the train from X to Y, and in conversation with the man on the seat next, I found out that he was a prominent retailer from somewhere on the line on his way to the market. Gently I zigzagged the conversation to the subject of my goods, advertising novelties, and soon we made our way to the baggage car.

"My trunks were buried under a lot of others, but a 'silvered' handshake with the man in charge soon brought them forth.

"To make a long story short, before I reached my destination I had sold a fat bill of goods and made a new customer who has since given me repeat orders.

"Another time in a medium sized city I was walking along the street when I noticed in the window of a bank the usual orthodox legend about the capital and the undivided surplus, and underneath in small type: "Established 1884." I went in and told the officers that this was their "silver anniversary." They hadn't thought of it before. I walked out with an order for a 'Silver Anniversary Souvenir' in my pocket."

"A habit of reading idly debilitates and corrupts the mind for all wholesome reading; the habit of reading wisely is one of the most difficult habits to acquire, needing strong resolution and infinite pains."—Frederic Harrison.

How Would You Come Out of a Thorough Sifting and Culling Process : by F. L. Oilar

WANTED—A young man to fill a position paying a salary of $25,000 a year, with a chance for an increase.

HOW MANY applicants would an advertisement such as this bring? Many thousand, no doubt, if widely circulated.

The young man that has worked from early till late, year after year, with his eyes on the clock and his mind on pay-day, would no doubt say to himself, if he should happen to read the appeal: "That for me, I knew I would strike something after a while, and here is my opportunity."

And the college man would say, "Ah, that is what I have been looking for, that very kind of position. I knew there were a few such to be had and this is my chance. I don't believe in starting in at the bottom, at any rate."

How many hundreds of other young men there are that are looking for such a snap and wonder why they are not more easily found.

But read on:

Requirements: applicant must have an absolutely clean character, to shoulder responsibility.

Ah, there is the rub—Responsibility.

A salary to be paid some one that can shoulder and carry a weight.

That advertisement is pretty broad, isn't it? It not only means that the man should be clean from now on, but requires an absolutely clean character. That brings up the past and changes the chances for a great many. Now, how many applicants would the advertisement bring?

Thousands of snap seekers would read the first part with a great desire to see that office, with its fine equipment. But after reading the second part they would drop their aspiring hopes, after a little reflection. "I knew it," they would whine, "it takes luck and a pull to get that kind of job." Then they would go on plodding in the same old way, waiting for the next job to come that will pay $25,000, or even less, that has no requirements.

An Ancient Sifting Process

Handling the responses from such an advertisement in any trade journal or other periodical, would be like the search for ten righteous persons in those cities of the olden time that were threatened with destruction unless the ten could be rounded up. Every corner was searched. The tens of thousands of inhabitants were sifted and culled and hunted over. And, after all the scrutiny, only four were found. And one of them, a woman, lost her life because she let her curiosity get the better of her.

Only seventy-five per cent of even the righteous reached safety.

That was a pretty good percentage of the number that escaped, but how about the three as compared with the total of many thousands, who were destroyed.

Pretty serious, isn't it?

And yet things are going on at about the same ratio now. Look around you and see.

Could there be found three that would fill the requirements of this advertisement? If not, why not? What is becoming of the young men of that calibre?

What is Included in a Sale of Services

Twenty-five thousand dollars a year!

What does that mean?

Does it mean twelve hours a day, or does it mean from eight a. m. until noon with an hour for lunch and then back until five p. m., or eight hours a day, until noon on Saturdays and off all day Sundays and holidays? Is that what a year means?

Not much, it means twenty-four hours each day for three hundred and sixty-five days in the year.

You say, "What? No time for recreation? No one can stand the strain of work all of the time for any money."

Ah, there is the point. When a man is employed he is employed outright, for all there is in him all of the time. His services are sold. That doesn't necessarily imply that he is to crowd forty-eight hours into ten. It does mean that he must put in all there is in him while at the office. When out of the office he must spend his time in the interest of the concern for which he works, by building up his physical and mental systems so that they will keep up under the responsibility while at the office. How many people there are that are not keeping their systems in good shape for the next day of work.

If you watch your employes you will see that it is not their eight or ten or twelve hours' work a day that is killing them, but it is what they do after the day of work that is putting them on the vacation list so often.

How many people have you heard say something like this: "In the office for the concern. Out of the office, none of their business."

That is very common, but is that the right policy?

There is too much "I don't care" about it and not enough of "What shall I do to be saved?"

Some time ago I got into a barber's chair and told the barber what and how I wanted my hair trimmed. He, being an excellent barber, fixed me up all right. I know it was all right because no one said, "Where did you get that hair cut?"

When he got through he handed me a mirror that I might inspect the sale, saying to me, "Does it suit you?" He should have known that an advertisement on the back of my head like stair-steps would hurt his business worse than it would me, because I would not have known it, unless some one had asked me, "Who cut your hair?" If it had been a poor job the barber would have lost that customer, no doubt, at least wouldn't have gained him. If the inquiring person happened to be a particularly close friend of mine he might lose another customer.

"Just Good Enough"

"Does it suit you?" He should have said to himself, "Does it suit me?"

Catch the point?

We are too anxious to do just enough to hold our positions—just a small increase in business to let the boss see that we are getting better.

Isn't that natural?

That reminds me of the professed salesman that used to be employed by the same concern that I was. When he had a good sale early in the day he would say, "Well, I have earned my salary today. You fellows get busy. If you want me, I will be upstairs asleep."

Just enough to hold down the job!

That is the mistaken idea of too many people, from school days up through life, just to slide through.

"Three out of many thousands."

Not much show for most of us! That is true, but there are going to be some good sized boots to fill some day and some one will have the privilege of filling them. It will be a case of the survival of the fittest.

Did you ever notice some people who think, when they have a position, that they are fixed for life? Some of them are.

It is the fellow with an ideal that doesn't stay fixed, for he sees something of greater magnitude ahead.

You will notice, too, that everything that was ever accomplished was first an ideal. But the dreamer didn't wait for the revelation to come about, he got busy and went after it. By so doing, he benefited others by helping himself.

When one gets that kind of germ working in one's system things are bound to come to pass.

Once upon a time there was a little boy who wouldn't eat any dinner because he wanted to save his appetite for the mince pie. But when the pie was served his mother told him that boys who wouldn't eat were too sick to be allowed any mince pie. That's just the way it is with the pessimists. They won't enjoy today because they are waiting for a better day, but when the better day comes they will find that they have no part in it because they refused to enjoy today.—The Optimist.

Live, as it were, on trust. All that is in you, all that you are, is only loaned to you. Make use of it according to the will of Him who lends it; but never regard it for a moment as your own.—Fenelon.

The All-Aroundness of the Human Being and Its Development : by H. D. Brasefield

OUR SUBJECT, the All-Aroundness of Man, is a comprehensive one.

"The greatest study for man is man and the greatest thing in man is mind."

One cannot help but marvel at the tardiness of humanity in taking up a scientific study of the individual human being, to get a clear understanding of the laws that govern his existence and upon which his growth and well being depend.

Our good friend Burbank has said, "Just as soon as we become as intensely interested in the culture of the human being as we are today in the culture of plant life and animal life, it will be easy to produce results more marvelous in race development than have ever been accomplished in the vegetable or animal world."

He further asserts, "Before this result can be accomplished, there must be a realization of the fact that every provision has been made by the Creator of the Universe for the perfecting of what seems to be the last great word of creation—the human being."

The Possibilities of the Human

You have noticed that I have spoken several times of the human being. I believe that the time will come when we will designate man generically as the human, use the term "man" to designate the male of the human and continue to use the word "woman" to designate the female.

The most obvious expression of the human is the body, and the first requisite of an all around man is the right kind of body.

Of anatomy, physiology, and hygiene, most of us know very little.

In the story of young Sidis, the son of Professor Sidis of Harvard University, we are informed that he was able to pass the required examination for entrance into the medical college of Harvard University on the questions of anatomy and physiology when he was but seven years of age.

This same boy, by his father considered to be only normal, by Professor Rice of the Department of Psychology of Columbia University considered a prodigy, at the age of two was able to read the English language; at the age of four could speak in Russian, German, French, Latin, Hebrew, as well as English; at the age of five he made a calendar by means of which he could tell the day of any date in the year; at the age of nine he was well versed in the great principles of astronomy; at the age of eleven, entered the post-graduate department of Harvard University, having already completed a three years' college course in Tufts College; and recently lectured before the mathematical department of the University on that most abstruse and difficult problem of pure mathematics—the fourth dimension.

You may be inclined to agree with Professor Rice and say that the boy is a prodigy like the many others who have appeared from time to time, especially those gifted with unusual musical or mathematical ability. But Professor Sidis, his father, says that the boy's ability is largely traceable to scientific methods used by himself and the mother from the very first day of the boy's existence.

He is willing to acknowledge that the boy has a good inheritance. This acknowledgment is to be expected from his father. The mother is a graduate of a medical school. The father is a polyglot, speaking all the languages that the boy spoke at the age of four. Nevertheless he asserts that in the main the boy's remarkable ability is due to scientific training.

In making this claim, he agrees fully with the prophetic utterances of Burbank who has from platform and through magazine often made the statement that when we come to understand the laws of human life and put ourselves willingly into harmony with them, we will get as a result a most splendid type of the human.

If this boy of seven had sufficient knowledge of anatomy and physiology to pass a University examination, certainly we adults ought to have a sufficient knowledge to help us to understand the problem of right living and true development as it connects itself with the body.

Four Attributes of Physical Fitness

Perhaps we may be able to get a better idea of the importance of a well developed and well organized body if we were to think of it as a machine, say an electric motor.

You are all familiar enough with the general construction of a motor to know that its worth depends first of all on the use of first class material in its structure, and secondly, the utmost care in the mechanical workmanship so that every bearing runs smoothly, and every joint is well made.

Whatever may be the use for which the motor is intended, it is compact and well formed according to the models that experience has proved to be the most efficient for each different kind of work.

We might say of it that it is symmetrical. This word is made up of two parts—the first, "sym," meaning together, and the second part, "metros," which means to measure; the underlying idea being that a body is symmetrical when its parts, measured and fitted together, will produce the ideal type of construction.

We further know that every piece of steel, every piece of iron, every piece of copper that enters into the construction of our motor is tested before used for its strength.

Further, as the machine is constructed, it is plainly kept in mind that one of its characteristics must be endurance. The machine whose maker can demonstrate that it can run for a long time with little wear and tear will have the market.

Further, a good motor implies activity. The machine is to be used. No one buys a motor to place it under a glass case as a parlor ornament. The purchase is made that work may be done; that results are to be accomplished.

These four words—symmetry, strength, endurance and activity—that so aptly describe the characteristics of our motor can be used also to describe the four physical characteristics of the body of an all-around human being. And these characteristics can be realized through obedience to fixed laws. This will mean, to many, a complete reorganization of the physical habits of life, but we can be assured that the change will pay.

Breathing Right

Let me give you some of these laws. One of the most important is, breathe right.

Physical trainers and physicians who make a business of examining for insurance policies say that most people use less than one-half of their lung power. Other things being equal, therefore they develop less than one half of their possible life force.

The lungs, if fully inflated and deflated, raise and lower the diaphragm, massaging the liver and other abdominal organs, and thereby keeping them in tone and enabling them to perform their functions properly. This means also a larger supply of oxygen, greater purification of the blood and the proper repair of wornout tissue, hence better bone, better nerve, better muscle.

Right Exercising

Another important law is, exercise right.

This is a question that each individual must settle for himself, determined largely by the character of his daily activity. But every one will need to study the problem; for whatever may be the line of work it will at best only call into play certain muscles, leaving the others undeveloped. It is a law of Nature that what is not used is abused, for it atrophies. The dwindling of any one set of muscles impairs the efficiency of all others.

For those in sedentary life, exercises that will call into play the muscles of the back and of the abdomen are especially recommended.

Breathing and exercise stimulate the circulation. This means healthy skin action. The pores of the skin, with the perspiration, throw off the poisons that are a consequence of the breaking down and wearing out of tissue by mental and physical activity.

Right Cleansing

We are therefore led logically to the fourth law, cleanse right.

The daily bath of hands and face is practically established as a custom. We would do well, however, as the old Greek did, to realize that every part of the body needs to be washed each day. Some temperaments thrive best with cold bathing. Others cannot endure much cold water. But all can take a daily bath of some kind—cold preferably, if there is a healthy reaction. This serves to tone the whole system as well as to assure the cleansing of the whole body.

Dr. Luther Gulick, who had made a study of the body and its relation to man's efficiency, makes a statement in his book on "The Efficient Life" that "Bathing is not only a necessity from the standpoint of cleanliness, but still more from the standpoint of a right mental attitude; for from a sense of cleanliness comes a feeling of power and a responsiveness to higher ideals."

He further asserts that we must go farther than the aphorism, "Cleanliness is next to Godliness," and realize that Cleanliness is Godliness; that a clean body will make us responsive to good impulses.

Right Drinking

The use of water for bathing the exterior of the body is not its only use. It is the best all-around drink that has been provided for man and beast. Eighty per cent of the substance of the body is water. It is being thrown off through the lungs, skin, and kidneys. This waste must be supplied by a generous quantity taken into the system. Each individual must decide the quantity for himself, only taking care that a generous supply is furnished. In the morning on arising, before taking breathing and other exercises; in the middle of the morning; in the middle of the afternoon, and early in the evening are good times to drink water. If at each time the larger part of a pint of water is consumed, the system will be well supplied under ordinary circumstances. If one's activity is muscular, accompanied with a great deal of elimination by perspiration, the drinking of as much as three or four quarts will supply the needs of the body.

Right Eating

The next law is, eat right. This involves two problems—what to eat and how to eat.

It is probably true that what is one man's food is another man's poison. But experiments are demonstrating clearly that a diet made up of foods as nature produces them is the diet upon which the human thrives best.

Plenty of fruit, a modicum of cereals, plenty of vegetables and a few nuts, well masticated (for this is the only method) will soon largely if not entirely eliminate the desire for highly seasoned foods and a mixture of many different kinds of foods.

Horace Fletcher, in his splendid series of books, points out that Nature has supplied our tongues with what are called taste buds, the purpose of which is first, to give us delight in the food we are eating, and second, to enable us to reject, after thorough mastication, waste material that does not nourish, but only clogs the digestive tract and becomes a fertile soil for the development of disease germs. This is especially true of the fiber of meat. This thorough mastication will not take place if the food is made up of a combination of a large number of different foods highly seasoned, owing to the presence of the condiment which makes a long holding of the food in the mouth difficult.

Right Relaxation and Recreation

In the course of every day, with our thinking right, our breathing and exercising receiving the proper attention, having used water liberally inside and outside, having thoroughly masticated our food selected with the idea of meeting the best needs of the body rather than satisfying a perverted taste, it will be necessary for us to remember that this delicately constructed machine needs rest.

It is well to relax body and mind several times during the course of the day. We gain time by losing it, and by letting down we allow the machine to adjust itself and the nerve centers to become relaxed so that the action of muscle and nerve will be the stronger and more effective.

With this idea of relaxation there is also the idea of recreation, giving ourselves to something outside of our regular line of work that will call into play a different set of muscles and of nerve centers so that there will be a complete change in thought and in activity. It is like having several machines and using one while the other is resting. Everyone knows from the study of steel that constant use produces a crys-tallizing in the structure, making it break easily. So it is in our physical machine. Constant use produces a condition where a break-down is likely to occur.

Recreation that takes the form of self-improvement is the most valuable.

Last but not least of the laws to be obeyed is, sleep right. This is Nature's provision for the repairing of physical wastes.

In order that the body may be repaired, the whole system should be completely relaxed and properly protected from cold. Every facility should be afforded for a generous supply of pure, wholesome air. The outside sleeping porch is a long delayed obedience to Nature's law, for man is not an indoor being but an outdoor being.

Obedience to these nine laws will bring about Symmetry, Strength, Activity and Endurance.

The Two Nervous Systems

I have already referred to the fact that "the greatest thing in man is mind."

I shall speak of mind as it refers specifically to those phases of consciousness that are directly connected with the cerebral nervous system, which includes the brain and the nerves distributed to the various parts of the body from the spinal cord.

The new psychology is beginning to raise a question whether the sympathetic nervous system is not wholly independent in its organic activity from the cerebral.

This sympathetic nervous system is made up of two score and more ganglia, that is, little bunches of nerve material from which radiate nerve filaments reaching every organ of the body. The most famous of these ganglia is the large one known as the solar plexus, situated in what is familiarly known as the pit of the stomach directly below the sternum. This was made famous by Fitzsimmons' knock-out blow, in his fight with Corbett.

Other large ganglia are situated at the base of the brain, in the region of the heart and in the lower part of the abdomen. Associated with these are small ganglia near each vertebra of the spinal column.

This nervous system is being studied, and a general interest has been awakened by the suggestions that have been made by some of these students.

Only recently one in Connecticut made the assertion that after years of study he has come to the conclusion that the solar plexus is the real seat of life force.

Several times within the last few years have I heard students of psychology and the problem of education make the assertion that one of the greatest fields, practically unexplored, was that which was determined by the phenomena of the sympathetic nervous system.

I am inclined to view a human being as tripartite, each part having distinctive phenomena of its own and all three dominated by the individual consciousness which we call the Ego.

The Intellectual Processes

The mental processes by which the Ego functions through the brain and its extended nervous system are designated by the terms knowing, or intellect.

All the intellectual or knowing processes of the mind begin with sensation—the impressions made upon the mind, through the sense organs—eyes, ears, nose, fingers, and tongue—their nerves, and the brain.

These sensations are combined to form images. An image is the mental thing composed of all the sensations that have come to the mind from one particular object.

Images are combined to form concepts, which are the mental things that stand for classes of images.

For example, when you see a rose, your mind receives a sight-sensation. When you hear it fall upon the table, you have a hearing-sensation. When you smell its fragrance, your mind receives a smell-sensation. When you feel the velvety smoothness and coolness of its petals, your mind received a touch-sensation. When you chew the petals, your mind receives a taste-sensation. There may be several sensations of each kind. But they all combine to form, in your mind, the image of that rose.

When you have seen, heard, smelled, touched, and tasted many roses, you have a mental concept of the whole class to which each rose belongs. If you think in English, then that class is labeled in your mind with the word rose.

Concepts, or concepts and images, are combined to form ideas. By the perception of the relationships between ideas—a process in which we use the mental power of reason—we form judgments. Ideas and judgments are compared, their relationships are studied, and we discover Nature's laws. From the study of these laws, we arrive at basic principles—the principles that lie at the foundation of the Universe.

All this is the process of thinking. In order that it may be done accurately, quickly, and powerfully, it is necessary that a man have trained senses, through which he can then get a rich stock of correct mental images, made up of many reliable sensations.

The rare and valuable quality of judgment—sometimes called good judgment—is the result of trained senses, a rich stock of images, a large store of concepts, the knowledge of laws and principles, and a trained power of reason, gained by a study of practical logic.

Memory is necessary to hold the sensations in the storehouse of the mind until they are brought out, and by the process of thinking, united to form images. Similarly, images must be remembered until they are used in forming concepts, and concepts for use in the forming of ideas. The memory is also the storehouse of laws and principles.

The memory is susceptible of training, also, by scientific methods that have proved successful.

All progress is the result of imagination, which is nothing more nor less than the combination in new ways of the concepts and ideas held in memory. This, the highest and most valuable of all the intellectual powers, may also be trained and developed scientifically.

These three—thinking, memory, and imagination—are all the processes of knowing. And knowledge, used, is power.

The Subconscious Mind and the Feelings

This activity of the mind, has, by some, been called "the phenomena of the objective mind." Hudson has done much to bring about the use of this expression. Over against this as a sort of antithesis is the expression, "subjective mind," not now so frequently used as a few years ago, being quite largely displaced by the term, "subconscious mind."

This is used to designate a class of phenomena which, up to a few years ago, were all classed as mental phenomena and believed to have their seat in the brain. I believe that we will rightly understand it when we conclude that they are phenomena of the sympathetic nervous system. These are the feelings. Among those that help toward success are reverence for and belief in a Supreme Power, spiritual in its nature, as the great First Cause of the Universe; love, by means of which one individual is drawn to others and made to feel a oneness with the others in purpose, ideals and life activity; a desire to serve, growing out of love, the basis of all the positive qualities; faith—faith in oneself, faith in others, faith in right principles and laws of conduct, faith in one's own work; earnestness, that zeal in what is undertaken that fires to achievement; honesty, the foundation of trustworthiness; justice, the guide to right conduct toward others; kindness, the warmth of character; cheerfulness, the sunshine of character; hope, by means of which the individual takes a large outlook on life; loyalty, by which one gives himself unreservedly to some great purpose or to some great institution; courage, which moves one to dare and to do in the face of great opposition or under circumstances that may include danger to himself and others.

These feelings, I believe, all belong to the subconscious mind, with its physical seat, so far as we can now understand, to be found in the sympathetic nervous system.

The Value of Suggestion

The subconscious mind is susceptible to suggestion. An idea once lodged in the consciousness will start a line of action in harmony with the suggestion which will be carried to its logical conclusion. In this connection comes another law of physical well being, think right. A right thought, through the subconscious mind, influences the whole physical organism. Right habits of thought, through the subconscious mind, result in health.

The subconscious mind is also telepathic. By this we mean that it is exceedingly sensitive to the mental condition of any other person with whom the individual is en rapport, and further that it has a power of projecting itself so that there is a certain conveyance of thought at such times.

It is believed by some that the subconscious is also clairaudient and clairvoyant—that is, it hears and sees things the physical ear and eye cannot perceive.

No doubt, as I have touched upon these various phases, I have led at least some of you, and all of you to a degree, into a line of thought that is more or less new. But our literature of today, the drama, the magazine and novel, also public addresses of those who are teachers, are beginning to show that slowly but surely something of this idea is laying hold of the mind of man and that there is coming to pass a recognition of a class of mental or psychical phenomena that is independent of brain structure.

It was my good fortune recently to hear Dr. Morton Prince of Tufts Medical College, Boston, who, with Professor Sidis of Harvard is in the front rank of the psychologists. He made this significant statement: "No impulse started by either a thought, feeling or sensation within the individual's consciousness, or by another acting on that consciousness through the medium of the printed page or spoken word or projected thought, ever crosses the field of consciousness without making its impression. This impression may be retained for a long time in the subconscious until the condition obtains for its expression. Then it will rise into the field of waking consciousness and become an active factor in determining one's conduct."

He based this statement on his observations of various types of abnormal mental conditions and upon experiments made in the psychological laboratory.

He further asserted that the condition for expression could be made to take place by putting the person into a hypnotic sleep and making use of crystal gazing or automatic writing. He backed up his assertion with concrete cases that had come recently to his notice.

As we weigh this statement we come to realize that psychology as a science is yet in its infancy. There is a great field awaiting the attention of the student that will yield richly in a fuller understanding of life and the laws that govern our mental activities.

The Dominant Ego

Back of all this there is the individual Ego—that something—that part of the great life stream of consciousness individualized (and I believe permanently so) which makes it a self-conscious entity. This is the seat of the will.

It is this Ego functioning through the sympathetic nervous system that gives rise to the feelings, and functioning through the brain gives us the processes of thinking, remembering, and imagining, and functioning through the body, gives us the customary physical activities.

This Ego, therefore, is a being of tremendous possibilities. The will is susceptible of great development through training. And being the dominant force in the all around man, its training is the most important of all man's duties in his progress toward perfection and consequent happiness.

The Social Aspect of the Human

We should fail to understand the human fully in his all-aroundness did we not come to realize that in addition to what is peculiar to him as an individual there is another set of phenomena that arises from his relation to other individuals.

The whole purpose of the creative process has been the production of this human, each individual being a component part of the race, having obligations to meet as a component part. These are his social obligations. No individual lives to himself alone and neither will one die alone, for whatever affects one affects all.

This brings us to the great law and principle of associative life—all for each and each for all.

Here we touch one of the great phases of human existence. It spells for us an ideal—Brotherhood. This ideal will express itself in co-operative activity, based upon the recognition of the oneness of the whole human family.

Therefore, let us maintain a wholesome attitude to anything progressive that may be evolved. By virtue of our fuller knowledge, let us get into harmony with the great laws of development, or unfoldment, that will make us leaders of our fellows.

The whole universe is under law—every individual with every part of his being. Our success is determined by the degree in which we become willingly obedient to these great laws and principles.

The Result of All Around Development

This knowledge and willing obedience will forever take us out of the ranks of the Knockers and Croakers so well pictured by Joe Lincoln in the following lines:

"Once, by the edge of a pleasant pool,
Under the bank, where 'twas dark and cool,
Where lashes over the water hung,
And grasses nodded and rushes swung,
Just where the brook flowed out of the bog,
There lived a gouty and mean old frog,
Who'd sit all day in the mud and soak,
And do just nothing but croak and croak.

"Till a blackbird whistled, 'I say, you know,
What is the matter down there below?

Are you in sorrow, or pain, or what?"
The frog said: 'Mine is a gruesome lot!
Nothing but mud and dirt and slime,
For me to look at the livelong time.
'Tis a dismal world!' so he sadly spoke,
And voiced his woes in a mournful croak.

"But you're looking down,' the blackbird said.
'Look at the blossoms overhead;
Look at the lovely summer skies;
Look at the bees and butterflies—
Look up, old fellow! Why bless your soul,
You're looking down in a muskrat's hole!'
But still with his gurgling sob and choke,
The frog continued to croak and croak.

"And a wise old turtle who boarded near,
Said to the blackbird: 'Friend, see here:
Don't shed your tears over him, for he
Is wretched just 'cause he likes to be!
He's one of the kind who won't be glad;
It makes him happy to think he's sad.
I'll tell you something—and it's no joke—
Don't waste your pity on those who croak!'"

Striving for Fame

By FRANK FARRINGTON

IT IS very easy to attract attention. It is very easy to become notorious. To attract favorable attention and become noted is quite another thing.

Some people achieve notoriety through infamous or criminal conduct and at its best notoriety always comes from something that gives the public an unpleasant impression.

"To Be Seen of Men"

There is a position midway between the noted and the notorious. It might properly be called the conspicuous. Some years ago a natty young New Yorker with an itching for celebrity attained conspicuousness by a simple method. Every morning he went through the elevated train on which he regularly rode down town and bade each passenger "Good morning."

At first people were mildly surprised, but thought little of the act. Soon however they began to grow curious and to take notice and before long every regular traveler on that particular train knew the name of that young man and inquiring strangers were met with the remark, "What! Don't you know Jerry Hall?"

Usually the one who aims at becoming conspicuous is satisfied when he accomplishes that and he fails to make his conspicuousness stand for anything of value to himself. If a man sees a way in which he may obtain good advertising or make his individuality of value to him when impressed upon the public, then it may be worth while for him to try to become conspicuous, but conspicuousness verges on notoriety and it is rarely that the effort spent in acquiring it would not produce far greater results of a lasting nature if used in a different direction.

Tom Murray has been conspicuous but he made himself so in the way of advertising his business. His conspicuousness was an incident, not the main object of his campaign. It stands for something and has a money value.

The man who feels a desire for newspaper prominence may well curb his ambition and restrain his erratic impulses, remembering that prominence which comes quickly from doing something outlandish goes just as quickly and causes more amusement than respect for its subject.

The Right Kind of Publicity

The publicity given nowadays to men and events of small importance causes the bee of ambition to awaken in every man's brain a desire to be one of the people the newspapers talk about. It looks like so desirable a thing to have one's picture in the papers, to be spoken of in double leaded columns under a twenty-four point heading.

It is more than merely sensible for a man to avoid publicity which is useless or sensational; it is wise. The cheap newspaper notoriety or conspicuousness which is so easily obtained is of no more value or satisfaction than a bubble and lasts just as long.

Any man who is anxious to become a newspaper celebrity ought to make up his mind that the way to gain that position and make it worth gaining is to do his work the best he can, drawing attention to the excellence of the results, seeking fame for the work rather than for the worker, in order that he may be celebrated for something that will make an impression upon the minds of people who find out about him. One's position should be prominent on account of a substantial foundation built up carefully with infinite pains to a height above other men, rather than on account of a balloon-like ascent which will last only as long as the air remains hot.

What's the Hurry?

People want to get to the top early in life. Men want to be famous young. They fail to realize that few young men can accomplish in their paltry years that which will give them deserved fame. They strive and struggle for a chance to get into the spot light and finally find themselves conspicuous only as freaks or fools.

They are the fruit which, picked before arriving at maturity only dries up and is wasted. They might remain quietly hanging on the bough attracting no attention until arrived at the full ripeness of proper time but impatience, which is youth's un-failing attribute, will not allow it and a wizened, green nubbins is the only result.

One might almost as well try to put the green fruit back upon the tree as to push back into the limelight the star that has once failed.

There is rarely a second or third chance for a man who has tried the top and been found wanting. The only way to acquire fame and hold it is to wait until one has something with which to hold it. Boy wonders often become old men failures.

Apples picked green neither ripen to perfection themselves nor seed to produce other perfect fruit.

Fame is too elusive to be captured when sought. It is found only in the search for something really tangible.

Fame is incidental, not objective.

THE men who I have seen succeed in life have always been cheerful and hopeful men, who went about their business with a smile on their faces and took the changes and chances of this mortal life like men, facing rough and smooth alike as it came.

CHARLES KINGSLEY

The Finding of Happiness

I FOLLOWED happiness to make her mine,
Past towering oak and swinging ivy vine.
She fled, I chased, o'er slanting hill and dale,
O'er fields and meadows, in the purpling vale;
Pursuing rapidly o'er dashing stream,
I scaled the dizzy cliffs where eagles scream;
I traversed swiftly every land and sea,
But always happiness eluded me.

Exhausted, fainting, I pursued no more,
But sank to rest upon a barren shore.
One came and asked for food, and one for alms;
I placed the bread and gold in bony palms.
One came for sympathy, and one for rest;
I shared with every needy one my best;
When, lo! sweet Happiness, with form divine,
Stood by me, whispering softly, "I am thine."

BURLEIGH

Why Cones had the Nerve

OUT IN Denver, which is in the more or less perpendicular state of Colorado, there is a man by the name of Cones—H. C. Cones, to be exact. He owns two suburban department stores. His brother, J. M. Cones, owns another, making three in all. These three stores are run on the same plan, both brothers sharing in the planning of the work and the working of the plans. And the tripartite business is advertised as "Three Rules."

Now the reason for the odd name of these stores is the fact that the policy of the business has been crystallized into three rules. Here they are:

- "A Good Article."
- "A Moderate Profit."
- "One Cash Price."

I don't want to seem officious, but I should like to suggest to the Coneses that they make it four rules, and add this one: "Good Service."

They have a right to that rule, because they live up to it.

You may have noticed that these four rules make no extravagant claims. They don't suggest any odious comparisons by the use of superlatives. They don't waste any words. Evidently the Coneses think that it is better to do more than they promise than to promise more than they do.

But what I started out to tell you was about a nervy thing that these brothers did a short time ago.

Now "Three Rules" never advertise in the newspapers. That's a nervy thing in itself, but they have succeeded in spite of it. I suppose they know their business, but I can't help but think that they would have made a greater success if they had used newspaper space. But that is beside the point. They do advertise—by means of cards and posters. Here is the one I started to tell you about:

Honestly, Now,

the following proposition is not a joke. We are not trying to be funny. We were never more serious or sincere in our lives.

In a prominent place in our store we have placed a letter box which we hope you will use. If you have any suggestion for the betterment of our store, if we have ever displeased you, if you've ever been offended, if you have a "kick" of any kind on anything or anybody in our store we want to know it.

We want to please you.

We want this store to be your store.

We want to conduct it just the way you'd like to have it conducted.

In a growing business with the attendant hurry and flurry, little things sometimes creep into the management that don't belong there.

If we're doing something we should not do, we wish you'd tell us, for we might fail to please some of these new customers we're getting every day without knowing it.

Write on the back of this card, if you wish, or on the tablet by the box. Write your name and address plainly, for we wish to repay you for your favor by sending you a little souvenir. It's not expensive, of course, but something you'll not be ashamed of.

Of course, if you've no criticism, a compliment will do, for we are human and everybody likes to hear good of themselves. (Children's letters not answered.)

There you are—the bars are down. Every old grouch and sorehead in the district had a chance. Took nerve, didn't it?

But the results showed why Cones had the nerve. Here is what the stores themselves had to say about the nature of the replies:

You've Simply Got to Admit that if you had conducted a business for seven years—and had put up a criticism box in your store—and had hundreds of letters commending your methods, and fifty odd people had said they had traded with you since your store was opened and never found an article misrepresented—you'd be mighty proud of that reputation, wouldn't you?

Of course you would.

We have those letters and we keep 'em in the safe.

Would we be fool enough to spoil that reputation with a single false claim?

Of course not. We'd be cutting our throat in a business way. That's why hundreds of people who get this card will absolutely know we are selling skirts that are worth from $10 to $18 for $6.95.

The rest of the card is just good advertising of the specials of the day.

Eight thousand of these cards were distributed in the three stores. Considerably more than two thousand replies were received.

Mr. J. M. Cones, who wrote the cards, also writes a personal letter to every one who has sent in a reply to his card, taking pains to refer to some remark in the reply, so that the recipient of the letter will know that it was dictated especially to her—or him.

"What was the use of it all?" I asked Mr. Cones. "Did it repay the expenditure for cards, souvenirs, time, stationery, and postage?"

"It did pay," was his emphatic reply. "The results were even greater than we expected. It has brought us into closer touch with our customers, given us the names and addresses of the best of them, and greatly increased their confidence in us. They feel more at home in our stores—feel that they know the management personally, which is a great thing in any business."

Then I found that H. C. Cones had started in twenty years ago with a little room twelve feet wide and thirty feet long, five hundred dollars in merchandise, and some fixtures made in the back yard with a saw and a hammer. Now he and his brother have the three department stores, "Three Rules."

When I asked J. M. Cones to what he attributed the remarkable growth of the business, he said, "There is nothing remarkable about it. It is the just and only possible result of years of hard mental and physical labor."

Same old story! No matter where you seek for the road to the pot of gold at the foot of the rainbow, you find that it is long, hard, rugged, steep, and difficult.

Newmort's Luck

ONCE IN a while some big, hulking fellow gets under my guard and puts up a hard luck story that would bring a lump into your throat as big as a bale of straw—if you took it at its face value. Says that he never had a chance to make good at anything because his father didn't have money enough to send him through college.

But I remember that Fra Elbertus has wisely informed us that people who will tell hard luck stories will have hard luck stories to tell. And then I remember the luck of my old team mate, Newmort, one of the best quarter-backs that ever called signals on the Belawpon gridiron.

"Mort," as we used to call him, showed up at college in about as destitute a condition as any Weary Wilhelm I ever saw. His only assets were, youth, health, a few nondescript clothes, an angelic smile, and courage enough for a regiment.

The rest is an old, old story—and yet it is ever new. And though it has been told so many times, there are thousands of people who don't seem to have heard it—or else they don't believe it.

"Mort" registered somewhere so far down the college ladder that he had to reach up to touch bottom—junior prep, or something like that. He told the treasurer that he would have to take a little time in paying his term bills, because he had to go to work and earn the money. The treasurer was a good sport himself—besides he liked the cut of "Mort's" jaw, so he told him to lose no sleep over the accounts.

"Mort" sawed wood, made gardens, shoveled snow, waited on tables, took care of furnaces, beat carpets, scrubbed hallways and recitation rooms, dug in the ditch, and did whatever work came to his hands to do. Besides this, he carried more than the regular schedule of studies and won good marks.

Of course all this has been done before by thousands of ambitious young men—is being done now by thousands. But I'm telling it just to show that it can be done—that no young man who has taken care of his health and has no one immediately dependent upon him for support, need go without an education—or a college education, if you will have it that way. To my mind, it is possible for a man to get an education even in college.

Getting a Real Education

But let me tell you some more of Newmort's "luck." Early in his college course he decided that he would make physical science his specialty—his major, as they call it on the campus. Likewise, he made up his mind that physics was about as useful as a snow-shovel in the jungle unless it was made to earn profits. So, thereafter, he earned his way by the practical application of his major science. In other words, while he was working out the theory of the thing in the physical laboratory, he was working out the practice of it at electrical and mechanical jobs.

He learned to string wires, hang bells, install telephones, put in electric lights, run steam and gasoline engines, repair all kinds of machinery, build automobiles, repair pipe organs, survey streets, sidewalks, drains, and property lines; and do many other things that made practical use of what he learned in college.

The result was that before his graduation he was in demand as consulting engineer on many problems, and earned more than enough money to pay all his school expenses. Another result was that he left college with his reputation as a practical engineer established, instead of having to begin at the bottom as most college men do.

Newmort's "luck" followed him after he received his sheepskin and was shown politely out of the front door of the college. He was sought after by many who knew his record. A wide range of positions were open to him—positions as engineer, as salesman, as partner in a business, and as a teacher of physical science. Being a bit of an idealist, despite the intensely practical turn of his mind, he elected to teach. And, as a teacher, his rise has been rapid—first an instructor, then professor and assistant principal, and then, within a very few years after his graduation, at the head of a large and growing school.

"Mort" has stamped his personality on that school, made it a power in practical education, increased its enrolment, and raised high the standard of work done. Some big colleges have been after him and tried to get him away from his school, but the trustees would not let him go, putting the jackscrews under his salary as need required, in order to keep him. "Newmort is the school," they say.

The Education of the Unlucky

In my travels around the country I meet thousands of young men, old men, and middle aged men. Some of them I have been watching for years.

I have seen young men in the trains and at hotels either sitting looking aimlessly about, reading—it's a desecration of the word—trifles lighter than air, spending hours upon hours, night after night, playing cards, dissipating their mental powers in idle gossip—or worse—and coarse "wit," and poisoning their bodies and brains with alcohol and nicotine.

I have seen these same young men, when middle aged, struggling hopelessly along, doing mediocre work, often out of a job, and complaining of their "luck." They never had a chance to get an education, they say, therefore they can't take the positions decked with salaries written in four figures.

I have seen young men sent to college by their indulgent parents, and supplied with plenty of money for what Elbert Hubbard calls "crams, exams, frats, spats, chips, chippees, Yale mixtures, Harvard beers, fears, tears, bromide, cubebs, yells, carcens, duels, bull dogs, and bull fights." We used to think, sometimes, that they were in great luck not to have to work their way through. But those who did work their way through seem to have had the best luck since graduation.

I have seen young fellows making good pay go about in patched clothing, with their feet actually through the soles of their shoes, "baching" in tiny hall bedrooms that they might spend their money for books and instruments and correspondence courses. I have seen these same young men, when middle-aged, captains of industry and envied by the cigar-store lounge for their "luck."

I have seen sons of rich parents spurning all the advantages of wealth, determined to make their own way and win on their own merits. This is perhaps the hardest path of all, but it is also a "lucky" one.

And so, it seems to me to be a case of "you pay your money and take your choice."

When Newmort was in college, there were scores of young men in the school and in the town at the foot of the hill who wore good clothing, attended all the dances and theaters, hired livery rigs and took their girls over to the lake, made occasional Bacchanalian trips to "the city," and had a good time generally. "Mort" would have enjoyed some of these pleasures just as much as they did. Sometimes the lure grew almost more than he could bear. But he stuck to his bargain, and when the bunch went off in their rejoicing textiles to some place of crowds, lights, and music, Newmort would be dressed in greasy overalls, whistling merrily while he committed surgery upon a sick gas engine down in some dark basement.

The event shows that these gay lads had their good times first and are paying for them afterward, while "Mort" paid for his good times first, and is having them afterward. And his good times are more satisfying, more enjoyed by those around him, and last much longer than theirs.

The Ethics of Being Cheerful

By Ray C. Rose

CCHEERFULNESS that comes of culture, and after understanding, is the highest mark of courage. It is as dominant and inspiring as the Victoria cross on the scarred breast of a veteran. Do you remember the God-loving and man-pitying cheerfulness of the old Bishop in "Les Misérables?"

Anyone not sodden in selfishness can give and be gay in the fair weather of health and success; but the cheerfulness that sits like a halo and shields like an ironclad is manifest when we can think helpfully of others and encourage the depressed while suffering clamors at our own hearts.

The grace to face disaster with a smile of hope and a front of determination is what makes the man.

No life need be blighted by misfortune. Blight comes because we let affliction serve as an axis on which we whirl ourselves into a bewildered helplessness of woe.

If we appreciate fully that loss of money, health or station, ambition unfulfilled—all are superficial ills, and that the self within is unimpaired; that trial must pass away as all else passes away, then may we cultivate the inward calm that manifests in outward cheer.

Cheerfulness is a matter of conscientious and faithful effort in everything that makes for true happiness or success. The first essential of cheerfulness is restraint. To restrain the impulse toward gloom and despair is to produce the reverse tendency. The man without cheer carries his disappointments with him. He suggests incompetency to whom he may approach. If he tries to sell anything his bargain is sicklied o'er with the self-suspicion that shows in lack of cheer.

To cultivate cheerfulness is impossible except by a careful process of elimination, such as forgetting your troubles. Telling your woes is making them concrete. Don't saddle yourself with incubi.

First and finally, to be helpful is to be cheerful. Helpfulness is reflex in its action. Strive to cheer and you will be cheered. Your digestion will improve. Your prospects will emulate your digestion. Success cometh after.

I sat upon the adamant
And chaos reigned abroad;
The dawn broke through the turgid dusk,
And Day, unfolding like a husk,
Revealed the Cheer of God.

"His mind was so clear, his temper was so sweet, his standards of conduct were so high, that if any man had trouble with Baldwin, the presumption was that the other man was wrong."—An estimate of the late William H. Baldwin, Jr.—Worth while?

"I have known sixteen-hour wives of eight-hour men."—Graham Taylor.

The PHILOSOPHER AMONG HIS BOOKS

A great book is alive. Cut it anywhere and it will bleed. You cannot tell me that bugs and worms which crawl on people and make them jump have life and that books which move and fire the hearts of men to noble aspiration, to heroic duty, are without life.—Charles Reynolds Brown.

THE YOUNG MAN'S AFFAIRS—By Charles Reynolds Brown. Thomas Y. Crowell & Company, New York.*

The author of this book is a master of rectilinear English. And it is a good thing that he is, because he has some pretty straightforward things to say. The processes of his mind are singularly clear and pellucid, and the products of it are of the same convincing quality. His words are short and all in common use, his sentences brief and compact, and his style direct and free from cant or verbiage.

So much for the way he puts his ideas. Now as to the ideas themselves. They are concerned with the main purpose, the intimates, the books, the money, the recreations, the wife, and the church of the young man. On all of these subjects, Mr. Brown is intensely practical, shows a broad knowledge of life as it is lived today, an optimistic and hopeful philosophy, and a grasp of spiritual realities. The book grips the reader from the very first, compels his agreement to the author's conclusions by easy but sound logic, lights the way with gleams of wit and humor, and ends each chapter with a sincere seriousness that leaves the reader on a plane of thought favorable to high resolve.

Young men will make no mistake in studying this book. Their parents, teachers, and friends will be glad to place it in their hands.

LETTERS FROM A BASEBALL FAN TO HIS SON—By S. Dewitt Clough. Cartoons by C. A. Briggs. Pen Sketches by Richard Sigmund. The Backbone Publishing Company, Ravenswood, Chicago.*

A young chap is off at the University trying to make the 'Varsity nine. His daffy daddy, a former pitcher with the old-time "Invincibles," writes to him letters of warning, advice, and congratulation. This is how the book is supposed to have happened.

The old man has a lot of good common sense, along with a fine accumulation of base ball sense, and he writes both kinds to his son in base ball vernacular. Therein is the value of the book.

The son makes the team all right—as pitcher, too—and is the star in winning the championship. Then his father writes him that he is expected to come home and spend the summer putting some of his championship enthusiasm and determination into "the business."

The book will interest, amuse, and instruct. The cartoons and pen sketches are right over the plate. But why, oh why, Mr. Clough, did you have it printed on heavy score cards and tied tight together with a bit of red tape? I got cramps in all my fingers trying to hold it open while I read it.

THE CALIFORNIA BIRTHDAY BOOK—Prose and Poetical Selections from the Writings of Living California Authors, with a Brief Biographical Sketch of Each. Edited and Arranged, with an Introduction, by George Wharton James. Arroyo Guild Press, Los Angeles, California.*

I have often wondered which was most prolific in writers, California or Indiana. Here in this birthday book are quotations from about one hundred and twenty-five writers—all more or less Californians. And they are all writers who have succeeded in the world of letters, some of them being of the highest fame. I think, however, we may have to revise George Ade's witticism about Indiana when we apply it to the Golden State. You remember that some admirer of Ade's said to him, on being told that the humorist was a Hoosier, "Lots of smart people come from Indiana." Ade's reply was, "Yes; and the smarter they are, the quicker they come."

Lots of smart people go to California, and the smarter they are the quicker they go. Anyhow, out of the whole list, only twenty-one give California as their birthplace. From the quotations given, however, I take it that most of them are sorry that they were not born in their native state.

Many of the excerpts, as indicated in the foregoing facetious remark of mine, are descriptive of or apostrophising the beauties and glories of the Sunset State. I don't see how anyone can read them and not begin to plan on joining the favored folks on the Coast. To tell the truth, I'd like to go there myself.

The book is prettily printed and bound in boards in an artistic cloud effect. The right hand pages are blank except for the dates that guide your friends in writing down their names to show what day of the year they were born.

MENTAL AND SPIRITUAL HEALTH—By A. T. Schofield, M. D. R. F. Fenn & Company, 18 East Seventeenth Street, New York.

The author speaks in beautiful strain of that calmness and perfect peace, under all circumstances, which comes from resting in the personal knowledge of and communion with God. The basis of the work is orthodox Christianity, which the writer defends manfully in his opening address of the four of which the book is a report. These addresses are given from the standpoint of a physician who has found "psychologically that some varieties of nervous disease were wholly inexplicable without the understanding of the fact and powers of the unconscious mind"; and "theologically, that one great factor in ill-health of mind, nerves, and also body, was internal discord, the result of lack of peace of conscience or heart in spiritual matters, and what wonderful results ensued when the soul was really in touch with the Infinite."

THE SHOW GIRL—By Max Pemberton. The John C. Winston Company. $1.50.

Let a man fall in love with a woman and marry her and, says the cynic, nine times out of ten that will be the end of romance. But make a man fall deeply in love with a woman and have her slip out of his life and he will move heaven and earth to find her. Then, after he has found her and has enjoyed wedlock for a few weeks, have her stolen from him under heart-breaking circumstances and one needs no great imagination to see what the grieved husband will do in pursuing his search. Mix into this a duel, a murder, a description of low and high Parisian life, a hypocritical preacher, a jolly young Irishman, a married woman who loves an unmarried young man, a possible loss of a great fortune, and there you have a few of the elements which make up a story from which one cannot escape. The tale is told delightfully in a series of letters.

THE GOOSE GIRL—By Harold McGrath. Bobbs-Merrill, Indianapolis. $1.50.

When the young American consul fell in love with the Princess Hildegard of Ehrenstein it most certainly was a very foolish thing to do. An American may love a princess and a princess may love an American. But in Europe, where royal marriages are only political arrangements which use men and women as puppets, a marriage for love is something that scarcely ever happens. Then there is a goose girl who is almost too angelic to be true. She loves and is loved by a vintner. The prime minister of Ehrenstein has arranged for the marriage of the King of Jugundheit. Neither the princess nor the prince had ever met. Besides, the king was a young man who had visited his kingdom only twice in fifteen years, and at the time of the arrangement he was said to be on a hunting expedition. It also appears that the little princess of Ehrenstein had been abducted and a sixteen-year search had been kept up. She had been found in a music hall in Dresden and had been brought back and given her royal place. Mr. McGrath has a merry time moving these puppets around so that the vintner turns out to be the king, the goose girl the real princess, the princess the daughter of the prime minister. Of course all ends happily, only the prime minister suffering disgrace for substituting his daughter for the princess. Of course the princess was innocent and was mighty glad to come to America with the man she loved.

A very learned English jurist, Judge Rentoul, in the course of an address at a London club, said that in his opinion there were fourteen common errors in life and these were:

To attempt to set up our own standard of right and wrong and expect everybody to conform to it;

To try to measure the enjoyment of others by our own;

To expect uniformity of opinion in this world;

To look for judgment and experience in youth;

To endeavor to mold all dispositions alike;

Not to yield in unimportant trifles;

To look for perfection in our own actions;

To worry ourselves and others about what cannot be remedied;

Not to alleviate if we can all that needs alleviation;

Not to make allowances for the weaknesses of others;

To consider anything impossible that we cannot ourselves perform;

To believe only what our finite minds can grasp;

To live as if the moment, the time, the day were so important that it would live forever; and

To estimate people by some outside quality, for it is that within which makes the man.

—Today's Magazine.

Loyalty, Faith and Truth,
O'er us your scepter
Wield;
Negligence and Indifference
Ever to your influence Yield.—John C. Donahue.

"The Universe is all good, at least good in the making; good striving on toward perfection."—Simonds.

30 Editions Since Publication

It is Only Once in a Decade, not Oftener, that a Really Great Book is Written—this is One

We want you to read Jules Payot's "EDUCATION OF THE WILL," because it is a great book. No matter what your present position in life may be, this book will help you to greater achievement—greater success.

If after reading "The Education of the Will" you tell us that you have not been benefited, have not been inspired to higher, nobler thoughts, have not been clearly directed to a better standard of life, *send the book back to us and we will refund the purchase price paid by you.

The author, one of the foremost educators of France, proves that character is not wholly a matter of birth or heredity, but that through the education of the will, character can be formed and developed to the highest degree.

All that is necessary is that one possesses the desire for mental superiority.

No matter how richly endowed you may be mentally you can only go as far as your will will carry you.

If you follow the suggestions in this book you can secure mastery of your will, and that means not only spiritual but worldly supremacy, because your will is the force that drives and directs your faculties; the higher its development, the more profitably you may capitalize your talents.

While the author's thesis is based upon the soundest laws of psychology, the book is written in plain, frank language, unclouded by abstruse scientific terms, and it is easily understood by the ordinary reader.

Every father and mother should insist that their children, from seventeen years of age upward, read this book not only once but several times.

CAUTION—Be sure that it is Payot's book that you buy as there is another book with the same title, but which has no relation to this.

THE EDUCATION OF THE WILL, by Jules Payot, Litt. D., Ph. D., translated from the French by Smith Ely Jelliffe, M. D., Professor Clinical Psychiatry, Fordham University, New York, 12mo, cloth, 450 pages, $1.50; post-paid, $1.60.

Sheldon University Press
Area P. O., Rockefeller, Illinois

SUCCESS-POWERS

FOR YOU IN

"Power of Will" tells you

The Law of Great Thinking.
The Four Factors on which great thinking depends.
How to develop analytical power.
How to think "all around" any subject.
How to throw the mind into deliberate, controlled, productive thinking.
Detailed directions for Perfect Mind Concentration.
How to acquire the power of Consecutive Thinking, Reasoning, Analysis.
How to make any topic yield ideas, instructions, material, for essays, speeches, compositions, descriptions.
How to acquire the skill of Creative Writing.
How to guard against errors in Thought.
How to make the Will supreme in the Mental Realm.
How to drive from the mind all unwelcome thoughts.
How to follow any line of thought with keen, concentrated power.
How to develop Reasoning Power.
How to handle the mind in Creative Thinking.
The secret of Building Mind Power.
How the Will is made to act.
How to test your Will.
How a Strong Will is Master of Body.
What creates Human Power.
The Six Principles of Will-training.
Definite Methods for developing Will.
The Seven Ways that Moral development builds Will-Power.
How to develop to a high degree the Mental Moods of Interest, Feeling, Energy, Permission, Decision, Continuity, Understanding, Reason.
The Six Crown Principles for multiplying Will-Power.
The NINETY-NINE STAR METHODS for using Will-Power in the Conduct of Life.
The Seven Great Principles of drill in Mental, Physical, Personal power.
The FIFTY-ONE MAXIMS for Applied power of Perception, Memory, Imagination, Self Analysis, Control.
How to make the Eye a great power in Influence and Observation.
How to develop a strong keen gaze.
How to make the Eye yield values in Mind-Power.
How to concentrate the eye upon what is before you—object, person, printed page, work.
How to school the eye for power in business, society, public.
How to force Will into the eye.
How to cultivate a bright, attracting, intelligent eye expression.
How to become aware of Nerve Action.
How to keep the body well-poised.
How to open the Mind and Body for reception of incoming power.
How to exercise the nerves.
How to throw off the mood of Worry.
Affirmation of Supreme Well-being.
How to overcome the tyranny of the Nervous system.
How to secure steady nerves.
How to keep the body quiet, controlled conserved in power, eliminating all nerve-force destroying habits.
How to train the great executive servant of the Mind—the Hand.
How to maintain the Central Factors of Body health.
The First, Second and Third difficulties in Mastering Harmful Habits.
The Law of Will-Power in Habits.
The Mental Law of Habit Cure.

"POWER OF WILL"

By FRANK CHANNING HADDOCK, Ph. D.

This great Training-System builds

Power of MIND WILL CULTURE
MAGNETISM INTELLECT INFLUENCE
LEADERSHIP MASTERY FINANCIAL ABILITY

Makes Masterful Men and Queenly Women.

Contains a vast amount of Direct Personal Instruction. Its hundreds of fascinating pages are crowded with the diamond-value discoveries of 18 years research by a keen scholar-philosopher-scientist. It tells in clear, pointed, easily understood language exactly what to do and HOW TO DO THAT for multiplied Success-Powers. Its instructions will make you a leader in any Business, Art, Profession, Society. Claimed by authorities "the most searching study of psycho-physical man in print." Read the very brief analysis given here and answer: "Can I afford to be without this lifetime Manual and Guide to Business, Financial, Personal, Social Success?"

Price $3.00 Postpaid.

A noble volume, 400 pages, gilt top, choice paper and printing, 28 chaps, 30 original power poems. Superbly bound in royal purple rib-silk, size 6x9. "Edition Royale" now ready. Delivered anywhere on earth. Order your copy at once.

So extremely good that I will buy the book back from anyone who will part with it inside five days from receipt.

Descriptive booklet "SECRETS OF SUCCESS" mailed to anyone not already convinced of the NECESSITY of owning this Peerless Guidebook.

Tear this page out, write your name and address on the bottom, enclose remittance and mail immediately to

Albert Lewis Pelton,

Associate Manager: POWER-BOOK LIBRARY,

Berthens, Conn., U. S. A.

"Power of Will" teaches you

The Seven Laws for ridding yourself of Profane Speaking.
The Fifteen Star Methods for mastering Anger and Irritability.
What the Psycho-Physical cause of the Drink Habit is.
Nine long demonstrated regimes for mastering this curse (Rare Value).
How to overcome embarrassing Hesitation of Speech.
How to develop a direct, forceful, effective style of talking in business, society, anywhere.
How to eliminate Mind-wandering.
How to hold the mind closely upon any desired line of thought.
How to speak tersely, emphatically, and think ahead for best expression.
How to school yourself against Thoughtlessness.
How to overcome Indecision.
How to develop abundance of Thought.
The Principles of Memory.
How to throw Attention and Energy into Memory culture.
The Psychological Principles for memorizing words, sentences, anything.
The Inner Law of Memory.
The Star Method for remembering the substance of any book.
How to plan ahead in your career through the great Pioneer Power—IMAGINATION.
How to plan conduct so as to avoid former mistakes of Thought, Action.
How to make the imagination fill the mind with Life, Action, Energy, Beauty, scenes of Pleasure, Profit.
How to work the Imagination for discovery and invention.
How to improve mechanical devices.
How to create and build new devices.
How to make Imagination create for Literary Ability.
How to make Imagination suggest improvements in business, the home, your environment, conduct.
How to look into the Workshop of the Mind—and give ideas and thoughts Practical Creation.
How to cure diseased Imagination.
How to banish unhealthy mind states.
How to banish fear of Men, Ill Luck, Death, Hell, Misfortune.
How to arrive at best decisions.
How to use the power of deliberation.
What Francis Bacon said you must do to work (influence) any man.
The First Principle for success in contact with others.
The Mental Attitude you must hold to impress people.
The Secret of Control of Others.
How permanent Influence over others is secured.
The Best Rule in the Control of Others.
The FIFTY-FOUR MASTER RULES in the control of others.
The chief difficulty of Public Speaking.
How to use the Skill-Art of Influence before any audience.
How to acquire Thought, Develop Language, Exercise Expression.
How to be instructive, impressive, pointed, effective, clear.
How to overcome stage fright and embarrassment.
How to secure poise, power, persuasive ability.
How to handle eyes, voice, body.
How to deeply impress the audience.
A scientific treatise with hundreds of rules for training the child's will.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

THE NEW MEMBER OF THE POWER-BOOK LIBRARY
"BUSINESS POWER"

The Master Builder of Financial Ability and Commanding Business Personality

A practical analysis and instruction book in the underground factors of present-day fortune building, with actual directions for those who seek commercial chieftainship.

By FRANK CHANNING HADDOCK

*Author of "Power of Will," "Power for Success"
"Culture of Courage," etc.*

Here comes first announcement of the greatest—understand—the Greatest book on business power and success ever formulated. Nothing like it in literature. The general remark will be, "Where on earth did this author find so vast a mine of ready-to-use knowledge?" It is not a story of others' successes, it is an encyclopedia of rare, scientific rules, methods and result-producing plans for every successful business man, for the leaders in money-making, for those who are big men—or wish to be. Here is a very brief idea of contents:

Brilliant Methods for developing Personal Business Power.

The Fourteen Great Laws of Business Power.

How to Blend Business Functions.

Master Methods of Planning Business Action.

Specialized Directions (many pages devoted to each) for Canvassing Agent, Jobber, Broker, Real Estate Man, Merchant, Advertiser, Miscellaneous, The Man in "High Finance." Into this division alone is crowded more substance of the "how and what to do" than many ordinary volumes contain.

Superb MASTER REGIMES for Handling Immense Business Activities.

How the Underground Mind Grows and Acts.

How to Acquire Courage—Confidence.

How to Handle, Attack, and Maintain of Business Conduct.

How to Apply Various Phases of Business Action.

How to Unfold Magnetic Business Power.

How to have Physical Attractiveness for Business.

How to be Resourceful in Ideas.

How to Adjust to all Classes of People, avoid clash, have attractive manners, be Genuine and Self-Controlled.

The Great Hand of Power: Diagram showing where the powers are placed and applied.

How to know Human Nature.

Golden Laws of Business Adjustment.

Unique System of Psychic Bookkeeping. How to accurately gauge the credits and debits of your Personal Powers; to take your measure.

Ten Diamond Rules of Self-Power.

Ten Subjective Brilliances; including Personal Style, Business Language, Character, Self-mastery, The Front of Business, etc.

Ten Rubies of Success.

How to Increase Income on a solid, natural-law basis.

What the Great Economic Laws of Business are.

The Wheel of Power with Diagram.

Wealth.

Marginal Utilities: the basis of all profitable business.

How to acquire Leadership from this knowledge. The Origin of Initiative: the greatest of achieving qualities.

Groups of Initiative Combinations.

How to Climb by Initiative.

Initiative and Success.

Use and Development of Initiative.

Brilliant Lessons on Business Mentality.

How to Acquire Powerful Attention.

How to build the Mental Prism of Concentration.

How to cure Mind-Wandering: Scatteration.

The Pyramid of Business Concentration.

How great Mind Ability for Business is created and handled.

How to Develop Commercial Memory.

How to Assimilate what you wish to remember.

What the Basis and Control of Mental Processes is. Memory and the Brain Cells.

Inhibition.

Three Jewel Laws of Memory.

Diagram of Memory Processes.

PRICE
$3.20
POSTPAID

Size, 6 x 9 inches, rich purple binding, with designs stamped in gold; 600 pages, gilt tops. Uniform with "Power of Will" (see opp. page). Both books sent prepaid for $6.00.

You are one of the 50,000 readers of "Business Philosopher" who have hunted and waited for this volume. It is brand new, in a virgin field never before entered; and mark this—it will be the big thing in business literature for years to come. No other magazine will offer this book before September. The Sheldon people think mighty well of the Power-Books (because they have them). Get the new book at once. If you don't see $1,000 in value for each dollar you paid—in short, Book Back—Money Back.

ALBERT LEWIS PELTON, Publisher
The Power-Book Library • MERIDEN, CONNECTICUT

YOUR SUMMER HOME

OF COURSE you want to own a summer home. There is something in you that calls for woods, meadows, cool waters, and broad, comfortable porches, when summer comes and brick walls and paving stones shimmer and quiver with the heat. You need rest and relaxation.

You may have to be in the city on business during the day. But you are refreshed and renewed by the evenings and the week-ends at your summer home.

And it makes you glad to know that wife and babies are away from the glare, the blare, and the dust, getting strong and rosy at your summer home.

No, this is not a millionaire's dream. That summer home is within your reach. And, if your business is in Chicago, it is only an hour's run from that city—you can come out every night. If further away, you can come Friday or Saturday and stay until Monday.

For your summer home, I have just opened a new sub-division on the shores of Lake Eara—the most beautiful of all the famous lakes of Northern Illinois. It is only thirty-five miles from Chicago—three railways run from it into the city.

There are a limited number of lots, all at reasonable prices—first come, first served. When you buy a lot, you buy fishing, swimming, and boating privileges on Lake Eara. There is no lake property so near Chicago at anything like the price.

My primary object in opening this sub-division is to finance the first building of Sheldon Commercial University.

I want these summer homes, as far as possible to be owned by Sheldon Graduates or those in sympathy with A R E A philosophy.

*Write me today, saying you are interested,
and I will tell you all about it*

A. F. SHELDON
LIBERTYVILLE, ILLINOIS

The Other Side

"The House That Has a Hoover is a Home"

THERE are two sides to the question of economy.

As a business man, you have studied Business Economy—perhaps reduced it to an exact science.

But haven't you overlooked or neglected the other side of the question, that equally important side, Household Economy?

Figure up what it costs you annually to keep your home clean. Add to the amounts paid to cleaners and renovators the wages of extra servants to come in and clean once a week or so. Consider the loss through breakage and wear and tear; and don't overlook your wife's doctor's bills, traceable to the strain and overwork.

As against this, put down $125 for a Hoover Sweeper, which will do all your cleaning for twenty-five years. Add from $2 to $3 for the annual cost of electric current to run it, and you have the entire expense. There will be no "extras" to crop out from time to time.

HOOVER
ELECTRIC
TRADE MARK
SUCTION SWEEPER

Is not a "suction alone" device. It combines Vibration and Brushing with Suction, affording the only thoroughly practical and effective cleaning principle.

It is strong, durable, efficient, convenient, the only machine a woman can and will use for every day cleaning.

Only a moment is required to put it into operation, and the lightest touch will move it.

Hose and nozzle attachments for every sort of cleaning are included in the equipment.

The Hoover Suction Sweeper Co.
NEW BERLIN, OHIO

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

GET TOGETHER PAGE

In this page our subscribers will have the free use of a four line space for one insertion. In this space they may advertise themselves for sale or may advertise for the services of some one else. Others—not subscribers to THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER—will be obliged to pay 25 cents per line for classified ads. In sending in your ads you should figure seven words to the line so that there will be no trouble over the insertion.

ONE OF THE LEADING OLD LINE LIFE INSURANCE companies, issuing exceptionally attractive policies, will grant liberal contracts as agency managers to two or three men having records as producers, in the states of Missouri and Illinois. Address Dept. 108, Business Philosopher.

THE MIDLAND MUTUAL LIFE OF COLUMBUS, Ohio, operates exclusively in Ohio. Good territory and good contracts await the successful producer. The most attractive literature and policy forms to be found anywhere bear the imprint of "The Midland." Address B. F. Reinmund, Secretary, Columbus, Ohio. (F.)

WANTED—SALESMEN WITH RED BLOOD AND determination to sell the Commercial Account Register and Duplicating Books. Territory guaranteed. References and bond required. Commercial Register Company, Buffalo, N. Y.

WANTED TO BUY A LINE OF MEN'S SUITS TO retail at $5.00, shoes $2.00, hats $1.50, shirts 50c, neckwear 10c, hose 10c, underwear 25c, suspenders 10c, cuffbuttons 10c, collars 10c. W. S. Fornes, Market and Eighth Sts., Canton, O. F

REPRESENTATIVE WANTED—WE WANT A man with ability and ambition to represent us in Chicago. Must have good reference. Write us at once. Trade Mark Title Co., Ft. Wayne, Ind.

WANTED—POSITION AS ASSISTANT BUYER with reliable wholesale or manufacturing concern, age 33, 11 years' business experience, graduate of Commercial School and S. S. of S. S. Best reference. Chas. C. Bryan, 642 N. Elm St., Muncie, Ind. F

SALESMEN WANTED—IF YOU ARE A CLERK with natural qualifications as a salesman, I have an exceptional opportunity to offer you. If you are a merchant going out of business and looking for an opportunity to go on the road, my proposition will appeal to you. I want two or three capable men with the work habit, and who have energy plus. I want men with ability to sell goods all day long. I require references, also send an abstract of your qualifications. I have an advertising specialty proposition that interests all progressive retailers. Hundreds of the best retailers have endorsed my plan because they have found it profitable. Samples will go in coat pocket. My best salesmen are making from $500 to $1,000 a month. I want men who can do just as well or better. If you are of the right caliber, think you can handle a high-class, ready selling proposition, write me immediately before all territory is assigned. W. F. Main, Dept. 117, Iowa City, Iowa.

WANTED—AGENTS TO TAKE SUBSCRIPTIONS to THE BACKBONE MONTHLY—"a serum against softening of the moral spine"—a magazine so different, both editorially and typographically. Show a sample copy and there's a sale on the spot. Agents are making money with THE BACKBONE MONTHLY. Come on in! Sample copies, terms and blanks on request. The Backbone Society, 144 Fox St., Aurora, Illinois.

START AN EASY AND LUCRATIVE BUSINESS. We teach you how to establish a successful collection business and refer business to you. No capital required. Little competition. Rare opportunities. Write for Free Pointers today. American Collection Service, 165 State St., Detroit, Mich.

Are You Going

from Toronto or any other Ontario point

to spend the two weeks' vacation from July 27 to August 9 at Sheldonhurst, near Libertyville, Illinois, at

The Sheldon Summer School?

Then join the happy crowd of good and pleasant people who will leave Toronto at four o'clock on the afternoon of Tuesday, July 26th, by the

Canadian Pacific Railway

That way you will get the best accommodations, the most pleasant traveling companions, and special rates. If you want further particulars about the train or the School, or if you want to know about those special rates, write at once to

Milton Bergey

12 Richmond Street, East Toronto

Phone Main 7319

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Improved 1906 Edition, 160 Pages, 6½x3½ Inches

ROPP'S New Commercial Calculator & Short-Cut Arithmetic

Is from beginning to end a greatly improved, enlarged and thoroughly revised publication. It contains an entirely new system of unique Tables, Short-Cuts and up-to-date Methods. It is unquestionably the most complete, useful and comprehensive Calculator ever published. It has more than twice the matter, scope and capacity of Ropp's former editions, of which

Nearly 1,500,000 Copies Have Been Sold

It is the most convenient and practical Labor-saving work ever used in the business world. It will make every one independent, sure and self-reliant in all practical calculations. It will prevent mistakes, relieve the mind, save time and labor, and often loss and trouble. Its Tables are adapted to all the trades and occupations in the city and country, and Show the Answer as Quickly as a Watch Shows the Time.

It also explains and simplifies the principles of Arithmetic, Mechanics and Mensuration.

It will make the study and use of Figures easy and interesting for young and old.

It will enable every progressive mind to become an expert, sure and rapid calculator.

It will prove a boon to all whose education in arithmetic has been limited or neglected.

Its 48 new cuts clearly illustrate the elements of Mechanics and Mensuration.

It defines about 70 points in "Commercial Law" which every man and woman should know.

It is the result of devising, and improving system after system; of spending thousands of dollars in experimenting; of making millions of miscellaneous calculations, and of doing some vigorous thinking during 38 years, by an analytic, practical and preserving mind.

It is especially designed for Farmers, Mechanics, Business and Professional Men, Bankers, Manufacturers and Dealers in Grain, Stock, Cotton, Coal, Lumber, Produce, etc.

OFFICE EDITION—9½ x 5¼ inches—Cloth binding, gold stamp, large type.....$1.00

POCKET EDITION—6½ x 3¾ inches—Cloth, with pocket, flap and silicate slate..... .50

Leather, with pocket, flap and silicate slate, gilt edge..... 1.00

VEST POCKET EDITION—5¼ x 2¾ inches—Cloth, round corners, red edges..... .35

Leather, gold stamp, burnished edges..... .50

*The Standard for Store, Farm,
Bank or Factory*

Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Ill.

The author speaks from first hand of the decade in which Chicago reached the maturity of its first growth—Chicago Daily News

Bygone Days in Chicago

By FREDERICK F. COOK

THE COURT HOUSE, CHICAGO, IN 1860

THE WORLD is interested in Chicago, and there is no one who will not be interested in this, the most fascinating and informing book ever published dealing with the early life of Chicago. The prominent part that the city took in war preparations; the picturesque incidents and personalities of war-time days; the life of the "Under-world," then graced by a type of gambler which has disappeared forever, and a hundred and one vivid stories of the "Garden City," are here presented in a fresh and vigorous style by an old newspaper reporter, who writes for the most part from intimate personal observation.

Mr. Cook's pen pictures of the down-town life of the '60's are much more dramatically picturesque than the hectic survival of the same element that exists in the down-town life of today.—Chicago Journal

Illustrated from rare prints and photographs. 8vo, $2.75 net

Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Ill.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

THE VERY LATEST THING IN DUPLICATORS

"CANTYPE" SPRING-FRAME DUPLICATOR

1000 Perfect Reproductions per Hour of Hand-writing; Typewriting, Music or Drawing

Circulars can be taken direct from the Duplicator, and laid one copy on top another without off-setting or blurring. No other duplicator possesses this advantage. Circulars and samples of work on application. The only makers in America of all descriptions of ribbons, clean carbon papers, duplicators, stencil papers, inks, etc. Agents wanted in all unoccupied territory.

A Rapid, Medium-Priced Duplicating Machine

Simple, durable, rapid, clean, perfect work. Portable, inexpensive, practical, compact, noiseless.

Cheaper to Buy      Cheaper to Run

CHAS. E. ARCHBALD, PRESIDENT

PEN-CARBON MANIFOLD CO.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.

Originators and Only Manufacturers of Non-Flake Carbon Paper for Typewriter, Pen, Pencil and Stylus

The Practical Value of Mental Training

Henry Dickson

Principal Dickson School of Memory. The largest and most successful School of Mental Training in the world.

WHAT James H.C.A. Jones needed was a practical course of Memory Training; with that behind him he might now be in partnership with the merchant, instead of hiking for another job. No matter whether you are employer, employee, student, business man or Book Agent, you are not Making Good if your Memory is on the Job only Half the Time. The man

Read what WALT MASON, the Foot-Philosopher has to say about it:

STOP FORGETTING

The merchant said in caustic tones: "James Henry Charles Augustus Jones, please get your pay and leave the store; I will not need you any more. Important chores you seem to shun; you're always leaving work undone, and when I ask the reason why, you heave a sad and mournful sigh, and idly scratch your dome of thought, and feebly say: 'Oh, I forget!' James Henry Charles Augustus Jones, this world's a poor resort for drowns, for men with heads so badly set that their long suit is to forget. No man will ever write his name upon the shining wall of fame, or soar aloft on glowing wings because he can't remember things. I've noticed that such chaps as you remember when your pay is due; and when the noon-time whistles throb, your memory is on the job; and when a holiday's at hand, your recollection isn't canned. The failures on life's busy way, the paupers, friendless, wan and gray, throughout their bootless days, like you, forget the things they ought to do. So take your coat and draw your bones, James Henry Charles Augustus Jones."

Walt Mason

Copyright, 1909, by George Mathew Adams.
Reproduced by permission from the Chicago Daily News of Feb. 15, 1910.

with the Wandering Mind is a drug on the market—he has too many competitors. The Great Men of all ages are those who grasped the ability to Concentrate. You can acquire this ability. How? Send coupon for my free booklet.

The Dickson System has been highly recommended by Elbert Hubbard, Professor David Swing, Dr. Latson and many others.

Send this coupon for my free book (or a postal will do)

Prof. Henry Dickson, 938 Auditorium Building, Chicago

Send me your free booklet, "How to Remember"

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

STATE _____

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

A BOOK OF FRIENDLY THOUGHTS

The Girl Wanted

A Companion Book to "Boy Wanted"
By Nixon Waterman

"The best book for girls. A girl will be glad she has read it, and will be the better, the sweeter, the happier therefor."—Journal of Education.

"Every young woman should read this book. It is food for the eye and a feast for the mind."—Boston Globe.
Beautiful cover. Illustrated. Cloth. 8vo. $1.25.

Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Ill.

THE SECRET OF SUCCESS

By Thomas Dreier, Editor

THE secret of success is not a secret. Nor is it something hard to secure. To become more successful, become more efficient. ¶ Do what you can do, and what you should do, for the institution for which you are working; and do it in the right way, and the size of your income will take care of itself. Let your aim ever be to better the work you are doing. But remember, always, that you cannot better the work you are doing without bettering yourself. ¶ The thoughts that you think, the books and magazines you read, the words that you speak, and the deeds you perform, are making you either better or worse. Realize that "you are the master of your own fate, and the captain of your own soul." You can be what you Will to be.

Keep watch of the men and women who are doing quality work. "Example is always more efficacious than precept;" and if you analyze the work and methods of those who are doing quality work, you will receive inspiration that will increase your efficiency. ¶ You will find The Caxton Magazine of almost inestimable value, because it prints intimate stories about men and women who are succeeding. These stories are analytical; telling what these folks are doing, why they are doing it, and the elements that have brought success. ¶ The Caxton Magazine preaches the gospel of efficiency, and teaches the way to the goal of success. It is comprehensive, reasonable and sane.

Send us one dollar, and receive The Caxton Magazine for twelve months. We know that you will like it; but if for any reason you think you are not getting your money's worth, tell us, and your dollar will be promptly returned. You run no risk—so send the dollar today. This is the magazine that you will eventually subscribe for.

The Caxton Society, _____ 1910
Pittsfield, Mass.

Enclosed find one dollar for which send The Caxton Magazine for twelve months. It being understood that if I do not like it, you are to return my dollar promptly.

P-D _____

The Caxton Society
PITTSFIELD :: MASSACHUSETTS

3000 GUMMED LABELS $1.00
SEVERAL SIZES AND STYLES
PRINTED TO ORDER IN ONE AND TWO COLORS
AT THIS AND EVEN LOWER PRICES. SEND FOR CATALOG
FENTON LABEL CO. NINTH & THOMPSON STS. PHILA. PA.

A GOOD SHORTHAND REPORTER

is the only kind you can afford to employ. I am well prepared to handle all kinds of law and general reporting.

FRED H. GURTLE

SHORTHAND REPORTER

Phone Randolph 3038 810-811 Reaper Block, CHICAGO

The Royal

Standard Typewriter

(Price, $65.00)

comprises every essential of the ideal writing machine—

Simplicity, Convenience, Light Action, Fine Work, Durability

It is being adopted by ever increasing thousands of high-class business houses the world over, because it has established a new and higher standard of efficiency and economy. Its perfect workmanship and many mechanical advantages distinguish it among typewriters as

The REAL Standard of Today

Royal Typewriter Co.

Royal Typewriter Bldg. . . . . New York
412 Second Ave., So. . . . . Minneapolis, Minn.

The Magazine That Dares

to print the news that's vital to human advancement. An absolutely fearless monthly, the exponent of constructive reform for the betterment of all. You never have seen such unless you know THE TWENTIETH CENTURY MAGAZINE. The editor is B. O. Flower, founder of The Arena. Among the contributors are Edwin Markham, Lincoln Steffens, David Graham Phillips, Hamlin Garland, Prof. Charles Zueblin, Charles E. Russell, Brand Whitlock and Carl S. Vrooman. You should see this new periodical. It is beautifully illustrated and handsomely printed. It entertains and illuminates. One copy will convince you that there is no other magazine of equal strength in America, but to clinch your interest in the glorious work that Mr. Flower is leading, we will send you three sample issues, postpaid, all for only 10c. Get this intellectual stimulus and literary treat and realize there is a new force in the magazine field. We'll refund your remittance without question if you say we have exaggerated the value of this great monthly.

The Twentieth Century Co.
52 PARK SQUARE · BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS

Save your Pocket and Insure your Keys

Key Insurance—Good for one year, Insures Keys and Identifies Owner; this with Genuine Morocco Combination Key and Knife Purse.....50c
Accident Insurance—Above, plus a Limited Accident Policy for $1,000, renewable each year.....25c
Key Purses, (Cowhide.....40c. Combination { Cowhide.....40c. (Key Chains { Morocco.....35c. Key and { Morocco.....50c. (Sc. extra.) { Real, Russia, 50c. Knife Purses { Real, Russia, 65c.

Special Prices in Quantities for use as Advertising Novelties
MURRAY S. CHISM, Patentee and Manufacturer
224 N. Camac St., Philadelphia, Pa.

if you have advertising troubles I can help you

I make sketches, layouts and dummies or handle your advertising campaign complete — Write me.

Burton Gibbs Smith

Ⓢ ADVERTISING COUNSELLOR Ⓢ
1150 OLD COLONY BUILDING · CHICAGO

Make Your Letterhead Work for You—

YOUR outgoing mail represents the circulation of an advertising medium that costs you nothing—we can show you how to take advantage of this advertising potential—easily and surely. ¶ When reading your morning mail, which letterhead catches your eye, rivets your attention and creates a favorable impression? A letterhead which does these things is advertising—regardless of what the letter is or to whom it goes.

Engraving Stationery—An Engraving Stationery Letterhead has selling value—it not only commands attention but has embodied in it a touch of individuality—suggests the importance of your proposition and the prestige of your firm. The cost is no higher than the ordinary printed letterhead. We have unusual facilities for producing high-grade Engraving Stationery work, in any quantity, at short notice. ¶ Write us today for our interesting set of samples. This is a valuable portfolio and will be sent you free on request. Write today.

Eugene Smith Company

Makers of Fine Printing • 161 Fox Street, Aurora, Ill.

¶ For the production of high-grade catalogs, circulars, etc., we have a modern printing plant, complete in every detail. A postcard will bring you full particulars and an estimate of your needs.

$100 in Gold Given Away

A GENUINE bona fide offer. Read our proposition. Are you a smart speller? We give $100 in gold and other prizes named below to those able to make the largest list of words from the words The Rountree Publishing Company. You can make at least twenty, we believe, and if your list is the largest you will get the greatest prize. In case of a tie, prizes will be divided between highest contestants. Here are the rules to follow: Use only words in the English language. Words alike, but with different meanings can be used but once. Use any dictionary. Pronouns, nouns, verbs, adverbs, suffixes, adjectives, proper nouns, allowed. Anything that is a legitimate word will be allowed. This is the way: Heart, temple, rain, only. Use these words and arrange alphabetically. The following is a list of the prizes:

$25.00 for the largest list of words as above. $20.00 set of Encyclopedia, second largest list. $15.00 third largest list. $12.00 set of dishes, fourth largest list. $10.00 Mission Lamp, fifth largest list. $10.00 cash, sixth largest list. $5.00 cash, seventh largest list. $2.00 each to the next twenty-two highest. Subscriptions to the Dixie Home one year to the next hundred highest.

We want you to know The Dixie Home, which is one of the brightest and best illustrated magazines in the world, and it is for this reason that we offer these premiums. We make no extra charge for the privilege of entering this word-building contest. To enter the contest it is necessary for you to send us fifty cents or subscription to the Dixie Home for one year, with your list of words. List should be sent at once. The lucky names will be published later. This is a great offer to those who take an interest in such contests.

— Address —

“Contest Editor,” Dixie Home, Dept. 13, Birmingham, Alabama

SAY—“I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER”

Relieve Your Memory

Depend on this convenient, useful, gentleman's memo book to keep your dates, figures, names, memos, etc., in better, neater style.

Bennett Everlasting Memorandum Book

—leather cover, 3.4 x 8 inches, pocket for cards, removable pads—the most convenient. Price complete with your name stamped in gold on the cover and four inside pads, only $1.00

Send no money Simply send us your name and we will forward the book with your name printed. If satisfied, send us our $1.00. If not, return the book. Send today.

W. W. BENNETT CO.
Box 146, East End Pittsburgh, Penn.

PRIVATE OFFICE
This is your office!

The stepping stone from hopeless drudging for others to an easy, lucrative and independent business of your own is just a mental decision. Decide now to be the employer instead of an employee. Our first lessons enable you to start a Collection Business. No capital required. But little competition. Remarkable opportunities. We refer business to you. Write for "Pointers in the Collection Business." AMERICAN COLLECTION SERVICE, 409 State St., Detroit, Mich.

Pen Money For You

I will place the synopsis of your story or magazine article in the hands of 1,000 buyers of manuscripts and photographs, on commission only. Send 10 cents today for "How to Write a Story," by today's most popular author, and I will send you the particulars of my plan for selling manuscripts.

MR. BUSLEY

Authors' Review

610 Steinway Hall, Chicago

Books that have Helped Thousands Develop Power to Make Greater Profits

THESE books will help YOU develop more power. Will teach you how to control your forces. Will show you how to inspire confidence. They are uniformly bound in green, printed on heavy book, contain over two hundred pages of helpful, inspiring, scientific, man-building advice. The simple, direct, concise language drives the lessons home at the first reading. Than these three the famous author of "As a Man Thinketh" has written nothing better.

SEND THREE DOLLARS TODAY

SHELDON UNIVERSITY PRESS, Libertyville, Illinois:

Enclosed find $.....Dollars.

Send me.....Copies (Mark the number).

....."From Poverty to Power"

....."All These Things Added"

....."Byways of Blessedness"

Name .....

City..... State.....

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

A CORKING HIT

Letters from a Baseball Fan to His Son

By S. DEWITT CLOUGH

Illustrated by C. A. Briggs, the famous cartoonist of The Chicago Record-Herald.

Every person interested in Baseball will want a copy. Here is a book which if well displayed, is more than half sold. The price is small, only 50 cents, and the profits are big.

Hot Cakes

Did you ever see a bunch of hungry people clean up a big pile of hot wheat cakes served with real maple syrup? You may have been one yourself—well, that's the way "Letters from a Baseball Fan to his Son" disappear. Everybody says: "Geo that's good" and comes back for more.

What Is It?

These letters are written by an old-time baseball player to his son in college trying for the varsity team. They are not only clever and amusing, but are chock full of practical pointers and hints as to how baseball can be made a backbone bracer. The cartoons by Briggs and the pen sketches are worth the price of the book alone.

Price Fifty Cents Each, Postpaid

Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Illinois

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Dr. Lindlahr's Sanitarium for Nature Cure

offers complete sanitarium facilities to patients from a distance and to those who wish to live the natural life in natural surroundings. We successfully treat all forms of so-called incurable diseases without the use of poisonous drugs or surgery.

Nature Cure by Mail

In this department we are prepared to take care of patients at a distance who cannot have the benefit of instruction and treatment in our sanitarium. Free literature and diagnosis blank furnished on application.

Send for Valuable Free Health-Culture Literature

A LIMITED NUMBER OF VOLS. I. and II. of the NATURE CURE MAGAZINE, cloth bound, are now for sale. Price $1.50 per volume, postpaid.

Dr. Lindlahr's Sanitarium

525 Ashland Boulevard, Chicago
Telephone, Monroe 2246

Down town offices and Treatment rooms:
84 Adams St., Rooms 404-406
Telephone Harrison 6130

Automatic Paper-Fastener

Fastens 25 sheets
with one blow.

Cash with order $1.50
post paid.
This price
includes
500 staples.

The Hotchkiss Automatic Paper-Fastener uses a single strip on which there are 25 staples. These staples when inserted into the machine are automatically cut off and fed forward, accurately and without failure. The staple is always ready to be driven and a single blow will suffice to drive it through 1 to 25 sheets of paper, and with the same movement feed forward the next staple.

Useful not only for papers, but for fastening samples of silks, laces, dress goods, etc., being neater than any other method of binding.

Place the machine on a solid foundation, insert the papers to be stapled, and strike the plunger a quick, sharp blow with the hand.

Agents wanted to sell our line of office supplies
Send for Catalog

National Office Supply Company
ZION CITY, ILLINOIS

Another Angle on Business Philosophy

The Mediator

A New Magazine of Industrial Economy. A Vigorous Publication for Progressive Minds.

Not a Muck-Raker.
Helpful, Inspiring, Courageous

Free Write today for free sample copy. Don't wait till tomorrow. Published monthly. Brimful of helpful suggestions. Stands for industrial tolerance. Believes strikes are futile. Urges cooperation between employees and employers.

The Mediator

ROCKEFELLER BLDG., CLEVELAND, O.

How to Write an "Ad"

A Tabloid
Course in Adwriting,
Complete in Six Lessons;
the Boiled

Down Experience of Years, in Booklet Form

If you are a business man interested in adwriting or a man who wants to get started in the advertising business, you certainly ought to have this valuable little course.

It outlines in a brief, yet comprehensive way, the entire method of writing an advertisement from the inception of the idea, the collecting of matter, drawing the plan, instructing the printer—to its realization in printers' ink.

Six interesting and instructive lessons with diagrams and illustrations showing how to sit down and finish a complete advertisement.

POSTPAID, FIFTY CENTS

Reference, The Sheldon School.

ARTHUR B. FREEMAN
3745 MAPLE SQUARE AVE., CHICAGO, ILL.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

The Illustrated Review

A magazine for Authors, Artists, Craftsmen, Collectors and Devotees of the Art of Physical Expression

---

Reproductions of paintings by American artists.
Studio stories and news.
Unconventional snap shots of authors at work
and at play,
Illustrations of handicraft work.
Short articles giving advice to buyers of objects
of art and rarities.
Illustrations of types of beauty.

---

"Its atmosphere is homey to those who work with the fine tools of words and pigments," says Will Levington Comfort, author of "Routledge Rides Alone."

10 cents per copy. Four back numbers for 20 cents. Three months for 25 cents. One year, $1.00

The Illustrated Review

Steinway Hall Building, Chicago

IF YOU WANT TO KNOW ANYTHING ABOUT

Ohio

The State of Marvelous Natural Resources. The State of Great Manufacturing Advantages. Where Good Business is Encouraged and Bad Business is Discouraged.

IF YOU WANT TO KNOW ANYTHING ABOUT OHIO, YOU'LL FIND IT IN

The Ohio Journal of Commerce

a weekly journal published by the business men of the state in the interest of all business. Subscription: Two dollars a year. THE OHIO JOURNAL OF COMMERCE is read every Saturday by the progressive business men of Ohio.

If you want to reach this money-spending class of Ohioans, place your advertisement in THE OHIO JOURNAL OF COMMERCE. We will be glad to give you any information about Ohio and THE OHIO JOURNAL OF COMMERCE.

The Ohio Journal of Commerce Co.

339 CHAMBER OF COMMERCE BUILDING :: :: COLUMBUS, OHIO

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

WHAT are you going to do about the education of your son and daughter? Where will they study this fall?

Their education is the most important business to which you can give your attention. Time spent in investigating the matter is well spent, because so much depends on the right start; you can't afford to make a mistake.

It takes just as long to receive bad instruction as it does good, and it costs the same. There's no excuse for accepting poor instruction and paying the price of good. Make sure that your boy and girl have the best by employing the best teachers.

The faculty of this University represents the most eminent men and women in the world; their salary amounts to over one hundred thousand dollars each year. If you were to employ them to teach your children, it would cost you four hundred thousand dollars, as a college course extends over a period of four years.

The American Woman's League has endowed The Peoples University, and every member of the League is entitled to instruction free, for life. This privilege is not limited to members, but extends to minor children—all of them—of members. Every woman of the white race is eligible to membership; the cost is small, and the benefits are great.

A book containing a full explanation of the League and its work, together with the names of the faculty of this University, will be sent free upon receipt of your request. Fill out coupon and mail at once.

The Peoples University

P. O. Box 1285

University City, St. Louis, Mo.

CUT HERE
THE PEOPLES UNIVERSITY,
P. O. Box 1285,
University City, St. Louis, Mo.

Please send me, without obligation on my part, full information about the League and how I can take up the study of the Course I have marked below.

|                        |                    |
|------------------------|--------------------|
| Music                  | Stenography        |
| Art                    | Typewriting        |
| Journalism             | Bookkeeping        |
| Short Story Writing    | Penmanship         |
| Teachers' Certificates | General Commercial |
| Kindergarten           | Agriculture        |
| Domestic Science       | Horticulture       |
| Civil Service          | Veterinary Science |
| Preparation            | Floriculture       |
| Dressmaking            | Poultry Culture    |
| Auto Engineering       | Bee Keeping        |
| Photography            |                    |

Name .....
Street and No.....
P. O.....State.....

PRACTICAL BUSINESS BOOKS!

Examine the List—Select Those That Will
Help You—Mail Your Order Today

Authorized American Edition of DICKSEE'S AUDITING

Revised and Enlarged
By Robert H. Montgomery, C. P. A.

The acknowledged authority in both England and America on all subjects connected with auditing. The present edition retains all the valuable matter of the first edition, revised and brought up to date, and in addition over 200 pages of entirely new matter. The subject treatment is (1) Auditing—Up to the Trial Balance; (2) Methods of Account; (3) Special Considerations in Different Classes of Audit; (4) Auditing—From Trial Balance to Balance Sheet; (5) Forms of Account and Balance Sheets; (6) What Are Profits? (7) The Attitude of the Auditor; (8) The Liabilities of Auditors; (9) Investigations; (10) Interest; (11) Professional Ethics; (12) C. P. A. Examination Questions. Contains 100 pages of model forms of Balance Sheets, Income and Profit and Loss Accounts, etc., etc. 6 x 9. 586 pages. 1909. Durable cloth, gold stamped. $5.00 delivered.

CORPORATE FINANCE and ACCOUNTING

By H. C. Bentley, C. P. A.

Every corporation treasurer and accountant should possess this book. It is a complete working manual covering the daily duties of these officials. In six parts, as follows: (1) The corporation treasurer, his legal status, the requirements of his office, his duties, powers and liabilities, his relation to corporate affairs in general, his bonding; (2) An extended exposition of the methods and forms for practical corporate accounting, describing the various forms of books and entries; (3) Corporate finances, including funds in general, bank deposits, checks and dividends; (4) Negotiable instruments, their nature and requisites, their general and special liabilities, their collection; (5) Corporate securities; (6) 44 model legal forms for signatures, checks, receipts, resolutions and certifications. 6 x 9. Buckram. 500 pp. $4.00 delivered.

A Manual of CORPORATE MANAGEMENT

By Thos. Conynghon of the N. Y. Bar

No corporation official can really afford to be without this book. In it can be found immediately a clear, accurate, non-technical answer to any question concerning the legal side of corporate management. Tells the purposes, scope, and uses of the Charter and By-Laws: the rights, duties, powers and liabilities of Officers, Directors, and Stockholders under all circumstances; explains fully the issuance, sale, record and transfer of stock; tells how to conduct meetings; how to keep all books of record; and discusses such important matters as Committees, Dividends, Consolidations, Re-organization, etc. A safe guide in any state. Contains also over 200 model legal forms, covering practically every matter in corporation work requiring a form. Third Edition. 1909. 6 x 9. Buckram binding. $3.50 delivered.

CONDITIONAL SALES

By F. B. Haring of the Buffalo Bar

No concern which makes credit sales should be without this book. It states clearly the requirements for a valid contract of conditional sale in every state of the Union, whereby title to goods sold is retained in the vendor until payment has been made. This information is arranged under uniform headings giving Legal Status of Contracts, how to execute them, acknowledgement or proof required, recording or filing necessary, recording fee, renewals, discharge, Landlord's lien, criminal liability of vendee, action for money judgment, claim on fixtures, when vendor or vendee loses, etc. Approved forms of contracts, acknowledgements, etc. Used as a guide by hundreds of the largest concerns in the country. "Send us another copy," say Lyon & Healy, Chicago, 6 x 9. Buckram. 1909. $5.00 delivered.

A Manual of CORPORATE ORGANIZATION

By Thos. Conynghon of the N. Y. Bar

Explains clearly and in detail every step necessary for the organization and incorporation of a new company or the reorganization of an old one. Describes ends sought by incorporation: stock subscription lists and contracts; tells where to incorporate and the expense; detailed explanation of capitalization and the stock system and the status of stockholders; describes the nature and functions of the Charter and By-laws; tells how to conduct meetings; how to elect officers and directors, and defines their duties, powers and liabilities; full information for the protection of minority interests, protection of an inventor, underwriting, promoters, etc., etc. Accurate, authoritative, up-to-date, and entirely free from legal technicalities. Second Ed. 1908. 6 x 9. Buckram. $3.00 delivered.

FINANCING an ENTERPRISE

By Francis Cooper

A practical two-volume work telling how to secure capital and successfully promote a business enterprise of any kind. Vol. I describes conditions necessary for successful financing; tells how to investigate, protect, and capitalize an enterprise, discusses experimental work and model making. Vol. II tells best methods for securing money, privately, or publicly, by advertising; how to write a prospectus. Important chapters on stocks, bonds, incorporation, underwriting, etc. Written from 15 years' promoting experience. Only reliable work on the subject. Third edition. 1909. 543 pp. Buckram. Both vols. $4.00 delivered. Either vol. singly $2.00 delivered.

Complete Descriptive Circular of Any Book on Request

THE RONALD PRESS COMPANY

Publishers of Business Books, and of
THE BUSINESS WORLD, a magazine of Practical Business

Rooms 14-20
229 Broadway, New York

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

50c Secures this Great Reference Book

An entirely new, up-to-date, down-to-the-minute Reference Book, for bookkeepers, cashiers, accountants and business men.

This magnificent volume weighs nearly 6 pounds; contains over 500 pages, 200,000 words and 700 illustrations of forms and tables; beautifully printed on fine paper; handsomely and strongly bound; produced and presented to the business world at a cost which brings it within the reach of all; easiest for reference, plainest for acquiring information, and most economical when compared with all other publications of like nature.

It is yours on payment of only 50 cents

down and the balance in monthly installments of 50 cents or $1.00 as you prefer.

Monthly installment price, $4.00 per copy; introductory special cash price (less 10 per cent) only $3.60.

In either case the expressage is prepaid to your address in the United States and Canada.

E. H. Beach, Publisher, Detroit, Mich

Send 25 cents for 12 months subscription to BEACH'S MAGAZINE OF BUSINESS

A handsome monthly magazine for business men, bookkeepers, accountants, cashiers, credit men, stenographers, advertising managers, etc. The "man behind the desk" must have it. Splendid business stories. Your money back if you do not like it.

E. H. Beach, Publisher, 69 West Fort St., Detroit, Mich.

The International Business Correspondence Course

HAS BEEN DEvised FOR THE BENEFIT OF THOSE INTERESTED IN HIGHER AND COST ACCOUNTING WHO DESIRE TO QUALIFY FOR HIGHER POSITIONS AND HIGHER SALARIES

Higher accounting for bookkeepers, cashiers, accountants, office men and business men generally.

Factory cost accounting for cost clerks, superintendents, factory foremen, all of whom require in the performance of their duties an accurate knowledge of factory detail and daily results, to be obtained with the least possible labor combined with the greatest satisfaction.

For those who wish to adopt the lucrative profession of Certified Public Accountant.

What the Course Offers You

The active experience of twenty years enables the directors of this Business Correspondence Course to concentrate in lessons spread over six months an education comprising all the vital principles and essential systems and methods of down-to-the-minute accountancy for all classes and varieties of business included in the curriculums of the most expensive Correspondence Schools, at a charge to students of from $40 to $100.

THE COST

Special Terms for Balance of Year 1910

This comprehensive, complete and fully effective Business Correspondence Course is offered at the temporary and very low introductory price of $10 cash, or $12 payable in easy installments of $2 down and $2 per month for five months.

E. H. BEACH, Publisher :: Detroit, Michigan

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Keeping Our Tailors Busy

A suit with extra pair of trousers for the price of the suit alone

$25 to $50

NICOLL The Tailor
W. J. JERREMS' SONS
CLARK AND ADAMS STS.
CHICAGO

Embossed Business Stationery

Printed from Steel Dies
Send for Samples

Engraved Cards

We engrave a one-line plate and furnish 100 engraved cards, postpaid. Engraved in script, $1.25; block, $1.50; solid Roman, old English or French script, $1.75; shaded old English or block, $2.00; shaded Roman or French script, $2.25. Cash to be sent with order. Best stock used. Monogram stationery. Wedding and business announcements.

The American Embossing Co.
192-69 SENECA STREET, BUFFALO, N. Y.

Financing an Enterprise

By FRANCIS COOPER

TWO volumes that have helped hundreds of men win fortunes by showing them how to successfully finance and promote their business or their discoveries. Highly endorsed. Only successful work on promotion.

Volume 1 describes conditions necessary for successful financing; how to investigate, protect and capitalize an enterprise; experimental work and model making.

Volume 2 tells best methods for securing money, privately, or publicly, by advertising; how to advertise, how to write a winning prospectus. Important chapters on stock, bonds, incorporations, etc.

Invaluable knowledge gathered from fifteen years' experience. Save you hundred times its cost. Full descriptive circular if you want it.

600 pp. 1909 ed. Buckram binding. Two vols., $4.00 prepaid. Either vol. separately, $2.00 prepaid.

SHELDON UNIVERSITY PRESS
LIBERTYVILLE, ILLINOIS

SPINAL IRRITATION

An elegantly illustrated booklet explaining the cause and cure of the disease that produces the following

SYMPTOMS:

HEADACHE or pains in the head, especially in the Back part or Base of Brain; Nervous or Biliary Headache; sensations that feel like the pulling or stretching of
CORDS in the Neck; trouble with the
EYES connected with pain or aching in back part of head or neck or upper part of shoulders; aches or pains in the eyes or back of them; specks or spots before the eyes or blurred vision; a frequent desire to
SIGH or YAWN or take a deep, full breath, and in some cases, an inability to do so;
PALPITATION or irregularity of the heart; pains, oppression, difficult breathing, or very peculiar and disagreeable feelings in the region of the
HEART, LUNGS, STOMACH, or other parts of the body that doctors often call Neuralgia, Rheumatism, Indigestion, Heart trouble and various other names, but fail to cure; aches or pains in the region of the
KIDNEYS; BACKACHE; sensations of oppression or constriction like a
BELT AROUND THE BODY, or part way around;
PARTIAL PARALYSIS of arms, shoulders, hands, lower limbs or feet, causing pains in these members, or a
NUMB FEELING or sensations of coldness, heaviness, or a tingling or feelings resembling the
PRICKING OF PINS or needles or as if the parts were asleep;
SORE, TENDER OR BURNING points along the spine or in the limbs or feet; pains in the face, arms, back, lower limbs or feet, resembling those of
NEURALGIA OR SCIATIC RHEUMATISM (physicians often treat these symptoms as ordinary neuralgia or rheumatism, but such treatment will not cure them);
CHILLS UP OR DOWN BACK;
CREeping sensations, coldness or numbness; pain
BETWEEN SHOULDERS.

If you have the above named symptoms, or any of them, you probably have SPINAL IRRITATION, a very serious disorder that but few physicians can cure. Yet it is very easily cured by proper treatment. Our elegantly illustrated booklet explains how. It also describes the disease and explains what causes it.

Price, 10 Cents

OHIO STATE PUBLISHING CO., 93-5 The Birmingham, Cleveland, O.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

The Largest Staff of Salesmen in the World

that is what Advertisers command in

"The Traveling Man"

We have a paid in advance subscription from members of the fourteen great orders in which the Salesmen of the United States have banded themselves—that should make advertisers think—our Magazine represents the Greatest Commercial Force in the World — "Word of Mouth" Advertising by our Subscribers. Think it over—Our Rates by Mail—You've Thought.

Strong Endorsement

The following large and important Organizations of Traveling Men, representing hundreds of thousands, approve of "THE TRAVELING MAN" and wish it God Speed!

|                                                                           |                                                                       |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Christian Traveling Men's Association"Gideons," Chicago, Ill.         | Northwestern Traveling Men's Association,Chicago, Ill.            |
| The Commercial Travelers' Life and Accident Association, Cleveland, Ohio. | Travelers' Health Association,Omaha, Nebraska.                    |
| Commercial Travelers' Accident Association,Utica, New York.           | Traveler's Protective Association of America,St. Louis, Missouri. |
| Illinois Commercial Men's Association,Chicago, Ill.                   | Toledo Travelers' Health Association,Toledo, Ohio.                |
| International Travelers' Association,Dallas, Texas.                   | United Commercial Travelers of America,Columbus, Ohio.            |
| Iowa State Traveling Men's Association,Des Moines, Iowa.              | Western Travelers' Accident Association,Omaha, Nebraska.          |
| Minnesota Commercial Men's Health Association,New Ulm, Minnesota.     | Western Commercial Travelers' Association,St. Louis, Missouri.    |

Subscription Price, $1.00 Per Year

THE TRAVELING MAN

VALPARAISO, INDIANA

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

How to Increase Your Mental Wealth at Small Cost—

TO BECOME a better Speaker of Words—and to be a scientific salesman one must know how to speak wisely and well—one should have a thorough acquaintance with the great classics of literature.

¶ The Caxton Brochures are exquisitely printed in two colors on high-grade paper—protected with a heavy cover—tied with silk—brightened with a special portrait of the author by Hillberg—and possess the great merit of fitting the pocket both in size and price.

¶ By special arrangement we have secured a limited quantity of these beautiful Brochures and while they last they will be sold for Fourteen Cents each or Ten for One Dollar.

¶ Of course you know we wrap all our goods with Satisfaction—which means that you can have your money back absolutely without question if you are not perfectly satisfied.

The Caxton Brochures

¶ A collection of Little Masterpieces, published one each month, by the Caxton Society, the aim being to present the most significant essays and short stories by the world's best authors, in a form that will appeal to all bookish people.

No. 1—CHARLES LAMB'S ESSAY, "A Dissertation upon Rast Pig," also "Detached Thoughts on Books and Reading."

No. 2—RALPH WALDO EMERSON'S "Essay on Compensation."

No. 3—"THE CHINESE PHILOSOPHER'S SON," by Oliver Goldsmith. This number is now out of print.

No. 4—"BIBLIOPHILE AND BIBLIOMANIAC," by Henry Houssaye and Henry Ward Beecher.

No. 5—"COLLECTANEA," being certain verses written by Rudyard Kipling.

No. 6—"POOR RICHARD'S ALMANACK." Shrewd wit of Benjamin Franklin as compiled by himself. With facsimile reproductions.

No. 7—"HENRY DAVID THOREAU, His Character and Opinions," by Robert Louis Stevenson.

No. 8—"BACON'S ESSAYS," being those contained in the first edition, published in 1597. With facsimile reproductions of some of the pages.

No. 9—"WISDOM OF CHESTERFIELD." Being extracts from letters of the Earl of Chesterfield to his son.

No. 10—"LOVE LETTERS OF HENRY VIII TO ANNE BOLEYN." The authentic love letters of a real king.

No. 11—"RUBAIYAT OF OMAR KHAYYAM," by Edward FitzGerald. This is a careful reprint of the first edition, introduction and notes.

No. 12—"SELF-RELIANCE," by Ralph Waldo Emerson. "Let a man know his worth, and keep things under his feet."

No. 13—"WILL O' THE MILL," by Robert Louis Stevenson.

No. 14—"RABBI BEN EZRA," by Robert Browning. This number contains a special analysis and study.

No. 15—"THE LEGEND OF SLEEPY HOLLOW," by Washington Irving.

No. 16—"THE ATHEIST'S MASS," by Honore de Balzac.

No. 17—"ODES OF ANACREON," as translated by Thomas Moore.

No. 18—"EVERYMAN," the great Morality Play. Facsimile reproductions from old editions.

No. 19—"ADDRESS ON ARTS AND CRAFTS," by William Morris.

We believe these Brochures are a little better than anything ever before attempted in special editions at a popular price. The numbers now ready are No. 1 to 19, inclusive; and with exception of No. 3 which is out of print. We will supply them at fourteen cents each, or ten for one dollar.

Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Ill.

DEPARTMENT 87

AMONG all the potent elements in the power of persuasion, there is none more effective than that manful character that enables the speaker to look the other fellow squarely in the eye and not be ashamed.—Sheldon

SEPTEMBER, 1910

Gen. Lib.

PRICE 20 CENTS

AUG 29 1910

The BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

ARTHUR·FREDERICK·SHELDON
EDITOR

SHELDON·UNIVERSITY·PRESS
LIBERTYVILLE·ILLINOIS

Ginger Talks

235 PAGES—15 FULL PAGE CARTOONS

Sales of Two Millions a Month

The Course in Salesmanship that Built Them for the National Cash Register Company

Yours for Two Dollars

THINK of a course in practical salesmanship, written straight out of the heart of the greatest selling organization in the world, by a Director of that organization; a course that does not merely describe the selling system of this colossal concern—but IS THAT ACTUAL SYSTEM ITSELF—the word for word Ginger Talks of that world famous company to its 1,000 salesmen—the verbatim coaching, the exact specific instruction, the very selling pointers and arguments and inspiration and enthusiasm that built up, through those 1,000 red-blooded salesmen, a business of over two million dollars a month in monthly sales.

The Pabst Co. bought it for its 1800 salesmen. The Quaker Oats Company invested $450 in it. 1682 other giant concerns have taken it for their entire sales forces, many taking from 100 to 1000 each.

Ask us to send you a list six feet long of these concerns which employ nearly 50,000 salesmen

GINGER TALKS are a complete text-book of instruction and pointers on the art of selling goods. They simplify the whole of practical salesmanship; make clear with wonderful illustrations and exact explanations how to make approaches, how to secure attention, how to create desire, how to stimulate to immediate action and walk out with the order. They tell the salesman how to turn enmity into friendship, cold indifference into eager interest, casual inquiries into actual buyers, actual buyers into permanent customers. They touch on a thousand salesmen's difficulties and perplexities and show a way out of each one.

GINGER TALKS is the only business book ever written that is as brilliant and fascinating in style and has the same human interest as George Ade's "Fables in Slang," Billy Baxter's Letters," or Mr. Dooley's famous conversations with his friend Hennessy. The sentences are crowded with epigrams, sharpened with penetrating wit, lighted up with humor, and made fairly alive with the tones of a masterful personality. It is this wonderful combination of solid instruction and brilliant expression—"beef-steak nutriment and champagne style" that has brought Ginger Talks their tremendous sales.

SEND YOUR GINGER

SHELDON UNIVERSITY PRESS, Libertyville, Illinois.

I am enclosing Two Dollars. Send me a copy of Holman's "Ginger Talks."

Name.....

Address..... State.....

You can enclose $3.50 and receive a copy of Ginger Talks and The Business Philosopher for one year

ARTHUR F. SHELDON
EDITOR-IN-CHIEF

CONTENTS

ARTHUR W. NEWCOMB
MANAGING EDITOR

SHELDON'S BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER AND SALESMANSHIP

SEPTEMBER, 1910

|                                                           |              |
|-----------------------------------------------------------|--------------|
| I LIVE FOR THOSE WHO LOVE ME.....                         | Frontispiece |
| By Francis Margaret Milne                          |              |
| EDITORIAL .....                                           | 515          |
| By A. F. Sheldon                                   |              |
| ECONOMICAL REASONS FOR THE WAVE OF TEMPERANCE REFORM      | 521          |
| By David Gibson                                    |              |
| A GOOD BUSINESS LETTER AND WHAT MAKES THE WRITER OF IT    | 524          |
| By Frederick W. Pettit                             |              |
| GOOD SERVICE BRINGS SUCCESS IN THE FOOTHILLS OF THE WEST  | 525          |
| By George H. Eberhard                              |              |
| SCHOOL AND CITY GARDENS AS FACTORS IN HUMAN CONSERVATION  | 527          |
| By Maron Watson                                    |              |
| GLEANINGS FROM BUSINESS FIELDS.....                       | 531          |
| By Thomas Dreier                                   |              |
| PUBLICITY AS A CREATIVE FORCE IN BUSINESS—AN ADDRESS..... | 536          |
| By E. St. Elmo Lewis                               |              |
| APPLYING THE PRINCIPLES OF ART TO BUSINESS.....           | 543          |
| By Ernest L. Briggs                                |              |
| THE QUESTIONS OF SOCRATIC.....                            | 547          |
| By ARTHUR W. NEWCOMB                               |              |
| ARGUMENT IN FAVOR OF QUOTING PRICES IN ADVERTISEMENTS     | 555          |
| By A. St. P. Reynolds                              |              |
| THE SECURING AND HOLDING OF FAVORABLE ATTENTION.....      | 557          |
| By Fred G. Kaessmann                               |              |
| LETTERS OF A SALES AND ADVERTISING MANAGER.....           | 559          |
| By George H. Eberhard                              |              |
| THE LIFE INSURANCE AGENT AS AN EDUCATOR.....              | 562          |
| By W. H. Tennyson                                  |              |
| WHAT THE BUSINESS MAN SHOULD KNOW ABOUT INSURANCE         | 564          |
| By E. G. Vail                                      |              |
| LEAVES FROM MY ORDER BOOK.....                            | 569          |
| By Morton Mayne                                    |              |
| SOME REASONS WHY I SUCCEED IN THE PUBLISHING BUSINESS     | 574          |
| By Cyrus K. Curtis                                 |              |
| THE PHILOSOPHER AMONG HIS BOOKS.....                      | 577          |

Two dollars a year will bring the magazine to anyone in the United States or its possessions, $2.25 in Canada, and $2.50 in foreign countries. Requests for "change of address" must reach this office before the tenth of the month in order to insure the proper mailing of the current issue of this magazine. In sending in the new address please give your previous location.

Published by the Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Illinois

Entered as Second-Class Matter, December 15, 1908, at the Post Office at Libertyville, Illinois, under Act of March 3, 1879. Copyrighted by Sheldon University Press.

Seventeen Cents a Day Buys an Oliver Typewriter

This amazing offer—the New Model Oliver Typewriter No. 5 at 17 cents a day—is open to everybody, everywhere.

It's our new and immensely popular plan of selling Oliver Typewriters, on little easy payments. The abandonment of longhand in favor of clean, legible, beautiful typewriting is the next great step in human progress.

Already—in all lines of business and in all professions—the use of pen-and-ink is largely restricted to the writing of signatures.

Business Colleges and High Schools, watchful of the trend of public sentiment, are training a vast army of young people in the use of Oliver Typewriters.

The prompt and generous response of the Oliver Typewriter Company to the world-wide demand for universal typewriting, gives tremendous impetus to the movement.

The Oliver, with the largest sale of any typewriter in existence, was the logical machine to take the initiative in bringing about the universal use of typewriters. It always leads.

Save Your Pennies & Own an Oliver

This “17-Cents-a-Day” selling plan makes the Oliver as easy to own as to rent. It places the machine within easy reach of every home—every individual. A man's “cigar money”—a woman's “pin-money”—will buy it.

Clerks on small salaries can now afford to own Olivers. By utilizing spare moments for practice they may fit themselves for more important positions.

School boys and school girls can buy Olivers by saving their pennies.

You can buy an Oliver on this plan at the regular catalog price—$100. A small first payment brings the machine. Then you save 17 cents a day and pay monthly.

And the possession of an Oliver Typewriter enables you to earn money to finish paying for the machine.

Mechanical Advantages

The Oliver is the most highly perfected typewriter on the market—hence its 100 per cent efficiency.

Among its scores of conveniences are:

- the Balance Shift
- the Ruling Devise
- the Double Release
- the Locomotive Base
- the Automatic Spacer
- the Automatic Tabulator
- the Disappearing Indicator
- the Adjustable Paper Fingers
- the Scientific Condensed Keyboard

Service Possibilities

The Oliver Typewriter turns out more work—of better quality and greater variety—than any other writing machine. Simplicity, strength, ease of operation and visibility are the corner stones of its towering supremacy in

- Correspondence
- Card Index Work
- Tabulated Reports
- Follow-up Systems
- Manifolding Service
- Addressing Envelopes
- Working on Ruled Forms
- Cutting Mimeograph Stencils

Can You Spend 17 Cents a Day to Better Advantage than in the Purchase of this Wonderful Machine

Write for Special Easy Payment Proposition or See the Nearest Oliver Agent

The Oliver Typewriter Co., The Oliver Typewriter Building Chicago, Illinois

SAY—“I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER”

Ring the Bell Every Time

WHAT is it worth to you to be able to ring the bell every time you strike for a customer's order? What is it worth to you to be able, when he puts forth an objection, to knock that objection sky high with the irresistible force of a selling argument that has been tried and proven by the best salesmen of the best concerns in the world—concerns whose names are household words by reason of the enormous sales these very selling arguments have brought them?

What is it Worth to You:

—To know in advance the objections your prospect will make and the best answer to each that has ever yet been discovered.

—To have a number of answers (in some cases as many as twenty to thirty) to each objection—all irresistible—600 irresistible selling arguments?

—To know that every one of these arguments has been evolved by years of hard experience—improved and made stronger by constant successful use?

—To know that many of these arguments cost thousands of dollars in experience before they were discovered and perfected—and that many of them have sold millions of dollars worth of goods?

Every Page Coinable Into Money

A chemical formula written on the back of an envelope may be worth a fortune; a few figures giving the combination to a safe may unlock a door with millions behind it. Every page of this book contains a selling formula that you can coin into ready money. Every one of these 600 irresistible arguments opens a door that will lead you to more sales and more commissions. You could well pay, if you had to, a green-back for every page of this book; but the cost to you is slight.

Sign This Coupon —Can you afford to pay one-half cent for an argument that has sold thousands of dollars worth of goods—an argument whose discovery cost hundreds or even thousands of dollars in time and experience and actual money of star salesmen and great concerns.

—An argument that will surely close sales for you—that may clear you a hundred dollars in commissions the first day you use it, and hundreds or even thousands of dollars as you use it over and over again, throughout the entire year and for years to come.

Can you afford to pay one-half cent for what is worth anywhere from $10.00 to $1,000.00 in actual money-making power to you?

Then Sign This Coupon and Mail Today

THE SHELDON UNIVERSITY PRESS, Libertyville, Illinois

Enclosed please find $4.00 for your Two Big Volumes of Six Hundred Talking Points and Selling Arguments.

Name.....

Address, etc.....

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

The Salary Question

YOUR "salary question" is at once and forever solved the moment you become a trained man. Once you enter the ranks of the men who are trained for modern business, the salary question takes care of itself. It is no longer necessary to "go through the mill" for a business training. The days of long apprenticeship, long years of waiting for promotion are past.

You will put a postage stamp and a little of your time against The Sheldon Book—which we will send you FREE—we can show you how more than 40,000 men have been helped to decide their salary questions through the medium of The Sheldon School. Let the burden of proving at we can turn your spare time at home to a high class business training rest entirely upon us. Merely inscribe your name and address on this coupon and leave the rest to our literature.

The Sheldon School, 1033 Republic Bldg., Chicago
Please send me a FREE COUPON of The Sheldon Book without cost or obligation.

Name .....
Street .....
City ..... State .....

The Sheldon School
1033 Republic Bldg., Chicago

STIFFEN UP YOUR BACKBONE!

The Backbone Monthly

"A Serum Against Softening of the Moral Spine"

It will help you develop more power, teach you how to control your forces and stiffen up your backbone. You will find its pages brimful of helpful, inspiring, scientific and man-building advice.

Tom Dreier edits it!

It's so different—both editorially and mechanically—terse, brief, pointed and powerful in all departments. Men who usually criticize have only good things to say about it.

A remittance of one dollar will start your subscription with the next issue. Sample copies 10 cents—and they're worth it! Better use this coupon now!

SEND ME YOUR BACKBONE

THE BACKBONE SOCIETY, Aurora, Illinois:

I am enclosing one dollar. Please enter my subscription to THE BACKBONE MONTHLY for one year, beginning with the next number.

Name .....

B.P. 9-10

Address .....

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Sherwin Cody's Latest Book
How to Do Business by Letter
and Training Course in Business English Composition

The most successful book on letter-writing ever published, now in its 47th thousand, eleventh edition, though but recently published.

Contains over 125 model letters of all kinds, including a number of the more successful pulling letters used by prominent houses.

Also the Rules of Grammar complete, with all common errors; the Rules of Punctuation, Words Often Misused, Rules and Regulations of the Postoffice (correct to 1910), etc.

Price, postpaid $1.00. See table of contents.

Sherwin Cody's Form Paragraph Letter-Writer

An indexed and gummed blankbook, full letter size, loose leaf, in which to paste form paragraphs to be used in answering all kinds of correspondence.

By this system an $8-a-week girl can write better letters than a $25-a-week correspondent, because she simply copies into her book the best paragraphs in the regularly dictated letters of the head of the business, and all letters are in his language, perfect in every detail of punctuation, grammar, etc., and may be signed by his name though he never sees the letter himself. This is a wonderful means of raising the quality of correspondence, as well as saving much time and expense. 80 gummed pages, 20 index pages, 100 pages in all; price, postpaid, $3; subject to approval and return at my expense.

Sherwin Cody's Compendium of All Card Systems .

An instruction book on loose-leaf and card systems (the only book ever published clearly stating the simple fundamental principles of these systems), accompanying a neat box of 500 cards, size 3 x 5 inches, printed from specially engraved wax plates in the best style, representing 18 complete systems all ready for use, including forms for mailing lists, advertising, salesman's report and route cards, perpetual inventory forms, cost systems, school forms, and loose-leaf and card ledgers of all kinds, for wholesale, retail, mail-order, instalment, and specialty businesses. Electrotypes of plates sold and directions given for printing systems at one-third the usual price. Price, complete, $3.00.

How to Make Advertising Pay
 How to Write Letters that Pull
 Office Salesmanship & Business
 Psychology

I have made a detailed personal study of forty-six leading lines of business: Manufacturing, wholesale, retail, mail-order, and specialty, and have taught presidents, secretaries and advertising managers how to make a success of their publicity—I know what will win in forty-six different businesses, yours among the number, and this information I give in my complete course, together with all the books and special features described above, with scores of others—everything I have for only $30, including twenty personal lessons. Write for complete catalogue.

SHERWIN CODY, LIBERTYVILLE, ILLINOIS

CONTENTS:

Using Words So as To Make People Do Things.
 How to Begin a Business Letter.
 How to Close a Business Letter.
 The Body of the Letter.
 Applying for a Position.
 Sending Money by Mail.
 Ordering Goods.
 "Hurry-up" Letters.
 How Money is Collected.
 Letters to Ladies.
 Professional Letters.
 How to Acquire an Easy Style in Letter Writing.
 Two Kinds of Letters—Buying and Selling.
 When to Write a Long Letter and When to Write a Short Letter.
 Answering Inquiries.
 Talking in a Letter—Colloquialisms and Slang.
 Complaint Letters.
 Condensation—Writing Advertisements.
 Advertising and Follow-up Letters.
 Display in Letter Writing.
 Salesmanship in Letters and Advertisements.
 Customs and Regulations of the Post Office.
 Social and Official Forms; the Rules of Grammar, with Common Errors; the Rules of Punctuation for Business Office Use.

Sheldon Summer School for 1910 a Big Success—Plans for 1911 : by A. R. Wines

WHEN I climbed aboard the train I was hot—likewise dirty and sticky. As a result there was a smoldering fire of resentment toward the weather, the dust, and things in general smoking under my collar.

But as soon as I entered the car I felt better.

At first I couldn't locate it, but there was something about the atmosphere of that beplushed box on wheels that revived my limp spirits. Then I saw them.

Just a little knot of young men and women—some of them wore their hair in becoming gray and white, but they were young, just the same. But there was a cleanliness, high spirits, and good fellowship about them that made me forget all about my pulpy collar and fifty-pound suitcase.

Not for a moment did I hesitate.

Walking right up, I stuck out my hands to the two neatest and said, "I'm going to Area, too."

Right then and there I became clean and young like the rest of them—anyhow, they made me feel that way.

We laughed and talked and sang on the way. Others joined us at a junction—knew us as soon as they came aboard—and then we shed so much sweetness and light that everybody in the car seemed to sit up straighter and look happier. Even the babies stopped fretting and smiled at us.

So we lived on the way to Sheldonhurst.

Yet the big circular camp of white tents among the trees on the campus of the coming Sheldon Commercial University looked like home, sweet home to us.

And Sheldonhurst! The woods, the meadows, the lake, the ravines, the tennis courts, basket-ball grounds, and base ball diamonds! Well, I never saw the Garden of Eden, or Paradise, or Elysium, or any of the dream-Utopias, but until someone complies with my Missourian demand, I'm going to stack my chips on Sheldonhurst.

Then there were hand shakes—real ones, you know. The boys—and some of the girls—that we chummed with at the Summer School of 1909.

First, we wrote our names in a big book, put down our pedigrees, and were assigned to our tents. And when I registered, I noticed that there was a long list of names ahead of mine—more than twice as many as the total enrolment of the Summer School of 1909.

Then I began to find myself taken in hand by a lot of keen, bronzed, happy young fellows in kahki. They were the students of the Sheldon Business Normal for 1910 and had been on the grounds since the first of July. So they felt that they were our hosts, too.

About this time, I caught sight of the disarming smile of Dr. Katherine M. H. Blackford, the lecturer on the Science of Service and Character Analysis. Dr. Blackford would have no friends but egotists if it weren't for that irresistible smile. She's so keen a reader of human nature that the humble man would feel like a guilty man in the sweat-box if she wasn't such a good fellow that she makes him forget all about himself.

It was all good for my heart action and brain vibrations, and I could feel my chest expand. But still there was something missing. But it was all made right when the big, wholesome man in a white flannel suit gathered me into his handclasp and showed me his luminous soul in his eyes. I felt like the returned prodigal at the feast.

Yes, it was Sheldon. Who else? Beside him was his gracious wife, our hostess at Sheldonthurst. She not only made us feel at home on the big estate, but her illuminating talks on child education in the lecture hall, and her unassuming participation in our fun at the camp fire made a big place for her in our hearts.

Two Great Weeks

And so my two big weeks began. If I were to write reams of paper, I couldn't tell you all about it.

I never traveled in such good company. Including the Business Normal fellows, our camp represented California, Connecticut, District of Columbia, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Texas, in the United States; Alberta, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, Saskatchewan, in Canada; Australia, Germany, Mexico, and Nicaragua.

Among the features were the seven that Baird brought down from Winnipeg, Manitoba, and Bergey's twelve from Toronto. The "Canadian Bunch" camped together and, in many ways, were "the life of the party."

Every morning in the big hall in the administration building of The Sheldon School, there were lectures and instruction by Mr. Sheldon and his staff. Every afternoon there was a special lecture. During the season, we heard several of the big men—men like Elbert Hubbard, Franklyn Hobbs "himself," W. P. Stearns, W. E. Coke, and others.

Three times a day in the big tent we ate of the fat of the land, laughed, and grew fat.

We swam, we rowed, we sailed, we fished, we rode horses, we tramped about the woods, we danced, we went to concerts at Ravinia Park, we played base ball, basket-ball, tennis, and other games, we read and studied business as it is done in Chicago, and we got acquainted all around.

Nearly every evening, there was a big camp fire in the center of the big circle of tents. There we sang, told stories, gave our experiences as business builders, did "stunts," and had an informal good time.

Here it was that we learned of the plans for the Summer School for 1911—and all made resolution to be here.

Next year the Sheldon Summer School and Sheldon Business Normal will begin on the same date, July 1, 1911. And when you come, you live ones, you will find most of the men and women of the Sheldon Summer School for 1910 here to meet you. One session does the business for a man—he is a life member after that.

I Live for Those Who Love Me

By FRANCIS MARGARET MILNE

I live for those who love me,
Whose hearts are kind and true;
For the heaven that smiles above me,
And awaits my spirit, too;
For all humanities that bind me,
For the tasks that God assigned me,
For the bright hopes left behind me,
And the good that I can do.

I live to hail the season,
By gifted minds foretold,
When men shall live by reason,
And not alone for gold;
When man to man united,
And every wrong thing righted,
The whole world shall be lighted,
As Eden was of old.

I live to hold communion
With all that is divine;
To feel there is a union
'Twixt Nature's heart and mine;
To profit by affliction,
Reap truth from fields of fiction,
Grow wiser from conviction,
And fulfill each grand design.

I live for those who love me,
For those who know me true;
For the heaven that smiles above me,
And awaits my spirit, too;
For the wrong that needs resistance,
For the cause that lacks assistance,
For the future in the distance,
And the good that I can do.

The Business Philosopher

A. F. SHELDON, EDITOR

VOLUME VI

SEPTEMBER, 1910

NUMBER 9

On the Front Porch

Where We Talk Things Over

I MET him at the club last night—a man whom I have known for many years. His usual smile and genial greeting were missing. His head was bowed.

As I shook his hand, I involuntarily exclaimed, "What's the matter, John? Have you been ill?"

He answered, "No, Sheldon, worse than that. My boy is dead."

My heart went out to him as yours has done to friends in sorrow.

We talked some time. I tried to cheer him up. To turn his mind away from grief, I drew him out about his business.

I found him heavy hearted there. For years he worked for others. He was and is one of the best sales managers I have ever known. As sales manager for a leading firm he served well indeed. Naturally he profited much.

Ambition led him on to do things for himself. He longed to have a business of his own. The opportunity presented itself and he acted.

Of course he plunged in debt, as most men do at such times. He has reduced his indebtedness. His business is in good financial condition.

He is on the road to great success as an employer, but he is fighting the battle that all men have to fight in the building of an organization.

In launching out for himself he thought that it would be easier than it has proved to be to find men who would serve him even as he had served others. He will find such men in time, for he deserves them and the law of compensation is working all the time.

As we were about to part, I said, "Is there anything I can do for you?"

At first he answered, "No." And then he thought a moment and said, "Yes. Try to find me a man, a real man."

Then he became intense as he said, "For God's sake, Sheldon, find me a man!"

And then he went on to tell me that he needed a mechanical genius who was also a manager of men.

His is a business that deals with the making of iron and brass specialties. It is a business of great possibilities.

He is personally a wonderful producer of sales and manager of salesmen, but he needs a man who will be to the making end of his business what he is personally to the selling end.

With a note of longing amounting almost to a cosmic call, he said, "The man I want is somewhere. He is looking and longing for me even as I am looking and longing for him. If you can find him for me I shall indeed be grateful."

Are you that man? I can't tell you John's other name here, but if you think you are the man, write me and I will tell you.

It won't cost either you or John a cent, but don't bother either me or John and don't waste your own time unless you are a real man and feel reasonably sure that you fill the rest of the bill.

THE FACTS ARE that my friend is only one of many who are loudly calling for men, real men, and it appeals to me that we could not select a more timely topic for our talk-it-over time this month than the question, "What constitutes a real man of the kind that this man wants?"

He has a man now—but not the man for the job.

The man he has is a good enough fellow, knows something about mechanics, and can handle men in an ordinary, "good enough" kind of way. But he needs watching all the time to see that he doesn't make costly errors. Worse than that, he lacks initiative. He doesn't go ahead and do the right thing without being told. He is often at a loss to know what to do, and takes a lot of John's time running to him and asking him about things.

So, you see, he needs much supervision, and his value is correspondingly low.

The man that John wants must be a man that doesn't need watching.

He must be able to do his work with very few, if any, errors—and especially without costly ones.

He must know all about the making of iron and brass specialties, so that he can go ahead and run the factory at a profit, from the standpoint of proportion of production to cost. This requires a thorough knowledge of the technique of this class of manufacture, a working knowledge of factory system and cost, skill in making high quality goods at a profit, and the power to keep employes up to the standard. This requires technical and engineering knowledge and skill, practical experience, a good working knowledge of factory method and management, and a familiarity with the latest and best machines and equipment for producing this class of goods.

But that isn't all. A man with all the qualifications I have named would be hard to get, but he wouldn't be worth much to my friend unless he also had initiative, self-reliance, good judgment, and keen, quick powers of decision and action. He would also have to be reliable, industrious, and a man of good health and endurance.

But even all that would not be enough to make the man that John wants. He must have the ability to handle men. He must know men—know the different types and temperaments and how to treat each. He must have tact, kindness, and loyalty, so that he can gain the confidence of men, but he must also have discernment, firmness, and courage, so that he can command respect and obedience.

If my friend could find such a man, he would be willing to let him acquire stock in his growing and highly profitable business, besides paying him a liberal salary to begin with and more as the business becomes larger and more successful—John told me he would rather pay the right man $5,000 than $3,500, and a $10,000 man would suit him better than a $5,000 man.

Where is the man?

I ask again, are you the man?

Here is an unusually good opening. The man that can fill it has his fortune made. He has no further need to worry about the future so far as finances are concerned.

How many thousands of men there are who would like to step into a pleasant berth of that kind!

How pitifully few there are who can!

Why are they so few? Why must my friend go about his business with a heavy heart? Why must he grip my hand and almost cry out to me to find him such a man?

Are there no men with mechanical genius and engineering skill? Are there no men with knowledge of factory system and management? Do all the millions of men who work in factories in this country learn nothing of these things? They have the opportunity.

And about these other qualifications. Do none of the skilled engineers and mechanics have initiative, self-reliance, good judgment, decision, and action? Do none of them have reliability, industry, good health and endurance?

Are there no men among these who have tact, kindness, loyalty, discernment, firmness, and courage?

Yes, there are plenty of men who have all these things. In fact we all have at least a little of each one of these qualities.

The trouble is that, in all too many, they are undeveloped. They are lying there dormant—or at any rate, only half awake.

Like muscles that are not properly nourished and are insufficiently exercised, they are thin, weak, flabby and almost powerless.

Of nourishment—mental food—there has been plenty, but these men have not partaken of it. Of opportunities to use their faculties there have been legion, but they have not grasped them.

What is the trouble?

I ask you. Why have you not taken the trouble—if you have not—to make yourself the kind of man my friend wants?

It is a serious question. Your success or failure—your place in life—is wrapped up in it. The big business, political, and social problems press upon us because men and women do not properly nourish and use their inborn faculties and qualities.

---

JUST TO give you this same idea from another point of view—as well as entertain you, I am going to give you here, in full, a paper read before the class of 1910, Sheldon Business Normal, now in session at Area. This paper was written and read by a member of the class, Prof. J. E. Morris, of Alliance, Ohio. It was written as a part of the regular class work, in response to a call from the instructor for each student to write in his own words, and with his own manner of treatment, an exposition of the Seven Eternals.

Let me say, in explanation, that the Seven Eternals are the seven great truths about man, beginning with the fundamental: "Your power to serve and hence your profit-making, success-winning power, is dependent upon the amount of supervision you need in your work. That is to say, the less supervision you need, the greater your value; the more supervision you need, the less your value."

Look for the other six in Prof. Morris' paper. They are all there.

Now, here is the paper:

"And it came to pass in the days of the Sultan Abdul Aziz, son of Abdul Aswas, that a young man in a far off country said unto himself, 'Behold these seven years have I toiled and have made little progress. Wherein have I failed? Why hath not success smiled upon me? What shall I do to increase my value?'"

"And as the young man meditated upon these questions, he became grievously possessed of the spirit of despondency and cried out in a loud voice, 'Woe is me! Who can deliver me from this living stagnation?'"

"And his father and his mother and all his kin lifted up their voices and bewailed the young man in his grief.

"And they took counsel, and brought the matter before the elders of the city as they sat in the gate thereof.

"And the chief patriarch of the city reproved the young man and said unto him, 'Why makest thou all this fuss? What disturbing spirit hath entered into thee that thou art dissatisfied? Art thou better than thy fathers? Art thou superior to these elders before whom thou art standing this day?'"

"And the chief patriarch sat down with indignation on his face, and all the assembly maintained a deep silence for the space of seven minutes.

"At that time there arose in the audience the wise man of the city, and he said:

" 'I have sympathy in my heart for this young man. Praise and not censure should be given to this manifestation of the spirit of progress. Therefore, hearken unto me. There dwelleth in the northland and toward the setting sun, a great king. He is wise, like unto Solomon. Let the young man go unto him with his questions.'

"And the young man put on his sandals, girded himself, and with staff and lunch-box set forth.

"He found the king seated within a tent under an oak tree. He made obeisance unto the king and was kindly received. And the king said unto the young man, 'Wherefore comest thou hither?'"

"And he answered, 'To learn how to increase my value and to merit success.'

"And the king said, 'Thou hast a noble desire. Art thou willing to serve and suffer and sacrifice for success?'"

"And he said, 'Yea, I am.'

"And the king said, 'What is thy occupation?'"

"And he answered, 'Thy servant is a camel driver.'

"And the king asked, 'Doth not thy chief take much time each caravan to give thee instructions as to where to go, how fast to travel, where to camp, what merchandise to sell, and what to buy when thou returnest?'"

"And he answered, 'Yea, O king.'

"Then', said the king, 'If thou wouldst serve better and profit more, reduce thy need of supervision.'

"And the king asked again, 'Hast thou, O young man, been diligent in business? Hast thou avoided mistakes?'

"And he answered, 'I fear not. For one night I gazed too long at the stars and neglected properly to feed and water my camels for the next day's journey across the desert, and one of the camels died. At another time I was so fatigued from dancing in the market-place that I could scarcely walk in the caravan and had to ride on one of the camels and thus injured it.'

"And the king spoke, 'If thou wouldst serve better and profit more, reduce thy errors of omission and commission.'

"And the king asked yet again, 'Art thou careful?'

"And he answered, 'Nay, nay, for once did I carelessly tie the rice bags that were on my camels and the birds followed us to pick up the rice that leaked out.'

"And the king asked, 'Dost thou obey orders?'

"And he answered, 'It grieveth me to admit that I have caused my master great loss by reason of my disobedience.'

"Then said the king, 'I perceive that carelessness and disobedience are not thine only failure qualities.'

"Therefore, if thou wouldst serve well and profit much, thou must overcome or destroy more and more of thy negative qualities. And the way to overcome thy negative or failure qualities is to develop the corresponding positive or success qualities.

"Instead of staring and dancing in the market-place when thou hadst important business on hand, thou shouldst have been studying thy instruction book, or caring for thy camels, or getting thy rest for the desert trip.'

"Instead of being careless and disobedient thou shouldst have tried to be careful and obedient.

"Therefore if thou wouldst serve well and profit much to the end of the enjoyment of complete success, thou must develop thy positive qualities.'

"And when the young man heard all these admonitions from the king he rent his clothes, beat upon his breast, and cried with an exceeding great cry, 'Woe, woe is me! It is too high, I cannot attain unto it. I must be a camel driver all my life. Wherewith can I develop the positives?'

"And the king spake softly unto the young man and said, 'Nay, not so; be not grieved overmuch; the case is not so bad; thou hast within thee all the positives; they are sleeping; the garden of thy heart is full of the seeds of success, but they cannot grow because thou hast neglected it and the weeds of failure have nearly choked thy garden.'

"Now, therefore, if thou wouldst serve well and profit much, thou must apply thine heart unto wisdom, which meaneth that thou must nourish and use the positive forces of the body and mind, and lo, they are within thee and must be brought out.'

"Now, when the king had thus spoken, the heart of the young man rejoiced within him, and his spirit revived.

"And he said, 'O king, live forever! I will apply my heart unto wisdom, I will seek knowledge, I will get understanding.'

"And the king was pleased and said unto the young man, 'If thou doest these things, then the result thereof when applied to thy whole self will be Ability, Reliability, Endurance and Action. Therefore,' said the king, 'if thou wouldst increase thy power to serve and thy power to make profits, and attain unto success, thou must increase thine AREA.'

"Now, when the young man heard the word area, he was mystified and wondered whereto this would grow. But the king enlightened him and said, 'The word Area is made up of the initial letters of the words ability, reliability, endurance, and action. Ability meaneth the education of the head. Reliability hath reference to the rightness of the heart. Endurance pertaineth to the training of the body for strength and health. And action meaneth "Get there."'

"And the young man said unto the king, 'Blessed be Allah that hath given thee wisdom like unto that of the prophet Mohammed.'

"And he gave unto the king fifty and five pieces of silver, coin of the realm. And the king gave unto the young man two-and-thirty books which contained the things that made one wise.

"And the young man salaamed and departed unto his own country. And he became a great merchant, having caravans that traded in Mecca, Bokhara, Teheran, Khartoum, and Timbuctu."

---

YOU WANT to know more about the Sheldon Business Normal?

This class of 1910 is the first enrolled, and I am very proud of it. In it there are twenty-two young men of various ages, ranging from twenty-five to fifty, all of them successful business and professional men. They have come to Area from Canada, Nicaragua, Germany, Mexico, and from ten states of the United States, from Massachusetts to California, from Minnesota to Texas. They are taking personal instruction in the science of business building, in salesmanship, advertising, business methods, business economics, business technique, and business management.

I am being assisted in the instruction by Dr. Katherine M. H. Blackford, M. D., who is recognized as the foremost expert in character analysis in the world. In fact, she is the formulator of the science of character analysis; by Mr. A. G. Taylor, who has been for years a successful lecturer and instructor in A R E A sciences; by Mr. H. H. Rodee, in public speaking; by George Landis Wilson, of the Business Counsel Division of the Sheldon School, in business technique, and by a number of experts in various lines from Chicago and other cities—leading business and professional men in their various callings.

This term of the Business Normal began the first of July. The class will be graduated on October first.

It is going to be a glorious three months for me. Seldom have I had the pleasure of meeting with a cleaner, keener, brighter, or more receptive company of business and professional men than these twenty-two members of the class of 1910 of Sheldon Business Normal.

Economical Reasons for the Wave of Temperance Reform : by David Gibson

THIS temperance wave that has been rolling over the country in the past few years is economical rather than moral.

It is intellectual rather than emotional.

Obviously the emotionalists, the long haired men and short haired women, who are in it as a matter of morals, have undoubtedly helped some, but by comparison with the economist, the intellectual, they are a good deal like the fly on the elephant's neck who had just pulled a load of mahogany logs up a hill, and which exclaimed on reaching the summit: "Well, we've had a long pull!"

When a manufacturer of Muncie, Indiana, that the writer knows, puts up forty thousand dollars of his personal funds and hires the best practical politician in the state to vote the town dry, you can be pretty well assured that there is going to be something doing in the way of ten per cent dividends very soon.

When you pay off a bunch of men on Tuesday and ten per cent of them do not show up next day, both you and the men soon realize the frightful cost. Not alone the cost of the booze direct, but the fact that it incapacitates men for production.

Take a bunch of tool makers, or a bunch of printers, and the best man among them—the best in actual ability—is a booze fighter. His brain and hands are out of commission at a critical time. As a result, a man of really less ability takes his place.

Sober men are taking the places of boozers everywhere, just as the scientific salesman has taken the place of goodfellowship salesman—it is purely a question of economy.

The Saloon, a School for Drunkards

The favorite argument of the "wets" is this: When you close the saloon you open the speakeasy; you close the opportunity for drinking light alcoholic beverages and render only the higher and inferior spirituous liquors available.

This is all true enough, but—

You only open the speak-easy to this generation of drinkers.

With the saloon out of existence you take the saloon attitude away that educates each generation of drinkers.

The very existence of a saloon is an advertisement to educate drinkers.

Youth is venturesome and curious. They see men drinking and they want to test the effect. The curiosity of ignorance leads many a young person into the habits and disease of drink.

If you tell of the effect of a certain narcotic in a newspaper, you will have several people trying the drug to see if it is really so.

A saloon is just like any other business in this respect, that it creates business within and by itself. That's why most stores have show cases and show windows.

A saloon creates business on this same principle, but—

A saloon is not a legitimate business.

It is a negative rather than a positive influence.

It is destructive rather than productive.

Confessions of a Booze Fighter

While the writer has been a teetotaler for a good many years, yet in his time he has helped open a few saloons in the morning and participated in some closings at night, and we will take his case to show how the average boy learns to drink and gets the drink habit.

In a small town, the livery stable where the race horse touts, swipes and rail birds gather in winter is always attractive to a boy. These become his ideals in a way, he is anxious to enter their good graces and soon performs little offices for them, the principal one of which is "rushing the can."

He says to himself that this stuff must be good from the way the fellows go at it, and when the can is passed around the stove in the office at the corner of the stable, takes his turn. He doesn't like it—it's bitter; but still there must be something in it that he has not found, for Old

John Day, the stable foreman, he gets drunk, and so does Ben Hoey, one of the swipes. After considering that it must be his own fault instead of the beer he keeps at it until he really likes it.

Then with a few of the older kids he begins to rush the can on his own private account. He hears a big story about all the touts and swipes and livery stable chambermaids generally getting on a big drunk the night before! How they started in at Charley Polster's saloon and ended up at Pete Snitzel's, and obviously, the fellow who is telling it was the soberest of the crowd.

Then his curiosity is awakened as to the other phase of drinking—the effect. He gets out with the kids some night and drinks as much as he can conveniently hold, and acts a good deal more drunk than he really is.

Then he hears stories about capacity drinking—how Ed. Wurgler, the toughest "bub" about the stable, went to a German party and drank twenty-five glasses of beer—this number is usually beyond the ability of the average country follower of the track to buy out of season, so he must be favored where it is free. He has no opportunity to try this, neither has he the capacity, but still it remains an ideal of his.

He finds some booze bottles hid around over the stable, drains one or two of them. Doesn't like the stuff, burns his tongue and gags him, but still there must be something about it, or why should men drink it?

A few years roll around, he has changed his environment and for a time his sense grows faster than his appetite. He gets a job in an office, notices that his boss drinks, so does the next man to the boss, and he doesn't see that it is putting them down and out. He drinks occasionally and even gets out in a crowd and gets "tanked" now and again. He is sick next day, either lays off or gets through with his work the best he can.

A few more years, he grows and his job grows and he is drinking more as he earns more. The night "busts" become more frequent, but he has found a way of treating the "next morning effects" by taking an early "bracer"—before breakfast.

Here at this point the nerve tissues are fast becoming destroyed. There is a constant craving for a stimulant. He, in time, becomes a steady drinker with a route of about so many saloons at certain times in the day and goes around smelling like a gas leak. Or according to nerve temper, he may become a periodical drinker—where he must lay off for a week and simply drinks till his stomach quits—he doesn't quit, his stomach quits.

Obviously, if a man is young when he arrives at this point and his ambitions stronger than his appetite, there are hopes for him. By having a talk with himself, changing his line of work, moving off to another environment and changing the whole key of life in which he has been playing, he becomes another man, save in name and body.

How the Saloon Builds Business

These few brief "Confessions of a Booze Fighter" would not be printed if the circulation of this magazine were not to mature men; for if they were young they would only serve as curiosity awakens—a curiosity alarm clock. But—

They will serve the purpose of illustrating the fact that one generation of drinkers educates the next.

While you will open the speak-easy by closing the saloon and all that, yet you do not give it a chance to exist openly and advertise itself openly as in the case of the corner saloon.

Supposing you are not a drinking man. You are down town occasionally at night. You resolve to take the very next car home. In going past a restaurant on the way to your car you observe that it is well lighted, clean and beautifully decorated; people are sitting at the tables eating and you even get a whiff of some of the good things on the bill—possibly there is an orchestra playing.

Now, this restaurant keeper doesn't know what the word psychology means, yet he has applied the science. He has appealed to your every sense in order to get you into his place—that of smelling, seeing, tasting and hearing. Instead of going directly home, as you had intended, you go in, eat a good meal and spend some of your money.

The same would be true if you were an occasional drinker and this restaurant were a saloon.

A saloonkeeper is a merchant the same as a restaurant keeper or any other storekeeper and he seeks and creates business in the same way.

The saloonkeeper is more frequently a decent fellow than otherwise; attracting and creating business becomes second nature to him, as in the case of the rest of us. Like us, he knows his business perfectly in relation to itself, but the saloonkeeper does not know that his institution is a menace to other industries and commercial pursuits; because he appeals to a weakness rather than a strength.

The saloonkeeper is individually not to blame, for he is there in the supply of a demand, and he is voted out of business and his property practically confiscated, just as in the case of the slaves of the South. While slave trade was an unscientific business, as the saloon business is unscientific, unnatural, yet it is all the business they have and there should be some way of compensating the loss.

Business Men are Drinking Less

The temperance wave which has been going over this country is just the tendency to the efficient adjustment of industry and commerce and is the result of straight, scientific thinking.

That there is less drinking among men is seen everywhere. Down in New York City there is a noon lunch club on the top floor of the Postal Telegraph Building, opposite City Hall Park, known as the Hardware Club. It is patronized by the business men in the jobbing and other trades in that section of the city. Ten years ago, if you had looked around over the big dining room, seating possibly two hundred persons, you could have seen a highball at every plate. The other day the writer was in there at the noon hour and there were not six drinks in the room.

Most of the table glassware of the country is sold to jobbers and big retailers by the manufacturers holding an exhibit twice a year at Pittsburg, and all the buyers in the trade gather there at these times. Most of the furniture is sold in the same way by the manufacturers holding exhibits at Grand Rapids, Michigan.

Each one of these meetings meant a big drunk a few years ago. There was a portable bar in every booth, and salesmanship depended upon a man's capacity to carry a load. But this is no more. The exhibits are still held, but all the tank salesmen are either dead or out of business or have quit drinking. Goods are sold purely on merit and drinking among the buyers and sellers is the exception.

The Paralyzing Effect of Alcohol

The fact that alcohol has no internal value to man has been scientifically proven. It isn't even a stimulant—it is paralyzing in its effect.

Some months ago, at Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore, a test was made by taking ten men in a normal state and having them do small examples in arithmetic, at finding a certain word in a dictionary and other minor mental feats. An accurate account was kept of the time required by each individual of the ten, and which was afterwards averaged. Then each was given an ounce of whiskey and the same examples of a like character. After a long series of average tests it was found that under the effects of alcohol in the system the speed was not only reduced, but the error account increased.

This all goes to show that while drinking may not always get a man down, yet it is a negative quality that is keeping him stationary.

There may be successful men who are heavy drinkers; yet they are successful in spite of it rather than by reason of it. The men who can drink and be successful are so rare in strength of character as to make them an unsafe precedent in considering the average man.

It isn't the actual cost of booze itself, but rather its cost in rendering men less efficient to produce, and this is not a moral consideration.

"One thing is clear to me: that no indulgence of passion destroys the spiritual nature so much as respectable selfishness."
—Geo. Macdonald.

"The great lack of the age is conscientiousness in trifles."—R. J. Campbell.

Our salvation is not in sacrifice, but in production.—David Gibson.

A Good Business Letter and What Makes the Writer of it : by Frederick W. Pettit

THERE is not wanting evidence that well-written letters bring orders—deliver the goods.

Experience in this direction is, however, varied. Firms there are who have made a phenomenal success of the letter salesmanship system—others have barely broken even—while still others have had severe trials in this direction and have stepped down and out.

Let it be stated with strong assurance, that to make a success of letter salesmanship, it has to be done—just so.

Certain factors enter into a campaign of this nature—factors that must stand investigation from all view points—square to the four winds that blow. They are:

1. A good proposition.
2. A good appropriation.
3. A good letter.

Three essentials that may be called—the Object, the Motive Power and the Medium.

Why Mail Order Campaigns Fail

Some goods, articles or propositions lend themselves more readily to a mail order campaign than others—they will stand a greater percentage of expense. Where failure occurs it may be put down to insufficient funds, weak letters, and very probably, if investigated, a weak all-round campaign.

It is beyond question that given a generous appropriation and every mechanical facility, unless the letters are of the highest grade—brilliant compositions tinged with vim and snap in strong, original form—there can be nothing but failure.

Business letter writing, as indeed is all good letter writing, even in these days of telephones, cables and xeroforms, is still an ART. Some there are to the manner born to this kind of work, just as some are musicians, mechanics or painters. But even with such gifted natures, talent must be supplemented by knowledge, training, and hard work.

They tell of a man in Gotham who commands as high as $25 for writing a page follow-up letter—a sum that looks a trifle high, yet, on investigation, it would be found relatively cheaper than mere rubbish at one-tenth the price.

The business letter, while requiring the aid of the campaign machinery, is nevertheless the keynote of the situation, and for this reason the best in this kind of literature is none too good.

The waste burner of large business blocks consigns to the flames annually tons upon tons of unread form letters, which glide practically from the mail bag to the waste basket.

Waste—waste—of energy, material and anticipation.

If ever any phase of business called for the very highest workmanship, it is assuredly this work of business letter writing, and only by experience—being cajoled by smooth talk with handing over this department to incompetency—will the users become able to discriminate what the best really is.

What Makes A Good Letter Writer

A service of this nature is among the brainiest of workmanship; and, if the best costs more at the outset, like many other things, it will be found infinitely cheaper in the ultimate—and the best is found only in a few minds with a special training in this particular direction.

Well written letters get a reading and consideration even from hard, flinty business men.

They must, however, carry originality, an easy flow, and limelight the proposition at a glance.

To be able to write these is an art.

And that art is built upon a science—the science of business building.

The fundamental principles of letter writing are the same as those of salesmanship, in the broadest sense of that word.

Good Service Brings Success in the Foothills of the West : by George H. Eberhard

TO OBSERVE the way every man conducts his business affairs, to look carefully for the laws or conditions that underlie his success, is becoming second nature to me. As a consequence I am sitting in the shade of a big, black oak which protects me from the noonday warmth of our California sunshine, and putting down some of the ideas that have been suggested by my present vacation trip.

The part of the "Promised Land" that I am visiting is the Sierra Nevada foothills in California, about due east from San Francisco. I may say that I have seen the changes wrought during a period of over twenty-three years in this particular section.

The Old Days and the New

Of course, my memory of the old days is that of a boy, fresh from the Middle West. All through the foothills then, the last of the Argonauts, those who had not secured the gold or entered into mercantile pursuits with success during the gold excitement, were ranching.

Some few merely squatted on the land in little cabins among the pine and oak-covered hills and worked alone on the creek beds with rocker, pan and sluice.

The big placers had long since been worked out or made unprofitable by the debris laws. Those who were married usually took to cattle and horse raising and cultivated some little meadow near where they built a cabin, sheds and corrals.

In those days it was feast or famine. A dry year made the cattle and horses poor, and hay was very high, if any could be purchased. Good rains, and all was well, resulting in the making of brave plans that the next dry year caused to be set aside.

Business or agricultural science, even in a limited way, was apparently undreamed of by the old guard. One could ride for days and find no fences except near a homesteader's cabin, for most of the land, being government, was secured by living on it the required time. Of course, vast tracts were secured by those who filed and swore falsely that it was to be their home. This land was used for grazing of herds of cattle and horses.

The railroad owned alternate sections for many miles each side of its right of way given by the government, whose money also builded the road and some private fortunes. Land when sold, brought only $2.50 to $10.00 an acre.

Today the new era is dawning, the land is valuable and fenced, gates are seemingly everywhere. The land has been cleared and cultivated, and gardens irrigated, so though the season is dry or wet, some crop is assured.

Painted houses, though not as yet the painted barn, are in evidence. Even the stage line and the stage with its leather springs and six horses, where I rode between the driver and the shotgun-bearing express messenger, are making way for the automobile stage service.

The railroads—electric and steam—are working through the hills and soon the power companies will distribute their electric light along the roads. The telephone now follows the wagon road. The cream-separator and the porcelain bathtub are here and tell the story of the great change.

The Men Who Succeeded

With this rough sketch before us, let's ask, "What are the men like who are succeeding, and why do they succeed?"

Everywhere I find proof of Sheldon's statement that "The science of business is the science of service. He profits most who serves best."

The storekeeper in the nearby town who, years ago, had the big trade, is now an old man broken in health and fortune. With his little remaining trade he still charges the highest price and gives the poorest quality so as to insure a profit. His competitor, who started with but $90 a few years ago and gave good value, plus service, asking a reasonable profit, has grown to first rank. His are the loads the big teams haul over the grade-road from the railroad.

The man who makes the business of teaming pay now goes regularly on his fifteen-mile drive every other day, he personally attends to the detail and has the thought of rendering service foremost in mind.

The old, loud-spoken friend of the way-side inn drives his team still, but his loads are like his trips—irregular and unprofitable. Telling of the old days when it was different is his only compensation.

The ranch hand of today, here in these wonder hills where fruit tree, vine, garden and dairy are multiplying in the fulfilment of the promise of the "Promised Land," is no longer the halfbreed or the old miner in need of a few dollars. He is the quiet worker of good habits who knows that service, intelligent effort, means steady employment and good wages.

Everywhere I go, the men who stand out through all these years of visits to the hills, are those who worked—who were clean minded and honest. This whole divide is a sermon in behalf of honest effort of service building success.

The workers have created around them in the years past a reputation that makes them the respected men of today. Those who, in the early days, apparently profited by the mean way, are coming to their own and live as lessons to the student.

What of the Future

Nature is near one here, not hidden with the cement and brick of the city. In contrast the shirker, the waster and the narrow man in the hills stands out in all his uselessness and ugliness against the honest, clean worker, who lives right and sanely.

There is much to be done, however. The gasoline engine, the hydraulic ram, the use of cement, planned development of the whole ranch or farm, soil study, conservation of soil, water and timber, the selection of stock and plants must all be appreciated here before the new era can reach its zenith.

When the farmer, the fruit grower, the rancher realize that these things are as necessary as typewriters, cash registers, card ledgers, check books and all that go to facilitate the dispatch of business are to the business men, then only will they profit in full as they deserve.

Service that Serves

By C. FIRST JOHNSON

IN OBSERVING conditions as they reach me in my efforts to serve my fellow-man, I have concluded that any man can succeed provided he gets into his head that he is a manufacturer of the greatest commodity in all the world—and that that commodity is Service that Serves.

Let any man sell the Service that Serves, and he is a success already. He is a creator, because the world is looking for the manufacturing establishment which offers and furnishes this rare commodity.

There is always room for folks who are willing to serve. Greatness is often found in simplicity—the simplicity of service.

Invest your time, then, in finding ways in which you can render the Service that Serves. You need give no concern about the kind of business in which you are engaged or the place at which you find yourself employed, provided your business is honorable and you are willing to Serve.

People never fight to keep anyone from serving them. This thought emanates from the whole human race. Get busy in doing things for people, and they will just naturally begin to do things for you. This is what I call rendering Service that Serves.

Some people will tell you that for you the opportunity does not exist. Whether they are right is not the question, but the burning question is for you to get busy at your work and create your opportunity.

Begin to build, to lift, to construct, and you will succeed where you are.

Apply all of the strength with which you are endowed to useful ends and you will be led step by step, degree by degree, plane by plane into the sunny atmosphere of this life.

Believe in yourself and you will get others to believe in you.

Keep climbing, keep working, keep serving, and some day fate will take your measure for the great prizes of life.

Motto: Rendering the service that serves, I am a success.

School and City Gardens as Factors in Human Conservation : by Maron Watson

SCHOOL gardens and city gardens are at work putting big profits into the pockets of the business man of tomorrow.

I wonder how many will get that without a word of further explanation. I know that many big progressives will—because they saw the point long ago. Several of them would tell you, with enthusiasm, that these same gardens were putting money into their pockets in this year of the comet. And they are right. But the big profits on these little plots of ground are going to fall into the hands of your son and my grandsons.

To those of you who have not looked into this thing, and who may not be able to see the connection between Jimmy Grimes' three-by-ten-foot bed of radishes today and your own George Albert's bank roll twenty-five years from now, I recommend a careful reading of this story of the development of the garden idea.

The foundations of your business success lie a great deal broader and deeper than the capital invested, the stock of goods on hand, and the present good will of the concern. Your success depends upon the power of people everywhere to produce wealth, and the manner in which society distributes that wealth.

And the increased cost of living has taught us a severe lesson in the results of diminished power to produce wealth. All human prosperity—even human life itself—depends upon the product of the soil. And scientific agriculture can get from fifty to five hundred per cent more out of the soil than the old hit or miss ways. More important even than that is the effect of the study and work on the girls and boys. These effects are many. The gardens give an outlet for surplus vitality, build up health, increase knowledge and skill, develop industry and initiative, perseverance, business methods, and love of nature; provide food and money for the little gardeners and their families, and make beautiful the barren spots in our cities.

The Work in Chicago

In Chicago, more than sixty-five acres of these gardens are now under cultivation, under the direction of the Chicago City Garden Association. More than two thousand men, women, and children are engaged in cultivating this acreage. These represent about four hundred families.

The garden tracts are distributed as follows: McCormick Harvester Company gardens, fifteen acres; Western Electric gardens, at Hawthorne, twenty acres; George E. Adams gardens, Fortieth and West Chicago avenues, ten acres.

The Lincoln Center tracts, loaned by the Hill estate, consist of a children's garden at Fortieth and Langley avenue, and an adults' garden at Fortieth and Stanton avenue.

Every amateur gardener pays a yearly fee of $1.50. This entitles him or her to the use of a certain space for the raising of vegetables subject to the supervision of the association officers. The gardener virtually possesses a "deed" to the land, but must keep its condition up to a required standard.

The officers of the association follow: President, Laura Dainty Pelham; vice president, C. W. Price of the International Harvester Company; secretary, Miss Amelia Sears, United Charities; treasurer, Miss Harriett Vittum, Northwestern University settlement; superintendent, A. A. Fisk; directors, Jens Jensen, Graham Romeyn Taylor, F. A. Winkleman, C. W. Farr, W. H. Schultz.

In the association literature the purpose, work, and results of the movement are epitomized as follows:

"Our purpose—Not to give charity but to open an opportunity for those in need to help themselves by their own work.

"Our work—The cultivation of gardens by those in need on unused land in our city, subject to dispossession when the owner wants to use the land.

"Our results—Opportunities opened to the mentally and physically incapable, the aged, and other needy and unemployed persons to improve their condition morally, mentally, and physically without pauperizing them. Increased industry, thrift, self-respect, self-confidence, sobriety, and honesty. Waste places turned into beautiful gardens."

The twentieth century garden is growing boys and girls, says the Chicago Tribune.

Three boys doing damage to the extent of $30,000 in an Ohio suburb are credited with starting the movement for boys' vegetable gardens in America.

They lived in Slidertown, then a straggling village on the outskirts of Dayton, Ohio, and as the president of a large corporation there estimated it, had each worked about $10,000 worth of mischief in the neighborhood, making it a byword.

The corporation president thought the boys needed farms to grow on.

The city had no cows to drive, no chores to do, no live green things to watch and tend. And inasmuch as he could not take them to the farm, he decided he would bring the farm to them.

He plowed and laid out in plots two acres of ground. That was in 1897.

Ten years later there were fifty of these individual gardens, each ten by one hundred feet in size, and tended by as many different boys, the corporation furnishing tools, seeds, and other equipments and the head gardener.

Plan Makes Rapid Progress

At first the boys were backward. Some of them laughed. Then a few took hold.

The boys were fascinated. Bulbs soon appeared. The boys became proud.

Vegetables came. The boys wondered. Finally they grew enthusiastic. Others joined them and before the end of the season forty boys were working together systematically in the gardens.

The company announced a series of annual prizes amounting to $50. And the boys were also allowed to sell what they raised at market prices. Now each year all make enough money during the summer to provide pocket money for the winter. Some keep their families supplied with vegetables through the whole summer.

In each succeeding year the interest has so increased that now there always are more applications for membership than there are plots of ground. There is a course of instruction covering two years, and diplomas are awarded at an annual banquet given by the company's president.

Application for membership in the gardening class is made by card each spring, and since there always are more boys applying than can be received the surplus number are furnished with seeds, bulbs, and tools so that they can have gardens at home.

Each boy gardener is given a notebook in which a record is kept of the progress of his garden and the sale of his product at harvest time.

Ten years after the gardens were established three crops of lettuce were taken from the gardens, three crops of beans, and 6,000 pounds of radishes, as only part of the output. Ten tons of vegetables was the season's yield.

The corporation president and his fellow citizens believe the gardens are growing boys as well as vegetables. They believe that without living somewhere near to nature's heart the city boy must lack some essential virility that goes to give him his manliness.

Idea Now Generally Accepted One

And that is what people everywhere are beginning to think. In Iowa they call it park life. In Cleveland it is the Home Gardening Association. In Chicago it is the Chicago City Gardens Association, which reports four hundred gardens cultivated by those in need on unused land in the city limits, one hundred on the Harvester land, one hundred and sixty at Forty-fourth and West Sixteenth streets, one hundred at Fortieth street and Chicago avenue, and the rest in the neighborhood of Langley avenue and Fortieth street on the south side.

At the University of Chicago, in the school of education, the children are being taught how to raise plants, and if their friends will rally to their aid they will have a botanical garden and a greenhouse for the public to visit and enjoy and study flower life in.

In the public schools and normal schools it is school gardens and Bird and Arbor day. But under one name or another all over the state the children are hearing the call of the country which they love and are going back to the simple soil to get the wholesome culture which books and brick walls cannot supply.

Cleveland Gardens Set Pattern

Some of the most successful and pattern school gardens are in Cleveland. At the Rosedale school there is a wonderful large lawn, an ample playground, a rock garden, a small formal garden, a botanical garden, hot beds, work tables, benches, a tool house, and individual vegetable gardens, as well as two handsome rose arbors, a picturesque sundial, and two delightful stone garden seats.

The children grow with the gardens and are realizing every season the most magical influences on themselves from their garden work.

One of the boys has become so enthusiastic that he has engaged to work in the country next summer, and it will be about the first summer he has ever spent outside the city gates.

One of the younger girls said: "I did not have St. Vitus' dance this summer nor last, since I have worked in the school garden."

The nervous strain of the school room from which many delicate children suffer is greatly relieved by the out of door activity.

Another girl, now in the high school, who worked in one of the school gardens for two years has decided to become a landscape gardener. In preparation for her career she raises all the vegetables for her family and is studying the relation of soil, sunshine, and moisture to the trees, shrubs, and plants.

There is a special garden for the mentally and physically defective children, who learn many practical lessons in reading and arithmetic from the gardening processes. Those who cannot plant seeds and bulbs or measure walks and beds take delight in keeping the paths free from weeds and rubbish. While the school garden is not primarily for the defective, it has become one of the most potent means ever devised for elevating them to normal conditions.

Garden Lesson in Other Studies

Problems of arithmetic are found in drawing gardens to scale, in finding the areas of beds, and in computing weights and measures.

The observation of soil, rainfall, change of season, and plants affords the material for lessons in elementary geography.

The manual training department furnishes models from which labels, shrub tags, stakes, flower sticks, and line winders are made.

The supervisor of domestic science wishes to have a garden at every center in which the girls can raise the vegetables they are learning to cook.

In view of the relationships to almost every phase of the regular school program, the idea is emphasized that gardening should be treated neither as an extra nor as a fad, but as a fundamental part of the regular school instruction.

Training Garden a Great Success

The training garden is a novelty and a wonderful success. The boys are encouraged to make their work in the garden a basis for investigation and study, so that in the end they may be inclined to adopt one of the many branches of nature life, agriculture or horticulture, as a vocation. This means sifting out the unresponsive and securing the good will and support of the parents by laying before them the object of the work and the opportunities it affords.

Otis W. Caldwell, formerly of the Eastern Illinois State Normal school and now of the University of Chicago, tells of a rather lethargic and somewhat troublesome boy in the spring of 1905, who did not want to work in the garden of the normal school.

Discussions of bees, of beautiful flowers, of thrifty vegetables, or experiments in crossing varieties of corn did not appeal to him.

Finally he was asked if he did not wish to see how much money he could make by growing radishes in a bed six by twelve feet. This appealed to him, and he no sooner had planted the bed than he asked for another.

He was allowed one-half of another bed.

He began at once making plans as to disposition of his radishes and engaged his entire crop to a local hotel, agreeing to furnish bunches of twenty radishes at 5 cents a bunch.

The receipts from the sales to the hotel were $2.65, and radishes worth 85 cents had been taken to the boy's mother for home use, thus making a return of $3.50.

The next season the boy persuaded his parents to rent a vacant lot for his use in growing potatoes, and during the season following he had charge of a small farm. He is now especially interested in the science of agriculture and is planning to take a course in an agricultural college.

New Interest in Agriculture

The farmers are feeling what it means to them and to their calling for the children to be educated in flower, vegetable, and tree raising. Their organizations are co-operating with the state agricultural colleges, and with state and county departments of education, with organized clubs in connection with country schools of Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Nebraska, and Texas. These clubs for the most part are composed of farmers' sons. And they attend the farmers' institute meetings, visit schools and colleges and large farms, conduct seed tests and experiment with fertilizers and soils.

In Indiana twelve county school superintendents have organized clubs for the study of agricultural productivity, and they have asked Purdue university to organize a training school for teachers in agriculture and nature study.

Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, South Dakota, and Wisconsin all require agriculture to be taught in the elementary schools.

Nearly all the states have agricultural colleges, and Alabama, California, Minnesota, and Wisconsin have agricultural high schools.

Europe Heads the Movement

Europe has been doing even more in many respects. In the French country districts are 28,000 schools with gardens attached, in which boys and girls are taught tree planting, gardening, and other farm work.

In Russia there are 800 such schools, where all the pupils are also taught silk-worm raising, bee-keeping, and the girls, dairy work, poultry raising, cooking, sewing, nursing, and other home work.

At the Nikitsk school the pupils spend three hours a day in the schoolroom and four or five hours in the garden. In other Russian provinces the children are given fruit trees to plant around the school houses and homes.

In the Belgian schools the children all must study agriculture.

School gardens are common in Saxony, Switzerland, Sweden, and one province of Austria. They were first established in Sweden. The United States, England, and Germany are the most backward in the school garden movement.

In Europe the government furnishes the ground and seed needed free. Each garden is divided up into plots, one for each pupil. The teacher tends a special bed as a pattern and then lets the youngsters cultivate their plots as they think best. They generally take pains, for they own all they raise and prizes are given for the best kept and most productive beds.

The American government has issued a bulletin devoted to school gardens with detailed directions on starting them and the best ways and methods. In this bulletin L. C. Corbett of the bureau of plant industry points out that those who have had most experience in the school garden movement are emphatic in their statements regarding the educational value of the work.

America will have to take up this school and city garden work in earnest if your son's business is to prosper in a big way.

You can do the boy a mighty good turn by becoming a center of agitation for the movement in your community.

---

Think of the millions upon millions of years it took for you to evolve into this world and then think of the millions upon millions of years you will be off of this world, and compare those with the instant of time you are visiting this world. Read that again, then—improve your visit—F. L. Oilar.

---

Every noble life leaves the fibre of it interwoven forever in the works of the world.—Ruskin.

---

We cannot declare dividends on excuses.—George W. Ballinger.

THE professor told me this. Not being a master of that amusing study known as antelopeology, I pass it on just as he told it, not vouching for its truth, nor recommending that it be tried on anything except human beings.

Capturing
the Antelope.

"Do you know how they catch antelope out west?" asks the professor, shaking his Medusa-like locks. Not getting any reply, he continues: "The tenderfoot goes out with a gun and a family of dogs. When he spies an antelope he sends his dogs ki-yi-ing after it, and of course he follows on horseback with his gun unlimbered ready for a shot.

"Never does such a man get game.

"The experienced hunter goes out and makes noise enough to attract attention, and then calmly sits upon his horse with his gun across his knee, and waves a red rag tied to a stick.

"The antelope, after running away for a distance and finding themselves unpursued, stop and look back. In the distance they see that red rag waving. They stop and wonder. Curiosity then getting the better of prudence—showing their feminine attributes—they slowly return.

"The hunter sits quietly and patiently waving the stick with its red rag decoration. Finally the antelope come up close for inspection, and it is then that the gun spits red and one victim falls."

Then the professor looked hard at his pipe for a moment and concluded:

"I sometimes think that most folks who pursue success go after it like a tenderfoot. They rush hither and thither and come into camp at the end of the long day with no game.

"Your wise man, on the other hand, makes just enough noise to attract attention, prepares for success to return to him, and then sits patiently and watchfully upon his horse waving the curiosity provoking red rag. Success, like women, will come to the man who apparently does not pursue."

Again the professor sat looking at his pipe and the smoke curling up from the bowl.

"The trouble with too many men," and he smiled at Peedie, because Peedie was innocent, "is that they sit quietly all day, but neglect to wave the stick with the red rag."

Training is every thing. The peach was once a bitter almond; cauliflower is nothing but cabbage with a college education.—Mark Twain.

WHEN Glen Buck was advertising manager for Butler Brothers—which was before he went into the advertising business for himself and made up his mind to capture B. C. Bean and compel him to

Making the Price
Plain

punch a time-clock—he filled many printed pages with injunctions to merchants which ran in this way: "Always mark your goods plainly with the price mark."

In spite of all the advice given to merchants along this line—advice wrung from expensive experience—there are thousands who still dare to hold to the antiquated and asinine practice of hiding the price from the purchasing public, just as if the price were too sacred to be shared with the commonalty.

Than the owners and promoters of the summer shows, there are no wiler and no wiser and no keener business men. Listen to what one of them says about this very matter of always showing the price:

"It is as important for the showman to mark his prices plainly as for the merchant, especially one who deals with the great mass of the people and who has bargains to offer. Many people who go to the summer parks have a limited amount of money to spend. If a man is with a girl, he does not want to go up and ask the price of admission. He wants to step up like a sport and say, 'Give me two tickets,' and lay down his money, just as if he had been in the habit of doing it every day of his life. If you help a man to do this, he will come back to your park again."

He needs no other rosary whose thread of life is strung with beads of love and thought.—Persian.

THE Studebaker Bros. Mfg. Company of South Bend, Indiana, understands full well that it pays to educate employees. I have before me a copy of a library bulletin which is issued weekly to all workers by the advertising department. In it I find little practical preachments on the value of education, and on the first page there appears an emphatic statement on service.

Then comes a list of new books added to the library. Here we have books on bacteriology, biography, cement, foods, gas and gas producers, girl wage-earners, grammar, punctuation and letter writing, household economics, hygiene, mechanical engineering, metallurgy, textile fabrics, and water. Books dealing with all these subjects appear in this one weekly bulletin. Each week witnesses new additions.

After that, we find an index to current magazine articles. The aim of the index is to give the title of the article, the author, enough description to make the drift of the article clear, in what magazine it was published, publication date, volume, pages covered, and whether illustrated.

Workers can go to the library and find what they want without waste of time. That this will encourage reading and study, and that reading and study will produce more efficient employees may be regarded as a certainty.

To develop the efficiency of workers is looked upon by our wisest employers as good business. It pays dividends.

THOSE business men who rush frantically at every task, and who wear themselves out as one may wear out an incandescent carbon by repeatedly turning on and off the current, may find in this little lesson from the New York Sun something of value to them.

Untying Knots

"Why do I do that?" said a busy business man who was spending a lot of time picking at a knot in a cord around a bundle, in an effort to untie it, "Why, I do that to discipline myself. I used to slash a bundle open always, but I found it didn't pay. I did everything that way then, rip, smash, high pressure all the time, all keyed up and on the jump all day long. I never knew what it was to be calm, and then I found it was wearing on me, and then, too, it struck me that it wasn't the best way, that I'd do better if I went slow occasionally, and kept cool and gave myself time to think. Then I stopped slashing bundles open, and began untying them, as I am doing now. I lose time by this, but I gain in other ways. I find in it a helpful exercise of my power of self-control; and to get the knot untied, to keep cool and accomplish this task calmly, I find, is something not only helpful but gratifying to me."

It is a ridiculous thing for man not to fly from his own badness, which indeed is possible, but to fly from other men's badness, which is impossible.—Marcus Aurelius.

TODAY, in spite of the summer heat, has been a great day for me. Most days are great days to me. But this has been a Real Humdinger. I am having what Mr. Sheldon used to designate as one of my mental drunks. Anyhow, I have been producing copy of various degrees of excellence since early this morning, scorning the suggestion of stopping work for such a prosaic thing as a real meal.

*Actions Show
State of Feeling*

Anxious to get some of this copy into the mails for the amusement of various magazine editors, I swung up the street to the postoffice, stopping at the office of a friend on the way.

As soon as I came in, he exclaimed:

"Permit me to congratulate you. I knew that some day you would discover the existence of a rich uncle over in Ireland and that, not knowing you as well as some of us do, he had left his entire estate to you. Permit me to shake your hand and invite myself to spend my vacation with you in your aeroplane."

Treating his levity with the scorn it merited, I sat down to give him a chance to recover from his bit of heat insanity.

"The way you came down the street is all the evidence anyone needs to feel that it's your treat. I happened to be looking out of the window when you crossed away down there, and I tell you, foolish follower of the strenuous, that the way you held your head up and the way your legs moved was an inspiration to even poor wilted me.

"If you will deign to answer a common person one little question, I should like to inquire, doing so wholly without any desire to eventually make a touch, if some dear, kind and deluded woman hasn't left you a fortune because of having pleased her with that paragraph on Maude Adams which pleased so many of the proletariat?"

Of course such levity should be treated with contempt, but I gathered from what he said later that I acted the part of see-the-conquering-hero-comes, and had done it so blooming naturally that my friend was not the only one who stared.

It is possible that they thought me crazy with the heat, but, knowing how bubbly and effervescent I felt, and how filled with faith and confidence I had been all day, it is possible that my very movement was inspirational. Anyhow, a good lesson was taught me—one that I should have known better before—and that is: A man betrays his mental condition by his stride on the street.

From experience I know that I never went after anything with such a feeling as I have had all this hot day, that I did not get what I went after.

Somehow, there was a sense of elation, a sense of power, a sense of ability to achieve, and back of it all was the knowledge that there was a great reserve ready if I needed it.

This article is all mighty personal, but I reckon that there is no reason why I shouldn't follow precedent—even if I am supposed to be a maverick—and arise in meeting with "testimony."

Here is how today's feeling was produced, and here is how the feeling of many another similar day was produced.

The real power is Auto-suggestion.

An article on Fear once bore my name as author. In it Analysis and Auto-suggestion were given as destroyers of the Devil of Fear. A traveling man, whom I met in a hotel, complimented me on the article as a whole, but characterized as "all blankety-blank rot" my mention of auto-suggestion. In the language of the rube at the menagerie, he said, "Ah, there hain't no such animule."

I might have quoted Mr. Sheldon's illustration covering that point, but I didn't—making it a point to spend no time in defending or explaining anything I write to one person, when the answer may be passed on to a few thousand readers.

This is the illustration, quoted imperfectly from memory:

"So you say Auto-suggestion will not work? I ask, Have you really worked auto-suggestion? You might as well say that fire will not heat water when you have only tested it by burning one match under a five-gallon kettleful, as to say that auto-suggestion will not work after trying it but once."

Of course, everyone knows that a suggestion is anything that arouses thought. Auto-suggestion is the suggestion you give your own subconsciousness.

Well, to come back to the personal, my inspirational preachments are to be inflicted upon the people by means of a new, middle-western magazine. Frantic calls for copy have been flooding the mails. It was up to me to produce. There was no chance to evade or escape.

So, last night, when I tumbled into bed at a most unchristianlike hour, I said to myself:

"Old man, tomorrow is your big working day. You will turn a deaf ear to the call of the canoe and the lake and a friendly book, and will camp right on the job of poking your typewriter. You are going to get up in the morning when the raucous rattle of your alarm-clock enters into competition with Chantecler, and from the time you get your mail opened until the neighbors call in the police and fire-department to stop you, you are going to produce enough copy to make you say to yourself, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

Of course I went on and, no one being around to contradict, told myself that when it came to producing copy that stiffened the softest backbone, I was about the whole thing. I bluffed myself into believing that as a worker I had few equals, and that my fingers were especially made to convey thoughts and ideas onto the keys of my Royal typewriter. The talk I gave myself was a wonder, if I do say it myself as shouldn't. It ought to be emblamed in a Victor record and used to make messenger boys hustle.

Let me joke about it as I may, the fact remains that I started work this morning with an industrious air that would have made a Chinese laundryman look like an intoxicated tramp draped over a Central Park bench at three o'clock in the morning.

Right at the start, an article had to be produced in which I had to tell all about the glorious value of that article, unprotected even by the Aldrich-Payne bill, known as Backbone.

I went on and told about 'most everybody, from Mahomet down to the Man from Mars, who made some stir in the world because of possessing a backbone that had the strength of a Toledo blade.

"How did that man, Mahomet, feel when, after forty years of meditation and thinking, and three years of preaching and working against heart-breaking odds, he had but thirteen followers—a mere handful—a bit of chaff—less than a whole seed for the planting to produce a great movement?"

I asked myself that question and tried to imagine myself in his place.

Then I asked: "And how did he feel when the wine of victory filled his veins, when he led his followers by the thousands against the proudest princes and cities of the east, when the air was filled with wild praise, when his dream materialized, when the future was brightened by the glory of an unconquerable faith, and back of him he felt a power that impelled him forward into the very teeth of opposition, sweeping obstacles aside as the hail beats the petals from a full-blown rose—a power too great to control, yet which filled him with an indomitable determination to preach his faith unto all the nations of the earth?"

And that feeling I tried to make mine.

Then I took Socrates calmly drinking the hemlock, Christ going meekly to his doom, Luther exclaiming, "Were there as many devils in Worms as there are roof-tiles, I would go on," Napoleon sweeping like the scourge of Satan across Europe, Cromwell leading his regiment, Old Ironsides, the people forcing King John to sign the Great Charter almost ten hundred years ago, Tom Paine inspiring the spineless to fight for freedom. Of these I wrote, and then I spoke of Roosevelt flinging defiance into the teeth of the machine and reaching upward for the presidency, and of Robert M. LaFollette who lifted Wisconsin's capitol from its old position facing the Northwestern depot and who turned it toward the people of his state, a feat before which the cleaning of the Augean Stables by Hercules was but the amusement of a child.

Of all these I wrote. With all these I tried to feel.

Was it any wonder that my step was confident, that my eyes sparkled, that I faced men and women with courage and faith, and that I, too, felt back of me a Great Power that no man understands, but which all men may use as their own.

Perhaps I may be permitted to say here what Newton A. Fuessle says for me in the August number of "Human Life"—something about the power of association with inspirational people, and of the startling effect of reading inspirational preachments, especially those which come in the guise of biographies of living men and women who are accomplishing things.

No one can estimate the far-reaching influence of those wonderful "Lives" of Plutarch's. Read the biographies of men who have stirred the world, and of the majority you will learn that they were spurred on to accomplish some great service by reading the stories of that ancient master, only a fragment of whose writings are preserved to us.

The other day, a friendly critic came forward and said, "Why is it that you tell nothing but the good things about folks whose biographies you write, don't they ever do anything wrong, don't they make mistakes, or is it possible that you do not learn of their misdeeds."

"Bless you, my friend," I answered, "of course I know that no man is good enough to be canonized, even after having slumbered in a grave for a century. If you want the truth, I must confess that I am not laboring under any blinding illusion, even if I do make it my chief business to look only for the success-producing qualities.

"Confidentially, I do not mind telling you, first getting your promise never to speak of it except when alone or with others, that the biography of the individual really doesn't interest me in the least, except in this: that the writing of a story about a live man permits me to send out some scientific truths that in any other form would not be read. The man written of serves as a model upon which to drape a philosophy that has been tested and proven good by those who have won."

Plutarch's strength consists, not so much in his giving of dates and incident, although he is a master of both, but in his ability to drive home a lesson that is unforgettable. His aim seems to have been, to write character studies that would inspire others to emulation.

Anyhow, let this be said. The man, no matter what his position or occupation, who fills his mind with inspiring suggestions by associating with successful, keen, alert, progressive, courageous, kindly folks, who reads literature that makes for faith and courage and self-improvement, and who follows all up by using the power of Auto-suggestion, cannot fail to become a stronger, more efficient doer of deeds and an infinitely better citizen and neighbor.

The Reward of the Unafraid

By Glen Buck

MR. AVERAGE ADVERTISER may be long on opinions—but he certainly is short on courage.

He is even afraid of his own advertising shadow.

He plays a silly, sheep-like game of follow-the-leader—without ever being sure who the leader is—and trembles in abject fear every time he happens to glance over his left shoulder.

He hasn't even the courage of his lack of convictions.

Because he does a thing once and it is partially successful, he sticks to that one thing with tooth and nail—in woeful ignorance of what lies beyond.

But advertising is capable of greater developments and possibilities than Mr. Average Advertiser dreams of.

His advertising success is made in spite of his methods—not because of them.

A big, new, powerful force he has in his hand, yet he uses only a small part of it—because he lacks strength and is afraid.

He follows the lead of his own fears—or dances to the tune of another, who needs a paltry commission more than he needs a clear conscience—and misses the big, splendid opportunity that might be his, if only he would take the time to see that his advertising money is spent with as much intelligence as is used in the buying of the socks and shirts he wears.

An advertising dollar is as big as another—and it's a crime to spend it with a foggy understanding—be its number one, or one million.

There is no place where courage will pay as big dividends as in advertising—provided only that it be a sane, and well directed courage.

The few who have reaped the big and substantial advertising rewards, are those who have had the nerve to break away from the trite and the obvious—who have dared to express an individuality—who have done the thing in a new way.

But there is danger ahead for even these—if they are content to rest upon past accomplishments.

The new thing of yesterday becomes the commonplace of tomorrow.

There must be a constant and rapid progress for him who would lead.

The imitator, at best, makes only a half-success. He is a self-advertised weakling.

Business is a contest in which only the fit survive. There will soon be no place in it for the cowards.

Every day it is getting harder for the unfit to endure. The rewards will go to him who is unafraid.

Follow-the-leader is a game for sheep—not for men.

Publicity as a Creative Force in Business

—An Address : by E. St. Elmo Lewis

MY FRIENDS: I had nothing to do with the selection of this subject.

My good friend, your chairman, probably selected it because it gave me an opportunity to talk about almost anything on the earth, in the heavens above, and in the seas beneath.

I warn you, however, that I shall probably be much in the position of the man whom a candid author once told, "If your subject had been a contagious disease, you never ran the slightest chance of catching it."

It would be a waste of time and I should poorly requite your courtesy in listening to what I have to say tonight, if I should be content to employ the few glittering generalities to which such a subject insistently incites. I confess I am not brave enough to stand here and tell you solemnly, as if I had discovered a new thought that "Advertising pays." If it has not paid you individually, or collectively, you will probably have but little interest in what follows, for if it has not paid, you must put it down to your fault and not to that of advertising.

About that Word "Creative"

I assume that I am talking to a representative gathering of the business men of this city. For that reason I want to say something about the so-called "practical" man because he is successful advertising's chief stumbling block.

I want to talk to you in a free and un-polemical fashion about the creative power of advertising—so little understood; and then to take a bird's-eye, as it were, of where it is leading business.

I am principally concerned, and I take it you are, too, not with the rich and suggestive past of advertising, nor even with its busy and fecund present, but with its future. I should ill deserve the title of Advertising Man, if I did not, in this hour, exercise my typical privilege of having one eye on the distant future, while keeping the other busy with the task of the day.

Feeling, as I do, that this subject from its emotional and imaginative side fits more the oratorical ability of a Watter-son, than the analysis of a plain business man, I yet feel that advertising so deeply concerns the future of all business, and the very possibilities of growth of our American business life, that I shall ask your serious consideration and forego the purely entertaining features so much more fitting, perhaps, to an occasion like this.

E. ST. ELMO LEWIS

I do not know what my friend meant by the word "creative." There is nothing really new in business. The newest things are but combinations of old truisms and activities.

Every man's life "is but a quotation from all his ancestors," a New England philosopher once said.

I hope that "truth is the property of no man," for that is comforting to many of us who feel a certain hopelessness when it comes to striving for originality, the obsession of small minds.

I shall consider "creation" then, in its more restricted sense of "invention," by which we link two or more hitherto unrelated subjects, or activities and produce a new condition or a new power.

Advertising is simply the voice of the market-place speaking to all men in the highways and byways. Its animating motive is educative as has been said for twenty years. Its first purpose is to educate the people to realize new wants and new desires, and to create a confidence in the ability of this generation to satisfy these wants. If this attitude towards the subject is logically in keeping with the facts of experience we must be prepared to admit that advertising is not simply a phenomenon of our business life, but that it is an expression, the fundamental characteristic of American life, principles and practice.

A vast population, a continent-wide distribution, a busy and changing civilization, an aggressive demand for immediate knowledge of the very latest developments in supply and demand, requires some method quicker than the salesman's visits, more economical than the waiting until a pleased public shall by the slow seepage of satisfaction from man to man, wear a pathway to the door of the maker or seller of goods.

Advertising not Yet an Exact Science

We have had to solve the problem of distribution over this vast domain. "It is," as Jefferson said, "a part of the American character to consider nothing as desperate—we are required to invent and execute; to find means within ourselves, not to lean on others," and our answer to these conditions has been—advertising.

A business-like desire, however, to keep our advertising expenditure well within the requirements of good business; to get "our feet on the ground," and to know where we are going, is leading the most optimistic to a more searching inquiry into the real meanings of what we are accomplishing, and how and why. This, too, we have had to do for a part of business where there were no signposts.

I don't know if there is a final science of advertising—I am sure there is not—but I feel sure that there is much more to be found out about the laws that govern it that we are not now conscious of. We shall find what these laws are just as fast as we make the profession of advertising attractive to educated men of trained intelligence. Advertising is only as old as the human race.

Apples had been dropping from branches of apple trees for several thousand years before a Newton said why, hence we must not assume that we have discovered all there is in advertising.

There is a keen desire becoming manifest among the more thinking advertisers, that out of the mass of tradition, experience, out of the gossip of the market-place, and the dogmas of half-trained minds, there shall be extracted the technical body and emotional soul of advertising. Then we shall formulate those basic principles, for the want of which any art must halt and stumble and remain uncertain.

Probably all of you would like to know just what kind of advertising would pay you the best—just what results you should expect from a given course of action.

But that is not to be desired. It would lessen competition, and the man who knew exactly what to do would be an enemy of both the people and the market-place—and would probably be hanged!

Yet, to lessen the losses from bad practice is a sane ambition and is being realized. There is no desire to be scientific in the sense of going on a still hunt for the original "advertiscus microbus," which inoculated commerce some twenty centuries ago, nor do we care to discover the process which reproduces it or its antitoxin, but we do want more knowledge of the human soul, and of the heart and mind of man, considering these emotionally and not physiologically. In more common phrase, we want to get down to a larger experience than our own, in the handling of the man-stuff of which the world of business is made, and of which we should know much more than we are conscious.

Above all things, let us be honest with ourselves.

The Peril of the Business Coward

I am not impressed with the testimony of the disingenuous veteran in business who confesses himself to be an advertiser and then remarks, "I have been at it for ten years and I know less today than when I began." He should know more—he should be sure of more things, and be sure that he gets more business with advertising than without it, or he should stop advertising. Of course, he doesn't mean what he says and we know he doesn't mean it. If he did, we should send for a lunacy commission and ask in a committee of his creditors. It is such silly statements made by otherwise veracious men, which cause the inexperienced to believe that advertising experience is like Confederate money, that more you have the poorer you are, and what is worse, to act on that generalization.

I know experience cannot be generalized, especially when it is disorganized and undigested experience like much of that in advertising, but let's throw aside this pose of childish innocence, and, out of deference to our human common sense, let us, once and for all, cease this silly cant of trusting to the god of luck for direction in making one of our largest business investments.

In order for advertising to become the potent creative force of a bigger business for you, for this city, for the state and nation, for it to achieve even a small part of its possibilities for those interested, we must start with ourselves. We must assume a positive and not a negative attitude.

It is the moral and business coward who has no faith in things as they are, whose faith doesn't catch fire when he looks at the opportunities this life in American business offers him.

This coward, whining for a cinch in a game he calls a "gamble," is the man who makes the trouble.

The Advantage of the Theorist

As I look into some of your faces I see that you are calling me a theorist and telling me I am theorizing.

I like that word, my friends. I hope to have it engraven on my tombstone when my clay shall finally return. I confess to an impatience with the man who pursues a theory through a pot of ink for the mere sport of the chase.

Most of us are naturally inclined to believe that discussion of any subject that lies beyond the confines of our daily experience, is theorizing.

In advertising we are cursed with the trailer, for most men only think they think.

Most men vote a party ticket because it is the fashion among their friends, or their fathers did, rather than because of the power of a well-reasoned conviction of the righteousness of what that ticket stands for.

To many of us a theorist is a crack-brained rider of hobbies, who is not to be relied on, and who must be compared with the so-called practical man to the disadvantage of the theorist.

Every one of you is working out a theory. It will pay you to be more hospitable to theories, because it will make you more receptive to success-making ideas.

A theory is just the plan for work before it is done; it is the plan of the building before it is done.

Every one of us is a theorist—and the man who does not plan his work and work his plan has no title to business man.

The man who is successful without knowing why, where or how it was done should be a good Presbyterian and believe in predestination, for God has taken care of him!

It is the so-called practical man who has stood in the way of the greatest developments in advertising, and for a moment I wish to pay some attention to him in detail, for of all the cants canted in this canting world, the cant of the practical man is the most tormenting. This typical, smug, self-satisfied practical man looks at life from the narrow channels of his daily activities, no matter how big they are to him, and sees only a past and a today.

He goes crawfish-like through the world, only progressing as fast as he can go backwards.

Opportunity must bear the hallmark of tradition before he will admit her. He is a man of memories, without a vision. No one has lost so many opportunities as the practical man; none has won so many successes as the theorist, for the practical man's eyes are always on the past—the theorist's always on the future.

The practical man needs the theorist and the theorist the practical man, just as the electrical current needs the negative and the positive poles before it may start on its wonder way. The sooner we business men get that thoroughly domiciled in our work-a-day creed the sooner we shall be broader and better.

The Triumph of a Dreamer

Every day I am conscious of my indebtedness to a man who worked and struggled in a musty little office in the city of Auburn, New York, tied down to the dull routine of making two and two equal four, of making six divided by three produce two, until at last out of that toil came a vision.

He carried that vision about for ten years before he found a man who could see it, even as a dream.

Practical men laid the flattering unction to their souls that they could not be caught by dreams of crack-brained theorists, and so through poverty and sickness, indifference and smiles, and the clatter of tongues in empty heads, he dreamed on, theorizing and experimenting, until at last his dream came true.

You today are paying that theorist a golden tribute, for he has saved for his own and succeeding generations uncouthed toil-worn hours.

I say that this dreamer was greater by far than the man who drove the rivets, fashioned the form and transmuted the dream into a reality.

The successful advertiser is always a dreamer, he must have the imagination, he must have a vision, he must be able to see the chicken in the egg. He must know that this ability alone is responsible for the creative force in advertising, and it is this alone. If he advertises only because somebody else does, and hasn't the sense to buy a far-seeing man to do it, he fails.

The "Pig-Tail" Business Man

A man ought to eat because he is hungry, and not because he is afraid of the doctor; he ought to marry because he is in love, not because he is afraid of Roosevelt; he ought to advertise because he wants a bigger and larger business, because he has a pride in being able to deliver a service that the people will be glad to pay money to get—not because he is afraid of being accounted a back number.

"Business," said Marion Crawford in one of his novels, "is the art of creating values."

Webster said, "Business is that which busies one," and although he takes up considerable more space, that is about as far as he gets. I submit that Webster's pun is futile. A pig's tail is busy, but it never does anything.

There are a good many pig's tails in business! This shows how we must revise definitions in order to get a fair start in any discussion.

There are two important words in Crawford's definition—"art" and "creation." The art of business is based on the science, which is simply our organized knowledge of the facts about human nature, society and the machinery of distribution.

But creation means something more—for it calls for making an entirely new thing out of old or new materials. It requires a theory, a vision.

It required some vision and a theory upon the part of General Manager Wooley, of the American Radiator Company, to see the possibility of placing steam heat and hot water systems in the homes of the farmers. A knowledge of selling conditions soon demonstrated that it would be impossible to get the local plumber or heating contractor to push the sale, so what was the next great distributing agency?

The press. Salesmen couldn't do it.

What did the farmer read more than anything else? The farm paper.

What next? The great daily.

What next? The monthly magazine.

Hence, the American Radiator Company's campaign in these three mediums. Mr. Wooley recently said that, "This campaign has paid well."

Yet, steam and hot water heaters existed for twenty years before the American Radiator Company took up this development.

The National Canner's Association recently started a fund of $150,000 to overcome the idea that ptomaine poisoning had become a common result of eating canned goods.

Somebody had a theory.

The old plan would have been for the canners to meet in convention and tell each other it wasn't so, then wonder why the public didn't believe it.

It puts one very much in mind of the Bryan story that described the non-advertiser as a man who threw silent kisses to his sweetheart in the dark—he knew what he was doing, but nobody else did.

The next development is to spend some money hiring a publicity agent who is supposed to have a large and mysteriously effective pull with the newspapers. This publicity agent is deputized to write those wonderful fascinating poems in prose, called "feature stories" and by newspapers well named, "dope flimsies." This publicity expert is supposed to get these stories in the papers through his irresistible power over the editor of the Sunday paper. This method is supposed to represent the very acme of shrewd publicity.

The American Newspaper Publishers' Association recently published a list of these publicity agents, not a few of whom work "under the rose" for clients who are afraid to sign their names to the schemes they father.

The Cannery Association must spend real money. Let's hope that they will come out in the open light of day in the advertising columns and talk to the American people as respectable manufacturers dealing with self-respecting folks.

Some Winning Theorists

When the Ingersoll watch was introduced into England, in true, practical British style, the Ingersoll people started after the jewelers, but they found that the jewelers wouldn't handle the watch, because a five-shilling watch interfered with their two-pound goods; then what were they going to do? Then the man who didn't know any better, the man with a theory, started out and sold watches to the stationers and hardware dealers, and there they are today.

A number of sapient souls were traveling up and down the land some months ago, pointing with great glee to the Buick car as the only automobile that didn't advertise, yet was successful.

When General Manager W. C. Durant first came to market the Buick product, he faced a situation where there are only about 700 automobile dealers in the United States. For some years, however, he had been selling heavy wagons to the agricultural machinery dealers.

In every cross-road store in the United States there is some agricultural machinery handled. When he came to the question of marketing his car, he had but to imagine a day to come when the farmers would be using automobiles instead of buggies. There was no reason why they shouldn't, except that they didn't, and that isn't any reason to a man who is not too practical.

They made a great deal of fun of Durant when he began to sell cars to Cy Perkins and Bill Jones in Tuscaroro County, but Durant knew what he was doing. He only had to sell an average of one or two to the three thousand or four thousand agents who had been handling his wagons to take care of a year's output of his big auto plant. That was three or four years ago.

Today there are over nineteen thousand dealers selling automobiles.

The manufacture of buggies has decreased by sixty per cent.

The Studebakers are getting into the automobile lines more and more, and the other big manufacturers, such as the International Harvester Company, are coming into line with Durant's four-year-old theory.

The Ever-Widening Field of Advertising

The lesson of these few incidents, reinforced by thousands of similar cases that anyone familiar with advertising in its anecdotal side could tell you, but further convinces the thoughtful man of open mind, that there is something in advertising beside the mere writing of a startling catchline or a cleverly worded brochure.

The man of wisdom sees not only those people who are about to buy an article that he sells, and who must be turned in his direction rather than be permitted to drift in another, but he sees beyond that relatively small part of the public, the infinitely greater field of those that must be made to think about him and his goods, then beyond those again a still greater world, that will in the day after tomorrow be brought within the range of the appeal of his advertising.

This is advertising in its broad sense. When we finally come to understand that the interesting element in all advertising is the human element, the personal element, which reduced to a general principle simply means that men are always more interested in men than things, we will make our advertising personal in both the sense of the writer and his business, and in the sense of the man or woman who is to read it.

The only very simple human principle involved in successful advertising, and always practiced by the man with a vision, whether he be selling goods on the road or writing about them in his copy, is the simple principle that Madam De Sevigne gave as a recipe for good conversation: "Always talk about your listener's interests, his pleasures, his business, his hobbies, or his loves."

Any man or any manager who guides his business along those lines, brings it into contact with the public's human side. That man becomes a necessary part of real life, a part of the social fabric, who contributes to the happiness of its betterment on the great, broad, simple principle that—"He who serves best, profits most."

The futile and silly vanity displayed by the advertiser who talks only about his superior product, creates in the public mind a resentment that soon solidifies into indifference.

The Human Interest Appeal in Advertising

This is the power used by the man with a vision in advertising—this is the human nature that we hear so much about. I have seen it work in intimate relationships. I have seen it work with the Burroughs adding machine.

Six years ago the accent was put upon "Machine," and the wonderful mechanical ingenuity.

Today, we talk about William Seward Burroughs, the inventor, when we want to talk about the mechanical ingenuity of the machine.

We used to talk about the machine as a time, work and worry saver, now we talk about the things it does, and by that make people want to see the machine that does it.

It is an attitude of mind which has its foundation in the very simple philosophy of which I have told you, that men are more interesting than things.

It requires some knowledge of human nature upon the part of the business man to understand that among other things that men and women are persistently interested in, are living well, thinking comfortably, enjoying life, and having something to show for the hours they spend at work. These are the things that after all are at the base of what is known as self-interest, and there is no way in which you can get at self-interest so effectively as through the emotions, the eye and the ear.

John Wanamaker buys a page in four or five New York newspapers, in which he conducts a little paper of his own. Does he list a bunch of prices? No, he sets it up in bold type with an editorial column, drops in a note about the weather. If he talks about French china dinner sets, he does not tell what a wonderful man Wanamaker is in getting these sets from a fellow who couldn't pay for them, but he does tell the wonderful things those French china dinner sets can do for the table of the housewife.

He puts the "man of the house" experience into that column. He has heard some housewife talk of her dinner service. He puts this experience into that column. He doesn't talk of chinaware as a buyer for a department store would talk to a department head, but he talks about it as one woman would talk to another.

Here are two columns entitled, "The Kingdom of the Kitchen." He doesn't talk like a green grocer, but it's one mistress talking to another.

So on throughout the page, there is human nature, imagination and selling energy, no fancy writing, nothing but a fine sense of the exact word, the exact thought, the fitting experience that illuminates the whole page and makes it as interesting to a woman as the best woman's page published in the country.

This is the art of selling at its best.

The Real Philosophy of Advertising and Selling

It is the persistent, consistent, all pervading philosophy of human existence, made to illuminate the little things of daily life—a big man bringing a little man up to his standard, making the little interests of the little people his interests, because the little, individual but similar interests of a million folks in the aggregate, are big enough for the biggest man in the country to think about.

This is the real philosophy of advertising and selling—the ability of the big man to understand that the individual sale is nothing, the aggregate is everything.

The individual sale of a five-cent paper of pins to that unknown woman who needs them, is an infinitesimal drop in the great aggregate of sales that make up the twelve or thirteen millions of dollars of the Wanamaker turn-over. It is the realization, however, on the part of the Wanamaker managers that the Wanamaker system must be a fine sieve to catch that five-cent paper of pins as automatically and as surely as it catches the hundred thousand dollar order for the equipment of a hotel.

It has always been so.

How Advertising Saved the Union

In a broader way, advertising has helped to work out the destinies of nations.

It saved the Union in those first dark days of the war when Lincoln had to get money and get it quickly. A Philadelphia banker, whom I once knew, Jay Cooke, took a large share of the first loan issued immediately after the first battle of Bull Run.

Those bonds had to be sold at home.

He had a vision and a theory.

Get to the people with the bonds. How? Newspapers, of course. He did it.

He sent out his advertisements, much to the horror of the conservative bankers of his day, and marketed the government loans to the tune of $1,000,000 a day throughout the war, and in many cases his advertising actually sold the bonds at a premium.

Remember this was done after the government itself had found it impossible to accomplish the result by the old "practical" methods.

Human nature is essentially the same the world over. Show it a good thing in a way to make it understand and it will act.

Take the experience during the same trying period of the Honorable John Bigelow, who was sent by President Lincoln as consul to Paris. His principal duty, as an experienced journalist, was to influence the French press in favor of the Union. We are told in his recent "Retrospections," that his first move was to see that the French papers were supplied with correct information direct from America, instead of being left dependent as theretofore, upon intelligence that had been colored by the Southern sympathies of English correspondents.

We find that he arranged for the publication in pamphlet form of some of the favorable articles that appeared in one of the prominent French dailies. He secured another article in another paper by the old-time device of ordering a thousand copies if it was inserted. He induced General Winfield Scott, who happened to be visiting Paris at that time, to sign a statement that Bigelow had prepared, which according to the rules of the Diplomatic Service, it would have been impossible for Bigelow to have signed himself.

The Advertising Man and the Salesman

There can be no doubt but that advertising has led business into new developments, for it uncovers new wants, new selling conditions, new territories, new ignorances and knowledge, and it is a poor sales department and but indifferently managed, that does not draw inspiration from advertising, for a constant revision of the selling viewpoint, plans and methods.

Manufacturers and wholesalers alike cannot hope completely to realize the possibilities of any territory with a salesman. The man is always busied, as he should be, with the individual sale or the immediate prospect of a sale. He has no inclination, no time, no ability to educate all his possible customers.

That is the legitimate role of advertising. One of the South's most observing and convincing writers on business subjects recently paid this great tribute to the power of advertising:

(To be concluded in the October number.)

"When Self is enthroned, Passion is made Prime-minister, and Principle becomes court fool."—S. John Duncan-Clark.

There is a limit to every man's capability—but few men reach their limit—Master Printer.

What May be Done by Applying the Principles of Art to Business: by Ernest L. Briggs

IMET THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER the other day, in the heart of the sales department of the largest high-grade printing plant in America.

In the few minutes at my disposal, I saw brief inspirational classics, both original and worth repeating, and an abundance of every-day business suggestions blended with bits of philosophy and even poetry. I would rather subscribe to a press clipping service than to the average technical magazine, but somehow this unobtrusive visitor seemed worth cultivating and I am now sure of a lasting friendship from this chance acquaintance.

It is interesting to analyze the audience of any publication. Large or small, bright or dull, all have enthusiastic subscribers, and each may boast of a devoted following which, if gathered together, would make a fellowship club of kindred spirits.

The Environments of Business

The idea followed by the readers of this magazine is definitely recognizable as the natural result of the evolution of business.

There is no leisure class in this country. Every man worth meeting is a business man. There are no qualifications to this statement. The measure of success does not count for as much as some would wish, but the law is immovable—all must work and work for better conditions for all.

The recognition of this fact has given us many utilities, both in factory and office. There is practically no end of mechanical devices designed for the purpose of lightening tasks, and helpful to all from the office boy to the man higher up. Man and many women must spend the larger part of the best hours of daylight, and sometimes the hours of night in business.

Right here comes the philosophy.

Business must be more than endurable and even more than comfortable—it must in some way furnish the best things of life. We must have the daily application of all that furnishes inspiration and beauty.

So it is well to have in the magazine of business some literary inspiration from the pens of Van Dyke and Hopkinson Smith, and much modern advanced thought shown in its association with actual business problems. This sort of thing makes business men of thinkers and encourages the passing type to think. A man who might in the olden days have hidden his lamp of oil in a cave now finds room for philosophy while engaged in business under the rays from the artistic chandeliers of indirect illumination.

Here we approach the question at issue: "What May be Done by the Application of Art to Your Business?"

The Evolution of Industrial Art

Modern business development much resembles earlier changes. Dr. George Lamonte Cole, who has made a life long study of the Pueblo Indians and the remains of the ancient cliff dwellers, told me that the lesson to be learned from his collection was that the progress of any civilization could be traced by the progress of its art. The hammer or axe of the Indians was at first a crude affair without a handle, chipped to some semblance of a shape. The shape gradually changed until it came to what was and is required, and then came the handle, at first roughly planned and held in a split stick, but finally approaching its present shape. As soon as the mechanical part of the tool had reached practical perfection some attention was given to the selection of materials, and the fine colors of stone, some vari-colored and suggestive design showed an inclination toward the beautiful. Naturally, the application of design followed, and then the possibilities of shape and color were unlimited.

It is easier to trace our progress in the larger undertakings. We are inclined to forget the small objects until some competitor forces our attention by some embellishment which wins the business.

The first steel skeleton building, now known as the Home Insurance Building, was erected on the corner of LaSalle and Adams street, Chicago, in 1884-5. Compare this with the 1910 LaSalle Hotel, also on LaSalle street, a few blocks north.

In twenty years, architectural possibilities have been realized and "Chicago con-

Touraine. It might be mentioned that its prices for food and service are at least as high as any in the Middle West. Is this development of the art feature a good struction" now has a world-wide fame for beauty as well as for its adaptability to the requirements of the city of today.

THE LA SALLE HOTEL, CHICAGO

This same LaSalle Hotel has in its interior fittings and decorations exceeded the luxurious art of the chateaux of Old business proposition for the owners of the LaSalle Hotel?

Swain Nelson established a nursery about forty years ago. Today, Swain Nelson & Sons advertise "Landscapes Without Waiting." The introduction of the art of landscape gardening in their business has given them opportunities.

The Chicago University grounds, the Swift and Armour estates, the estate of Chas. Hutchinson, president of the Chicago Art Institute, and hundreds of other landscapes owe something to the art of gardening successfully, combined with the art of advertising. This is better than the lithograph sample for selling nursery supplies, is it not?

Patrons Will Pay for Beauty

Among professional men we find some with offices tastefully arranged, with the work of good artists on the walls, oriental rugs on the floors, and fine furniture. These grew from other tastefully arranged offices which had good carbon and other reproductions of works of art on the walls, inexpensive but harmonious rugs and furniture. Does it pay?

Not so very long ago it was the custom of grocers to buy in bulk and sell in packages and bags, both plain and in fact ugly. A change has taken place, and it illustrates the vital point to be considered by those who would find new applications of art. Had the merchant asked his patrons at any time if they would care to pay an advanced price for the sake of having the goods put up in neat cartons, the answer would have been in the negative. But action gets results in art as in all else. Enterprising manufacturers placed on the grocers' shelves cartons with neat designs and attractive illustrations. The customers did the rest, and ever since, bulk goods have been on the run.

The rule holds good in any business. Give your customer something more pleasing in appearance and you will have to call his attention to the price to make him worry about it.

Beauty in Printing

Many cases similar to the above few will occur to the reader, but however broad or narrow the application of art may be in any one business, there is one common ground which is the foundation on which all businesses are built—good printed matter.

Will Bradley was big enough to design a series of interior decorations for the Ladies Home Journal and to act as art editor for Collier's. He was also big enough to know that a shipping label, a menu, a business card, letter head or program could be planned along artistic lines. He found time for such planning.

One of the best examples of the good use of an art theme for advertising purposes is shown by the adaptation of the painting,

THE DUTCH BOY

"The Dutch Boy Painter," by Lawrence C. Earle, to the use of the National Lead Company, of New York. This valuable painting is now in the directors' room of the company. Mr. O. C. Harn, the advertising manager of the company, informs me that it is the intention to have a reproduction of the figure of the Dutch Boy on every piece of advertising matter used by the concern. These reproductions are all well-made and so displayed as to enhance the value of the printed word. This advertising is effective. The advertising manager of the National Lead Company will stand back of that assertion.

The growing demand for artistic printing has resulted in a number of printing plants organized for the purpose of producing artistic printing. Some few of these plants realize to the fullest the possibilities of the printed sheet. These are comprehensive enough to maintain the desiderata of beauty throughout, from the smallest circular to the mammoth catalogue. They include the wonders of the age, the modern magazine with its great circulation and the modern book with its complex requirements, in their output. This means that the most intricate inventions in machinery must be in use in every department, and a splendid organization of business men must be maintained as an organization for art discrimination and application.

The application of art to business may be considered as inclusive of every piece of printed matter, the office environment and the product of studio, office and factory combined. It brings profit and gives a solid basis for the future—it makes the business life worth living.

Co-operation

By W. H. Tennyson

ALTHOUGH, as stated by Lincoln, "Success does not so much depend on external help as on self-reliance," external help is worth a great deal sometimes.

"The real business of the world," says E. B. Kirby, "is done by team-work, and you must qualify for this. It is done by innumerable bodies of men, each of which is under some kind of organization, intended to combine its units into an efficient human machine, capable of the business on hand."

Again, The Philistine declares that "men are valuable just in proportion as they are able and willing to work with other men. When a person loses his ability to co-operate with others he has joined the Down-and-Out Club."

Often we see words of encouragement for the man who is discouraged temporarily. General words of this kind on paper have not the force, however, that a hearty hand clasp or an encouraging remark from some fellow worker has.

Add your strength to the strength of your fellows. Learn the secret of good comradeship.

For the man with the habitual grouch there is no room in the ranks of the successful. Neither can the man who stands aloof and who is unsocial be successful as a salesman. It never pays to jeer at other men and find fault with them, just because they happen to have struck hard luck. The jeerer may find himself in a like position the following day.

Learn, rather, to do team work, to co-operate, to lend a hand. Men who co-operate gain mutual benefit.

It is well, too, to think of team work in another light.

It is a psychological fact that persons of opposite personalities attract. Men who are able to work together, it will be found, very often admirably complement each other. Traits of character that are weak in one are strong in the other.

Many salesmen have found that by working together, doing team work, they have been able to do more than twice as much business as when working individually. One man is often able to secure an interview, but cannot close. Another man can secure almost any man's application provided only that he can secure an interview, but for some reason he lacks the power to secure the interview.

Yes, "the real business of the world is done by team-work."

"Personality is not purchasable—no bank book can compass it."—Anne Monroe.

"I cannot sweep the darkness out, but I can shine it out."—John Newton.

The QUESTIONS OF SOCRATIC

BY ARTHUR W. NEWCOMB

Nool's Reliability

OBERVE the ornate front elevation of one Hennery Nool," started Fussberg, suddenly sitting up flipping the sand out of his hair. "I thought he was wooing the fickle goddess Fortuna in San Fran."

"I seem to note a droop of sadness in his footsteps," cacchinated Dubheimer, pouring the hot sand over a fat knee. "Mayhap the jade has turned him down."

"Henry is a very able young man, and a dum good fellow," boomed Wiggins. "I have no doubt he made good all right in 'Frisco. Can't a man come home on a vacation without you self-appointed oracles consigning him to the discard?"

"O Wigg!" groaned Fussberg, "The sand is warm, the sky is blue, the sun is bright and kindly, and the Pacific Ocean is reaching out her cool, calm, sea-green arms to us—she wants to soothe us and sing to us. Why must you take yourself and the rest of us seriously on an occasion like this?"

Wiggins opened his mouth to reply, but Fussberg cut him off by the shout: "Hi, Hennery! Come on in—the water's fine!"

Nool stopped his slow pacing of the pier and squinted along the beach, trying to locate the source of the voice.

Wiggins majestically waved his long, solemn hand, and Nool spied the bunch. Vaulting off the pier, he came over and there were greetings and hand-grips.

"Just wait until I go up to the bath-house and get into the scanty attire," he grinned, "and I'll be with you in the damp."

"Hennery sure has fallen down," mourned Fussberg, while we waited for the returned wanderer to get into his bathing suit. "His voice is wooden and his eyes dull. I thought he had grown so much in the last year or two that he would be sure to make a hit. Too bad!"

The Tragic Truth

"I don't see why you're so sure," objected Wiggins, stubbornly. "He does seem a little bit down in the mouth, but perhaps his dinner has disagreed with him. Or he may have been having trouble with the girl."

"Wait and see," scoffed Fussberg. "Hennery's gloom is no summer thunder storm."

After some minutes of this debate, Nool joined us, and we all splashed into the big, salt tub.

A quarter of an hour later, we were all soaking up sunshine in the sand. It was Dubheimer that broke the skin of the cheese.

"Well, Hen, old boy," he bellowed, gently, "how'd you make things go on the new job?"

Nool's eyes sought the horizon for a moment. Then his head drooped and he muttered, "Well, fellows, I fell down—I've been canned. That's the rotten truth."

Socratic stepped quietly into the murky silence that followed this confession.

"Been neglecting your AREA, Henry?"

"Assault and battery on your AREA tommyrot!" blew off Nool, savagely, banging his fist into the sand. "It's all a delusion. I worked for two years developing my AREA, as you call it, and this is all I get for it. Just about what I expected, though. You can't make a gold necklace out of a piece of lead pipe. I guess I'll go back to the high desk at Lichtenberger's, where I belong—that is, if the old man will take me.”

“Don’t think a man’s AREA has anything to do with his success?”

“May have something to do with it, I suppose, but a man can grow big with Ability, Reliability, Endurance, and Action, and still be a pink, polka-dotted failure.”

“Ever know such a case, Henry?”

“Well, you can see I am in no mood for swinging the censer before my own shrine, but you know yourself, Socratic, I did develop my AREA—and this is what I get.”

Honest but Unreliable

“Still, mightn’t there have been some little irregularity in the outlines of that AREA of yours, Henry—some places where the frontier had not been pushed very far?”

“Well, maybe. But I did mighty conscientious work on all four of the qualities.”

“I know you did, Henry, and I thought you would succeed unless you failed in reliability. Are you sure you developed that as far as you ought?”

“What do you mean?” bristled Nool, getting red in the face. “Honesty is more than a policy with me, and you ought to know it. It’s bred in the bone. I want to know what you mean by your question?”

“Just what is reliability, Henry?” soothed Socratic, ignoring the hauteur.

“Why, it’s trustworthiness.”

“And it is a result of what?”

“Sounds like our old AREA club recitation,” grinned Nool. “Why it is a result of the development of the positive feelings.”

“Honesty the only one of the positive feelings, Henry?”

“Why no, I suppose not, but it’s the one we make the most of in the development of reliability.”

“Perhaps so—at least some people, to whom honesty is ‘bred in the bone’ anyhow, and therefore no trouble to develop, may make the most of it. But do you think any man would be a complete failure who was full of faith in himself and of hope for the future?”

“Faith and hope! They are feelings, of course. I hadn’t thought of that, Socratic. But what’s the use? I’m too much of a doubting Thomas ever to develop any amount of faith.”

Nool Takes a Brace

“Do you think that a man is fully reliable who lacks faith in himself?”

“Well, in the technical sense of the word, perhaps not. But in the way that the word is ordinarily used, I can see how a man might utterly lack faith in himself and yet be thoroughly reliable.”

“Would you call a man reliable who would get cold feet and desert his post under fire?”

“Of course not. I guess you’re right, Socratic. And I might just as well own up that I fell down right there. I had to meet a committee from the Board of Supervisors and present our line. I got stage-fright and balled my selling talk up so that my competitor took away the business like taking the meat out of a soft-shelled egg. The boss was mighty good to me and tried to cheer me up, but I was down in the mouth. The result was that I got to passing up the hard prospects a good deal of the time, simply calling on them and getting my turn-down without trying to make a killing. Then the easy ones began to find out how little trouble it was to turn me down. By that time, the Old Man shed a few tiny tears of regret and reluctantly scraped me off the pay roll. Unreliable! I guess that hits Henry Nool, all right, Socratic. Wallop me hard. I don’t care what you give me. Only soak it to me strong enough to make me wake up, buck up, cheer up, and whoop ’er up, and go after the development of my whole AREA—reliability included.”

“Last one in’s a mutt!” yelled Fussberg, piling a double handful of sand in Wiggins’ lordly mane and sprinting for the surf.

“Not the Thing Itself, but the Idea of the Thing”

NOW this is my idea of living,” elaborated Wiggins, digging into his sundae. “The coolness of the sea breeze, the radiance of the lights, the soothing murmur of the surf, the soft, distant music of the band, the gleam and flutter of the light dresses and white ducks, the laughter and chatter of happy humans, the delicate flavor of the ices, all go to make up a midsummer night's dream of delight."

"Wiggins turned Sybarite!" grunted Fussberg, almost upsetting his glass. "And this is his idea of living! Suffering imbeciles! Sand in his shoes, gnats in his eyes, sunburn on his nose, blisters from the oars on his hands, gum-chewing supports for dead hair in the foreground, goo-eyed spooners in the middle distance, and heavily tanked souses in the background, dilute inanities in his ears, salt and sand in his hair, a gob of sweetened paste in his stomach, and a fatuous, pink-and-tinsel idea in his alleged mind! I suppose, Wigg, you would think that you had died and gone to Elysium if you were to get into fairly decent surroundings."

"And I suppose you would want to sprinkle attar of roses on your English violets, or turn up that classic nose of yours at gold double eagles because they were not flavored with fresh spearmint."

"Forget it!" snapped Pascoe. "You're both wrong, as usual in these silly wrangles. This isn't living, Wiggins, no matter how much pleasure it may be to your physical senses. It's simply relaxation and recreation in preparation for living. And it isn't a nightmare of discomfort and disgust, Fussberg. The shadows in the picture bring out the high lights. But it's when we are doing things in our work, when we can see the results grow under our hands, when we know and feel our power that we are really living."

"Et tu, Pascoe?" groaned Fussberg. "How could you? We all love our teacher dearly, and learn our little reading lessons as well as ever we can—so we do. But we don't think we have to stand up and recite the bunk on solemn occasions like this. Besides, for a man whose pate makes a high light among the shadows of the bald-headed row four nights in the week, your professed idea of living is too obvious. And relaxation and recreation! Baled hay! It's an assassinating bore, and you know it. We all know it. And we all hate it. But we come over here and take our punishment because 'it is the thing to do.' Nobody has a good time, any more than I do. But, poor fools, like me, they think they have to come. And then some of the more glib worshippers of the established, like Wiggins and Pascoe, drool about midsummer night's dreams and relaxation! Hold my head, Dub, I'm going to faint."

"Poor Fuss!" exuded Wiggins, "He can't even take his pleasures seriously, but has to delude himself into thinking that he is bored, and that everything is as hollow a mockery as his conversation. The rest of us aren't suffering any. This is a delight to me."

Suffering from the Idea of Hot Weather

"Hello, here's Goode Burdard," interrupted Fussberg. "Come on over, Goode, and join the bored."

"Thanks," smiled Burdard, nodding to the circle about the table, "Misery loves company, and I am worse than bored tonight. I've got to go over into the Imperial Valley to put one of my salesmen on his feet, and I'm slowly broiling to a cinder at the very thoughts of it. Pejor was over there last week, and he tells me that they are cooking their meals in the heat of the sun."

"Nonsense!" snorted Dubheimer. "I was over at El Centro last week myself, and it was just fine. Little warm, of course, but the heat is so dry that you don't notice it much. Besides, I feel better when it's hot."

"That's the difference between your temperament and mine, Dub, pursued Burdard. "Your blood may be so cold that a little scorching does you good, but mine is warm enough as it is, thank you."

"Hold on a minute, Goode," broke in Socratic. "Remember that Fourth of July we spent in Fresno, a year ago?"

"The day we raced all over town looking for members of the city council purchasing committee, finally got them together, bagged their order for equipping the new city hall with our device, and got away to Bakersfield on the evening train in time to land our man there before he started East? Well, can I remember one of the biggest larks I ever enjoyed? I'll tell you, I lived that day."

"And do you remember that we saw in the paper the next day that the Fourth of July had been the hottest day that Fresno had seen in years, the thermometer climbing up and touching a hundred and twenty-two in the shade?"

"By Tetter! So it was. And I remember I never noticed that it was hot at all."

"Is it really the heat, then, that you dread so much in going over into El Centro, or just your idea of it?"

"Well, maybe it is my idea of it, but I dread it just the same."

"Borrowing trouble, aren't you?"

"Don't see that I am."

"Well, if your idea of the Imperial Valley were the same as your idea of Fresno that Fourth of July, then you wouldn't dread it at all, would you?"

"No, I suppose not."

Some Painful but Preventable Ideas

"Wiggins here has an idea that Coronado on a summer night is living. Fussberg has an idea that it is a perishing bore. Pasco has an idea that it is relaxation and recreation. But the thing itself is the same in all cases, isn't it?"

"Sure," we chorused.

"Here is Fasil. He almost goes into convulsions when he hears a violin. And yet the rest of us enjoy violin music—with the emphasis on the music. Is it the violin that distresses him, or simply his idea of the violin?"

"Must be his idea of it," answered the crowd.

"Then here is Dubheimer. Hates to study. Groans when he studies English, perspires, twists his hair, grinds his teeth, bites his nails, and says things I dare not repeat before Wiggins. And yet he never notices the flight of time when he is studying out the batting and fielding averages of the big teams and their players. Is it the studying that causes him such grief, or his idea of studying?"

"I'll answer that," swung in Dubheimer, grinning. "It's just my fool idea that it is hard to study that galls me, that's all. But I'm getting over the idea, Socratic. It gets easier all the time."

"Does the subject you are studying get easier, or is your idea of studying convalescent?"

"Oh, the stuff gets harder all the time, and I have to study harder, but I don't dread it so much."

Just then there was a commotion at a near by table. A woman had screamed and fainted. Wiggins went to help.

"Toad hopped against her foot," he said, when he returned.

"Was it the toad itself that terrified her, or her idea of the toad?" Socratic wanted to know.

"Must have been her idea of it, because the toad itself is perfectly harmless?"

"Now here is Fussberg again," tickled Socratic. "A day or two reading proofs will put him to bed with a bruised ego. And yet he can read prize-fight dope by the week without suffering a pang. Which is it, the thing itself or Fuss's idea of the thing?"

How to Lay the Specter

"My idea of it, of course," owned up Fussberg, impatiently, "but what's the answer? What's the good of all this analysis of our troubles?"

"Can Goode change the temperature of El Centro, Fussberg?"

"No."

"Then he's bound to suffer from the heat when he goes there?"

"I see, I see. Please pass the hammer and a cold chisel and I'll get the idea into my head. What you mean is that most of our troubles are caused not by the thing itself, but by our idea of the thing, and that while we can't change the thing, we can change our ideas. Fine! Now perhaps, having shown us the way out of our afflictions, you will be good enough to show us how we can walk in that way."

"How did you get rid of that old idea of yours that you hated to write advertisements?"

"I got interested in the business, and was sitting up nights writing ads before I knew what had happened to me."

"And how did you get interested?"

"Got the idea that I could make money at it."

"Couldn't you get interested in proof reading by filling yourself with the idea that an absolutely clean proof is a rarity—and one worth producing, or that no ad is ever perfect and there is an opportunity for you to get in some feature at the very last minute that may increase the selling power a hundred per cent?"

"Bimini! Of course I could."

"But how about my trouble with the violin?" queried Fassil. "How can I interest myself in that?"

"Did you ever stop to analyze the fact that there was nothing so terrible about the rubbing of a rosined horsehair across a gut string on a wooden box?"

"Don't know that I did. What difference does that make?"

"Ever see a horseman training a colt not to be afraid of locomotives and automobiles?"

"Sure—drove the beast right up to the whirring, hissing things until he found that they would not hurt him. I suppose none of us really fear what we fully understand."

"Would the woman have fainted when that toad hopped against her satin slipper if she had spent years in the study of the anatomy, habits, and classification of reptiles?"

"Rather not. She would have had a totally different idea of the cute little thing."

"Would Fussberg make sarcastic remarks about young girls if he had a couple of lively daughters of his own?"

"Let's go and shoot the chutes," suggested Fussberg. "My idea of this whole show has changed."

What Garfort Didn't Know

YOU had better let me write a couple more thousand on your life while you're here, Garfort," pleaded Wiggins, as he filled out the receipt for the premium Garfort had just paid. "Your family is growing, and you are getting older. You really need more protection."

"No events," stubbed Garfort, doggedly. "It's about all I can do to soak off my fingers the money I'm paying you now."

"You'll have to think up some better excuse than that, old man. You have been building up business in your territory right along, and your commissions ought to be nearly twice as much now as they were when I wrote this first policy for you. Come, what do you want? Another twenty-year endowment?"

"I did push up my sales to beat the tambourine for a year or so, but they have been falling off for the last six months like the white man's hope before the black champion. Unless I can get my stride again, I'll have to take a new territory."

"What's the trouble? I thought we were on the sparkling crest of the wave of prosperity. New competitors in your territory?"

Same Competitor—New Ability

"No, same old crowd. But X. Q. Berty, with the National, is taking business away from all the rest of us in shiploads."

"What's he got on you? Prices or qualities?"

"Neither one. We all carry about the same grades of shoes, and the trade agreement keeps prices even. It's a puzzle to me how he does it."

"Is he such a whirlwind of a salesman?"

"That's what I can't figure out. He plugged along for years about the same as the rest of us, and we were all happy. Then, all of a sudden, he began to pull out of the ruck like a race-horse saying good-bye to a herd of fat steers. Since then he has had the bunch running around in small circles, throwing flip-flops, squawking discordantly, and burning up nerve fiber."

Socratic had been slowly coming out of his cave of meditation ever since the conversation began. Right here he took a hand in his usual quiet way:

"What does Berty himself say about it?"

"Says that for the first time since he began to carry a sample case, he knows his goods. But that's only a bluff. We all know our goods."

"Made a scientific analysis of them?"

"Why no—what's the use of all that poppycock? I've been handling shoes all my life, and I guess I know shoes."

Some Questions Garfort Didn't Answer

"What's that shoe you have on, Garfort?"

"Why, that's a Nettleton 'White House' patent leather, Oxford tie, knob toe and common sense heel."

"What is the vamp made of?"

"Horse hide."

"What kind?"

"Oh, it's the best quality."

"How do you know that?"

"Tell by its flexibility, weight, and toughness?"

"Is it Russian horse hide?"

"Perhaps so—that's a good quality."

"Be a good thing to tell your customers if you knew?"

"Oh, I suppose so, but they know the values of the Nettleton line."

"All of 'em?"

"No, not all of 'em, but they can be told about it."

"Where and how was it tanned?"

"Oh, I don't know where it was tanned, but it was done with bichromate of potash."

"Some tanneries do better than others, don't they?"

"Yes, I guess so."

"What is the outer sole made of?"

"Sole leather."

"Pretty broad term, that, isn't it?"

"Yes, there are a good many qualities of sole leather, but this is the best."

"Why not tell them that it is from the back of a Texas steer, tanned in Kentucky, with oak bark from Tennessee, and then explain why this is a superior combination?"

"That might be better, but they never ask about such things."

"What is the inner sole made of?"

"I can't tell you, specifically, but it's high grade, flexible, heavy leather."

"How about the lifts of the heel?"

"Don't know."

"What kind of thread is used?"

"Don't know."

"What cement do they use in the thread channel?"

"Some kind of stickum—I don't know."

"What kind of leather is used in the box toe?"

"Oh, it's just leather, hardened with some kind of preparation."

A Loud Outburst of Silence

"What's the tongue made of? (Silence). What is the sole polished with? (Silence). Of what and how is the twill made? (Silence). How are the laces made? The nails? The eyelets? What is the 'patent' enamel made of, and how is it applied?"

"Oh, cut it! You can't take the time to tell a busy merchant all those things."

"Do you know the history of shoes? The kinds worn by the different peoples of the past and present? The development of the shoe industry in the United States? When and where this particular shoe was produced? The designer of it? The industrial conditions in the factory? The personnel and capitalization of the firm making it?"

"No, not much about those things. What have they to do with selling shoes?"

"Do you know just how this shoe was made? The exact processes of tanning, die cutting, binding, bottoming, trimming, polishing, and packing and shipping?"

"Oh, a little. Not enough to talk much about them."

"Do you know about the machines used, when they were invented, and how they excel hand work? The financial and executive problems that arise in running a shoe factory and how they're solved in the factory that made this shoe?"

"What I don't know about those things would make me a millionaire if I knew them."

"Do you know just exactly what it costs to produce and market this shoe? How the cost is figured? What profits the manufacturers, jobbers, and retailers make?"

"Oh, I know a little about the jobbers' and retailers' end of the business, but nothing definite."

"Do you know just the relation in value, as to quality, utility, perfection, and price of this shoe to the other shoes in your line?"

"Yes, I know something about that—at least I can talk about it."

Garfort takes the Count

"Do you know who buys these shoes? Just what is their reputation among consumers? Any good judges of shoe values that wear them? What are the suggestive associations of this shoe?"

"Enough! Enough! I'll never say again that I know anything about shoes until I can talk something besides glittering generalities. I know enough about salesmanship to know that I have to get down to brass tacks when I want to sell. But I never realized before how vague, flat, and scanty my real knowledge was. I don't see how I ever sold any shoes at all. I'll bet there are consumers that know more about them than I do."

"And you're going to—?"

"Spend my vacation in the shoe factories and tanneries—live in them day and night—nose through them from cellar to loft—haunt the technical libraries. And I'm going to spend a week or two with our accounting department. Then, in the fall, we'll see where Mr. X. Q. Berty gets off."

"How about that new policy?" smirked

Wiggins, coming out of his suspended animation.

"Make it a five-thousand-dollar, twenty-year endowment, Wigg, old man. I'll meet the premiums all right."

"Jungl-itis!"

By D. HERBERT MOORE, in Agricultural Advertising

DON'T start—gentle reader—this is not a reopening of the Sinclair vs. Stockyards controversy.

Reference is made to the genuine African variety of jungle, and the fascination it holds for the modern hunter.

"Jungl-itis"—the "Big Game Fever"—is simply a symptom of the trend today toward big efforts—big results.

When Theodore Roosevelt set out to carry his hunting tour into the very heart of Africa, to penetrate the jungle—to match his endurance, his judgment, his fighting skill, against the mightiest beasts that roam—when he set as his mark the highest achievement hunter could win, he did more than give the world a concrete example of his own aggressive personality.

He gave expression to that fever that is a part of life in the new century—the throbbing desire to conquer the biggest obstacles and to win the biggest trophies.

Now "Teddy comes marching home" with enough specimens to stock a hundred museums.

And the point is this—he went after Big Game and he didn't stop until he got it—and got it a-plenty.

Colonel Roosevelt might have lingered in his native land had he been satisfied with smaller things. But the excitement of popping over the mild and purring wild cat of Arizona or the gentle grizzly of the Rockies had palled upon him.

No pop-gun play for Theodore!

He thirsted for gorier gore. He wanted to confront the lion in his lair and to twist the tail of the ferocious tiger.

He had the "Jungl-itis"—an acute attack.

And the Colonel's malady was contagious.

After him into the heart of the Big Game country went a host of followers. Our own McCutcheon forsook the corrosive pencil for the explosive elephant gun, and followed suit. Many more trailed in his wake, all with hearts pounding and cheeks glowing with the Big Game Fever.

It's the modern trend—the right trend—for those who play the Man's part—this Big Game hunting.

Jungl-itis in Business

And it's just as true in business as it is in sports.

The keen, live, alert man of affairs—whose nerves tingle with the desire for real accomplishment, is not content to pepper at Johnny Cottontails with bird-shot. He has lost his zest for snipe.

And just as the modern hunter sets his face toward the Big Game country, just as the Izaak Walton of today ignores the patient pike and the overfat bullhead and does battle with the gamey "muskie," so Mr. Commercial Huntsman and the angler for the best that is in the sea of business demand that they shall land the same prize trophies.

This holds the vital lesson for the advertiser, for the man who ought to be an advertiser. And the first chapter in that lesson and the first line in the chapter is this:

Go After the Big Game.

It's just as easy—often easier—than to do the thing in a pickayunish way.

But you can't rouse Big Game from the brush pile back of the barn. You won't land salmon trout or tarpon from the mill pond. It takes a brave man to be a good advertiser. It takes a brave man to be in business at all.

The man who is afraid of his shadow lingers amid the rushes that skirt the shore and watches the fellow of nerve and initiative wade in and win the prize.

You can't play any real game without bravery.

And business is a game—just as love and war and politics and every other struggle that puts men on their mettle is a game.

You will always have competition—stiff competition. There's no royal road that the other fellow can't encroach on, but the deeper you go into the Big Game country, the straighter your trail to your quarry, the fewer your companions will be, the more good, "clean" shots you will have for yourself.

If this be a Disease—Give Us More Sick Men

"Jungl-itis"—this incessant longing for Big Game—may be a malady. But it's a heap sight better than "Buck Fever," the outward quaking and inward shrinking from the dangers and discouragements of the trail.

Many there be who suffer from the latter ailment. Steamless fighters—the small game hunters in business. They are out with bean blowers, seeking to bag field mice. They are fishing with pin hooks for tadpoles.

Big Game hunting is not a parlor accomplishment. It doesn't class with ping-pong. It's not an undertaking for the fellow whose feet are tender and whose back is achey and who is not willing to drudge and carry and wait and to eat rough food in rough places. It's not for the fellow who won't drink flat on his belly from the cup that Mother Earth provides.

It's a man's work—and a man's winning.

Have you "Jungl-itis" in your veins, Mr. Business Man?

Do you feel the call of the Big Game country—to do the big thing in the big way—and win the big reward?

The time was never so opportune as now, the opportunity never so ripe. The way is more open than it ever was before. The game awaits you. The road is not always easy, but it has been trod before and there are markings along the way to show you the course. There are paths and guides and helpers.

Colonel Roosevelt wanted Big Game—so he did not go armed with a target rifle. He took Big Game guns, Big Game ammunition. He went prepared—and came back rewarded.

And that's the way the business hunter will win. He will be well prepared, well armed, well backed, well nerved.

And not the least of these accoutrements is the true nerve that means—not false confidence—but the Courage to do the Big Thing in the Big Way.

What is Good Advertising

By JEROME P. FLEISHMAN

THE president of the Advertising Club of Baltimore—McKee Barclay is his name—delivered himself of the following bit of wisdom in the course of a little talk on advertising that I had with him a short time ago:

"Good advertising isn't noise. It is desire-creating salesmanship. Do you want to know whether you have written a good ad? Then ask yourself this question: 'Have I said anything that will make the other fellow WANT what I have advertised?'"

This man, who is the executive head of an aggregation of the Monumental City's brainiest producers of advertising "copy," is as full of horse-sense as he is of genius. He is a newspaper writer and cartoonist. Perhaps you have seen his name before, for his work is reprinted in the foremost journals of the land.

He is extremely practical—a personification of the sort of practicality that will tear the most effusive and elaborate piece of advertising to pieces with the query, "Will it sell the goods?"

And it seems to me that Mr. Barclay's query is, after all, the supreme test.

Advertising is written by or for the man with something that he wants to dispose of to somebody else.

The best advertising, regardless of copy critics and art connoisseurs, is that which does what it is intended to do—sells the goods.

Do your part, Mr. Merchant—put some life and enthusiasm and "desire-creating salesmanship" into your advertising—and the other fellow will want to do business with you.

Argument in Favor of Quoting Prices in Advertisements : by A. St. P. Reynolds

SO," EXCLAIMS our genial friend, John Bigfamily, perusing his Sunday paper, "here is just what I have been waiting for, an opportunity to pick up a new suit cheap. 'Quickseller' is advertising forty-dollar suits for just half. I'll get down there bright and early tomorrow morning and look 'em over."

"Did you notice a vacuum cleaner advertised on that same page, Jawn"? remarks the Missus.

"Vacuum cleaner, that's the new fangled way of sweeping. Yes, here it is. They don't say how much, though. Humph, reckon they are afraid to tell, perhaps. I'd stop and ask 'em or drop 'em a line, but if I did either they would try to 'hot-air' me to death, or sick their canvassing agents on me, or else they would everlastingly pester the life out of me with circular advertisements. Nothing doing on the vacuum cleaner, m'dear, we'll wait till they come out with their prices and if we can afford one, then we'll get it."

About the suit, however, the lingering smile which lit Bigfamily's phiz during the rest of the day, was the smile of anticipation. The advertiser stated the quality and price, and Bigfamily sold himself the suit. It may never have been built to sell for $40, but it was worth $20 and Bigfamily was satisfied.

In ninety-nine cases out of every hundred where no price is quoted the advertiser is deluding himself into thinking that he has a good reason, and from any angle or perspective he is dead wrong.

The hurrying, frivolous public won't guess worth a cent. It is utterly devoid of favorable imagination. It is from St. Louis in more ways than one, and if its fancy supplies the aching void left by the lack of price in an advertisement, it does so with a grouch, for it figures that the advertiser had good reason to neglect to state his price. The reason popularly attributed is that the price might bring on acute cardiac neuralgia.

Suppose—yes, let us suppose—that a big factory took the pick of its brightest salesmen, dressed them up fine, gave them excellent samples and started them forth, but utterly refused to give them an inkling as to the price on the goods. The railway ties from Maine to Mexico would soon be crowded with them homeward bound, unless they managed to save out a return ticket.

Then why, in the name of the great horn spoon, are the finely dressed ads, the best obtainable at the price, expected to shout, verily to scream forth their wares and when asked their prices to stare the reader dumb-founded in the face? It would spell absolute confusion for the salesman. Is the ad not the salesman, too?

Because a thing costs high to produce is no reason why prices should not be quoted at first hand. Everyone expects a house to cost more than a suit of clothes.

It isn't necessary to have a bargain to make a sale. The public wants its needs supplied, and it knows that it rarely gets its needs at a bargain.

Merit will sell a useful and superior article with price blazoned on it much quicker than without, especially if the price is "right."

Therefore, I contend, why be afraid to put a price on goods advertised? A store that doesn't mark prices in its show window display will never have a popular run of trade. It is the plain open-and-shut way of doing business that sells goods these days.

Buying by the public is not horse swapping and few people, if any, want to haggle. Besides, haggling takes time, and time is worth money to the man who pays money for it. Prices marked plainly in advertisements will allow the buyer to size up his roll and if his desire is great enough for the goods, he spends if he has the price.

Irrespective of quality, price is the greatest feature of all, and the man who tells of his goods in advertisements and fails to state prices is shortsighted and is doing but half of what is essential to promote sales. He is apt to be considered one of the "hot air specialists," aiming to get into touch with the spender so that in the effusion of his humid selling gas he can "sort o'" overcome the buyer and make the sale.

No, all non-quoters of prices who advertise are not in this class but the public is shy of the man that doesn't quote prices.

Lack of price indicates lack of confidence on the part of the seller, or else it indicates the questionable practice of gauging the price according to the means of the purchaser.

And it is surely a waste of the advertising appropriation to tell of the merits of good goods and not to tell of the cost of them.

How many sales would Sears-Roebuck make, were their prices not a feature along with quality. How many sales would Wanamaker or Macy's close if they advertised without stating prices.

I may be wrong on the exceptions but in the rule I stoutly maintain that price should be named in all advertisements with a liberal use of intellect on the part of the advertiser to convince the "advertisee" that the goods are measure for measure, worth the cost and more.

Human Welcome

By C. R. TROWBRIDGE

WELCOME! How lifeless, how meaningless in paint or ink. But what a power in human demonstration!

Here is a convention. The store fronts and buildings are gay with welcome signs. "Welcome, welcome, welcome" on every side. A reception committee is at the railroad station. Several strangers of importance are expected. They arrive. Sparkling eyes and thrilling handshakes combine with smiles as the committee members receive the visitors. Up the street they go in carriages.

Did the signs or the man give the true definition of welcome?

In a hotel down east there is a beautiful welcome sign over the desk in the rotunda. A stiff, cold-faced clerk extends a clammy hand wrapped about a pen, as he nods to the register for the signature.

In a hotel in an Indiana city a merry little fellow meets every hack and bus that backs up to his doorway. "Good morning," "Good evening," "How are you," comes in a cheery voice with a hearty handshake.

Did the sign or the man give the true definition of welcome?

Over the doorway of an office in an Illinois factory is a very pretty sign, "Welcome to Everybody." I sat in a cubby hole on a hard-bottom chair in that place for two hours one day, waiting to see the president. An unconcerned boy, chewing vigorously on gum, had previously presented my card. Just why I was kept waiting so long, I never found out, but when my patience was at the point of blowing a piston, I was waited upon by a chilly young clerk, who said the chief was "very busy today" and to "state my business." I did—on the back of a card—and hastily left the building. My mission meant a lot to this factory manager, as I represented a big stockholder in the company, who sought some information on a certain delicate topic. The next day I received, by registered mail, a letter of apology, but I never went back and the stockholder later disposed of his holdings.

In another factory some years ago, I happened to be a caller on a matter of interest to the general manager. I sent in my card by a wide-awake, pleasant chap, who returned instantly to tell me that the general manager would see me in a few minutes. It was scarcely ten seconds, it seemed, when I was greeted by the man I sought, with "Glad to see you; come right in," accompanied by a handshake which immediately gave me courage and hope in the proposition I had to present.

Did the sign or the man give the true definition of welcome?

Webster in defining the word says, "To receive and entertain hospitably, gratuitously and cheerfully."

Can a sign do this?

The answer must be No.

Human welcome is the thing.

In this there is action, inspiration, results!

The Securing and Holding of Favorable Attention : by Fred G. Kaessmann

ON EVERY hand one may see the lessons of life. Nor are there restrictions. The scientist may see—as may the butcher, the baker, the candlestick maker. Above all, may our friend, the salesman, see. He can learn here, there and everywhere. The main trouble is that many of us having eyes see not. But—we can learn.

Here is one lesson.

The city hall was packed to the doors. Not another seat was left. Aisles were crowded, doorways packed.

Hon. William P. White, mayor of Lawrence, Massachusetts, candidate for reelection, was soon to address his fellow citizens. He sat there in all his immaculateness whilst other minor lights said their little say. It would be impossible for him to make a spectacular entrance. To secure attention he must devise some other means—but he was equal to the occasion. His voice is powerful. He can make himself heard even in the largest of halls. So he placed his reliance upon that.

A Political Attention Getter

"Ladies and gentlemen," he said, "One year ago when I ran for mayor, the Democrats said I would steal the eagle off the city hall. Today the bird is there proud and handsome in his brilliant plumage. Had the Democrats been elected, his head would have been between his legs, and his tail feathers would be drooping unto the dregs of shame."

Did that attract attention? Would that have attracted you? Whether or not, it caught that vast audience, caught it to the man, and the roar of applause that followed showed plainly that for the present, at least, he had that big concourse of people in the hollow of his hand.

Yes, and he kept it there. Nothing prosy about his talks. He talks facts and figures. No mere "hot air" for him. Like the salesman out fighting for glory and orders on the firing line, he met objections—the kind the gallery god likes so well to present. These he met straight and properly. Then there were other objections:

"Believe it or not," he said, "I was offered $7,500 to pave Essex street with wood block paving—$7,500, five times as much as you pay me for a yearly salary. Did I take it? Did I betray you who fought for me last fall, and you who trusted me?"

Voice from the audience—"You wanted $10,000."

"Yes and you," retorted the mayor, like a flash, "would sell out for two dollars."

Laughter greeted this—and cleared the way for proceeding.

Just try to imagine, though, if you must, what a cumbersome thing any attempt at explanation would have been, under the circumstances. Yet there are salesmen, placed in almost identical circumstances, not as to facts, understand, but as to circumstances, who try to explain—to their sorrow.

Especially is this true of salesmen whose one strong point is a secret manufacturing process, relative to which, though, purchasers will persist in nagging. Such can learn from the mayor of Lawrence, Massachusetts.

Building a Selling Point

"They tried to get it going. Various societies took hold. But until I came along those poor women, earning just a few dollars a week, with children, little children, and no husbands, had no place to leave them. I changed that. I had them come here to the city hall and I talked it over with them. Then I went out and got the money. The business men of Essex street subscribed it.

"Today those children are clean, safe and happy—and their mothers no longer need worry. You may think that nothing. There was nothing big about it—but all others failed. You might have failed. I made the home successful. I established it. Is that worth nothing? Ought you, who have children, children that may some day be left alone, not to consider that, when you cast your vote next Tuesday?"

"Billy" White is a shrewd politician. He is as shrewd and far-seeing as the best—nearly always. Now, I myself believe that his heart was in the work when he worked to place this children's home on a successful and permanent basis. Discussion as to that would here be futile.

Important to salesmen, though, is the fact that men can build selling points—when "on the job." Many is the proposition that might be made more attractive, around which a better selling talk could be built, if only those who would be most benefited would dig for the points, would, so to speak, provide children's homes—for effective talking later.

Many salesmen can attract attention. Many can maintain this attention at white heat. These are successful. Many others cannot.

Mayor White is one of those who can. It is a pleasure to watch him keep his finger on an audience's attention pulse, as it were. The slightest wandering quickly becomes known to him. Always, too, he is the man of the minute. He can check that wandering—does check it—instantly. No matter how important the matter may be that he may be discussing, he switches from it for the time being. Some other point is brought forward—for the time being. Always, however, he drives home the point he had in mind. He comes back with it later in the talk.

By following this method he kills two birds with one stone: He maintains the interest of the audience—and he, sooner or later, drives home the point in mind.

About Repetition—The Teacher's One Method

To the salesman whose prospects have a habit of yawning while he talks, these tactics of Mayor White should prove of interest and value. And he doesn't hesitate to repeat his words—even as I have done. For which, as the barbed nail said, "Things cling the better."

Repetition—interested repetition—is the teacher's one method. And the salesman is a teacher.

Of course, you may see something about the foregoing that is incongruous. You may say, "How can a man be interesting and repeat himself?"

Usually, to be sure, you would be right. The thing for you to remember is, then, that there is such a thing as being discriminating. "Billy" White discriminates. He knows when to repeat and when not. Controlled repetition—repetition resulting because of deliberate repeating—differs materially from the repetition of mind wandering. "Billy" White knows this—and acts accordingly.

You can use the device in your selling talks with good effect. Men have, you know, a way of forgetting, when facts, points, are not driven home.

Hero worship, this, you say? No—nothing of the kind. I am not much on hero worship. Never was—except in the case of good old Abe—probably never will be again. Simply a case of studying the man—with a view of learning from his strong points—and his weak ones. Perhaps, some day, you may hear of some of his weak ones.

The "I Will" Stamp

By Ray Clarke Rose

IN MY left hand I hold a blank piece of paper. It is tough, durable, sightly. It is worth, perhaps, a cent.

In my right hand I hold an exact duplicate of the first piece of paper—except that it has something printed on each side of it.

It is worth one hundred dollars. It is a one-hundred-dollar bill.

Purpose and action have increased that almost worthless sheet to ten thousand times its original value.

Here is a concrete example of what a steadfast purpose accomplishes. The one-hundred-dollar bill says that somebody will.

Say, William, stamp the fair sheet of your personality with the fiat of your determination.

Impress indelibly your character with the "I Will" of your changeless purpose, and you'll be worth something.

Perhaps you may be a million-dollar Bill. Who knows?

Extracts from the Actual Correspondence between the Sales Manager of the Geo. F. Eberhard Company, San Francisco, and a Live Organization of Business Builders

Service

Being Part of a General Letter to the Sales Force

IN A letter before me the question is asked, "What do you believe is the vital force in business?" A dandy question, and I only hope that I can answer it in a way that will do the subject full justice.

Broadly speaking, the vital force in business life is the honest desire to serve. Business, it is well said, is the science of service. He profits most who serves best.

At the very bottom of the wish to render service must be honesty of purpose. As I go along through life I see more and more that honesty in word, thought, and work, means success. It spells a life worth living and in business, clean success.

Service in business must be everywhere; the desire and act of giving the customer just what he requires, to pack it securely, to ship it promptly, to invoice it correctly and to collect for it in a courteous manner are only part of the science of service.

Service in business also calls for the willingness to accommodate, an active effort to do all reasonable things for one another and for the customer. It is a full appreciation that little details attended to grow into the big results.

You cannot count the profits on every transaction, but if you work with the guiding idea of service in mind, you win.

Service means to be tactful, to do things graciously and do them well. It's part of the science of service to do business in a way that will leave the cleanest, clearest impression of the ability to serve so that the customer will want to purchase again and again.

Every business, every individual, is open to criticism for the unnecessary curtness, the momentary laziness, the lack of cheerfulness or willingness in the doing of some things every day. Each act of this nature interferes with the perfecting of uniform service.

Add to the desire to profit, the willingness to earn the profit by rendering service, an earnest intention to improve, to progress intelligently, to be critical and work cheerfully, and you or any individual or business with that kind of mental equipment is bound to win.

Everything Well and Pleasantly Done Spells "Service"

Remember this also—the years ahead of us mean that we must be more able than in the past. Are you and is the business preparing for it?

Service and efficiency will be interpreted more broadly, will be more comprehensive every year. We must co-operate to hold our relative position in the world of trade.

Think of the business world of the near future as a result of the growing appreciation of the science of service. The improvement the worker makes of his opportunities for self-improvement and the consequent development of business institutions and individual efficiency will mean a new commercial era.

The prospect is a pleasant one and as we live but a little while, let us live sanely, work intelligently, prepare ourselves and build the business so that we can appreciate and be a worthy part of the business world of the morrow.

The pleasantness of our work, our association together, our mutual profit, will grow also, if we continue to do our several parts with the perfecting of our business service as our ideal.

The Average Man

Being Part of a General Letter to the Sales Force

ACHAP said to me yesterday—"What you do is all right, Eberhard, but you are not the average man. Everyone can not study and say things as you do, and to be connected with a growing business organization is a big advantage."

No praise is due me, nor am I the only one. I have worked, studied and fought to keep above the average, and to have each one of you in the organization keep above, way above, the average.

It has well been said, that the average man is a narrow gauge egotist. He is not willing to look at himself, or admit that the other fellow knows anything worth considering. State some proved fact and see how quickly it is contradicted by the average man.

No man can fail to appreciate this if he will but analyze the course of conversation between men he meets at clubs, in hotels, on trains and in all places of business.

Listen to the excuses for mental, moral and physical deficiencies that the average man makes.

How he warms up to trifles, clothes, fights, baseball and small talk topics.

How he talks of the past. What he used to be or do. Who his brother Bill's wife's sister's husband is, his friend Jones and his doings, Jones' auto and real Turkish rugs.

How the average man loves to sleep, to eat, to drink, to see every show and then to curse the gods and business for his present poor health and financial stringency.

When a man who is above the average meets him—one who works cheerfully, who admires the efficient, who studies systematically, who keeps good health, morals and friends by the use of common sense and the expenditure in sane directions of his time and energy, the average man calls him by saying.

"Well, you're different. You have an advantage. You're not like me."

Thanks, we are not, and then thanks.

The great mistake the Creator made for the average man's peace of mind was to have created a world governed by unchanging laws and principles and making mankind of such great potential qualities that he could adjust himself to the laws and his environment, and rise as far as he desired.

If the world had only been made so that the average man could be stationary, unchangeable like a natural law, and order his weather, his meals, his home, his surroundings and get them without continued well-directed effort—how happy he thinks he would be!

Give him Aladdin's wonderful lamp and what average man could be unhappy? And every man has one at his command, if he will but polish up his mental faculties and keep the old moral and physical self in good order, not trying to trade for a new lamp at every setback, blow or disappointment.

Look at yourself. Look around you.

There is work for years. Do it, and the power of your genie will grow.

About Daily Reports

Being Part of a Letter to a Salesman Who Objected to Writing Them

ANSWERING your letter received on the 7th, relative to daily reports, everything that you have said on this subject I have brought up at the office here repeatedly.

You are right and at the same time you are wrong.

The information that we asked for is terse and to the point. You must admit that if we give it the attention that you know we can give it, then we can get a great deal out of it. You can rest assured that we are not only sending out form letters and special letters, to the number of fifteen and twenty a day, but we are correcting on an average of fifty cards every day in our card files. And we are accumulating other data for future use.

If you will fill out the reports for a while in the same manner that the others are doing, you will give the office an opportunity to decide on what can be eliminated or what can be substituted.

We will get to the top of this proposition and we don't intend to put in a whole lot of red tape or do unnecessary work. But we do intend to do what is necessary to secure the largest possible volume of business and render the most efficient service in our particular line.

Your idea of letting a salesman be a salesman is right; that is what we have always tried to do. We have tried to make the salesman an independent unit. We have no desire to make him report any more than is necessary to satisfy our principles and enable us to supplement his work intelligently.

Handling the Know-It All Buyer

Part of a Letter to a Salesman

I CAN sympathize with you in your experience and admit that of all the unfortunate situations, the finding of a buyer who knows it all in the general store in a one-store town, is the worst.

You were right in not telling him what you thought. Your experience and mine and, I believe, the experience of every other thinking salesman has proved that the buyer who knows it all, if he is in the employ of some one else, does not last long.

I have never met with a firm in my experience—east or west—that could afford to employ a man that knew it all. It places the customers, the salesman who calls to sell goods, the proprietor, and the other workers in the store at such a disadvantage that the know-it-all chap is let out for someone who has something to learn, confesses it, and sincerely seeks for knowledge.

Of course, if the man who knows it all is the proprietor, the problem is a little harder of solution. But there is always some solution to be found if you analyze the situation carefully. Possibly the proprietor has a small business, after all, or a glance at his credit rating may show you that in due course there will be a change.

No man who knows it all, whether in the position of employe or proprietor, can long succeed in the sense we both mean. So the way to do is to treat them kindly.

Sometimes you find that you have misjudged the action or attitude that makes you feel that some individual is a "know-it-all."

Such impressions are often given by buyers and proprietors who are acting upon the hereditary instinct of self-defense that has come down through the ages in the commercial world. Very few of them appreciate the advantage of a sincere and frank attitude when negotiating with visiting salesmen.

Of course it is well to remember that some salesmen are afflicted with the same disease of knowitallitis. That is the cause of a great many buyers assuming a somewhat similar attitude.

We have all met this man. We meet him every day. Have you ever stopped and sized him up in general? Could you take him into your confidence? Would you trust him with a secret? No! Why? Because he is a weakling. He is a man afraid of himself. He can't trust himself to listen to your proposition because he is afraid you will win him over, so he fortifies himself with this "Know-it-all" bluff, trying to make you think he knows all about your proposition.

I have met many of these fellows and called their bluff so that when I got through with them they generally gave me an order. I find that you must handle this class of buyers roughly—even in some instances, cuss them. They like it, as it shows them you are the stronger of the two. And it makes a good chap of them for the next time. As you say, they don't last long, because they are weaklings.

But, after all, Mr. "Know-it-all" sells merchandise and we want his business while he lasts. It will make a favorable impression with his successor.

How much easier our work would be if we put forth as much effort trying to improve the quality of it as most of us do trying to find excuses for not properly attending to it.—George W. Ballinger.

"You may be as orthodox as the Devil, and as wicked."—John Wesley.

Marshall Field once said to me, "The man that lies to sell goods is a fool."

Why?

Because as soon as that is discerned—and it will be discerned—confidence, the basis of trade, is shattered, and then you have the knocker instead of the booster.—Sheldon.

The Life Insurance Agent as an Educator and Public Servant : by W. H. Tennyson

SALESMANSHIP has been defined as the life blood of commerce; and service as the heart which pumps the life blood.

The life insurance salesman does a work of service, and when representing a company for whose record and practices he cannot be asked to apologize, may devote the best that is in him to his work. He is in at least as good a position as is a man in any other profession to base his expectations of reward on the solid foundation of service rendered. He must, however, look upon his work as an opportunity to be made the most of, and must be willing to pay the price of success in honest effort.

Each representative of a company is one of a compact body working for the same objects: First, to support himself and his family; second, to serve his fellows; third, to build up an institution that stands out as an exponent of twentieth century manhood.

The commission earned by the agent is, in every case, his pay for efficient service rendered. He serves the individual (and at the same time serves himself), and by serving enough individuals (and thus increasing his service to himself) he serves the public. His work then becomes a work of public service; he becomes a public benefactor.

According to Sumner, "he is the true benefactor and alone worthy of honor who brings comfort where before there was wretchedness, who dries the tears of sorrow."

He is the true benefactor, might be added, who has the ability to instill what Burns has called "that glorious privilege of being independent."

In no profession, other than life insurance, can a man in his daily work be a public benefactor in this sense.

The Agent as Teacher

The two greatest problems that the world faces today are ignorance and poverty. Society and governments are battling with them in various ways.

Old age benefits, pensions, compulsory insurance and other experiments are being tried in Europe. People in this country, however, appreciate more and more that the aged and destitute should not be left dependent upon charity.

There is just one institution that is today doing more toward the evolution and betterment of social conditions along these lines than has ever been accomplished by any other plan proposed anywhere. This institution is that of life insurance. By bringing these facts forcefully home to the uninsured and underinsured the field man is doing a work of public service.

As poverty and pauperism are decreased, ignorance is decreased. Furthermore, the life insurance agent is a teacher of high ideals.

The drunkard cannot secure life insurance, the man who uses drugs and otherwise injures his body cannot secure life insurance, the man whose health is poor cannot secure life insurance, the man who is engaged in a hazardous occupation without proper safeguards cannot secure life insurance.

As the public generally, through the life insurance agent, learns these things, a betterment is brought about.

The Agent as a Public Benefactor

To quote A. C. Newell, winner of the Calef Cup for the best essay on the subject, "The Life Insurance Agent as a Public Benefactor":

"Adherence to his lessons" (the lessons of the life insurance agent) "means right living. His mandate for the observance of health laws has brought about a boon to society less recognized but far more valuable than modern contributions to toxicology. * * *

"The life insurance agent is the greatest barrier to the increasing social and economic forces producing paupers. In the wide distribution of his funds, more than any one factor, he negatives the semi-adage that 'wealth accumulates and men decay.'"

According to Edwin D. Horgan, "Life insurance broadens all with whom it comes in contact. * * * The life insurance agent is a missionary; a teacher of moderation, of consideration for others. His profession is a creative one; he instills hope in the breasts of the weak, who become strong in themselves by reason of sacrifice. He helps to make two blades of grass grow where but one grew before. He lives from his own conviction, and also possesses the faculty to convince others—a great power for good when exerted in behalf of such an admittedly laudable cause as life insurance.

"When the agent succeeds, the estate of the widow and orphan is safeguarded by something more tangible than good intentions.

"A public benefactor?

"Truly so, if the molding of better men, giving succor to the infant and making sweeter the declining years of the aged and infirm, is work for the public good; for such, in effect are the results of the life insurance agent's efforts."

The Agent as a Financial Power

The great public benefit due to the work of the life insurance agent might be further illustrated by reference to the number of men saved from bankruptcy during the panic of 1907 through policy loans; by reference to the millions of life insurance funds invested in railroad bonds and in farm mortgages.

"It has been authentically computed," (to quote Mr. Newell further) "that life insurance companies and associations distributed, last year (1908) in the United States and Canada, $480,800,000. This was primarily the work of the agent.

"Instead of imperiling individual effort, the disbursement of this vast sum means that the life insurance agent has taught a nation thrift and systematic saving. The fund it represents is largely the altruism of those who would protect their families."

The work of the philanthropist is voluntary, whereas life insurance is a business institution founded on sound business methods, and with a perpetual charter.

There is a certain humiliation in accepting money from a philanthropist, but he or she who receives the proceeds of a life insurance policy that some agent has sold enjoys "that glorious privilege of being independent."

Is not the work of field men therefore decidedly worth while?

"The profit you make is but the pay you get for the service you can render."

The more service a man can render, the more successful he will be, so far as the two primary elements of success are concerned, manhood and money.

Cultivate Your Memory

By Frederick Neudorff

ONE MOST important feature of success in business, in my judgment, is the cultivation of the memory. I can give you a rule, that if strictly followed in your business life will cause you to be successful to your fullest expectation.

It is this: "When you enter any vocation, learn ten items, or ten duties. Learn them so thoroughly that nothing can drive them from your mind, then add ten more and then another ten, and keep on adding tens, not forgetting the tens that have preceded, until you have thoroughly mastered all the details of the business. Master them so well that no matter when called upon, your mind will respond at once to the call for information.

When you have done this, your services will be so highly appreciated that you can command almost any salary, because of your being the rare exception in the great mass of employes.

You realize that this means that you cannot give your mind up to frivolities nor allow it to wander at will in fields that are not memory-building.

You may think this an enormous price to pay, but if you will follow it and the elements that go towards memory-building, such as good literature, good music, good company, temperance in all things, you will not only be benefited financially, but you will be getting the finest things, and the best things, the most complete part of a well ordered, healthy and successful life.

"Patience," said Uncle Eben, "is good in its place. But dar ain't no cash compensation foh de man dat waits foh a thaw instid o' hustlin' out wif a snow-shovel."—Washington Star.

What the Business Man Ought to Know About Fire and Insurance : by E. G. Vail

Straight Talk on a Billion-Dollar Subject by the Chairman of the Fire Insurance Committee of the Chicago Credit Men's Association

DID you ever stop to consider how great forward movements among men grow, gradually transforming their minds, changing completely their sense of responsibility toward life?

Go back to the time of the Crusaders and after you have pierced the glamor of romance that the novelists have thrown around their centuries, consider some of the conditions under which men then lived—and particularly their exposure to the great black scourge which, stalking over the land, decimated villages and cities and laid low more brave warriors than ever fell in battle.

In those days men never dreamed that there was anything to do but submit to the awful waste. There was no preventive, no weapon with which to fight the scourge.

But a change has taken place!

Against ignorance and superstition, indifference and stubborn opposition—all lions in the path of progress which it takes courage to meet—the black smallpox scourge has been so conquered that it has ceased longer to be a cause of terror amongst civilized people.

The work was that of dauntless, far-sighted leaders, till public sentiment was sufficiently aroused to bring in government regulation and preventive measures which permit no man to be a menace to his neighbors. Now, the community that is visited by a few cases of the disease feels, as it should, a certain sense of disgrace.

We might follow this train of thought into other fields, but enough has been said to show how problems, seemingly hopeless of solution, are met and man's habit of thought completely revolutionized.

The Red Figures of the Fire Scourge

Now, the United States is visited every year with something almost akin to a scourge, in a large measure so unnecessary that it seems impossible that an enlightened people can allow it to continue unchecked. Day and night its destructive work goes on.

Look at the figures—$1,346,000,000 represents the absolute annihilation of the products of man's labor, resulting from fire, in the United States during the five years ending January 1, 1909, a waste that must be restored, if perchance restoration be possible, not by insurance funds (they only serve to spread the burden a little, they don't restore at all), but by an enormous expenditure of new energy on new materials.

Let us hope such a figure of waste impresses you, but at least consider the suffering which the devastation entails—loss of home, frequently loss of human life; loss through stoppage of business, or loss of employment, perhaps bankruptcy from which it takes years to recover.

E. G. VAIL

Would you care to undertake the defense of this record?

The Big Loss Preventable

Fire we must and always will have. If we had a record of burning, say twice or three times as much property for every thousand people as they of Europe have, we could perhaps put down as the cause a difference in construction more or less excusable in a country comparatively new. But to present a record of loss from ten to twenty times as great for the same number of inhabitants and growing worse instead of better, would strike any reasonable man as proof enough that there prevails here an inexcusable neglect of fire-preventive measures on the part of individuals, business houses, municipal and state governments such as exists nowhere else in the world.

In some way, there must be aroused among men the same feeling toward the individual or community that exposes men to excessive fire danger as has come into existence in connection with infectious disease.

If the results of a man's careless acts fell on himself alone, nobody else would have a word to say, but they don't.

Through careless, messy management of factory and store—waste allowed to lie anywhere, oil to drip over floors and shelves, heating and lighting apparatus to be a constant menace, combustible rubbish allowed to accumulate awaiting only the carelessly tossed, half-extinguished match, gasoline treated with absolute disregard of its highly inflammable character, etc., etc., property worth millions of dollars is constantly in needless danger of destruction with all the loss and suffering that entails.

Heedless of others' lives and property as well as their own, men refuse or delay to put in so simple a device as water buckets or fire-extinguishers to catch the incipient blaze; they construct flimsy buildings which they know the flames would eagerly seize and make a firebrand of, if given but half a chance.

Municipal Neglect

And again, the municipal authorities of the numberless growing villages and cities of our country give scant heed to their duty in making provision against conflagration until after their town has had its own experience—they permit rows of buildings of inflammable construction to be put up without a pretense of a fire-stop on the absolutely fallacious theory that a man has the right to do what he wills with his own; they provide systems of water supply no more than adequate to take care of the citizen's daily requirements; they are niggardly in providing fire apparatus and men to man it; they make no laws regarding the storage of highly combustible and explosive materials or, if they make them, do not properly see to their enforcement; often they actually discourage individual property holders from installing that best of all methods of fire protection, the sprinkler system, because it means the enlargement of their pipes and the increasing of their reservoirs or pumping plants; they treat with indifference and sneers the reports of the engineers of the insurance inspection boards, which point out changes which would tend to produce safer conditions, evidently thinking that while the town of Luckless might be visited by a sweeping fire, some special Providence protects their municipality.

Haven't we already had lessons enough? Haven't we seen enough thriving towns and splendid cities literally melt before the devouring conflagration, to brand such negligence on the part of our authorities as criminal?

Must every town and city have a rude awakening before it will enforce precautionary measures?

There is many a community where the entire population is having laid upon it the burden of high insurance rates because the negligence of municipal officers in providing against conflagration. What is even worse, the partiality with which they enforce preventive measures lays the whole town open to constant fire hazard.

I know full well how hard it is to enforce laws without fear and favor, how easy it is for certain influential townsmen (fine fellows whom everybody likes) to secure special exemptions on account of friendliness with the authorities whom they very likely have put under personal obligation in one of various ways. Over and over again political, social and business debts are being thus paid off by municipal authorities, but it means higher taxation for the whole citizenship besides exposing them to great risk.

Are you, Mr. Businessman, quite certain that your town is free from this condition and that everybody is being made equally to observe building laws and conduct his business so that he shall not be maintaining a menace?

Listen to the Fire Insurance Man

There is another point in this question of fire waste which should have no importance but, unfortunately, through careless thinking, is given importance.

Because the public has been taught to believe that the business of fire insurance is a form of pillage, any suggestions for preventing losses which insurance men may make, no matter what beneficence would flow from their adoption, are too apt to be utterly spurned.

And yet, men generally recognize the value of long training and experience in special directions.

When the lawyer advises regarding the probable decisions of the court; when the physician tells us regarding the probable action of certain drugs; when the engineer gives his opinion on the stress and strain upon the bridge; when the leading banker gives out his views on the probable action of the money markets, everybody listens and the wise give heed, recognizing that he invites disaster who acts contrary to their advice.

Now, all these men reach their conclusions by roads no more scientific than the fire insurance expert.

If we follow the precautionary advice of all other classes of experts, why spurn the advice of the insurance expert? Furthermore, his prosperity, just as truly as ours, depends upon avoiding losses, a fact that should make his opinion especially valuable.

Cooperation of the Business Men and Insurance Companies

Two things I want to have you realize before the lesson is impressed by personal or community suffering: First, the awfulness of our fire waste; second, that this waste is capable of being reduced to but a fraction of its present figures.

The first is a personal matter, but the second is a personal and community matter. Our authorities should be aroused to activity against wholesale fire devastation, through the enactment of proper laws and ordinances and their enforcement without fear or favor. This change will never be brought about except through business men. If they insist, precautions will be installed against the ravages of the fire scourge just as they have been adopted against other forms of scourge.

It's all simple enough. Every business man is applying precautionary measures every day of the year in every phase of his business, from the art of buying through all the arts of selling and accounting.

All I am contending for is the application of the same intelligent effort against fire risks that a live, up-to-date merchant applies to the minimizing of any hazard attending daily affairs, only I want you to see that you need to join hands with other citizens in this matter more than in meeting any other element which threatens your welfare.

Cooperation is the touchstone, intelligent cooperation among the business men of the community.

Up against hard luck and a soulless corporation!

That's the way the man talks who had a fire and failed to collect what he thought he was entitled to. More than likely you know him or have been told his story. It makes the company look black, but possibly there's the company's side, which you haven't heard. Your friend who had the fire wouldn't be expected to tell it.

Scrutinize Your Policies

There are some mean adjustments made, close bargains struck by insurance companies, especially when they are in the midst of a bad year; but if you will take as much pains as I have to seek the truth, you will find that in the great majority of cases the trouble is with the policy contracts. When it comes to a loss, they are found not drawn up to fit the risk. The agent may have been a good fellow, but you never thought of your policy as a contract full of conditions; and this friendly agent, the company's representative, though competent in other matters may not be well-informed regarding insurance contracts. He may have taken some very vital things for granted that were not true, the result being an imperfect policy contract that can't be enforced.

There's scarcely a merchant who will pay for a ten dollar invoice of goods, without checking every item, no matter how numerous they may be, yet the merchant is rarely to be found who will check the clauses of his policy which, if correctly drawn, may be worth five hundred times ten dollars to him some day.

So get out your policy and follow along, observing first the printed matter. The frequency of the word "void" should draw our attention. For instance, we destroy the validity of the policy if (without specific agreement to the contract written in the policy)—

(a) We had, when the policy was written, or at any time during its life, procured any other contract of insurance on property covered by the policy.

(b) We knowingly increase by any means the chances of fire.

(c) We employ mechanics in building or repairing the insured premises for more than fifteen days at a time.

(d) Our interest as insured in other than unconditional and sole ownership (not the property, but the person named in the policy is protected—that's important to remember); or, if the property insured be a building on ground not owned by the insured.

(e) In the case of property other than buildings, if it becomes encumbered by a chattel mortgage.

(f) Illuminating gas be generated or there be kept or used on the premises benzine, dynamite, ether, fireworks, gasoline, powder, naphtha, explosives, phosphorus, petroleum, or any of its products of greater inflammability than kerosene oil of United States standard, and then in prescribed quantities. (This clause, generally speaking, is in harmony with state or municipal prohibitory statutes.)

Again, unless specifically mentioned, the following property is not covered by the policy—signs, awnings, store and office fixtures, tools, etc.

In the compass of this talk I can't pretend to list all the printed conditions of the policy. My main purpose has been to awaken you to the fact that your policy is a contract full of conditions.

Some Special Provisions

Now, for a consideration of the special provisions which the agent inserts in the space above the printed portion of the policy. They have two special purposes:

(1) To make the policy fit the property and method of conducting business.

(2) To make certain modifications of the policy in the company's favor for protecting the company against hazards not contemplated. Don't trust anybody's mere "say so" regarding them. See for yourself that they fit the risk.

If any of the printed conditions are not now, or probably will not be, strictly lived up to in your business, insist that there be written in this space the necessary permissions. I repeat: Insist that they be written on the policy, and do not take the friendly agent's "Oh, that will be all right."

Now, there are certain clauses supplied by the companies to the agents, the use of which you should understand.

For instance, there is the "Three-quarter Value Clause," which means that the amount of insurance permitted to be carried is to be limited to three-quarters of the actual value of the property covered, and the companies shall not be liable for an amount greater than three-quarters of said value. Insurance companies figure that this clause removes considerable temptation to carelessness.

Strikingly in contrast with the "Three-quarter Clause" is the "Percentage Co-insurance Clause" (eighty, ninety, and one hundred per cent). This clause is used, for the most part, in towns where the fire protection is good enough to make it probable that a loss will be partial, or when the property insured is contained in more than one building and not subject to one fire. It is a warranty on the part of the policyholder that he will maintain insurance on the property described for not less than eighty, ninety, or one hundred per cent, as the case may be, of its actual value, and in the event of loss in a case where the total insurance amounts to less than the percentage stated in the clause, the policyholder will be considered as co-insurer for the difference between the total insurance and the percentage of the value stated, and as such co-insurer he will bear his proportion of the loss, just as if he were another company insuring this shortage.

I want you to notice that the eighty, ninety, or one hundred per cent clause does not say that you shall not collect the full amount of loss under any conditions. On the contrary, it provides only for a proportion of the loss to be borne by the insurer where the total insurance carried is less than the prescribed percentage, eighty, ninety, or one hundred per cent.

In many parts of the country the "Iron Safe Clause" is in use. It requires the taking of an inventory at least once yearly; that the assured keep a complete set of books, both books and inventory to be locked securely in a fireproof safe, or kept at night or during hours when business is shut down in some secure place not exposed to a fire which would destroy the building where the business is conducted. Failure so to do constitutes perpetual bar to recovery under the contract.

About Standard Policies

Just a word as to standard policies.

Legislatures have made policies standard for the protection of the people.

It is a great protection to know that the printed text in one policy is exactly the same as in all the others, and that after understanding one you need only examine in each the written or attached portions, which by the way, should read word for word exactly alike in all policies applying to the same property. This will distinctly increase your chances of getting a clear and satisfactory settlement in adjusting a loss; also the advantage of a liberal clause in one policy, you will, on reading the policy, probably find is lost if the same liberality does not appear in all other policies applying to the same property.

Why So Many Conditions?

If what I have said stirs up any thinking, out of it will come this question: "Why, in the first instance, does the Legislature prescribe the use of a basis contract containing so many conditions and allowing the insertion of still more? Why can't the misfortunes of fire be averaged and a charge made to cover all in a plain, unqualified contract of indemnity, so that I shall be protected against fire in any contingency? Why must I forever watch out against these conditions as I could against a lurking enemy?

Well, a plain, unqualified policy would be possible if all property were subject to practically the same chance of burning up, but such is not the case, and the standard policy is made to exclude the specially hazardous conditions. Then, to meet special conditions known to be dangerous, a blank space is required in the policy where insured and insurer can come together and such clauses be added as the degree of hazard attached to the property may require. You will see at once that without these special clauses it would be necessary to charge the same rate for a dwelling as for a store or lumber mill.

While, generally speaking, it is true that clauses written into policies modify them to the advantage of the insurance company, it is only fair to remember that the company is at a natural disadvantage. It can't see the property insured all through the year; it can't know as much about it as you do, and therefore it seeks by restrictive clauses to guard against risks not anticipated at time of the application.

Your duty is to know the contract and to know that you are living by its terms. It is not enough that the agent who signs the policy read it. For remember; he is the company's agent and not yours.

Sugar Coating the Pill

THE froth and follies of youth will always hold their attraction for youth. Inasmuch as we cannot change nature, the only thing we can do is to make the useful things so attractive and interesting that they will be earnestly desired by young people. The man who invented the sugar coated pill surely was a philosopher and we can all profit by his example.

So there is a great deal more that we can do for the young than to regret the follies of their course. We must be patient and wise—we must make our educational journeys look like picnic excursions, and hide our philanthropy under the cloak of good fellowship. The reward is sure to come.

Meeting Mail Order Competition

EVER since I began to carry a mileage book I have been taking hot, salt shower-baths three to five times a week, and sometimes oftener. And I don't do it for my health, either.

I don't like to get these soakings, especially as they always come when I am slicked up and have been paying out good money to have my raiment ironed. But I have to stand in the wet and be sympathetic, because, you see, it all comes from my customers weeping over the croolties of the mail order houses.

So you can believe that I was dee-lighted to run across Duncan, out in Kansas, the other day. Duncan had no tears to shed over that kind of competition—or any other kind. He is in favor of the parcels post and the carrying of packages by the rural route wagons.

"By George, this is bully!" I shouted when I heard him say it. "Tell me about it."

"It's all a question of service," he said. "If Montgomery Ward & Company and Sears Roebuck & Company can render better service to the public than I can, then they ought to grow, and more firms like them ought to grow until they can serve the whole people—and I ought to get off the earth. But I have the privilege of offering better service than they do, and I believe I can do it. In fact, I know that I do do it.

"If parcels post and rural delivery serve the public better, then they ought to be established just as quickly as possible. If I can't adjust myself to the new conditions and turn them to my advantage, then I lack something as a business man. I have a scheme all figured out now to make use of the parcels post in building up a trade in the big back country here. And I can make good on it."

Meeting Low Prices with Service

"But how do you meet the catalog competition today?" I asked.

"Easy, dead easy," he smiled. "I don't fight competition—I serve my customers. Most people would rather trade at home than to send their money away—if they can get the service. It is up to me to provide the service. But that isn't enough. I have to let the people know that I can.

"I have several methods of doing this. In the first place, few of my customers will send money to a catalog house without coming in and pricing what I have. Most of them wouldn't tell me for the world that they have been sitting up nights with a catalog, but I have learned to diagnose the symptoms almost without fail.

"In a case of that kind, I usually size up the order, get a line on Mr. Mail Buyer's needs, and then show him just about what he wants. Then comes a little selling talk on the article, pointing out its big values, leading to desire. Then I say, 'Now, if you will pay me cash in advance on this, and pay the freight, I will sell it to you for so much,' just about meeting the competition price. I may be a little above, because I will not cut prices. But I go right on and say, 'Now, that will save you a week or ten days in getting what you want, even granting that you could get it from Chicago in that time. You know how freights are delayed, and you have to take your chances on that. Besides that, you have the article right here before you and can inspect it before you pay a cent of money on it. When you buy it, you know that it is going to suit. You take no chances of having to send it back because it is not just what you expected.'

"Such a talk usually lands him. If it doesn't, I go on and point out to him how he can save money by buying something just as durable, just as stylish, and just as intrinsically beautiful, but less ornate and in better taste than what he had set his heart on. That means a little less profit for me than the other sale, but it is real service to him, and yields me a bigger profit than his money order to Chicago. Of course, this is only one of the ways I serve my customers. There are many others. Sometimes I show them how they will save money in the end by buying a better article. I never knock the mail order goods—I talk up my own. And, by getting the buyer's standpoint, I can often save him a lot of money."

Getting Catalog Buyers into the Store

"Yes, I see how that would work," I had to own up. "But how do you manage with those that don't come to your store?"

"In the first place, there is my advertising. I pay a great deal of attention to that, featuring my leaders, showing pictures, and inviting inspection. And I always take pains to tell the truth in my ads.

"Then, there are my window displays. I keep them fresh, clean, up to date, and timely. When I know that people are likely to be buying saddles, overcoats, furniture, refrigerators, or sporting goods, I have displays of those lines, with some strong leaders, and everything plainly marked. In this way, I show how complete my stock is, and how favorably my prices compare. And I keep up stock by studying the people and their wants, frequent buying in small lots, and making leaders of the goods that are slowest in moving off the shelves.

"Then I have my own way of keeping track of the goods that come into this territory from my Chicago competitors. I am a thorough student of their catalogs, so I know just about what the goods are and what the people pay for them. When I have located a mail order purchase, if I have nothing in my store like it, I take pains to get something at least as good, and perhaps better. Then I see to it that the mail order buyer sees my article and gets my price on it. By that time he knows what the freight has cost him and is ready to listen to reason. The result is that I usually cure him completely of the mail order habit.

"Of course, I have taken lots of pains to make my store attractive. I have rest rooms and dressing rooms for my rural customers, serve them lunch at what it costs me, get up all kinds of special stunts and contests, write personal letters to those who haven't been in for a long time, send out solicitors, make deliveries of orders telephoned in from the farms, and send to the city for special goods whenever they are wanted.

"As a result of all this, I am not worrying about competition. All I want is more capital to put into my business."

Well, there you have it, you retailers. Oh dry those tears—and get busy.

Making them Mad

FAVORABLE attention, Sheldon tells us, is the first mental state to be induced in the customer—the first step on the way to the sale. But the ways of getting that kind of attention are as numerous as mosquitoes at a summer resort—and about as hard to collect and label for future reference.

Now, at first blush—that's a literary expression—it would seem that one mighty good way not to get a man's favorable attention would be to get him mad. But you never can tell.

There is Nichols, who is advertising a correspondence school proposition. A while ago he wrote an ad that all the wiseacres told him would sting to bitter resentment a large class of very desirable prospects—in fact, the very class Nichols was going after in that ad.

"Let 'em get mad," said Nichols. "'Twill do 'em good. They'll wake up then. And they will want to take the course I'm advertising so that no one can ever twit them of the same thing again."

"Bosh!" said the critics. Also other contemptuous exclamations. "You would better throw your money into the furnace."

But Nichols said it was worth a gamble, and the ads went out to the magazines.

They made folks mad. The inquiry division got a lot of real angry, frothing-at-the-mouth letters. But when the returns were all in and the enrolments counted, the insulting ad had proved to be one of the best pullers that Nichols had ever written on that proposition.

"Insulting" Letters that Built Business

Then there is my friend, Wright, out in Iowa. Wright is as sweet-tempered and kindly a soul as you will meet in a day's march. And he is a heavyweight business builder, even if he doesn't weigh more than a hundred and thirty.

Wright is in the real estate, loan, and fire insurance business—in it every minute with amazing energy. And what he knows about fire insurance is worth several strong canvas bags full of gold eagles.

The other day, Wright got up some form letters to property owners in his territory—people not on his books. In these letters he asked, in plain terms, if they knew just what nature of contract they had signed when they took out their policies. He wanted to know whether they were sure that they were protected under the terms of the policy; and more than hinted that they had probably never read their contracts over before signing them. Then he invited them to come to his office, if they didn't understand about the conditions, or wanted to know how the thing could be fixed up more advantageously to them, and he would do what he could to help them.

The letters were good imitations of the real, hand made, typewritten letter, and the matching was good. The result was that several of the folks that got them came to the office and wanted to lick Mr. Wright. They wanted to know what business it was of his whether they had read their fire insurance contracts—and how in Tophet he knew that they hadn't, anyhow.

So then the courteous Wright explained that it was only a form letter after all—but he wanted to know, just the same, if it was true, then, that they had been fooled on their fire insurance.

Well, they didn't know exactly, but they thought they had. That was one of the things that made 'em mad.

"Got your policy with you?" asked Wright.

"Yes—here 'tis."

"H'm. Look here! Do you see that you have promised so and so, and if you don't live up to that promise, you can't collect a cent in case of a loss?"

"Yes, does look like that. And I never can live up to that promise. What 'm I goin' to do about it?"

"Go to your agent and get him to fix it, if you can. If you can't, get him to write you a new policy. It will cost you another premium, but you can better afford that than a total loss."

"No, I'll be ginswizzled if I'll take another Lake Superior copper cent's worth of insurance from that bughouse agent. You get me up the kind of policy you think I ought to have on that property."

And there was a neat little pile of commissions in Wright's bank deposit as the result of the letters that made those prospects mad.

Just the same, I am always pretty careful about making any of my prospects mad. It isn't everyone that can work it. And it isn't every kind of "mad" that will change into favorable attention.

Why Hage Succeeded

WHEN I first began to visit Lawrence, Hage was a small manufacturer. He did a great deal of the work in his little shop himself, working side by side with his men during the day and keeping his books at night. He did no advertising then, and employed no salesmen, because he was at the limit of his working capital, and couldn't have made any more goods if he had the orders.

Did I say that he did no advertising and employed no salesmen? That is hardly true. His satisfied customers did his advertising for him and were his salesmen. Hage had more orders than he could fill.

Hage knew his business thoroughly, was an expert and artistic workman, and, by being right with his men all the time, put some of his own personality into every article he produced.

Almost on the Rocks

A few years later I noticed that Hage had saved his profits and reinvested them in his business, so that it had entirely outgrown the little shop down by the mill pond. He had built a new factory, with up to date equipment and employed five times as many men as when I first knew him. He had begun to advertise, and had a salesman on the road. I found him jubilant over the way orders were pouring in.

But a year later, Hage was fighting hard to keep his head above water. Business had fallen off, profits had disappeared, competition was cutting the vitals out of him, and his help were like a kettle of boiling water to him. And he was "up in the air" about as high as I ever saw a man, without using a telescope. He had no idea what was the trouble with him—much less how to remedy it.

"Poor Hage!" I thought, as the "cannon ball" pulled out of Lawrence, "he was happy and prosperous in his little shop, but he isn't big enough for the expansion he has made. He'll be working for day's wages when I see him next time."

That was a piece of coarse work as prophecy.

It was only two years later when I visited Lawrence again, and almost the first thing I saw was Hage, the worry-creases all smoothed out of his face by a happy smile, exhaling an air of prosperity as a rose exhales fragrance, and driving a beauty of a seven-passenger car. Down at the end of the street I saw his factory, almost double the size it had been on my former visit.

"How did you make the turn, Hage?" I asked him over the coffee at the club, where he had been my lavish host at dinner that night.

"By giving more than a dollar's worth for a dollar."

"As how?"

A Man-Eating Superintendent

"Well, when things kept going from bad to worse, two or three years ago, I did a lot of thinking.

"My little old shop down by the mill pond had been a great money maker for its size. My new, big factory was a big money loser for its size. So I began to analyze the thing to find out where the big factory was different from the little shop.

"First of all, I took notice that there were a good many complaints about the product, and that too much of it was being returned as unsatisfactory. That was something new—and something fundamentally wrong. What was the cause of it?

"I had been sitting at my roll-top desk doing the general manager stunt, leaving the factory to be run by a hired superintendent. I put on my overalls and went into the factory with the rest of the operatives. I soon discovered that I was out of touch with them. My old men had left me with various excuses, but I had been too busy with my management to inquire fully into the reasons.

"I soon discovered that my superintendent was a man-eater. He was forever pushing the men to greater production. He had mottoes up all over the place:

"'Do it Now.'

"'Hustle.'

"'The Man that Never Does More than He is Paid For, Will Never Be Paid for More than He Does.'

"'Learn More—Earn More.'

"'Labor is Dignified Only When it Ceases to Watch the Clock.'

"He made a habit of paying a lot of the help in promises like these:

"'Now, you will get small wages to start with, but this is a growing organization, and your opportunities are big. You'll be taken care of all right if you make good.'

"'This business is just beginning to grow, but if you will take a small salary for the present and work with the rest of us to build it up, you'll be invited in for a big, cool slice of the melon when it is cut.'

"But this superintendent didn't come across. He paid less than the man was worth if he could bulldoze or cajole him into working for it. He didn't make good on his many promises unless he was compelled to. He never gave a man a raise until the man threatened to quit if he didn't.

"The result was that the men were discontented, disloyal, and the best of them were being hired away by my competitors.

Work was scamped and neglected, and in spite of all the superintendent's pushing and mottoes, production was away down.

Service-Plus To Employees

"The first thing I did was to fire that superintendent and take charge of the factory myself, hiring a good office manager to do a lot of my work in the office. Then I called the men together and told them that I was going to spend some time with them, gauging their capacity with a view of revising the pay roll upward. As a starter, and to show my good faith, I raised such men as I knew to be getting less than they earned then and there. Within two weeks, nearly every man in the factory had a good-looking increase in his pay.

"You should have seen the change. There was a different spirit in the factory, and output jumped up and up.

"I said little more to the men about it, but I devoted myself to the task of educating them to do more and better work. I reasoned that it was just as good business to advertise and sell wages to my help as it was to advertise and sell goods to my customers. It had always been a principle with me to give my customers a little more than a dollar's worth for a dollar. I am a great believer in service to the buyer as the source of profit. So I began to experiment with service to my employes as the source of confidence, satisfaction, loyalty, and plenty of quality work from them.

"It took a little while for me to convince the men that I was sincere, but, little by little they got the idea.

"The news spread, and soon all of my good old employes were again on the pay roll. Our product began to rebuild the reputation it had for years, and business was again on the up-grade. Then I promoted one of the best of the foremen to the position of superintendent, went back to the office, and took hold of the sales force. I did the same thing with them, taking care to give a little more than a dollar's worth for a dollar. The men worth while caught the spirit and began to give me more work than they were paid for. The others couldn't stand the pace and dropped out. I got good men in their places and taught them the service-plus idea.

"Sales began to jump—and profits with them.

"One of the best of the salesmen is now sales manager, and I am free to give all my time to figuring out new ways of giving more and better service to customers and employes so as to make more profits."

FROM the day when there thundered forth into the Cosmos the mighty mighty fiat—"Let there be Light"—down the ages in which humanity found amid material activities the Path of Duty, to the present, when the gigantic heart-throb of Manufacture and Commerce pulsates through the veins of the awakened nations of the world—and more especially of this Great Republic—all is Expansion

FREDERICK W. PETTIT

Some Reasons Why I Succeed in the Publishing Business : by Cyrus K. Curtis

IT IS true that The Curtis Publishing Company has been successful. But the person who built up that business hardly realizes what you term success. The business has been a slow growth for many years, and one on the inside does not realize how it may look to an outsider. What the outsider sees today is something that we have accomplished while we were looking ahead to something bigger.

Someone has said that the man who speaks a word for himself says a word too much. To be referred to as a successful man and then asked how one became successful puts one in rather a delicate position.

I do not think any successful man knows exactly of any secret of success; in fact I am inclined to believe that there is no such thing as a secret to it. It is just a plain business proposition. The fundamental principle and cornerstone of the whole business is simply this: Absolute intrinsic merit in the article sold to the public; a constant study of the wants of the public, and giving the public, if possible, something a little better than your competitors give.

Too many men fear competition and cheapen values to meet it.

Too many men watch their esteemed contemporaries too closely and copy the successful ones. For many years in my business life I have noticed this tendency in mankind. There are too many copy-cats.

Getting the Price

With quality you never need fear competition or cut prices.

In the mercantile world, particularly, there is too much cutting of prices. The sole idea of many a salesman is to secure a customer almost at any cost, and the first weapon he thinks of is a little cut in price. And generally cutting in prices to meet competition means a lowering of the standard. But with an article of absolute intrinsic merit, plain, straight advertising is sufficient to let the public know of it.

"Extra Inducements" Not Needed

The Curtis Publishing Company has never wasted time in inventing ingenious schemes to entice the public to buy. With a good article it is absolutely unnecessary.

So many publishers tread a crooked path. I don't mean in the sense of dishonesty, but crooked in the method of getting to a certain point, whereas a straight course would be so much more effective and quicker. I mean in such things as cut clubbing rates, premiums and jim-cracks. These are simply bribes, intended to whet the customer's desire, novelties in the way of an expensive present or anything that seems to be an extra inducement.

If the article itself can't stand on its own merits it can't have a long life.

There is a tremendous waste in boosting any kind of article on the public. Many a publisher fools himself with the idea that if he once gets his article introduced, his customer may be satisfied to continue indefinitely. But in the forty years that I have been in business I have never known a case where it proved permanently satisfactory.

From the beginning of our business to the present day we have charged what we believed to be a reasonable price and never varied from it one cent under any consideration, either for advertising or for subscriptions. It is the only policy a publisher ought to follow. Our absolute independence has caused some of our esteemed friends to refer to us as having "hifalutin notions," wishing that they could afford to have the same notions.

Those remarks sometimes amuse me and sometimes stir me to retort, for it seems there is nothing so absolutely foolish as to wish for high ideals that are nothing more than plain business common-sense, and yet show a lack of nerve to start in that direction.

They sometimes say, "Oh, yes, that's very well for you. You can afford it, but I need the money." That kind of a man will need the money as long as he lives.

I have said these things to a number of my fellow publishers. When they want advice I can only say to most of them: "You don't want it. If you want to take it I'll give it to you."

It's like telling a man how to regain his health. If he'd only give up eating too much and chew his food thoroughly and live a sane life he could remain perfectly well. He knows that, and he's heard it more or less all his life. It sounds like preaching, and he's too fond of the "flesh pots of Egypt" to control his appetite. Many publishers can't give up a dollar that is in sight for the two dollars a little farther on. They do not feel that they can afford to take chances of capturing two dollars, when the dollar in sight is too alluring.

Doing, Not Dreaming

By W. H. Tennyson

HERE'S a stanza by some unknown writer that contains a whole sermon on Action. The four-square man, you know, must, according to the philosophy of Sheldon, which has science behind it, be a man of Ability, a man of Reliability, a man of Endurance and a man of Action.

Without Ability, that is, intellectual power—knowledge, the remaining three qualities are of little value as values are measured in this Twentieth Century. Without Endurance, that is, physical power—strength, the other three qualities are incomplete. Without Reliability, that is, soul power—character, the power to inspire confidence, Ability, Endurance and Action will not bring success (for has not the great criminal these three qualities?). Without Action, however, without will power, that is, the force that does things, of what value are intellectual gifts, physical power or even a good character? No matter how good a man may be, or how much he can do, the world will not be helped unless he actually does things, gets into action. So it's doing, not dreaming, that makes one a man.

It is doing, not dreaming, that makes one a man. If the plan isn't followed, of what good is the plan?

You may think, till you seem, in your rapturous zeal,

To rise, as if borne upon pinions; to feel
The stars sink beneath you, and, fanning your face,

Elysian zephyrs surround you in space.
That will not advance you. No flame of desire
Has ever sufficed to lift anyone higher.
But doing, and doing, and doing again,
Though but little each day, yet each day all one can,—

With courage and patience, to God ever true,
'Tis a wonder what wonders a person can do.

When to Advertise

The following, from a letter written to an advertiser by E. Wallace Brainerd, of the Cosmopolitan Magazine, is so good that we pass it on:

"A well man is not so much in need of a tonic as one physically unfit or run down. To curtail an advertising expense does not cure a disease of uncertainty. On the other hand it helps to stimulate unrest and discourages yourself as well as others.

"Would you think a farmer foolish if he failed to plant next spring because of a short crop this year?

"Why not start your planting now?

"Personally I do not believe in intermittent advertising, knowing as I do that the largest business successes have been attained by those who 'keep everlastingly at it.'

"Now is the psychological moment. Promote your business welfare by persistent advertising of the right sort at the right time.

"The enterprising business man, who is keen and alive to possibilities around him, convinces the public when his competitor has not the courage or the foresight."

Expectation Realized

By Fred Rigg

JOHAN GRUMPY had the reputation of being the most cantankerous store-keeper for miles and miles around.

"When a merry maiden marries—All is right, and nothing's wrong," says the Yeoman.

Ask John if anything is right and he will tell you, if he replies at all, that he has never yet found a salesman who approaches within yards of right.

Watch the traveling man who enters John's store! In and out in two seconds, a smile of relief overspreading his countenance and elasticity in his boots.

Why? His firm (who have never interviewed John) expects him to call and thus duty is bravely done.

But why the smile? Well, did not Mr. Traveling Man know when he started on the journey that he would have to visit John, and had he not in anticipation, expected the treatment received.

Don't you know, Mr. T. Man that Grumpy is a mind-reader? He is, and a very clever one. If you go expecting to get marching orders, be assured you will get them.

Ask yourself the question "Why can John afford to treat salesmen thus?" and you will rapidly conclude that the chief reason is that he thinks he is independent because he can always find the money when the bill becomes due.

Ask yourself a further question, "How does Grumpy John manage to retain his customers?" and you find that the principal reason is because he gives them good value.

Have you any quality goods to sell?

Do you want your money dead on time? Don't answer me, but make up your mind to show John some good samples. Salesmanship with such buyers is invariably a trial of your skill and you ought to make up your mind that John should be on your books.

Commerce Develops Culture

By PROF. SHAILER MATHEWS

From an Address Before the Association of Commerce, Reported by Chicago Commerce

I REALLY think something of that splendid future that lies in the mind of any man who is a real philosopher, lies also in the mind of a man who lays out in the future some splendid scheme which he hopes to realize. It has come down across the ages, this lesson that you can see everywhere taught by great commercial centers. There was never a great commercial center that was not ultimately a seat of culture. Poor people have no great culture. They cannot afford it. A community must have a surplus that it can invest in culture before it can have any great art museums, universities and all the other paraphernalia that evidence and make for this culture.

The Lights of Antiquity

Athens was a great commercial city, and they do say that Pericles was an awful grafter. They say the money Pericles gathered up to fight the war with Sparta was used by him to build the Parthenon. Wouldn't you rather have had the Spartans whip Athens and give us the Parthenon, than to have had Athens whip the Spartans and leave us nothing but a great hill?

Now, it was because that city was able to grasp the beautiful things in life that made it what it was. That great city stands for the accomplishment of the things of the spirit, and it was able to accomplish these things of the spirit because it had builded up a tremendously amplified commerce all over the basin of the Mediterranean.

The same way with Rome. We think of Rome, not necessarily, as a commercial city, but it was. All of those people were in business more or less. They had their trusts and a publishing house. Any city that can have a trust and a publishing house is in a fair way of idealism. It is needed on both sides.

Under All, Commerce

Well, you can go straight down across history the same way, and you will find that back of all the idealistic movements that have given history significance—Athens, Rome, Florence, Venice, Genoa—you can not put your finger on a city you are going to visit this summer in your automobile that was not builded up on the basis of commerce. That does not mean necessarily that every person in the city was highly idealistic. It does mean that there was in the hearts of men, as they moved out into the sense of power and the possession of wealth, a desire to turn that power and wealth, and that community in which they dwelt, to something better than merely the making of wealth and power.

The PHILOSOPHER AMONG HIS BOOKS

Be sure that you go to an author to get at his meaning, not to find yours. . . . And be sure also, if the author is worth anything, that you will not get his meaning all at once;—nay, that at his whole meaning you will not for a long time arrive in any wise.—John Ruskin.

BUSINESS MANAGEMENT—A WORKING HANDBOOK OF BUSINESS PRACTICE AS APPLIED TO THE ORGANIZATION AND ADMINISTRATION OF COMMERCIAL ENTERPRISES, INCLUDING DEPARTMENTAL RESPONSIBILITIES, AUTHORITIES, AND METHODS—Two Volumes. By James B. Griffith. American School of Correspondence, Chicago.

This work is accurately described in the title. It is practical and concrete, being fully illustrated from photographs, diagrams, and drawings. As the author says, he has devoted himself to the practical side of his subject without going into the theoretical phase of the science underlying business management. For a man who, through experience or study—or, better, a combination of both—has mastered the laws and principles that govern success in this kind of work, the books should prove of great value, giving, as they do, the best and most efficient practice in the technique of administration, organization, purchasing, advertising, selling, credits, billing, shipping, correspondence and filing, and accounting.

THE WONDERS OF LIFE—By Ida Lyon. R. F. Fenno & Company, 18 East Seventeenth Street, New York.

One of the wonders of my life is why there are so few folks in the world who can get hold of a new idea without wanting to make it the key to all the problems of the universe. Another wonder is why a writer whose work gives internal evidence of but a smattering of true scientific knowledge should attempt to tell us, off hand, just how all the forces of nature work together. And a third wonder of my life is why nearly everyone that finds a good method of doing something should want to carry the thing to absurd extremes.

But, wonder as I may, I can't change human nature. So I expect that I shall see a great deal of the "making of books" like this one on "The Wonders of Life."

Now, having got that off my chest, I am willing to admit that there is much to be learned from this book. It is written in simple style, easy to understand—most of it—and contains a lot of good guidance for every day living. There is some scientific teaching in the book that is interesting, and in accord with the latest theories or hypotheses of some of the leading physicists, psychologists, and physiologists. But the author ignores the fact that even the savants who support these positions would not state them quite so positively as she does.

Specifically, the book is but another expression of the ideas now loosely labeled the New Thought. It is above the average of these books in its freedom from dogmatism and mystic gibberish—below the average in breadth of vision.

WAGE-EARNING WOMEN—By Annie Marion MacLean, Ph. D., Introduction by Grace H. Dodge. The Macmillan Company, New York. $1.25.

To the student of social problems and their solution, this is a valuable hand-book of information. Women—millions of them—are now wage-earners. Half a century ago there were very few. The sphere of woman was held to be the home, and in the home most of them remained. With the advent of woman in the world of industry and commerce, an entirely new set of problems has arisen. Good business, common humanity, and the welfare of the race demand that they should be solved. But any attempt to solve them without a thorough knowledge of all the conditions would be like a man trying to repair a high-power electric generator with no knowledge of the science and art of electrical construction to guide him.

There has been too much damage done, too much money squandered, too much fine, consecrated effort gone to waste—and worse—through the ill-informed and hysterical efforts to reform abuses that, while in crying need of reform, demanded the calm, cool, and thoroughly scientific treatment of men and women who bring to the work not only a big desire to help, but a keen sense of proportion.

It is to inform such workers that this book has been written. It is a book, not of theories, not of deductions and conclusions, not of wild appeal, but of facts—just hard facts. The author employed forty assistants in various parts of the country to help gather them. They worked under her direction and made their reports to her. She compiled and edited the results.

The book is arranged with reference to the sections of the country in which the women wage-earners were observed, and deals with them in various industries in New England, New York, Chicago, New Jersey, the Middle West, Oregon, California, and the coal fields of Pennsylvania. There is a chapter on the uplifting forces at work and their efficiency, and a final chapter outlining some of the needs and possible methods of meeting them.

The work is statistical, and has a good bibliography and index.

A SEARCH AFTER ULTIMATE TRUTH—THE DIVINE PERFECTION INHERENT IN MAN AND IN ALL CREATION—By Aaron Martin Crane. Lothrop, Lee & Shepard, Boston. Postpaid, $1.60.

Those who have read and enjoyed and profited by this author's splendid book, "Right and Wrong Thinking and Their Results," will be prepared for the clear, simple style, and the reverential quality of this book. The title is stupendous, and one enters upon the reading of the work with considerable doubt in mind as to the success of the search. Ultimate truth is something so deep and elemental that mere finite man is wont to despair ever reaching it. Personally, I am by no means convinced that the author, with all his unquestioned powers of spiritual perception and logical analysis has reached it. But I will admit that he has given us much food for thought and further philosophizing. Also that he has given us some gleams of at least relative truth.

The first task Mr. Crane attacks is the finding of a foundation for all reality. This he finds in God, whose qualities, origin, and powers he then discusses. In all this, the author is logical, clear, and easy to follow.

But, somehow or other, I cannot call this "ultimate truth." It is ultimate as far as my mind can go, and within the limits of my knowledge. But there are untold heights to which my mind cannot climb, and vast fields of knowledge that I cannot explore. I don't even know of the existence of that knowledge, to say nothing of the nature of it. To what different conclusions all this might lead me, I cannot tell—and I'm afraid Mr. Crane can't, either. That he has shown us the truth in the light of what we now know, he is right, and that ought to be enough for any man. It gives him a good, working and workable basis for his philosophy and life. All that I object to is the word "ultimate."

The next subject taken up is the old vexed problem of materiality. Mr. Crane makes too much of the limitations of our sense perceptions, and does some fine hair-splitting. Materiality, he urges, is unreal because sensation does not tell us of things as they are, but simply of their effects upon our minds through the sense-organs and sensory nerves. And how did he find this out? Whisper it gently—these same unreliable sense perceptions. Here he gets precariously near to quibbling. Just listen to this:

"If a painter were to dash red paint upon a surface so constituted that it would reject every particle of the red paint, we should not call that surface red, but that is exactly what the object in question (so-called red object) does with the red rays of light; it throws them all off, or reflects them, so that nothing that is red remains with it or belongs to it; therefore the object itself is not red."

Profound!

Mr. Crane's discussion of error is particularly good and valuable. It alone is worth the price of the book, and overbalances the faults I have pointed out.

In the progress of the book are elaborated the essential characteristics of man, and the mutual relations of men to each other and to God. Then follows a discussion of the right of every man to freedom, the mutual relation of oneness existing between man and man and between man and God, the whole concluding with a chapter which, by independent data, uncontestedly and triumphantly proves that man is immortal.

The book draws from all sources, is thoroughly reverential, and is mostly a work of sound reasoning and unflinching logic. It is a veritable guide to the science of life and living.

Doors of Daring

The mountains that enfold the vale

With walls of granite, steep and high,

Invite the fearless foot to scale

Their stairway toward the sky.

The restless, deep, dividing sea

That flows and foams from shore to shore,

Calls to its sunburned chivalry,

"Push out, set sail, explore!"

And all the bars at which we fret,

That seem to prison and control,

Are but the doors of daring, set

Ajar before the soul.

Say not, "Too poor," but freely give;

Sigh not, "Too weak," but boldly try.

You never can begin to live.

Unless you dare to die.

—Henry Van Dyke.

"I have felt and I have seen, yes, defeat, despair, regret, all the black ghosts that walk. And it is because of that that I can raise my face to the stars and say: It is good, all good—all that life contains. We are not animals—there is the unseen beyond the seen; the unknown beyond the observed. There is a spirit that rises up within us to slay the ghosts, to give them the light. Call upon it and it will answer, for peace is the rightful heritage of every soul that is born. . . . Peace always lies within the grasp of whomsoever will stretch out his hand to possess it. Call to it and it will come from the depths."—Herrick.

Business Power for Business Philosophers: by Albert Lewis Pelton

Explaining the Theory of Personal Supremacy and Pointing Practical Methods for Leadership in ANY Business

BUSINESS power is that combination of personal powers which a man can take into the commercial world and exchange for dollars, position and influence.

¶ Business power is that seldom-found ability which lifts ordinary workers into leaders; which boosts leaders up into the realm of financial giants.

¶ Business power is the skill in dealing with men: to know their moods and adjust thereto; to perceive, interpret and sense their motives and intentions; to intuitively know them, yet tactfully conceal your knowledge.

¶ Business power is the firm, intelligent grip upon yourself; the mastery of your thoughts and actions, your decisions; the large control of yourself at all times.

¶ Business power is the far-seeing intellect incessantly sweeping over the field of your business activities; comprehending present and future conditions; combining with a sure, irresistible power, and compelling all details to coalesce for the capture of all values and goals sought.

¶ Business power is a compound of Initiative, Insight, Creative Mentality, Will-power, Self-mastery, Magnetism and Personal Influence massed into a brainy, aggressive, directing, winning personality.

¶ Great achievement calls for two prime factors—knowing the science and details of some particular business, trade or profession, and huge “power to do” in back of such knowing.

¶ Hundreds of thousands learn the details of their work. Their “power to do” slumbers. Result—mediocrity and small success. The magic art which can flash knowledge into action wins wealth.

¶ It is an open secret which few seem to grasp: that man can do nothing without the inner energy or driving power to practically apply what he knows. In business this energy is termed “business power.”

¶ It is extremely difficult to write a perfect definition of this business power; but it is possible from this day on to own a great encyclopedic system of clear, inspiring, money-making science which develops this golden power. Anyone can take the degree “Master of Business Power” who is willing to pay the simple price of pleasant, concentrated study.

¶ Just rising on the horizon of this get-the-dollar world is a monumental training system in this hitherto untaught art of Business Power. It is really four distinct volumes merged into one far-reaching education in fortune-making. This masterful instructor steps right down into the engine room of human power generation and shows exactly what levers to turn in order to throw wide open the throttle which drives the man to marked success.

¶ It remained for Frank Channing Haddock to push over into the heart of the business world this great instruction book in human power capitalized. He is a man who combines in rare balance the insight of a philosopher; the intellect of a scholar; the level-headed sanity of a business man.

¶ As the author of the remarkable books, “Power of Will” and “Power for Success,” his fame is world-wide. And his newest triumph will take the world of men and affairs by storm. Nothing like the book in all literature. It is so packed and crowded that it fairly bulges with eye-opening knowledge in a virgin field never before entered. And mind you—this particular field is the heart of the art which makes every great magnate the leader that he is.

¶ Here in “Business Power” this master of forceful English and indisputable logic has cast up into 18 unparalleled divisions such a wealth of success directions as you never before read. You can spend dollar after dollar on general magazines and books, but you won’t find a tithe of what this volume contains. The invitation comes to you to become possessed of this volume. Read carefully the next two pages which give ONLY A PART of the vast list of studies in the work.

¶ OPPORTUNITY is banging away at your front door with a diamond-studded glove. Don’t climb out the rear window and run off at this vital moment: open the door and get a lifetime acquaintance with the “fortune lady.”

SAY—“I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER”

BUSINESS POWER

The Master Builder of Financial Ability and Commanding Business Personality. A Practical Analysis of the "Underground" Factors of Fortune Building, with Actual Directions for Those Who Seek Commercial Chieftainship

By FRANK CHANNING HADDOCK, Ph. D., M. S.

Author of "Power of Will", "Power for Success", "Culture of Courage" etc.

The Biggest, Brightest, Brainiest Book in Business Literature.

Four remarkable training-systems bound in one handsome volume: 1. The Personal Factors in Business Success (180 pages.) 2. Economic Laws and Business Maxims (80 pages.) 3. Psychology of Personal Power in Business (170 pages.) 4. Business in Fact (Winning the Fortune Fight) (160 pages.)

Here at last is "The Great American Power-Book." A book for which hundreds of thousands are searching; a book revealing DEFINITE DIRECTIONS in mastering and using the powers of Mind, Will, Intellect, Influence, Strategy, Initiative and Man-handling as required in the business of money-making. It deals with the problems of business expansion, conduct, personal business power, leadership and success as does no other book in literature. It is an inexhaustible manual and guidebook of keen, scholarly, scientific methods, regimes, working plans and bed-rock principles in "building the man and his power"—in multiplying his success-energy into whatever channel he chooses to "fight for fortune." It instructs for, and actually creates, the energetic, aggressive, brainy, wealth-winning commercial leader.

Every one of its chapter-volumes is crowded with a new sort of financial knowledge—not how to run any particular kind of business but the more important skill: how to develop the man-power, mind-power, money-power for ANY business, trade or profession. Every page will make you think, will enlarge your mental power, will give you new insight, will make you stand right up in your dealings with men, will give you big ideas—and proportionate ability for carrying them into practical execution.

It is the man with the trained brain—who is the "power of the hour." It is the director, leader and executive with exceptional power of Thought plus Application who is demanded in the big places of finance. And it is precisely for such a goal that "Business Power" so successfully instructs.

Now I frankly admit that I am trying to sell you this book. I wish you were here in my office where you could look over the pages of "Business Power"—you'd probably ask "Where on earth did this author mine out such a great amount of solid gold—so much entirely new knowledge in self-development for business application?" And you'd insist on buying the book AT ONCE. You'd see where thousands of extra dollars would come your way through using its original methods.

---

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

GLIMPSES AT THE ELABORATE LIST OF CONTENTS.

The book contains more than ten times as many special studies as listed here.

- |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       |                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Brilliant Methods for developing Personal Business Power. The Fourteen Great Laws of Business Power, including: First, Second and Third Laws of Magnetic Adjustment, The Laws of Initiative Power, Inspirational Driving Power, Subjective Business Automatics, Organized Omni-presence. Counter-Reaction, Developing Management, Financial Comprehension, Large Financial Detail, Psychic Mastery. How to Blend Business Functions. Master Methods of Planning Business Action. Specialized Directions (many pages devoted to each) for Canvassing Agent, Jobber, Broker, Real Estate Man, Merchant, Advertiser, Miscellaneous, The Man in "High Finance." Into this division alone is crowded more substance of the "how and what to do" than many ordinary volumes contain. Superb MASTER REGIMES for Handling Immense Business Activities. Efficiency of Business Association.Maintenance of Courage.Holding the Reserve.Maintaining a Low Level of Risk.Maintaining the Passion for Business.Creating Inspiration by Imagination.Maintaining Activity Worth While.Going Aloft for Vision. How the Underground Mind Grows and Acts. How to Acquire Courage-Confidence. How to Handle Attack and Maintain of Business Conduct. How to Apply Various Phases of Business Action. How to Unfold Magnetic Business Power. How to have Physical Attractiveness for Business. How to be Resourceful in Ideas. How to adjust to all Classes of People, avoid clash, have attractive manners, be Genuine and Self-Controlled. The GREAT HAND OF POWER: An original conception of the author. Diagram showing where the powers are placed and applied. How to know Human Nature. Golden Laws of Business Adjustment. Unique System of Psychic Bookkeeping. How to accurately gauge the credits and debits of your Personal Powers: to take your measure. Ten Diamond Rules of Self-Power. | Ten Subjective Brilliances: including Personal Style, Business Language, Character, Self-Mastery, The Front of Business, Etc. Ten Rubies of Success. How to Increase Income on a solid, natural-law basis. What the Great Economic Laws of Business are. The Wheel of Power with Diagram. Wealth. Marginal Utilities: the basis of all profitable business. How to acquire Leadership from this knowledge. The Origin of Initiative: the greatest of achieving qualities. Groups of Initiative Combinations. How to Climb by Initiative. Initiative and Success. Use and Development of Initiative. Brilliant Lessons on Business Mentality. How to Acquire Powerful Attention. How to build the Mental Prism of Concentration. How to cure Mind-Wandering: Scatteration. The Pyramid of Business Concentration. How great mind Ability for Business is built and handled. How to Develop Commercial Memory. How to Assimilate what you wish to remember. What the Basis and Control of Mental Processes is. Memory and the Brain Cells. Three Jewel Laws of Memory. Diagram of Memory Processes. Mind and the Memory in Business Principles. How to effectively use Business Imagination. Imagination and the memory. How to test your Productive Imagination. Universal Scheme of the Practical Man's Imagination. Special Uses of Imagination. How to Multiply the Energy of Success. Personal Force and Energy explained. How Man is a Fund of Energy. Energy and Health Explained. Energy and the Brain. How to Use Mental Energy. Diagram of the Ideal and Perfect Use of Energy. How to Remedy the Unskilled Use of Energy. How to Train the Subconscious Self (Down in the Engine Room of Personal Power. |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|

The 18 lessons are in 150 sub-divisions; there are 550 sections to the studies; there are a dozen or more unique charts and diagrams of special importance; and there are hundreds of laws, rules and suggestions for test and development of the powers and business activities. To be brief—the book is a reservoir of power in self-development for money-making; the more you draw upon it, the more the supply increases. You simply cannot drain it.

3.20 "Business Power" is uniform with all other Power-Books. Richly bound in purple, cover design in 22-carat gold, inside covers purple and gold marbled lining, very choice paper and printing; 600 pages, gilt tops. Division titles in red. A masterpiece inside and outside. Boxed and mailed prepaid wherever mails go for $3.20 on the sales plan of BOOK BACK—MONEY BACK if remailed within five days from Postpaid receipt. This book with "Power of Will" (see next 2 pages) for $6.00 postpaid.

Will you own it? It is a book which millionaires alone can afford NOT to own. Buy it—it will be worth any amount you are willing to make its instructions yield. Tear out this page, write your name and address on the margin and mail with price.

ALBERT LEWIS PELTON, The Power - Book Library
MERIDEN, CONN., U. S. A.

Train Your Brain

Make it a creative, commanding, convincing power.

Learn to successfully apply the powers of your Mind which master the men, the problems, and the conditions which confront you in your fight for fortune.

Own the superb study-system

“POWER OF WILL”

THE SCIENCE AND PRACTICE OF MENTAL SUPREMACY

A recent purchaser estimates the value of this book at $1000.00

It develops power of

Mind — Will — Health — Magnetism — Intellect Leadership — Self - Mastery — Financial Ability

The Book of a Thousand New Methods for Multiplying Mental and Physical Energy into the Foundation Powers of Human Achievement.

By Frank Channing Haddock, Philosopher - Scientist

Author of the famous systems “Power for Success”, “Business Power”, “Culture of Courage”, “Practical Psychology”, “Personal Atmosphere” etc.

“POWER OF WILL” stands today the most remarkable and successful system of Brain building ever devised. Twenty years of tireless research, scholarly study, concentrated personal test, devoted to selecting and arranging the most powerful laws of self-culture, philosophy of life, psychology, mental action, and personal success-power, have finally yielded up this masterpiece of the 20th century. It is not a book of essays, but a great collection of ACTUAL BUILDING PLANS whereby YOU can multiply YOUR powers of Mind, Body, Soul to the limit of your endowments. *****

Brief Glimpses At Its Vast Scope of Contents

“Power of Will” tells you

The Law of Great Thinking.
The Four Factors on which great thinking depends.
How to develop analytical power.
How to think “all around” any subject.
How to throw the mind into deliberate, controlled, productive thinking.
Detailed directions for Perfect Mind Concentration.
How to acquire the power of Consecutive Thinking, Reasoning, Analysis.
How to make any topic yield ideas, instructions, material, for essays, speeches, compositions, descriptions.
How to acquire the skill of Creative Writing.
How to guard against errors in Thought.
How to make the Will supreme in the Mental Realm.
How to drive from the mind all unwelcome thoughts.
How to follow any line of thought with keen, concentrated power.
How to develop Reasoning Power.
How to handle the mind in Creative Thinking.
The secret of Building Mind Power.
How the Will is made to act.
How to test your Will.
How a Strong Will is Master of Body.
What creates Human Power.
The Six Principles of Will-training.
Definite Methods for developing Will.
The Seven Ways that Moral development builds Will-Power.

Space permits only a partial list of the studies. Scattered through the 28 chapter-volumes which unite to make this epic, are more than 700 Principles of Personal Power, Rules of Self-development, Laws of Successful Conduct, Control of Self and Others, and Regimes in the Creation and Application of Mental Energy. Scores of these are subdivided into from 2 to 15 exercises. Like diamonds in rich gold mountings, these hundreds upon hundreds of infallible studies are set along through the 400 pages of clear, inspiring, power-producing instruction. The side columns herewith show what some of these studies are.

Why envy the Success, Prestige, Influence, Leadership, Money-making Ability, Mentality, and Culture of other people, when you can own “Power of Will” and possess these values yourself.

“Power of Will” teaches you

The Seven Laws for ridding yourself of Profane Speaking.
The Fifteen Star Methods for mastering Anger and Irritability.
What the Psycho-Physical cause of the Drink Habit is.
Nine long demonstrated regimes for mastering this curse (Rare Value).
How to overcome embarrassing Hesitation of Speech.
How to develop a direct, forceful, effective style of talking in business, society, anywhere.
How to eliminate Mind-wandering.
How to hold the mind closely upon any desired line of thought.
How to speak tersely, emphatically, and think ahead for best expression.
How to school yourself against Thoughtlessness.
How to overcome Indecision.
How to develop abundance of Thought.
The Principles of Memory.
How to throw Attention and Energy into Memory culture.
The Psychological Principles for memorizing words, sentences, anything.
The Inner Law of Memory.
The Star Method for remembering the substance of any book.
How to plan ahead in your career through the great Pioneer Power—IMAGINATION.
How to plan conduct so as to avoid former mistakes of Thought, Action.

SAY—“I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER”

When you own "Power of Will" you will know

How to develop to a high degree the Mental Moods of Interest, Feeling, Energy, Permission, Decision, Continuity, Understanding, Reason.
The Six Crown Principles for multiplying Will-Power.
The NINETY-NINE STAR METHODS for using Will-Power in the Conduct of Life.
The Seven Great Principles of drill in Mental, Physical, Personal power.
The FIFTY-ONE MAXIMS for Applied power of Perception, Memory, Imagination, Self Analysis, Control.
How to make the Eye a great power in Influence and Observation.
How to develop a strong keen gaze.
How to make the Eye yield values in Mind-Power.
How to concentrate the eye upon what is before you—object, person, printed page, work.
How to school the eye for power in business, society, public.
How to force Will into the eye.
How to cultivate a bright, attracting, intelligent eye expression.
How to become aware of Nerve Action.
How to keep the body well-poised.
How to open the Mind and Body for reception of incoming power.
How to exercise the nerves.
How to throw off the mood of Worry.
Affirmation of Supreme Well-being.
How to overcome the tyranny of the Nervous system.
How to secure steady nerves.
How to keep the body quiet, controlled conserved in power, eliminating all nerve-force destroying habits.
How to train the great executive servant of the Mind—the Hand.
How to maintain the Central Factors of Body health.
The First, Second and Third difficulties in Mastering Harmful Habits.
The Law of Will-Power in Habits.
The Mental Law of Habit Cure.

"Power of Will" means increased power for you in everything you do. It creates Tact in dealing with others; an unyielding mastery of yourself at all times; a keen power of insight into business problems; a wise application of mental forces; habits that assist rather than delay your advancement; personal traits that win admiration and secure favors in business or society; in short—it will greatly extend your sphere of action and influence no matter what your work or education.

Letters of praise are pouring in.

"Plain, practical, scientific", N. Y. Times.
"A gold mine", "Inestimable boon to mankind", "Valuable addition to our Library" Sheldon School. "Beyond description and well worth the price", "Wonderful Inspiration", "Delighted", "A Jewel", "Every page a delightful epigram", Nautilus. "Of infinite value to any man or woman". Health Culture. "Clears the boards of any book I ever read", "The work of a master mind", "Have read 40 pages—worth $100.00".

"It is all you claim in your circulars. Have spent $200.00 for books in this line of study but all put together do not possess a thousandth part of the merit this book has". — F. B., Route No. 1, Box 43, Grand Mound, Iowa.

How to make the Imagination fill the mind with Life, Action, Energy, Beauty, scenes of Pleasure, Profit.
How to work the Imagination for discovery and invention.
How to improve mechanical devices.
How to create and build new devices.
How to make Imagination create for Literary Ability.
How to make Imagination suggest improvements in business, the home, your environment, conduct.
How to look into the Workshop of the Mind — and give ideas and thoughts Practical Creation.
How to cure diseased Imagination.
How to banish unhealthily mind states.
How to banish fear of Men, Ill Luck, Death, Hell, Misfortune.
How to arrive at best decisions.
How to use the power of deliberation.
What Francis Bacon said you must do to work (influence) any man.
The First Principle for success in contact with others.
The Mental Attitude you must hold to impress people.
The Secret of Control of Others.
How permanent Influence over others is secured.
The Best Rule in the Control of Others.
The FIFTY-FOUR MASTER RULES in the control of others.
The chief difficulty of Public Speaking.
How to use the Skill-Art of Influence before any audience.
How to acquire Thought, Develop Language, Exercise Expression.
How to be instructive, impressive, pointed, effective, clear.
How to overcome stage fright and embarrassment.
How to secure poise, power, persuasive ability.
How to handle eyes, voice, body.
How to deeply impress the audience.
A scientific treatise with hundreds of rules for training the child's will.

THE BOOK — An imperial volume, inside and outside. On fine quality paper; 28 chapters; 30 original full-page poems; division titles in red; 400 pages, gilt tops; richly bound in purple silk-cloth; cover stampings in 22-carat gold. Size, 6 x 9 inches; carefully boxed and sent anywhere that mails go, for $3.00

PRICE
$3.00
POSTPAID.

It is better to own this one manual of Pointed Methods, than to have a whole library of general essays.

Buy "Power of Will"--the Star Investment of Your Life

Advertising Manager of "Business Philosopher" writes: "Am delighted with "Power of Will". It is a great and beautiful book. Is worth so much more than $3.00 that I feel cheap in taking it. It is magnificent stuff" (He paid full cash price.)

Sheldon School of Salesmanship (Bought their own copy) "Power of Will" is above the average product; a valuable addition to our library."

That means—the publishers of this magazine want you to own the most practical result-producing, dollar-bringing system of business power yet published. The price you pay for this book will prove to be as pennies against government bonds. ACT NOW and send for "Power of Will". Tear this page out, write your name and address on margin and mail with remittance. My guarantee is simple — BOOK BACK — MONEY BACK. And this magazine guarantees this offer "100 per cent Square Deal". Your own self-interest lies in getting your order started before the last mail closes to-night. Order direct from the publisher

ALBERT LEWIS PELTON, (The Power-Book Library)
MERIDEN, CONN., U. S. A.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

YOUR SUMMER HOME

SHORE ACRES SUBDIVISION, LAKE EARA

OF COURSE you want to own a summer home. There is something in you that calls for woods, meadows, cool waters, and broad, comfortable porches, when summer comes and brick walls and paving stones shimmer and quiver with the heat. You need rest and relaxation.

You may have to be in the city on business during the day. But you are refreshed and renewed by the evenings and the week-ends at your summer home.

And it makes you glad to know that wife and babies are away from the glare, the blare, and the dust, getting strong and rosy at your summer home.

No, this is not a millionaire's dream. That summer home is within your reach. And, if your business is in Chicago, it is only an hour's run from that city—you can come out every night. If further away, you can come Friday or Saturday and stay until Monday.

For your summer home, I have just opened a new sub-division on the shores of Lake Eara—the most beautiful of all the famous lakes of Northern Illinois. It is only thirty-five miles from Chicago—three railways run from it into the city.

There are a limited number of lots, all at reasonable prices—first come, first served. When you buy a lot, you buy fishing, swimming, and boating privileges on Lake Eara. There is no lake property so near Chicago at anything like the price.

My primary object in opening this sub-division is to finance the first building of Sheldon Commercial University.

I want these summer homes, as far as possible to be owned by Sheldon Graduates or those in sympathy with A R E A philosophy.

*Write me today, saying you are interested,
and I will tell you all about it*

A. F. SHELDON
LIBERTYVILLE, ILLINOIS

SHELDON'S LAKE SHCRE DRIVE, LAKE EARA

ELGIN WATCHES ON CREDIT

7 Jewel Elgin—Our Great Special $13.75
sent Anywhere on FREE TRIAL

Guaranteed to keep accurate time. Fitted in double stock gold-filled case, warranted for 20 years.
 You do not pay one penny until you have seen and examined this High-grade 17-Jewel Elgin Watch, in hand-engraved case, right in your own me. You are to be the Judge. Let us send it to you, all charges paid. If suits you PAY ONLY $1.50 A MONTH.

Trust every honest person. No matter how far away you live, or how small your salary or income, will trust you for a high-grade Elgin Watch, in gold case, warranted for 25 years, and guaranteed pass any Railroad inspection. Write for our big free Watch and Diamond Catalog. It tells all about our Easy Payment Plan—the "Loftis System"—and how we send Elgin, Illinois and Waltham Watches, 16, 16, 12 and "O" sizes, 19, 21, and 23 Jewel, anywhere in the world without security or one cent deposit. Send for the Loftis Magazine, Free.

LOFTIS THE OLD RELIABLE ORIGINAL DIAMOND AND WATCH CREDIT HOUSE
 Dept. K811, 92 to 98 STATE ST., CHICAGO, ILL.
IBROS. & CO. Branches: Pittsburgh, Pa., St. Louis, Mo.

Health and Personal Power!

"The Attainment of Efficiency" Through Rational Methods

By W. R. C. LATSON, M.D., Editor of Health-Culture.

This new work by Dr. Latson indicates the avenues that lead to efficient and successful living and should be read by every man and woman who would reach their best and attain to their highest ambitions in business, professional, domestic or social life. The following are some of the many chapter headings:

How to 've the Efficient Life—Mental Habits and Health—Secret of Mental Supremacy—The Nobler Conquest—Firmness One Secret of Power—The Power of Calmness—How to Be an Efficient Worker—The Attainment of Personal Power—The Secret of Personal Magnetism—How to Increase Vitality—The Prime Secret of Health—The Conquest of Worry—The Attainment of Success—The Way to Happiness—The Secret of a Beautiful Voice—The Attainment of Physical Endurance—How to Live Longer in the Land—Secret of Rest—Sleeping as an Art—Common Sense Feeding—Grace and How to Get It—Style and How to Have It—How to Have Fine Complexion—How to Cure Yourself When Sick.

Each of these chapters is full of practical suggestions that will prove invaluable to the reader, bound in cloth, $1.00. A very handsome paper-bound edition of this price, 50c., will be given with Health-Culture ($1.00 year) six months, both for 50c., money back if not satisfied.

HEALTH-CULTURE CO., 601 St. James Bldg., New York

HEALTH CULTURE CO.,
 601 St. James Bldg., New York.

Enclosed find 50c for Attainment of Efficiency and Health-Culture to Jan., 1911. Money to be returned if not satisfied.

DR. LATSON

Use this Coupon Now
 ADDRESS: Name .....

THE ALAMO

Colorado Springs' New Fire-Proof Hotel

Strictly First-Class—American and European Plan

RATES:

American Plan—$2.50 to $4.00 per day and upwards.

European Plan—$1.00 per day and upwards.

150 Rooms—Fifty Elegant Suites with private baths.

Golf and other Outdoor Sports accessible to guests.

Colorado Springs, Colorado

Dr. Lindlahr's Sanitarium for Nature Cure

offers complete sanitarium facilities to patients from a distance and to those who wish to live the natural life in natural surroundings. We successfully treat all forms of so-called incurable diseases without the use of poisonous drugs or surgery.

Nature Cure by Mail

In this department we are prepared to take care of patients at a distance who cannot have the benefit of instruction and treatment in our sanitarium. Free literature and diagnosis blank furnished on application.

Send for Valuable Free Health-Culture Literature

A LIMITED NUMBER OF VOLS. I. and II. of the NATURE CURE MAGAZINE, cloth bound, are now for sale. Price $1.50 per volume, postpaid.

Dr. Lindlahr's Sanitarium

525 Ashland Boulevard, Chicago
 Telephone, Monroe 2246

Down town offices and Treatment rooms:
 84 Adams St., Rooms 404-406
 Telephone Harrison 6130

GET TOGETHER PAGE

In this page our subscribers will have the free use of a four line space for one insertion. In this space they may advertise themselves for sale or may advertise for the services of some one else. Others—not subscribers to THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER—will be obliged to pay 25 cents per line for classified ads. In sending in your ads you should figure seven words to the line so that there will be no trouble over the insertion.

WANTED—AGENTS TO TAKE SUBSCRIPTIONS to THE BACKBONE MONTHLY—"a serum against softening of the moral spine"—a magazine so different, both editorially and typographically. Show a sample copy and there's a sale on the spot. Agents are making money with THE BACKBONE MONTHLY. Come on in! Sample copies, terms and blanks on request. The Backbone Society, 144 Fox St., Aurora, Illinois.

START AN EASY AND LUCRATIVE BUSINESS. We teach you how to establish a successful collection business and refer business to you. No capital required. Little competition. Rare opportunities. Write for Free Pointers today. American Collection Service, 165 State St., Detroit, Mich.

AGENTS MAKE BIG MONEY SELLING OUR new gold letters for office windows, store fronts, and glass signs. Anyone can put them on. Write today for free sample and full particulars. Metallic Sign Letter Co., 431 N. Clark St., Chicago.

SALESMEN WANTED—IF YOU ARE A CLERK with natural qualifications as a salesman, I have an exceptional opportunity to offer you. If you are a merchant going out of business and looking for an opportunity to go on the road, my proposition will appeal to you. I want two or three capable men with the work habit, and who have energy plus. I want men with ability to sell goods all day long. I require references, also send an abstract of your qualifications. I have an advertising specialty proposition that interests all progressive retailers. Hundreds of the best retailers have endorsed my plan because they have found it profitable. Samples will go in coat pocket. My best salesmen are making from $500 to $1,000 a month. I want men who can do just as well or better. If you are of the right caliber, think you can handle a high-class, ready selling proposition, write me immediately before all territory is assigned. W. F. Main, Dept. 117, Iowa City, Iowa.

GAS MANTLE MANUFACTURER—WOULD YOU like a live salesman to sell your product, Sold $8,000 worth in seven months to the retailer in a city of 112,500 inhabitants. Address Hustler, Grand Rapids Evening Press.

SHELDON STUDENT NOW ENGAGED IN FARM-ing wants position as traveling salesman. Line that will repeat each year, with Chicago firm preferred. Will start on reasonable basis. William Luettichwager, R. F. D. No. 2, Prairie View, Ill.

WANTED—SALESMEN WITH RED BLOOD AND determination to sell the Commercial Account Register and Duplicating Books. Territory guaranteed. References and bond required. Commercial Register Company, Buffalo, N. Y.

REPRESENTATIVE WANTED—WE WANT A man with ability and ambition to represent us in Chicago. Must have good reference. Write us at once. Trade Mark Title Co., Ft. Wayne, Ind.

LOCAL REPRESENTATIVE WANTED—SPLEN-did income assured right man to act as our representative after learning our business thoroughly by mail. Former experience unnecessary. All we require is honesty, ability, ambition and willingness to learn a lucrative business. No soliciting or traveling. This is an exceptional opportunity for a man in your section to get into a big-paying business without capital and become independent for life. Write at once for full particulars. Address E. R. Marden, President The Nat'l Co-op. Real Estate Co., Suite 494 Marden Bldg., Washington, D. C.

AMBITIOUS MEN—LET US SHOW YOU HOW to engage in the most profitable of all lines of business—Banking and Brokerage—without any cost to you. Simply write for our free booklet, "Fortune Building Without Capital." New York Bankers' and Brokers' Institute, St. George, New York City.

THE VERY LATEST THING IN DUPLICATORS

A Rapid, Medium-Priced Duplicating Machine

Simple, durable, rapid, clean, perfect work. Portable, inexpensive, practical, compact, noiseless.

Cheaper to Buy

Cheaper to Run

"CANTYPE" SPRING-FRAME DUPLICATOR

1000 Perfect Reproductions per Hour of Hand-writing, Typewriting, Music or Drawing

Circulars can be taken direct from the Duplicator, and laid one copy on top another without off-setting or blurring. No other duplicator possesses this advantage. Circulars and samples of work on application. The only makers in America of all descriptions of ribbons, clean carbon papers, duplicators, stencil papers, inks, etc. Agents wanted in all unoccupied territory.

CHAS. E. ARCHBALD, PRESIDENT

PEN-CARBON MANIFOLD CO.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.

Originators and Only Manufacturers of Non-Flake Carbon Paper for Typewriter, Pen, Pencil and Stylus

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

The Sheldon Business Normal

You have always wanted to spend the winter in California.

Here is your chance!

I am considering holding the next term of THE SHELDON BUSINESS NORMAL in the Golden West.

This is being written in the midst of the first term of the Normal. It began July 1, with twenty-two students from four foreign countries and ten states of the Union.

It is a pronounced success. Enthusiasm and interest have grown from the very first day.

The next term of the Normal—if enough of you want it—will be held at some convenient point in California during January, February, and March, 1911.

The course of instruction will consist of:

First—Personal study and class instruction in:

- (a) The Science of Business Building, which is the fourth edition of the Science of Successful Salesmanship;
- (b) The Science of Industrial Success;
- (c) The Science of Service.

Second—An extensive series of personal lectures by me, assisted by specialists, in Salesmanship and Business Economics.

Third—A course of lectures on Character Analysis, or the reading of Human Nature.

Fourth—Frequent drills in the Art of Salesmanship and Sales Management.

This course of study leads to the appointment of those students who desire to take up our work, and whom I shall select as being worthy and qualified, to immediate positions in connection with the work of the Sheldon Schools.

The gross earnings of those who prove successful in these positions will not be less than $3,000 a year. Experience shows that earnings of $10,000 can be realized by men thus trained and employed.

You who are now well placed in a congenial line can get here the training you need to ginger up and build up the work of your sales department.

The class is also open to employers who find the training of competent sales managers a problem. Already employers in different parts of the country are skirmishing to secure the graduates of the Business Normal now in session.

You find here quick, sure, sane, tried, plain, direct, and scientific training for efficiency in sales management.

This California class will afford an especial opportunity to all of you who live west of the Rocky Mountains, as well as you who would enjoy a winter among the sunshine, flowers, and fruits of America's western paradise.

If your response and encouragement is quick and hearty I will definitely decide to hold this Pacific Coast session, and will make speedy announcement of the exact time and place.

Write to me right away, and I will answer, giving full particulars.

Sheldon

A. F. SHELDON,

Area—P. O. Libertyville, Illinois

1910

Gentlemen—Will you please forward full particulars regarding The Sheldon Business Normal School, as advertised in THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER for September.

Name .....

Local Address .....

The Other Side

"The House That Has a Hoover is a Home"

THERE are two sides to the question of economy.

As a business man, you have studied Business Economy—perhaps reduced it to an exact science.

But haven't you overlooked or neglected the other side of the question, that equally important side. Household Economy?

Figure up what it costs you annually to keep your home clean. Add to the amounts paid to cleaners and renovators the wages of extra servants to come in and clean once a week or so. Consider the loss through breakage and wear and tear; and don't overlook your wife's doctor's bills, traceable to the strain and overwork.

As against this, put down $125 for a Hoover Sweeper, which will do all your cleaning for twenty-five years. Add from $2 to $3 for the annual cost of electric current to run it, and you have the entire expense. There will be no "extras" to crop out from time to time.

HOOVER
ELECTRIC
SUCTION SWEEPER

Is not a "suction alone" device. It combines Vibration and Brushing with Suction, affording the only thoroughly practical and effective cleaning principle.

It is strong, durable, efficient, convenient, the only machine a woman can and will use for every day cleaning.

Only a moment is required to put it into operation, and the lightest touch will move it.

Hose and nozzle attachments for every sort of cleaning are included in the equipment.

The Hoover Suction Sweeper Co.
NEW BERLIN, OHIO

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Roosevelt

A Striking Example of Success Due to a Well Trained Mind and Marvelous Memory

THE value of a well trained memory has never been more strikingly exemplified than in Theodore Roosevelt. It is to his remarkably trained memory—the ability to summon instantly to his aid the information necessary for prompt, accurate judgment and quick decision under all conditions—that makes Roosevelt the man he is today.

Roosevelt Recalls the Names of His Rough Riders

An incident illustrating the possibilities of a well trained memory was witnessed at Roosevelt's homecoming, when he shook hands with his famous Rough Riders, addressing each by name, and that after years of separation, an interval of excitement and strenuous life that would blot from the minds of most men all recollection of names and faces.

This man is a notable living proof that

A Good Memory is "The Key to Success"

What Roosevelt can do, any man can do—you can do. A perfect memory is the key to success in business, political or social life. You can have a perfect memory if you want it, because a perfect memory, like perfect health, can be acquired.

How Does Memory Training Concern YOU?

No matter who you are or what you are, what you do or where you live, you owe it to yourself to find out just how a perfectly trained memory will help you to greater success. You may secure this information without any obligation or expense. Do you want to remember names, faces, facts and figures? Do you want to learn how to focus your mind instantly on the vital points of a business proposition—How to think "on your feet" and make an extemporaneous speech—How to overcome bashfulness and converse in that natural, interesting way that wins friends—How to acquire the faculty of systematizing your mind, in fact, how to acquire the ability to CONCENTRATE? Then write to Henry Dickson, America's foremost authority on Memory Training and Principal of the Dickson School of Memory. You have the direct, personal supervision of Prof. Dickson.

Concerning the School The Dickson School of Memory is acknowledged the most successful school of Memory Training in the world—The fame of this school and its successful, logical system of home instruction has spread over the entire country and its graduates fill every walk in successful business, political and professional activity. While the weakest memories can be strengthened, you must not imagine that Prof. Dickson's system of Home Instruction is applicable only to this class. Many of the most intellectual men of the day have availed themselves of memory training. There are no tedious lessons or long hours of study. Just a simple, unfailing memory system, easy to learn, easy to adopt.

The Dickson System of Home Instruction in Memory Training has been highly recommended by such notables as Elbert Hubbard, Prof. David Swing, Dr. Latson and thousands of others.

The First Step is My Free Book "How to Remember"

Every reader of this publication should secure a free copy of Prof. Dickson's valuable book—"How to Remember"—read it carefully—it will show you how you can acquire a perfect memory. Fill out the coupon and mail it today. The reading of this book will be the first step toward a trained memory that will be the beginning of greater things than you ever dreamed of before.

FILL OUT COUPON — MAIL TODAY IT MEANS SUCCESS

MY BOOK
FREE

"HOW TO REMEMBER"
Write to day

Memory the Basis of All Knowledge
Stop forgetting

Prof. Henry Dickson, Principal
Dickson Memory School,
938 Auditorium Bldg., Chicago

Send me your free book "HOW TO REMEMBER."

NAME _____

STREET _____

CITY _____ STATE _____

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

A BOOK OF FRIENDLY THOUGHTS

The Girl Wanted

A Companion Book to "Boy Wanted"
By Nixon Waterman

"The best book for girls. A girl will be glad she has read it, and will be the better, the sweeter, the happier therefor."—Journal of Education.

"Every young woman should read this book. It is food for the eye and a feast for the mind."—Boston Globe.
Beautiful cover. Illustrated. Cloth. 8vo. $1.25.

Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Ill.

THE LAW OF Financial SUCCESS

10
CENTS

TELLS YOU IN PLAIN ENGLISH

- HOW to make money safely and judiciously.
HOW to judge investments properly and realize financial success.
HOW to acquire the faith necessary for success.
HOW to analyze, develop and utilize your dormant abilities essential to success.
HOW to guide your ambition, concentrate upon your aim and persist until you achieve it, etc., etc.

SPECIAL PAPER-BOUND EDITION
104 Pages - 10 CENTS - 16 Chapters

100,000 COPIES SOLD

MAKING MONEY

is not difficult for the man or woman who follows the instructions contained in the sixteen chapters of this most successful book of the year. The tremendous editions enable the publishers to sell the book at 10c, a price at which no man can afford to be without a copy any more than he can afford to refuse payment for his work or services. Fill out the Coupon now.

READ THESE LETTERS

Thos. C. Land, General Manager Conway Telephone Co., Pawnee, Okla.: "I have read the book and consider it one of the best books published. It is worth more than its weight in gold. I would like to see every young man read this book. I can certainly recommend it."

O. A. Jackson, Mason City, Iowa: "It is a great and good book."

James T. Castle, Manager Buckeye Engine Co., Pittsburg, Pa.: "Have read the 'Law of Financial Success' and find it of so much interest I want you to send me one-half dozen copies, as I would like to distribute same among my friends."

Harry A. Fries, Newark, N. J.: "Book is O. K.; worth twice the money with $10.00 added to it."

W. L. Wagner, of the Foos Gas Engine Co., Webb City, Mo.: "I cannot tell you in words just how well pleased I am with the book."

John G. Gretzinger, Fullerton, Cal.: "It is worth its weight in gold to me, far better than I expected."

Many Others on File. None Solicited.

If this announcement justifies you in investing 10 cents in a book which may mean the making of your fortune,

JUST WRITE YOUR NAME AND ADDRESS RIGHT HERE:

Name .....

Address .....

Tear out this coupon, wrap a dime or stamps in it, enclose in envelope and mail to

THE FIDUCIARY CO., 810 YACOMA BUILDING
CHICAGO, ILL.

The book will be promptly mailed, postpaid. When ever you wish to part with it, return it and the 10 cents will be instantly refunded.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

3000 GUMMED LABELS $1.00
SEVERAL SIZES AND STYLES
PRINTED TO ORDER IN ONE AND TWO COLORS
AT THIS AND EVEN LOWER PRICES. SEND FOR CATALOG
FENTON LABEL CO. NINTH & THOMPSON STS. PHILA. PA.

A GOOD SHORTHAND REPORTER
is the only kind you can afford to employ. I am well prepared to handle all kinds of law and general reporting.
FRED H. GURTLE
SHORTHAND REPORTER
Phone Randolph 3038 810-811 Reaper Block, CHICAGO

Be An Advertising Expert

Push your own business—make more money—increase your earning capacity by becoming expert on advertising in spare time. Our experts instruct you personally by mail. Free trial of the Lord Course proves what YOU can accomplish. Write today.
FREE TRIAL
A genuine trial proves value of books and instruction. Send for free Advertising Book.
Progress Self-Health University, 210-H Monroe St., Chicago, U. S. A.

I WILL MAKE YOU PROSPEROUS
If you are honest and ambitious write me today. No matter where you live or what your occupation, I will teach you the real Estate business by mail; appoint you Special Representative of my Company in your town; start you in a profitable business of your own, and help you make big money at once.
Unusual opportunity for men without capital to become independent for life.
Valuable Book and full particulars Free. Write today.
NATIONAL CO-OPERATIVE REALTY CO.
111 Marden Building
Washington, D. C.
R. E. Marden, Pres.

Early Arrivals of New Fall Woolens Now on Sale—

Suits or Overcoats
$25 to $55

NICOLL The Tailor
Wm. JERREMS' SONS
CLARK AND ADAMS STS.
CHICAGO

The Magazine That Dares

to print the news that's vital to human advancement. An absolutely fearless monthly, the exponent of constructive reform for the betterment of all. You never have seen such unless you know THE TWENTIETH CENTURY MAGAZINE. The editor is B. O. Flower, founder of The Arena. Among the contributors are Edwin Markham, Lincoln Steffens, David Graham Phillips, Hamlin Garland, Prof. Charles Zuehlke, Charles E. Russell, Brand Whitlock and Carl S. Vrooman. You should see this new periodical. It is beautifully illustrated and handsomely printed. It entertains and illuminates. One copy will convince you that there is no other magazine of equal strength in America, but to clinch your interest in the glorious work that Mr. Flower is leading, we will send you three sample issues, postpaid, all for only 10c. Get this intellectual stimulus and literary treat and realize there is a new force in the magazine field. We'll refund your remittance without question if you say we have exaggerated the value of this great monthly.

75c.
FOR 10c.

The Twentieth Century Co.
52 PARK SQUARE · BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS

Save your Pocket and Insure your Keys
Key Insurance—Good for one year, insures Keys and Identifies Owner; this with Genuine Morocco Combination Key and Knife Purses.....50c.
Accident Insurance—Above, plus a Limited Accident Policy for $1,000, renewable each year.....$1.00
Key Purses, { Corbille.....25c. Combination { Corbille.....40c.
(Key Chains { Morocco.....35c. Key and { Morocco.....50c.
5c. extra.) Seal, Russia, 50c. Knife Purses { Seal, Russia, 65c.
Special Prices in Quantities for use as Advertising Novelties
MURRAY S. CHISM, Patentee and Manufacturer
224 N. Camac St., Philadelphia, Pa.

if you have advertising troubles I can help you

I make sketches, layouts
and dummies or handle
your advertising campaign
complete — Write me.

Durton Gibbs Smith
ADVERTISING COUNSELLOR
⑤ 1150 OLD COLONY BUILDING - CHICAGO ⑤

Make Your Letterhead Work for You—

YOUR outgoing mail represents the circulation of an advertising medium that costs you nothing—we can show you how to take advantage of this advertising potential—easily and surely. ☐ When reading your morning mail, which letterhead catches your eye, rivets your attention and creates a favorable impression? A letterhead which does these things is advertising—regardless of what the letter is or to whom it goes.

Engraving Stationery—An Engraving Stationery Letterhead has selling value—it not only commands attention but has embodied in it a touch of individuality—suggests the importance of your proposition and the prestige of your firm. The cost is no higher than the ordinary printed letterhead. We have unusual facilities for producing high-grade engraving work, in any quantity, at short notice. ☐ Write us today for our interesting set of samples. This is a valuable portfolio and will be sent you free on request. Write today.

Eugene Smith Company

Makers of Fine Printing • 161 Fox Street, Aurora, Ill.

☐ For the production of high-grade catalogs, circulars, etc., we have a modern printing plant, complete in every detail. A postcard will bring you full particulars and an estimate of your needs.

$100 in Gold Given Away

A GENUINE bona fide offer. Read our proposition. Are you a smart speller? We give $100 in gold and other prizes named below to those able to make the largest list of words from the words The Rountree Publishing Company. You can make at least twenty, we believe, and if your list is the largest you will get the greatest prize. In case of a tie, prizes will be divided between highest contestants. Here are the rules to follow: Use only words in the English language. Words alike, but with different meanings can be used but once. Use any dictionary. Pronouns, nouns, verbs, adverbs, suffixes, adjectives, proper nouns, allowed. Anything that is a legitimate word will be allowed. This is the way: Heart, temple, rain, only. Use these words and arrange alphabetically. The following is a list of the prizes:

$25.00 for the largest list of words as above. $20.00 set of Encyclopedia, second largest list. $15.00 third largest list. $12.00 set of dishes, fourth largest list. $10.00 Mission Lamp, fifth largest list. $10.00 cash, sixth largest list. $5.00 cash, seventh largest list. $2.00 each to the next twenty-two highest. Subscriptions to the Dixie Home one year to the next hundred highest.

We want you to know The Dixie Home, which is one of the brightest and best illustrated magazines in the world, and it is for this reason that we offer these premiums. We make no extra charge for the privilege of entering this word-building contest. To enter the contest it is necessary for you to send us fifty cents or subscription to the Dixie Home for one year, with your list of words. List should be sent at once. The lucky names will be published later. This is a great offer to those who take an interest in such contests.

— Address —

“Contest Editor,” Dixie Home, Dept. 13, Birmingham, Alabama

Relieve Your Memory

Depend on this convenient, useful, gentleman's memo book to keep your dates, figures, names, memos, etc., in better, neater style.

Bennett Everlasting Memorandum Book

—leather cover, 3 3/4 x 8 inches, pocket for cards, removable pads—the most convenient. Price complete with your name stamped in gold on the cover and four inside pads, only . . . . . $1.00

Send no money Simply send us your name and we will forward the book with your name printed. If satisfied, send us our $1.00. If not, return the book. Send today.

W. W. BENNETT CO.

Box 146, East End

Pittsburg, Penn.

ONE DOLLAR BRINGS YOU

"The Rational Life"

By WILL J. ERWOOD

¶ The latest word on: Love—Marriage—Divorce; The Sex Question; Social Evils; The Rational Life; The Conquest of Self, etc. It is as fascinating as a romance. It is live thought on live issues.

It is written for you . EVERYMAN!
And for you . . . EVERYWOMAN!

¶ And you too, mother and father, it has ideals for you! Send for it! Read it together! It will help to make "Home, Sweet Home!"

¶ Finely bound, cloth and gold, about 200 pages; just from the press. Postpaid, only One Dollar.

Address: WILL J. ERWOOD

Dept. B.

717 East 22nd Street, Baltimore, Md.

Pen Money For You

I will place the synopsis of your story or magazine article in the hands of 1,000 buyers of manuscripts and photographs, on commission only. Send 10 cents today for "How to Write a Story," by today's most popular author, and I will send you the particulars of my plan for selling manuscripts.

MR. BUSLEY

Authors' Review

610 Steinway Hall, Chicago

Books that have Helped Thousands Develop Power to Make Greater Profits

THESE books will help YOU develop more power. Will teach you how to control your forces. Will show you how to inspire confidence. They are uniformly bound in green, printed on heavy book, contain over two hundred pages of helpful, inspiring, scientific, man-building advice. The simple, direct, concise language drives the lessons home at the first reading. Than these three the famous author of "As a Man Thinketh" has written nothing better.

—SEND THREE DOLLARS TODAY—

SHELDON UNIVERSITY PRESS, Libertyville, Illinois:

Enclosed find $..... Dollars.

Send me.....Copies (Mark the number).

....."From Poverty to Power"

....."All These Things Added"

....."Byways of Blessedness"

Name .....

City..... State.....

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

If These Men Know it, Don't ? You Want to Know it Too .... !

PROF. FLOURNOY, of the University of Geneva, Switzerland, says of it: "We have nothing so well done in French."

PROF. RICHTER, of Paris, France—"I have read it with the keenest interest."

PROF. MAX DESSOIR, of Berlin, Germany—"I was especially pleased with its sound, original ideas."

PROF. SCHILLER, of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, England—"I was particularly pleased with this book."

DR. VAN EEDEN, Amsterdam, Holland—"The sort of a book I considered absolutely necessary for the enlightenment of the public on this important subject."

PROF. BARRETT, of the Royal College of Sciences for Ireland—"I trust this work will really have the wide circulation it deserves."

SIR WILLIAM CROOKES, F. R. S., of London—"This book should be read with the utmost interest and care."

DR. I. K. FUNK, of Funk and Wagnalls, New York—"A strong book on a most vital subject."

MORTON C. PRINCE, M. D., of Boston—"I am sure it is destined to do a great deal of good."

HON. LYMAN J. GAGE, banker, ex-secretary of the U. S. treasury—"It has made good its purpose, which cannot be said of all books."

PROF. ELMER GATES, of Washington, D. C.—"It is the best simple statement of the subject extant."

REV. SAMUEL FALLOWS, D. D., LL. D., Presiding Bishop Episcopal Church, Chicago—"Practical, reliable, and has rendered a great service to the world."

REV. NEWELL DWIGHT HILLIS, D. D., Brooklyn, N. Y.—"Fills a real want. All persons will find it most suggestive and helpful."

REV. H. W. THOMAS, D. D., Ph. D., Chicago—"It reaches the heights of a singular power over its readers. There is certainly coming, and very near, a new birth of life."

ELBERT HUBBARD, East Aurora, N. Y.—"It shows a sure insight into the heart of things that is bound to make the world better."

What are they all talking about?

About a New Book by DR. STANLEY LeFEVRE KREBS entitled

"The Law of Suggestion"

If you wish we can get a copy for you, cloth-bound, post-paid,
for 75 cents. (Stamps, check or money-order.)

Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Illinois

$3,000 to $10,000
Per Year For You

I can make you prosperous. If you want to earn more money—if you want to establish yourself in an independent business requiring no capital—send me your name and address on coupon below. (or a postal will do) and I will mail you, free, our Big 62-Page Book, fully explaining just how you can fit yourself to earn big money in the Real Estate, Brokerage and Insurance Business. Our thoroughly tested successful system not only equips you fully on every point of Real Estate, Brokerage and Insurance, we also give you, free, a valuable course in Commercial Law. Our Free Book is of great interest to anyone, but is of vital importance to Clerks, Book Keepers, Salesmen, Agents, Solicitors and others who are ambitious to be in a good paying business of their own.

International Realty Corp., 422 Manhattan Bldg., Chicago
Successors to The Cross Co. and H. W. Cross & Co.

This Book Shows You How to Succeed in Real Estate, Brokerage and Insurance

Send no money, but merely your name and address on a postal or on the Coupon below.

NAME .....

ADDRESS .....

It Pays to Buy Your Goods From a Reliable House

Read What our Customer says in Regard to Our Carbon Paper

"We have found the Carbon Paper which we have secured from you people to be the most satisfactory of any carbon that we have secured from any other firms, and we have bought Carbon from at least four other dealers since we got the last from you.

"We need some Carbon now and we enclose herewith check for $2.00 which we believe is the price we paid you for one hundred sheets of the same. On an old box which we have in the office which we secured from you is printed: "100 Sheets Durable Typewriter Paper, $2.00 a Box."

How is That for a Boost?

Don't you want to try a box of this good grade carbon? If so, send $2.00 along to the

National Office Supply Company
ZION CITY, ILLINOIS

"The Square Deal House" who will promptly fill your order.

We carry two kinds; "Favorite," the high-grade, light weight carbon for manifolding, $3.00 a box. Also, our "Durable" carbon at $2.00 a box per hundred sheets.

Agents wanted to carry our up-to-date line of office supplies
ALL GOODS GUARANTEED. SEND FOR CATALOG

Another Angle on Business Philosophy

The Mediator

A New Magazine of Industrial Economy. A Vigorous Publication for Progressive Minds.

Not a Muck-Raker.
Helpful, Inspiring, Courageous

Free Write today for free sample copy. Don't wait till tomorrow. Published monthly. Brimful of helpful suggestions. Stands for industrial tolerance. Believes strikes are futile. Urges cooperation between employees and employers.

The Mediator

ROCKEFELLER BLDG., CLEVELAND, O.

How to Write an "Ad"

A Tabloid Course in Adwriting, Complete in Six Lessons; the Boiled

Down Experience of Years, in Booklet Form

If you are a business man interested in adwriting or a man who wants to get started in the advertising business, you certainly ought to have this valuable little course.

It outlines in a brief, yet comprehensive way, the entire method of writing an advertisement from the inception of the idea, the collecting of matter, drawing the plan, instructing the printer—to its realization in printers' ink.

Six interesting and instructive lessons with diagrams and illustrations showing how to sit down and finish a complete advertisement.

POSTPAID. FIFTY CENTS

Reference, The Sheldon School.

ARTHUR B. FREEMAN
3745 MAPLE SQUARE AVE., CHICAGO, ILL.

The Illustrated Review

A magazine for Authors, Artists, Craftsmen, Collectors and Devotees of the Art of Physical Expression

---

Reproductions of paintings by American artists.
Studio stories and news.
Unconventional snap shots of authors at work
and at play.
Illustrations of handicraft work.
Short articles giving advice to buyers of objects
of art and rarities.
Illustrations of types of beauty.

---

"Its atmosphere is homey to those who work with the fine tools of words and pigments," says Will Levington Comfort, author of "Routledge Rides Alone."

10 cents per copy. Four back numbers for 20 cents. Three months for 25 cents. One year, $1.00

The Illustrated Review

Steinway Hall Building, Chicago

IF YOU WANT TO KNOW ANYTHING ABOUT

Ohio

The State of Marvelous Natural Resources. The State of Great Manufacturing Advantages. Where Good Business is Encouraged and Bad Business is Discouraged.

IF YOU WANT TO KNOW ANYTHING ABOUT OHIO, YOU'LL FIND IT IN

The Ohio Journal of Commerce

a weekly journal published by the business men of the state in the interest of all business. Subscription: Two dollars a year. THE OHIO JOURNAL OF COMMERCE is read every Saturday by the progressive business men of Ohio.

If you want to reach this money-spending class of Ohioans, place your advertisement in THE OHIO JOURNAL OF COMMERCE. We will be glad to give you any information about Ohio and THE OHIO JOURNAL OF COMMERCE.

The Ohio Journal of Commerce Co.

339 CHAMBER OF COMMERCE BUILDING :: :: COLUMBUS, OHIO

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

IF YOU didn't get anything more out of your college life than just the knowledge you received from books you'd be well paid for all the time and money it cost you.

But that's the smallest part. The big thing was the mental training; power to think, to concentrate. Your brains are just like your body. They need exercise; must have it. Give them exercise and they will do for you whatever you will. On the other hand, if you neglect or fail to use them they become atrophied; dead.

Put your perfectly well arm in splints or a plaster cast and leave it a comparatively short time—you lose the use of it. Same with your brains. Use; life. Disuse; death. You can't afford to be without a well-trained mind—not in this day and age. You're going to deal with men who have trained minds or you're not—depends on what kind of a mind you've got, trained or untrained.

CUT HERE

THE PEOPLES UNIVERSITY,
P. O. Box 1374,
University City, St. Louis, Mo.

Please send me, without obligation on my part, full information about how I can take up the study of the Course I have marked below.

|                        |                    |
|------------------------|--------------------|
| Music                  | Stenography        |
| Art                    | Typewriting        |
| Short Story Writing    | Bookkeeping        |
| Teachers' Certificates | General Commercial |
| Journalism             | Penmanship         |
| Kindergarten           | Agriculture        |
| Domestic Science       | Horticulture       |
| Civil Service          | Veterinary Science |
| Preparation            | Floriculture       |
| Dressmaking            | Poultry Culture    |
| Auto Engineering       | Bee Keeping        |
| Photography            |                    |

Name .....

Street and No. ....

City ..... State .....

It's not too late to put your brains into training. Our home study course offers over two hundred branches. It would be strange if from this number you could not select a course of study that would do for your brains just what is required to help you realize your ambition.

If you'll tell us exactly what you wish to do we'll assist in selecting a course of study that will help you do it.

Mark the coupon, cut it out and mail today; your first step.

The Peoples University
P. O. Box 1374
University City, St. Louis, Mo.

PRACTICAL BUSINESS BOOKS!

Examine the List—Select Those That Will Help You—Mail Your Order Today

Authorized American Edition of DICKSEE'S AUDITING

Revised and Enlarged
By Robert H. Montgomery, C. P. A.

The acknowledged authority in both England and America on all subjects connected with auditing. The present edition retains all the valuable matter of the first edition, revised and brought up to date, and in addition over 200 pages of entirely new matter. The subject treatment is (1) Auditing—Up to the Trial Balance; (2) Methods of Account; (3) Special Considerations in Different Classes of Audit; (4) Auditing—From Trial Balance to Balance Sheet; (5) Forms of Account and Balance Sheets; (6) What Are Profits? (7) The Attitude of the Auditor; (8) The Liabilities of Auditors; (9) Investigations; (10) Interest; (11) Professional Ethics; (12) C. P. A. Examination Questions. Contains 100 pages of model forms of Balance Sheets, Income and Profit and Loss Accounts, etc., etc. 6 x 9. 586 pages. 1909. Durable cloth, gold stamped. $5.00 delivered.

CORPORATE FINANCE and ACCOUNTING

By H. C. Bentley, C. P. A.

Every corporation treasurer and accountant should possess this book. It is a complete working manual covering the daily duties of these officials. In six parts, as follows: (1) The corporation treasurer, his legal status, the requirements of his office, his duties, powers and liabilities, his relation to corporate affairs in general, his bonding; (2) An extended exposition of the methods and forms for practical corporate accounting, describing the various forms of books and entries; (3) Corporate finances, including funds in general, bank deposits, checks and dividends; (4) Negotiable instruments, their nature and requisites, their general and special liabilities, their collection; (5) Corporate securities; (6) 44 model legal forms for signatures, checks, receipts, resolutions and certifications. 6 x 9. Buckram. 500 pp. $4.00 delivered.

A Manual of CORPORATE MANAGEMENT

By Thos. Conyngton of the N. Y. Bar

No corporation official can really afford to be without this book. In it can be found immediately a clear, accurate, non-technical answer to any question concerning the legal side of corporate management. Tells the purposes, scope, and uses of the Charter and By-Laws: the rights, duties, powers and liabilities of Officers, Directors, and Stockholders under all circumstances: explains fully the issuance, sale, record and transfer of stock; tells how to conduct meetings; how to keep all books of record; and discusses such important matters as Committees, Dividends, Consolidations, Re-organization, etc. A safe guide in any state. Contains also over 200 model legal forms, covering practically every matter in corporation work requiring a form. Third Edition. 1909. 6 x 9. Buckram binding. $3.50 delivered.

CONDITIONAL SALES

By F. B. Haring of the Buffalo Bar

No concern which makes credit sales should be without this book. It states clearly the requirements for a valid contract of conditional sale in every state of the Union, whereby title to goods sold is retained in the vendor until payment has been made. This information is arranged under uniform headings giving Legal Status of Contracts, how to execute them, acknowledgement or proof required, recording or filing necessary, recording fee, renewals, discharge, Landlord's lien, criminal liability of vendee, action for money judgment, claim on fixtures, when vendor or vendee loses, etc. Approved forms of contracts, acknowledgements, etc. Used as a guide by hundreds of the largest concerns in the country. "Send us another copy," say Lyon & Healy, Chicago. 6 x 9. Buckram. 1909. $5.00 delivered.

A Manual of CORPORATE ORGANIZATION

By Thos. Conyngton of the N. Y. Bar

Explains clearly and in detail every step necessary for the organization and incorporation of a new company or the reorganization of an old one. Describes ends sought by incorporation: stock subscription lists and contracts; tells where to incorporate and the expense; detailed explanation of capitalization and the stock system and the status of stockholders; describes the nature and functions of the Charter and By-laws; tells how to conduct meetings; how to elect officers and directors, and defines their duties, powers and liabilities; full information for the protection of minority interests, protection of an inventor, underwriting, promoters, etc., etc. Accurate, authoritative, up-to-date, and entirely free from legal technicalities. Second Ed. 1908. 6 x 9. Buckram. $3.00 delivered.

FINANCING an ENTERPRISE

By Francis Cooper

A practical two-volume work telling how to secure capital and successfully promote a business enterprise of any kind. Vol. I describes conditions necessary for successful financing; tells how to investigate, protect, and capitalize an enterprise, discusses experimental work and model making. Vol. II tells best methods for securing money, privately, or publicly, by advertising; how to write a prospectus. Important chapters on stocks, bonds, incorporation, underwriting, etc. Written from 15 years' promoting experience. Only reliable work on the subject. Third edition. 1909. 543 pp. Buckram. Both vols. $4.00 delivered. Either vol. singly $2.00 delivered.

Complete Descriptive Circular of Any Book on Request

THE RONALD PRESS COMPANY

Publishers of Business Books, and of
THE BUSINESS WORLD, a magazine of Practical Business

Rooms 14-20
229 Broadway, New York

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

50c Secures this Great Reference Book

An entirely new, up-to-date, down-to-the-minute Reference Book, for bookkeepers, cashiers, accountants and business men.

This magnificent volume weighs nearly 6 pounds; contains over 500 pages, 200,000 words and 700 illustrations of forms and tables; beautifully printed on fine paper; handsomely and strongly bound; produced and presented to the business world at a cost which brings it within the reach of all; easiest for reference, plainest for acquiring information, and most economical when compared with all other publications of like nature.

It is yours on payment of only 50 cents

down and the balance in monthly installments of 50 cents or $1.00 as you prefer.

Monthly installment price, $4.00 per copy; introductory special cash price (less 10 per cent) only $3.60.

In either case the expressage is prepaid to your address in the United States and Canada.

E. H. Beach, Publisher, Detroit, Mich.

Send 25 cents for 12 months subscription to BEACH'S MAGAZINE OF BUSINESS

A handsome monthly magazine for business men, bookkeepers, accountants, cashiers, credit men, stenographers, advertising managers, etc. The "man behind the desk" must have it. Splendid business stories. Your money back if you do not like it.

E. H. Beach, Publisher, 69 West Fort St., Detroit, Mich.

The International Business Correspondence Course

HAS BEEN DEVISED FOR THE BENEFIT OF THOSE INTERESTED IN HIGHER AND COST ACCOUNTING WHO DESIRE TO QUALIFY FOR HIGHER POSITIONS AND HIGHER SALARIES

Higher accounting for bookkeepers, cashiers, accountants, office men and business men generally.

Factory cost accounting for cost clerks, superintendents, factory foremen, all of whom require in the performance of their duties an accurate knowledge of factory detail and daily results, to be obtained with the least possible labor combined with the greatest satisfaction.

For those who wish to adopt the lucrative profession of Certified Public Accountant.

What the Course Offers You

The active experience of twenty years enables the directors of this Business Correspondence Course to concentrate in lessons spread over six months an education comprising all the vital principles and essential systems and methods of down-to-the-minute accountancy for all classes and varieties of business included in the curriculums of the most expensive Correspondence Schools, at a charge to students of from $40 to $100.

THE COST

Special Terms for Balance of Year 1910

This comprehensive, complete and fully effective Business Correspondence Course is offered at the temporary and very low introductory price of $10 cash, or $12 payable in easy installments of $2 down and $2 per month for five months.

E. H. BEACH, Publisher :: Detroit, Michigan

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

WHEN IN DETROIT STOP AT HOTEL TULLER

New and Absolutely Fireproof

Cor. Adams Ave. and Park St.

In the center of the Theatre, Shopping and Business District.

Has large Convention Hall.

Has grand Roof Garden Cafe.

Music from 6 P. M. to 12:30 A. M.

Every Room has Private Bath

EUROPEAN PLAN

RATES: $1.50 PER DAY AND UP

L. W. TULLER - - Proprietor

Embossed Business Stationery

Printed from Steel Dies
Send for Samples

Engraved Cards.

We engrave a one-line plate and furnish 100 engraved cards, postpaid. Engraved in script, $1.25; block, $1.50; solid Roman, old English or French script, $1.75; shaded old English or block, $2.00; shaded Roman or French script, $2.25. Cash to be sent with order. Best stock used. Monogram stationery. Wedding and business announcements.

The American Embossing Co.

192-69 SENECA STREET, BUFFALO, N. Y.

Financing an Enterprise

By FRANCIS COOPER

TWO volumes that have helped hundreds of men win fortunes by showing them how to successfully finance and promote their business or their discoveries. Highly endorsed. Only successful work on promotion.

Volume 1 describes conditions necessary for successful financing: how to investigate, protect and capitalize an enterprise; experimental work and model making.

Volume 2 tells best methods for securing money, privately, or publicly, by advertising; how to advertise, how to write a winning prospectus. Important chapters on stock, bonds, incorporations, etc.

Invaluable knowledge gathered from fifteen years' experience. Save you hundred times its cost. Full descriptive circular if you want it.

300 pp. 1909 ed. Buckram binding. Two vols., $4.00 prepaid. Either vol. separately, $2.00 prepaid.

SHELDON UNIVERSITY PRESS
LIBERTYVILLE, ILLINOIS

SPINAL IRRITATION

An elegantly illustrated booklet explaining the cause and cure of the disease that produces the following

SYMPTOMS:

HEADACHE, or pains in the head, especially in the Back part or Base of Brain; Nervous or Biliary Headache; sensations that feel like the pulling or stretching of
CORDS in the Neck; trouble with the
EYES connected with pain or aching in back part of head or neck or upper part of shoulders; aches or pains in the eyes or back of them; specks or spots before the eyes or blurred vision; a frequent desire to
SIGH or YAWN or take a deep, full breath, and in some cases, an inability to do so;
PALPITATION or irregularity of the heart; pains, oppression, difficult breathing, or very peculiar and disagreeable feelings in the region of the
HEART, LUNGS, STOMACH, or other parts of the body that doctors often call Neuralgia, Rheumatism, Indigestion, Heart trouble and various other names, but fail to cure; aches or pains in the region of the
KIDNEYS; BACKACHE; sensations of oppression or constriction like a
BELT AROUND THE BODY, or part way around;
PARTIAL PARALYSIS of arms, shoulders, hands, lower limbs or feet, causing pains in these members, or a
NUMB FEELING or sensations of coldness, heaviness, or a tingling or feelings resembling the
PRICKING OF PINS or needles or as if the parts were asleep;
SORE, TENDER OR BURNING points along the spine or in the limbs or feet; pains in the face, arms, back, lower limbs or feet, resembling those of
NEURALGIA OR SCIATIC RHEUMATISM (physicians often treat these symptoms as ordinary neuralgia or rheumatism, but such treatment will not cure them);
CHILLS UP OR DOWN BACK;
CREeping sensations, coldness or numbness; pain
BETWEEN SHOULDERS.

If you have the above named symptoms, or any of them, you probably have SPINAL IRRITATION, a very serious disorder that but few physicians can cure. Yet it is very easily cured by proper treatment. Our elegantly illustrated booklet explains how. It also describes the disease and explains what causes it.

Price, 10 Cents

OHIO STATE PUBLISHING CO., 93-5 The Birmingham, Cleveland, O.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

The Largest Staff of Salesmen in the World

that is what Advertisers command in

"The Traveling Man"

We have a paid in advance subscription from members of the fourteen great orders in which the Salesmen of the United States have banded themselves—that should make advertisers think—our Magazine represents the Greatest Commercial Force in the World — "Word of Mouth" Advertising by our Subscribers. Think it over—Our Rates by Mail—You've Thought.

Strong Endorsement

The following large and important Organizations of Traveling Men, representing hundreds of thousands, approve of "THE TRAVELING MAN" and wish it God Speed!

|                                                                           |                                                                       |
|---------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Christian Traveling Men's Association"Gideons," Chicago, Ill.         | Northwestern Traveling Men's Association,Chicago, Ill.            |
| The Commercial Travelers' Life and Accident Association, Cleveland, Ohio. | Travelers' Health Association,Omaha, Nebraska.                    |
| Commercial Travelers' Accident Association,Utica, New York.           | Traveler's Protective Association of America,St. Louis, Missouri. |
| Illinois Commercial Men's Association,Chicago, Ill.                   | Toledo Travelers' Health Association,Toledo, Ohio.                |
| International Travelers' Association,Dallas, Texas.                   | United Commercial Travelers of America,Columbus, Ohio.            |
| Iowa State Traveling Men's Association,Des Moines, Iowa.              | Western Travelers' Accident Association,Omaha, Nebraska.          |
| Minnesota Commercial Men's Health Association,New Ulm, Minnesota.     | Western Commercial Travelers' Association,St. Louis, Missouri.    |

Subscription Price, $1.00 Per Year

THE TRAVELING MAN

VALPARAISO, INDIANA

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

How to Increase Your Mental Wealth at Small Cost—

TO BECOME a better Speaker of Words—and to be a scientific salesman one must know how to speak wisely and well—one should have a thorough acquaintance with the great classics of literature.

¶ The Caxton Brochures are exquisitely printed in two colors on high-grade paper—protected with a heavy cover—tied with silk—brightened with a special portrait of the author by Hillberg—and possess the great merit of fitting the pocket both in size and price.

¶ By special arrangement we have secured a limited quantity of these beautiful Brochures and while they last they will be sold for Fourteen Cents each or Ten for One Dollar.

¶ Of course you know we wrap all our goods with Satisfaction—which means that you can have your money back absolutely without question if you are not perfectly satisfied.

The Caxton Brochures

¶ A collection of Little Masterpieces, published one each month, by the Caxton Society, the aim being to present the most significant essays and short stories by the world's best authors, in a form that will appeal to all bookish people.

No. 1—CHARLES LAMB'S ESSAY, "A Dissertation upon Rast Pig," also "Detached Thoughts on Books and Reading."

No. 2—RALPH WALDO EMERSON'S "Essay on Compensation."

No. 3—"THE CHINESE PHILOSOPHER'S SON," by Oliver Goldsmith. This number is now out of print.

No. 4—"BIBLIOPHILE AND BIBLIOMANIAC," by Henry Houssaye and Henry Ward Beecher.

No. 5—"COLLECTANEA," being certain verses written by Rudyard Kipling.

No. 6—"POOR RICHARD'S ALMANACK," Shrewd wit of Benjamin Franklin as compiled by himself. With facsimile reproductions.

No. 7—"HENRY DAVID THOREAU, His Character and Opinions," by Robert Louis Stevenson.

No. 8—"BACON'S ESSAYS," being those contained in the first edition, published in 1597. With facsimile reproductions of some of the pages.

No. 9—"WISDOM OF CHESTERFIELD." Being extracts from letters of the Earl of Chesterfield to his son.

No. 10—"LOVE LETTERS OF HENRY VIII to ANNE BOLEYN." The authentic love letters of a real king.

No. 11—"RUBAIYAT OF OMAR KHAYYAM," by Edward FitzGerald. This is a careful reprint of the first edition, introduction and notes.

No. 12—"SELF-RELIANCE," by Ralph Waldo Emerson. "Let a man know his worth, and keep things under his feet."

No. 13—"WILL O' THE MILL," by Robert Louis Stevenson.

No. 14—"RABBI BEN EZRA," by Robert Browning. This number contains a special analysis and study.

No. 15—"THE LEGEND OF SLEEPY HOLLOW," by Washington Irving.

No. 16—"THE ATHEIST'S MASS," by Honore de Balzac.

No. 17—"ODES OF ANACREON," as translated by Thomas Moore.

No. 18—"EVERYMAN," the great Morality Play. Facsimile reproductions from old editions.

No. 19—"ADDRESS ON ARTS AND CRAFTS," by William Morris.

We believe these Brochures are a little better than anything ever before attempted in special editions at a popular price. The numbers now ready are No. 1 to 19, inclusive; and with exception of No. 3 which is out of print. We will supply them at fourteen cents each, or ten for one dollar.

Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Ill.

DEPARTMENT 87

SERVICE carries with it the necessity of an opportunity to serve. To obtain it often requires persuasion of the positive word-speaking and deed-doing kind

SHELDON

The BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

That man is best educated who is the most useful. —Charles W. Eliot

The right to be useful is the only right I want.—Katherine Blackford

ARTHUR·FREDERICK·SHELDON
EDITOR

SHELDON·UNIVERSITY·PRESS
LIBERTYVILLE·ILLINOIS

Ginger Talks

235 PAGES—15 FULL PAGE CARTOONS

Sales of Two Millions a Month

The Course in Salesmanship that Built Them for the National Cash Register Company

Yours for Two Dollars

THINK of a course in practical salesmanship, written straight out of the heart of the greatest selling organization in the world, by a Director of that organization; a course that does not merely describe the selling system of this colossal concern—but IS THAT ACTUAL SYSTEM ITSELF—the word for word Ginger Talks of that world famous company to its 1,000 salesmen—the verbatim coaching, the exact specific instruction, the very selling pointers and arguments and inspiration and enthusiasm that built up, through those 1,000 red-blooded salesmen, a business of over two million dollars a month in monthly sales.

The Pabst Co. bought it for its 1800 salesmen. The Quaker Oats Company invested $450 in it. 1682 other giant concerns have taken it for their entire sales forces, many taking from 100 to 1000 each.

Ask us to send you a list six feet long of these concerns which employ nearly 50,000 salesmen

GINGER TALKS are a complete text-book of instruction and pointers on the art of selling goods. They simplify the whole of practical salesmanship; make clear with wonderful illustrations and exact explanations how to make approaches, how to secure attention, how to create desire, how to stimulate to immediate action and walk out with the order. They tell the salesman how to turn enmity into friendship, cold indifference into eager interest, casual inquiries into actual buyers, actual buyers into permanent customers. They touch on a thousand salesmen's difficulties and perplexities and show a way out of each one.

GINGER TALKS is the only business book ever written that is as brilliant and fascinating in style and has the same human interest as George Ade's "Fables in Slang," Billy Baxter's "Letters," or Mr. Dooley's famous conversations with his friend Hennessy. The sentences are crowded with epigrams, sharpened with penetrating wit, lighted up with humor, and made fairly alive with the tones of a masterful personality. It is this wonderful combination of solid instruction and brilliant expression—"beef-steak nutriment and champagne style" that has brought Ginger Talks their tremendous sales.

SEND YOUR GINGER

SHELDON UNIVERSITY PRESS, Libertyville, Illinois.

I am enclosing Two Dollars. Send me a copy of Holman's "Ginger Talks."

Name _____

Address _____

State _____

You can enclose $3.50 and receive a copy of Ginger Talks and The Business Philosopher for one year

ARTHUR F. SHELDON
EDITOR-IN-CHIEF

CONTENTS

ARTHUR W. NEWCOMB
MANAGING EDITOR

SHELDON'S BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER AND SALESMANSHIP

OCTOBER, 1910

|                                                                  |                     |
|------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------|
| ELBERT HUBBARD .....                                             | Frontispiece |
| EDITORIAL .....                                                  | 579                 |
| By A. F. Sheldon                                          |                     |
| ADVERTISING—ITS RELATION TO LITERATURE, SALESMANSHIP, LIFE ..... | 583                 |
| By Elbert Hubbard                                         |                     |
| "KEEP YOUR EYE ON THE JOB AHEAD"—GOOD BUSINESS POLICY .....      | 593                 |
| By E. N. Ferden                                           |                     |
| THE SONG THE STEEL RAIL SINGS TO THE WHEEL.....                  | 596                 |
| By A. St. P. Reynolds                                     |                     |
| FLEISHMAN, "THE WANT AD MAN," AND HIS "LITTLE TALKS" .....       | 597                 |
| By Arthur W. Newcomb                                      |                     |
| TAKING ON EXTRAS OF KNOWLEDGE AND POWER TO DO THINGS .....       | 602                 |
| By W. H. Tennyson                                         |                     |
| ADVERTISING, SALESMANSHIP AND PUBLIC SPEAKING.....               | 603                 |
| By Arthur Bernard Freeman                                 |                     |
| WHAT THE PRISON REFORM LEAGUE WANTS TO DO AND SEE DONE .....     | 608                 |
| By Griffith J. Griffith                                   |                     |
| GLEANINGS FROM BUSINESS FIELDS.....                              | 611                 |
| By Thomas Dreier                                          |                     |
| PUBLICITY AS A CREATIVE FORCE IN BUSINESS—AN ADDRESS....         | 614                 |
| By E. St. Elmo Lewis                                      |                     |
| TEACHING SALESMANSHIP IN THE DEPARTMENT STORES.....              | 620                 |
| By Elizabeth M. Bishop                                    |                     |
| THE QUESTIONS OF SOCRATIC.....                                   | 623                 |
| By Arthur W. Newcomb                                      |                     |
| RANDOM THOUGHTS ON BUSINESS BUILDING AND MAN BUILDING .....      | 626                 |
| By A. F. Sheldon                                          |                     |
| LETTERS OF A SALES AND ADVERTISING MANAGER.....                  | 630                 |
| By George H. Eberhard                                     |                     |
| LEAVES FROM MY ORDER BOOK.....                                   | 634                 |
| By Morton Mayne                                           |                     |
| THE PHILOSOPHER AMONG HIS BOOKS.....                             | 637                 |

Two dollars a year will bring the magazine to anyone in the United States or its possessions, $2.25 in Canada, and $2.50 in foreign countries. Requests for "change of address" must reach this office before the tenth of the month in order to insure the proper mailing of the current issue of this magazine. In sending in the new address please give your previous location.

Published by the Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Illinois

Entered as Second-Class Matter, December 15, 1908, at the Post Office at Libertyville, Illinois, under Act of March 3, 1879. Copyrighted by Sheldon University Press.

Seventeen Cents a Day Buys an Oliver Typewriter

This amazing offer—the New Model Oliver Typewriter No. 5 at 17 cents a day—is open to everybody, everywhere.

It's our new and immensely popular plan of selling Oliver Typewriters, on little easy payments. The abandonment of longhand in favor of clean, legible, beautiful typewriting is the next great step in human progress.

Already—in all lines of business and in all professions—the use of pen-and-ink is largely restricted to the writing of signatures.

Business Colleges and High Schools, watchful of the trend of public sentiment, are training a vast army of young people in the use of Oliver Typewriters.

The prompt and generous response of the Oliver Typewriter Company to the world-wide demand for universal typewriting, gives tremendous impetus to the movement.

The Oliver, with the largest sale of any typewriter in existence, was the logical machine to take the initiative in bringing about the universal use of typewriters. It always leads.

Save Your Pennies & Own an Oliver

This "17-Cents-a-Day" selling plan makes the Oliver as easy to own as to rent. It places the machine within easy reach of every home—every individual. A man's "cigar money"—a woman's "pin-money"—will buy it.

Clerks on small salaries can now afford to own Olivers. By utilizing spare moments for practice they may fit themselves for more important positions.

School boys and school girls can buy Olivers by saving their pennies.

You can buy an Oliver on this plan at the regular catalog price—$100. A small first payment brings the machine. Then you save 17 cents a day and pay monthly.

And the possession of an Oliver Typewriter enables you to earn money to finish paying for the machine.

Mechanical Advantages

The Oliver is the most highly perfected typewriter on the market—hence its 100 per cent efficiency.

Among its scores of conveniences are:

- the Balance Shift
- the Ruling Device
- the Double Release
- the Locomotive Base
- the Automatic Spacer
- the Automatic Tabulator
- the Disappearing Indicator
- the Adjustable Paper Fingers
- the Scientific Condensed Keyboard

Service Possibilities

The Oliver Typewriter turns out more work—of better quality and greater variety—than any other writing machine. Simplicity, strength, ease of operation and visibility are the corner stones of its towering supremacy in

- Correspondence
- Card Index Work
- Tabulated Reports
- Follow-up Systems
- Manifolding Service
- Addressing Envelopes
- Working on Ruled Forms
- Cutting Mimeograph Stencils

Can You Spend 17 Cents a Day to Better Advantage than in the Purchase of this Wonderful Machine

Write for Special Easy Payment Proposition or See the Nearest Oliver Agent

The Oliver Typewriter Co., The Oliver Typewriter Building Chicago, Illinois

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

30 Editions Since Publication

It is Only Once in a Decade, not Oftener, that a Really Great Book is Written—this is One

We want you to read Jules Payot's "EDUCATION OF THE WILL," because it is a great book. No matter what your present position in life may be, this book will help you to greater achievement—greater success.

¶ If after reading "The Education of the Will" you tell us that you have not been benefited, have not been inspired to higher, nobler thoughts, have not been clearly directed to a better standard of life, send the book back to us and we will refund the purchase price paid by you.

The author, one of the foremost educators of France, proves that character is not wholly a matter of birth or heredity, but that through the education of the will, character can be formed and developed to the highest degree.

All that is necessary is that one possesses the desire for mental superiority.

No matter how richly endowed you may be mentally you can only go as far as your will will carry you.

If you follow the suggestions in this book you can secure mastery of your will, and that means not only spiritual but worldly supremacy, because your will is the force that drives and directs your faculties; the higher its development, the more profitably you may capitalize your talents.

While the author's thesis is based upon the soundest laws of psychology, the book is written in plain, frank language, unclouded by abstruse scientific terms, and it is easily understood by the ordinary reader.

Every father and mother should insist that their children, from seventeen years of age upward, read this book not only once but several times.

CAUTION—Be sure that it is Payot's book that you buy as there is another book with the same title, but which has no relation to this.

THE EDUCATION OF THE WILL, by Jules Payot, Litt. D., Ph. D., translated from the French by Smith Ely Jelliffe, M. D., Professor Clinical Psychiatry, Fordham University, New York, 12mo, cloth, 450 pages, $1.50; post-paid, $1.60.

Sheldon University Press

Area P. O., Rockefeller, Illinois

“Wasting Energy”

FOUR men, working in the WRONG way, fail to make a sale or convince a prospect, where ONE man, working along principles taught by THE SHELDON SCHOOL would easily succeed. Why?

It isn't MERE energy that sells goods or builds business.

It is knowing HOW TO APPLY the energy and the ability you have, with the LEAST POSSIBLE WASTE, that sets you up above the crowd as a successful man.

The Sheldon School will tell you how to sell MORE goods in LESS time—how to understand and apply those rules which go STRAIGHT to the point and CLINCH the business that other men lose.

Today more than 40,000 “live wires,” the world over, are making EVERY OUNCE of power COUNT because they are SHELDON MEN. If YOU are to succeed, you must grasp NOW the methods that it will take years to learn in the “school of hard knocks,” but which SHELDON teachings will impart to you quickly and easily in your spare time.

Start NOW to learn how you can develop MORE power and MORE salary thru the proper knowledge of how to employ your talents without the waste of energy. Start by asking for the SHELDON Literature, since it COSTS YOU NOTHING.

Simply send your name and address on the coupon herewith and learn how SHELDON METHODS will help you get the most out of your natural energies in your SPARE TIME AT HOME. Mail the coupon AT ONCE!

The Sheldon School

1064 Republic Building,
Chicago, Illinois

The Sheldon School, 1064 Republic Bldg., Chicago

Please send me FREE copy of THE SHELDON BOOK and full information regarding Sheldon Methods.

Name _____

Street _____

City _____ State _____

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

The Sheldon Summer School for 1911

JUST to show you the kind of good times we have at the Sheldon Summer School, here are some pictures taken at the session for 1910.

They show four scenes from the play of "Hiawatha," given by the students of the School on the shores of Lake Eara, on the night of Monday, August 8, 1910.

In addition to the one hundred and fifty students of the School, there were present several hundred guests from Chicago and other near-by cities.

All present declared that the presentation was one of the most beautiful and most impressive they ever had seen.

Plans are now under way for a great musical play, along lines of the Area Philosophy, to be given by the students of the Sheldon Summer School for 1911. The libretto and music will be prepared months in advance, parts will be assigned and sent to students who have enrolled, so that each will have become thoroughly efficient before the session opens on July 1, 1911. All chorus music will be sent to every student who enrolls in time, so that all who desire may take part, at least in the chorus.

We have a great natural, open-air stage and auditorium on the shores of the lake.

This will become a great annual affair.

In addition to the play, at the session of 1910, we had the instruction in man building and business building by Mr. Sheldon and a corps of specialists, we had lectures on business topics by business men and others of national repute, among them Mr. and Mrs. Elbert Hubbard of East Aurora. Mr. Hubbard's lecture appears in this number of THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER.

An even better program is being planned for the session of 1911.

---

---

Now is the time to plan to be there

THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

HIAWATHA'S WOOING

HIAWATHA'S WEDDING

Scenes from Play Given by Students of the Sheldon Summer School on the Shore of Lake Eara, Sheltonhurst,
August 8, 1910

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

DEATH OF MINNEHAHA

CONVERSION OF HIAWATHA

Scenes from Play Given by Students of the Sheldon Summer School on the Shore of Lake Eara, Sheldonhurst,
August 8, 1910

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

The Business Philosopher

A. F. SHELDON, EDITOR

VOLUME VI

OCTOBER, 1910

NUMBER 10

On the Front Porch

Where We Talk Things Over

GOD plays no favorites. His law—natural law—never remits a fine or any other penalty.

Get out of harmony with natural laws of health, and you suffer from disease.

Get out of harmony with natural laws of the intellect and you suffer loss of thinking power, memory, and imagination.

Get out of harmony with natural laws of the emotions, and you suffer from moral and spiritual weakness.

Get out of harmony with natural laws of the will, and you suffer from loss of self-control and inaction.

Get out of harmony with the natural laws of success in business, and you suffer from losses and failure.

All this is certain—sure—inevitable. For some, the penalty of violated law may seem to be delayed longer than for others, but it comes along just the same—and with compound interest.

This has been satisfactorily demonstrated, in some way or other, by every man and woman over fifteen years of age that ever lived.

Sometimes it seems to me that humanity's most fascinating gamble is the attempt to beat the laws of God at their own game. Seems as if every fellow thinks that, in some way or other, he can get all the fun of breaking natural law and, at the same time, all the rewards for keeping in harmony with it.

And, in every case, down through all the ages, without a solitary exception in all the annals of the game, law has been the winner. Those who have danced have always paid the fiddler.

I once knew a man who thought that he was an especial favorite of the Almighty. He claimed a great many privileges that were not enjoyed by the rank and file of humanity. One of the fanatical notions that possessed him was that, through a special dispensation of providence, he was above natural law in many ways.

This man embarked upon a business enterprise of considerable magnitude. Good business men among his friends told him that he was violating some of the fundamental laws of commercial success.

His reply was, "I will show you wiseacres that there is one man who can make a success of business squarely in the face of the laws that govern other business enterprises."

For a few years this foolish man appeared to prosper greatly. He was bold and aggressive, and his very cock-sureness and foolhardiness caught the vagrant fancy of the unwary.

At the height of his apparent success, he gleefully remarked, "I told those high-brows that I would show them that there was one man who could snap his fingers in the face of the laws of business and win out."

And in one short year from that time his top-heavy, hollow venture collapsed utterly, carrying the special favorite (?) of God down with it. Not only that, but he paid the penalty of his violation of the laws of health with a long, loathsome, and painful illness. He paid the penalty of violating the laws of confidence and friendship by being deserted by relatives and friends. He died penniless, a ward of reluctant charity, and almost alone.

This is an extreme case. And yet we are all prone to try to delude ourselves into the belief that, somehow or other, an exception will be made in our case if we step over the boundaries "just this once," or "moderately."

But God's bookkeeping is accurate down to the last and least item—and we don't have to wait until Saturday night to get our pay, either.

NOW, OFTENTIMES, when we "get ours," we think of Law as cruel, harsh, remorseless, unfeeling, unseeing, and inexorable.

A husband stands by the bedside of a young wife, dying in terrible agony. She is snatched out of his arms just when he needs her most—just when her beautiful life seems blossoming into its highest nobility and usefulness.

He cries out against the "cruelty" of the blow that has fallen upon her and upon him.

A man works early and late at his business. He puts money, time, strength, brain-power, and a wealth of nervous energy into it. He is honest, earnest, and hopeful. But the day comes when the work of years is swept away, and the good fellow has nothing to show for it.

Unless he is of clear sight and stern fiber, he wails about his "luck." His family weep as they rail at the coldness and hardness of Fortune, fickle jade.

An employe violates the laws of industry, accuracy, and economy of time. He knows that he is violating them. And yet he moans against fate when he is not promoted—or is discharged.

Even those who realize that all these "troubles" are but the result of violated natural laws, sometimes feel that the law is too exacting.

But there is another side to the story.

Natural law imposes its penalty upon the man, woman, or child that violates, it is true, but the resulting pain is educative and corrective.

The child, fascinated by the glamor of the candle's flame, takes it in his hand. Straightway he lets go of it—without anyone telling him to. He howls with pain. His hand is blistered and inflamed. It is sore for several days or weeks. Perhaps a scar is left upon the fair flesh.

Cruel flame, to hurt the baby so!
Is it?

As the result of that burn, the baby learns a wholesome respect for fire that keeps him from crawling into the grate when he learns to creep.

Natural law stings that hand, and stings it hard. But the sting, painful as it is, saves the child's life.

You get stung in business. Costs you a hundred or a thousand dollars. Hurts, doesn't it?

But then, the next time that game is sprung on you, you are wise. And you save five thousand or a hundred thousand dollars—maybe.

You see, I had to stick that maybe in there because there are so many people that do not seem to be satisfied with one severe lesson, but keep coming back for more until the idea finally penetrates their thick skulls.

They are like the cheerful fellow I heard about the other day. He had been poisoning himself with what he fondly supposed was a stimulant, and was "drunk and dressed up." While in this ecstatic condition, he passed a hall where a party was having a dance.

Attracted by the music, our convivial friend wobbled up the stairs. When he arrived at the top, the man at the door, seeing his condition, promptly threw him down. The victim of this rudeness gathered himself up from the pavement, turned about, and again lurched his way up to the lights and music.

"Here, you bum," the fellow at the top gritted through his teeth, "get out of here." And he threw him down the stairs.

Getting up from the sidewalk was a little more painful this time, but the man got up, and muttering, "On with the dance," climbed the stairs a third time—and two of them threw him down hard.

Two more trips he made up and down the stairs. When he landed out in the street for the fifth time, he lay still for several minutes. Then he sat up with a deeply perplexed look on his battered face. Finally he began to smile. And then he struck an open palm with a wavering fist: "I know what's the matter with those people," he crowed, "they don't want me up there."

Of this much you can be certain—if you get a punishment, you needed it to teach you something. Be thankful the lesson was given as lightly as it was. And be sure you learn it.

BUT THERE is something even better than the educative value of the penalty of violated law.

I speak of the rewards for harmony with natural law.

Here again God plays no favorites. The law is just as certain and sure and inevitable in its rewards as it is in its penalties. And if the penalties seem severe, the rewards are great—how great, no man has even yet lived in perfect enough harmony with natural law to find out.

The more nearly man gets in harmony with law, the more closely does he live and work with the infinite forces of the universe.

The power of natural law may be likened to a current—deep, swift and strong.

The man who swims in the direction of that current is carried along with all its sweep and force working in his favor. The man who is not in harmony, who swims across or against the current of law, is battered on the rocks of penalty, carried out of his course, and finally drowned.

Look about you. See what man has done since God placed him on the earth to learn His laws. All human progress has been the result of man's learning what the laws were and then getting into harmony with them.

Great men, great institutions, and great nations have been great in proportion to, and as a reward for, their harmony with natural law.

Great deeds, great inventions and discoveries, great books, great pictures, great movements, and great music have been wrought in obedience to natural law.

In harmony with law, man has developed his powers and qualities from a state of savagery but little above the beast to godlike beauty, stature, vision, and power.

THE LAWS of God, then, are not cruel, heartless, merciless. They are beneficent, nurturing, developing, uplifting, loving. Yes, that's it, loving.

People used to think that the love of the Infinite was shown in His willingness, in certain cases, to suspend or remit penalties, to set aside law, to intervene between the objects of His love and the operation of law.

But this view is no longer held. Seeing how great and how wonderful are the rewards for getting and keeping in harmony with law, we now see that the love of God is shown in the law itself.

Please do not misunderstand me. I am not writing theology here. I have no controversy with any man of any faith. I leave to theologians all discussions as to religious matters. They are not the province of THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER.

I am talking business—talking about the penalties and rewards for the violation of or obedience to natural laws that apply to success in business—and that includes all law relating to the physical, mental, and moral nature of man.

Whatever the source of these laws, whether you call it God, or Nature, or Infinite Spirit, or Infinite Mind, or the Great First Cause, their workings show the intelligence and love of their author.

Why?

Because harmony with them always produces better men and women, better methods, better things in business, better society, better arts, sciences and industries, better nations, and a better race.

What greater right, duty, and privilege has man, then, than to study, experiment, investigate, and classify and correlate until he knows more and more of the laws of nature, and having learned them, to get in line.

Far and away the best prize that life offers is the chance to work hard at work, worth doing.—Theodore Roosevelt

Advertising—Its Relation to Literature, Salesmanship and Life : by Elbert Hubbard

An Address Delivered Before the Sheldon Summer School for 1910, Sheldonhurst, Area, Illinois

Introduction—I wish that every reader of THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER might have had the privilege of being at the Sheldon Summer School during the last week of July and the first week of August. And especially do I wish that you might have been there on Friday, and Saturday, July 29 and 30, the days when Elbert and Alice Hubbard, the Fra and his wife from the Roycrofters, at East Aurora, New York, were there and gave us one of the treats of a lifetime. They came on Friday, and that afternoon the Fra was out on the base ball diamond, playing second base for the Summer School team, who were in contest with the Sheldon Business Normal boys that day. And the boys say that he made a mighty good second baseman, too. Whatever he does, he does well. In the evening, Mr. and Mrs. Hubbard attended the regular camp fire of the Tribe of Area, and we had a short address from the sage of East Aurora. There was singing and the tribesmen gave their peaceful war-whoops. And then we all had an opportunity to grasp the hands of our guests.

On Saturday morning, in the big lecture hall on the second floor of the administration building, Mrs. Hubbard addressed us. I wish that you might have heard her talk. Since most of you couldn't, I am going to let you read it in the November number of THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER. Until you get that, just whet your anticipation by remembering that she won all our hearts.

Following Mrs. Hubbard came her husband, the greatest living writer of the English language. It was the verdict of his audience that he outdid himself. Mrs. Hubbard, who is qualified to judge, says so. He himself said that he never had spoken to an audience that called more powerfully for the best that was in him. Anyhow, he and we spent an hour on the cosmic plane.

And here you have his talk—in cold type, of course, and lacking the Hubbard smile and the fire of the Hubbard presence, but with the clearness and beauty of his thought.—A. F. SHELDON.

MR. SHELDON and Dear Friends:
I am to talk to you a little while on the subject of Advertising.

Advertising in my mind is this: It is the instruction or the education of the people as to who you are, and what you are, and what you have to offer.

I think the world has reached a time when we can afford to admit that we are here on earth. We do not apologize for being here. We are not afraid to use the first personal pronoun.

I believe that modesty is only egotism turned wrong side out.

That man who isn't proud of his business, and who isn't glad he is alive, and who isn't grateful for life isn't much of a man; he's a dead one whether he knows it or not.

The only man who should not advertise is the man who has nothing to offer to the public.

The Basis of Successful Human Service

The one thing that we should all have to advertise is the human service.

We can each do one particular thing. We should be able to do this thing particularly well. We shouldn't do anything that somebody else can do just as well.

Pick out your own game and then you play your game. God never duplicates. No two men are alike. No two leaves in the forest are alike.

There is one thing you can do particularly well, and the bit of human service that you can do is the thing that gives you the most pleasure. And the thing that gives you a pleasure and a satisfaction you should do.

Now, as for myself, there is one thing I can do. I play at a good many different things. I am a Jack of all trades. There is one thing, however, I can do pretty well. I admit this. I do not have to prove it before the University of Copenhagen. I work the Cadmian game. That's my game. I hoe in the garden of letters.

There are twenty-six little letters of the alphabet, little black marks, and six punctuation marks. My business is to arrange these little black marks in a certain way so that I can send to you across the sea, to a man in another country, to Canada, to California, to a man who never saw me. He looks at my arrangement of these little black marks and he is thrilled—sometimes.

You can't thrill everybody. You can only thrill people who are on your wire. All I claim for myself is that I am right part of the time. An executive is a man who decides quickly and is sometimes right. We know men who are dead wrong all the time. But I am right a part of the time.

The Wonderful Invention of Letters

And so I arrange these little Cadmian marks, these little letters of the alphabet so as to thrill a man, to convey a message to that man, to make him see the thing that I do. That is a miraculous thing to me.

One of the greatest inventions, to my mind, I think, is this wonderful proposition that vocal sounds can stand for thought and feeling. It is a miraculous thing that we come to an agreement that a certain sound which I make with my tongue, epiglottis and teeth gives you a certain feeling that makes you think a certain thought.

You see, we had to come to an understanding, otherwise you wouldn't be delighted at all. You wouldn't understand or comprehend anything I would say. That reminds me of a certain great orator down in New York who happened to lose his teeth. It was at a political rally and in an impassioned moment his teeth flew out of his mouth. Someone picked them up and handed them back, but the man never made another speech. He had lost his nerve.

But with these that nature has supplied us with we are able to make certain tones. The next thing is for me to make a little black mark there and have that mark stand for a sound. And this sound stands for a thought. Then the arranging of these little black marks stands for language.

Isn't it a miraculous thing? Can't you understand now how, when only a few people could read and there was only one book, when that book was brought in, there was a sound of music and singing, cymbals and bells and candles, that the people fell in the dust before it?

So, when only a few men could read, they said, "These men are exempt, they are different from the rest of us." And in England, only a few years ago, there was a distinct code for the benefit of the clergy. The clergymen were the clerks who kept the records of the state. They were the men who could read and write.

Business men were accused of murder and other crimes, and when arrested they sometimes claimed the "benefit of the clergy." Clergymen were exempt. They could do no wrong. They were more than men; they were super-men. A clergyman went with the accused to the next room. When they came back, the court said, "Can he read?" The answer might be, "Like a clergyman," which to us would mean that he reads very badly.

Reading is Self-Discovery

But the miracle is that I can take this printed page and read it, although I never saw the man and do not know the man who made the record. When you come to multiply these and send them all over the world, you get what you call literature or the distribution of literature.

So my business is to catch thoughts and ideas that float through our brains. Now, if you understand me and what I write; you are on my wire; and all I do for you is to express for you the things you know, but which perhaps you do not know you know until I tell you.

Now, reading is self-discovery. It's finding out who you are, what you are and what you know. Nobody, at the last, ever tells you anything. You have got it in you or you haven't, and when you read it reminds you what you have. And when you read a page and like the author, you say, "Yes, yes." You mark that thing. It is because that man has expressed for you a thing that is your own.

So wherever you go you are looking for yourself. All you can find in the world is but a reflection of yourself that you throw upon the screen with your cosmic stereopticon, if you please. That's all you see.

You are the thing you hate, as well as the things you love, because you are the thing you can see.

My business is to express for people who are in other businesses. I have followed this thing until it has become a knack, it becomes easy. And so in my dreams I am formulating thoughts.

The idea is this, to formulate the thought in a way so it is easy and natural for the man to understand it, and obvious so he cannot go astray, the greatest number of thoughts in the fewest possible words and still have the thing carry.

How to Write Well

If you want to read well—read "Little Journeys." I didn't say that. Read Victor Hugo, cultivate the Victor Hugo sentence.

First get into a habit of thinking. The first thing is to have a thought and the next thing is to pass it along. Get the habit of thinking. "We all think great thoughts," says Emerson. "Speak your thought today or tomorrow you will take it from another second-hand."

And so our mind has flashes like electric sparks.

Working for us in the Roycroft Shop is a good old fellow by the name of Ala Babi. That isn't his name but we call him that. When I express some thoughts and do not care to attach my name to them, I give him credit. This man is really a good deal of a philosopher. Often working with him in the field I get some very good ideas from him. I always carry a pad wherever I go and a pencil and jot down such things.

You are a kind of Divine storage battery, a multiplex instrument. Here comes an idea as you walk, as you row, as you ride, as you hoe out in the garden. There is where you often get your best ideas. The thing to do is to catch them. So make a note of them. Carry a pad and pencil. Seize the idea and then clothe it in language.

Naturally, if you are out-doors and have something else to do, you will write that just as briefly as you can, and often your best sentences are these you seize out in the open, out in the sunshine. You will find that these things you write down, these short little sentences, are the best things you have. And so, when you start out to write a good thing, you will be slipping these things in. These are the natural things to say.

How Shakespeare, the Business Man, Wrote

I know how Shakespeare wrote because Shakespeare was a man, and he wrote just as you or I will write. The thoughts came to him and he seized upon them. He was a very busy man. He was a business man first and a writer afterwards. He was a business man and he grew rich. His ambition was to grow rich, not to grow great as a literary man. He, of all men, would surely have been amazed if he could have known that his name would go clattering down the annals of time, that he was the greatest man who ever wrote the English tongue.

He was a natural man. Out-doors he would have passed the medicine ball, played ball with you, fished with you, lived with you—a natural man. He clothed natural thoughts that came surging through his mind, and these gave him a great joy and great satisfaction.

As I read Shakespeare I see things that were written out in the open slipping in. And these are the things that you quote. For instance, take that little hing, "The Seven Ages of Man." That has nothing to do with the play. And he had to maneuver around a good deal with what we call flapjack to get that Seven Ages in the play.

The idea is first to have thoughts. You do have thoughts if you love nature. If you work, sleep, eat and have ambition and love, you will have thoughts.

When you advertise, when you write about anything, any man, any place, any event, you advertise. All history is an advertisement of things that happened—perhaps in the man's mind.

There is a difference between truth and fact, you know. Fact is the thing that happened, and truth is the thing that might have happened. And so some history is the thing that happened or didn't happen or might have happened—that's all.

Napoleon put this very bluntly: "What is history but a lie agreed upon?"

The only things that live are the things that are advertised. History is the advertisement of men and things and events. The event does not live, but the account of the thing lives. That's all.

How Some History is Made

Now, Paul Jones never called out that very saucy answer with which he is credited when surrounded by the ships of the enemy on the coast of Scotland. When closing in upon him they called upon him to surrender. You know his answer, a very uncouth remark, but it was this: "Damn your souls to hell, we haven't begun to fight."

Nobody ever heard that answer because there were no stenographers there. But somebody put those words into the mouth of Paul Jones and they have gone ringing down the centuries and have given courage to millions of faint-hearted when they were just about ready to give up. When a man sees nothing to fight for, when surrounded on all sides by an overwhelming force, these words of Paul Jones come to him and he says, "We haven't begun to fight." And so he takes courage and snatches success from the jaws of defeat.

Now, it was a poet who put Paul Revere in the saddle, set the steed a galloping and sent this man clattering up to Concord from Boston, with his cry "at every Middlesex village and farm." Nobody knows whether he could ride a horse or not. He was an engraver and he may have called the patriots up by 'phone, but Paul Revere lives for us because Longfellow wrote of him.

All the names we know in Greek history are the names that were written of by Herodotus, who was the father of history. You only know of the immortal Athens and those immortal thirteen men who lived in the time of Pericles because Herodotus wrote of them.

The years went by, as the years do, and Plutarch, who lived in the flowery times of Rome, picked out of the names of all the men of whom Herodotus wrote. Then he picked the name of a Roman and set opposite each of these names and wrote his parallel lives. All you know of Rome is what Plutarch told you. There is nothing in Rome that interests you anyway but the men and women who lived in Rome.

There is but one thing that is interesting to us, and that is human effort. Everything else is absolutely foreign to us. What did the man do? What did he say? Did he build these buildings? Yes. And there is only one thing that can make soil sacred, and that is the men and women who have trod it. Human interest, I repeat, is the only thing that interests us.

So you will find Plutarch's "Parallel Lives" and all you know of Cæsar and Brutus and the great men of that time is what Plutarch told you.

Along comes Shakespeare. He got hold of a copy of Plutarch's "Parallel Lives" and when he wrote his plays, giving a plot in the time of Rome or Greece, he simply made use of Plutarch. Often he was so busy he used Plutarch's exact words, not having time to formulate any of his own. Possibly Plutarch said it just as well as he could have said it anyway.

The men who live, the events that live, the things that never die, are the things that are well expressed. We are only here for a day—sent into life without our permission, sent out without our will; but literature lives on and on forever. Pass it along, on, on, on and on—the account of the event.

Literature is Advertising—Good Advertising, Literature

I do not differentiate between literature and advertising. I did once. People said, "If you write advertisements you will lose your dignity." I thought at one time that would be a great calamity, because at one time that was all I had, that was my chief asset. Now, I hope I have something else.

You know there are people who differentiate between educated and uneducated people, people who know the classes and people who don't know the classes, good people and bad people, "saved" people and "lost" people. I used to believe that. You did, too. There are people yet who talk about the saved and the lost just as if there ever was a man good enough to say that another man was wholly bad. Men are not good or bad; men are good and bad.

In the little village where I live, if I want to borrow any article I go to a man whom some people might say is lost just as quickly as I would to one whom they say is saved. He will go to heaven just as quick as the other man. He is just as kind and just as generous. This man who is going to heaven—and admits it—may be one who never pays his bills and his wife has to ask him for every thirty cents she wants to spend.

So we have ceased making differentiations, these sharp divisions. I do not differentiate now between literature and advertising. They are all one and the same thing to me.

Frankness in Advertising

Do you remember about twenty-five years ago of the ads that started out with an interesting anecdote and finally led you down to Hostetter's Bitters at the bottom and always gave you a jolt, you know. But that kind of advertising is getting out of vogue. It was a great thing in its day, but it had some very great objections. The thing at the last was not pleasant. You were disappointed, and sometimes you thought of it adversely instead of kindly. You were prejudiced against the thing.

So in advertising, you must not do a thing, or say a thing, or use a phrase that will prejudice the reader against you or your proposition.

You know there are people at Christmas time who send you a New York Draft "Payable to bearer, ten thousand good wishes." When you get that draft the color of it brings up hope in your mind, you know, and you are lured on by fond anticipations. And so you feel a sense of curiosity and elation in your mind. What do you say when you get this, "Payable to bearer, ten thousand kisses"? You say, "Oh, hell!" And you chuck the thing into the waste basket. That, to me, is a very foolish kind of advertising.

There has come into vogue a new kind of an advertisement, of which I have had something to do with the launching. But we build upon the past. All that has gone before has made this hour and place possible.

So, remembering the days of my youth, when reading the village weekly, I started one of these very interesting themes and ran up against Hostetter's Bitters, I say, "I will take the best of that idea, but I will not disappoint anybody. Therefore at the top of my articles I will say, 'An advertisement written by Elbert Hubbard.'"

There is a new idea, a frank statement, that this is an advertisement. So you get on good terms with the man at the beginning through your very frankness. There is no attempt at deception, no desire to lead this man and lure him on and then chuck him over the Hostetter cliff. So I say, "An advertisement written by Elbert Hubbard."

The Effect of a Frank Advertisement

Then I make this advertisement just as interesting as I possibly can from start to finish. Then the man begins to read the ad, and when he lays it aside, possibly I have impressed him. I hope so.

I wrote several of these advertisements for the Equitable Life Insurance Company. Mr. Paul Morton is president of that company. He is a western man, born in Nebraska, one of the great men of the world, one of the graduates of the University of Hard Knocks, a man who has gotten an education at his work, through his work. He draws a salary of $50,000 a year, which in itself might not prove him a great man; but the man who had the same position before drew a salary of $100,000.

So I showed this ad that I wrote to Mr. Paul Morton. Being the head of this great institution, with all of its many interests and branches, his work is to get business. He's a salesman. There are two kinds of men in every institution: One man is on the side of expense and the other man is on the side of the income; and salesmanship is siphoning business into the house, and salesmanship is the most important thing in any business.

You will never get salesmanship standardized. You will make your patterns but you will never sell on formula. You have to have men. It is psychology, and the psychology of salesmanship is a fluid something; it is not a crystallized something, and every day you have to begin again and mix common sense, love, health, patience, good cheer into your salesmanship formula.

The big man is always the salesman, and the President of the Equitable Life Insurance Company is a salesman. The thing that interests him most is the advertisement that will interest the new man, because people are always dying and if the company does not get in new men and new business, although they have a great and splendid business, if it does not get in new business, soon it will have no business at all; its work is not only the getting of new risks, but the getting of the highest and best quality of risks possible.

Mr. Paul Morton said to me: "According to the law of averages, one hundred men should have died who held Equitable policies, but only sixty died." But don't you see that this meant money for the institution? He must get in a quantity of risks. He must be making new friends and patrons.

So I read this advertisement for Paul Morton and when I gave it to him he said, "I like that and we will try it." So they sent this advertisement out in many magazines. Some people wrote in and said, "Why do you advertise Elbert Hubbard? Why do you put his name at the top and your name at the bottom? This farmer at East Aurora—where does he come in and where does he get off?"

Mr. Paul Morton looks up every such letter and if he can locate the man and he is anybody at all, Paul Morton sends him a lettergram, which is a telegram of fifty words sent by night at the day rate for ten. He says:

"We have received your kind inquiry as to why we feature the name of Elbert Hubbard. This is receiving our careful attention. I will tell you, one reason we feature him is that you will write to us and ask us why we feature him. Our agent will call on you tomorrow at ten fifteen."

Then he telegraphs to his agent to call on this man. Do you suppose this man can turn him down? No, he has one foot in the door. Do you remember when we used to peddle books? I guess so. Not only has he got one foot in the door, but both feet. He is inside on the sofa. He has got the man at a disadvantage, and this man having opened the interview has to listen to him.

And he may get the application.

I know of one case where they sold a policy for half a million dollars on one of these foolish little advertisements.

An Idea for Life Insurance Advertising

An idea came to me while out horse-back riding that life insurance deals with death. It's an unpleasant idea. That's the reason men do not apply for life insurance, but they will nearly all take fire insurance. You know the building is liable to burn down. All the reasons you can put forth for fire insurance you can put forth for life insurance.

It is simply equalizing the element of chance. There is less chance in large numbers. You do not want to think of this subject of death. What do I say in my advertisement?

I say that life insurance is for the living and that the man with $500,000 on his life is a better man, a healthier man, a saner man, a more useful man; that the very fact that he can get the money to carry $500,000 on his life, that he has been examined by physicians and they have passed him, and that they have also looked up his moral record—I say this man is a better man to his family, he is patient, he is industrious, he is neat, he does not over-eat, he does not over-drink, and he does not smoke more than two cigars at a time.

But I say, "The probabilities are that you cannot get into this class." There I stop. I put this as a privilege. The man begins to look himself over and mark himself, you see, on this chart. It's a great thing to take a good look at yourself every morning in the glass. The argument I put for the Gillette razor is this: You get a good look at yourself in the glass every morning and when you do that you will not blame anybody.

Size yourself up and mark yourself. Mark yourself on health, good cheer, patience, truth, industry, economy, justice to those who cannot enforce a claim against you, love of nature, love of the Infinite, honesty. Mark these things down and mark yourself up when nobody is around. Get a good look at yourself.

You will have to rank way up in order to get $500,000. Almost anybody can get a policy for $5,000. But when you weigh up for a policy of half a million, you want to be sure there is no danger of anybody's putting a dog button in your tea. You have to be on good terms with the woman you love, you have to be on good terms with your creditors. Best of all, you have to be on good terms with yourself—absolute sanity. That means length of days.

Are you a five hundred thousand dollar man? One man who read this ad said, "By God, I will see whether I am or not. I will go you once, Paul Morton." The profit on this one application, the profit on this one policy was enough to pay for all the ads they published.

The idea of this advertisement is to make the ad pleasant and not to force it on the man, but to show him it is a privilege to come in on this proposition and that life insurance is a magnificent thing; not solely to provide for these people who are left, the relatives, if you pass out, something that they will realize, but that you will realize. You realize on your fire insurance without having a fire, because you have a feeling of security. And so I said that a life insurance policy gives a man peace of mind such as a dress that fits in the back gives to a woman.

How a Series of Ads Was Written

And they said, "This is pretty good. You had better write some more."

I said, "All right, I will try it again."

I was going from New York to Buffalo on the train; and I like to write on the train, get the motion of the train. I always carry a pad with me, so I got out my pencil and started to write an ad.

As I wrote that ad, bringing in one thought, another idea came to me. I wrote that idea down very briefly on another sheet.

Never bring in two big ideas in one advertisement. The human mind is limited. So I say, use the Victor Hugo sentence. Make it easy to read. Have one thing in your advertisement, one good point.

Other good thoughts kept coming to me. As you write, others will follow.

The way to have thoughts is to get one and then all the rest come.

So I wrote down twelve points. I finished up one ad. I kept on and before I got through I had twelve ads—caught them all; and two or three of them are pretty fair.

I sent these ads down to New York. They looked them over and said, "These two are strictly bum."

I laid these two away. I took them out after a few days and read them over and thought they were pretty good, and then what did I do? I waited two months and then sent these two ads back. Then the same fellow said, "They are all right." He didn't know that he ever saw them before. He had read them in a certain mood.

And if any fellow has said your stuff is bum, don't believe it for a minute, because he may have been eating two things that are incompatible. He may have had two incompatible events come to him in the same direction at one time. You don't know the conditions under which this man read that. Judge this stuff yourself. Use one idea and use the Victor Hugo sentence.

Why I Wrote the Standard Oil Company Booklet

Now, Mr. Archbold; of the Standard Oil Company, read these ads I wrote for the Equitable.

I know Mr. Archbold quite well.

He sends a message up to East Aurora, "When you are up in New York I wish you would drop in and see us at 26 Broadway."

So I went to 26 Broadway to see him. He said, "Do you know there are people in the United States who don't appreciate the Standard Oil Co. There are people who have a wrong idea about us."

I said, "A woman wrote a book about you, didn't she?"

"Yes, Ida Tarbel—and she tarred us pretty well. She wrote lots of things about us that were not true."

I said, "Possibly they were true."

He said, "Don't get gay."

I said, "She was your advertising agency. She was your plenipotentiary."

He said, "I don't know what you are getting at, but she wrote a book about us. That book is in every library in the United States, and if any youngster, sophomore or high school graduate wants to write an essay on the Standard Oil they give him that book. Then he gets his facts out of that book and stands up there and reads that to five hundred people, a graduating essay on the Standard Oil Co. written by a woman, and an old maid." (I don't like the word, but he used it.) "A mere woman whose father's wheelbarrow was run over by a Standard Oil Co. tank wagon. She has a personal grudge against the Standard Oil and she has never forgiven us."

I said, "You should have begun advertising so as to have neutralized this vituperation. You should have told who you are and what you are and overcome the effects of Ida Tarbel's book."

He said, "We have all the business we want."

I said, "That's no reason for not advertising."

He said, "Will you write a little book about the Standard Oil?"

I said, "I will—for a consideration."

And, do you know, I had read Ida Tarbel's book and was prejudiced against the Standard Oil, although I knew Mr. Archbold—a little, simple, and as hard-working a man as I had ever met. I found that each and every one of the men who were at the head of that institution were doing the things we would like to do, and I think they have done the things superbly well.

How to Remove Prejudice

To remove the prejudice against them, if possible, through a new kind of advertising, the advertising of a successful institution against whom has grown up a violent prejudice, I studied the situation and found that the things they accuse them of were done in the eighties and not now.

We have a new standard of ethics, because Sheldonism has come into existence since then. Sheldonism is simply an expression of a thought that is in the hearts of a vast number of people. This man Sheldon has given the thought expression. We followers have found he is expressing the idea that is in the minds of everyone.

We didn't know anything about that in the eighties; so in the eighties it was dog eat dog. I guess so.

So when we read Ida Tarbel we learn of things that happened in 1867. She tells what a bad man John D. Rockefeller is;

and, not only that, what a bad man his father was. It takes a thousand pages to recite the crimes of his father. John D. couldn't help it. He didn't choose him.

So, what shall I write?

I said, "I will start in to remove the prejudice in the minds of the people."

If your audience is adverse to you, there is a prejudice against you. You must start in, not by flinging something at them that they will resent, but with something upon which we are all agreed.

So I say in this booklet, "The Standard Oil Company is an American institution. It deals in an American product."

Very true.

"This product is sold in every country in the world except where a country cannot beat the competition and has set up a prohibitive tariff."

You see the old flag flying to the breezes, don't you, and you feel that you are an American? You are glad that there is a good deal of the world that cannot meet Americans on an equality. You feel that we are pretty good people after all. You do not have to prove it. The Americans acknowledge that they are. I use the weak point in American character, that there is nothing outside of America.

I appeal to the prejudice of a man and I have got one under his fifth rib. He feels, "I am a part of the Standard Oil Company that deals in American products and sells its goods the round world over."

And then I go on to say, "It owns 110 steamships. It has 10,000 miles of pipe line and more. It has 25,000 tank wagons. Its agents carry the products that it makes into your house and fill your lamp for you; also sell you a lamp chimney at cost and a wick as well, because the business of this institution is human service."

The man thinks that is pretty good. He goes on reading the whole thing. He reads, "This is the greatest organization in the world with one exception."

When I first wrote that, I mentioned what this exception was, then I said, "I will cut that exception out." So I wrote, "If you do not know what that exception is you wouldn't believe it anyway."

Then the man begins to cast around in his mind, "What is that exception?" And he shows that to his wife or his boy. And if they don't know he is going to ask some one else. So I am getting him right up close to it and he reads on. He says, "There may be some truth in it." He thinks better of the Standard Oil Company; and the next man he hears accusing the Standard Oil Company of things that are base, he says, "You don't know anything about it. I have got a book here. You take this home and read it."

So that little book supplies an argument for a vast number of people who are willing to accept the argument of other individuals.

Bearing of Monism on Business

You have got to advertise. I like the man who came out at the little end of the horn and who seized the horn and blew it forever more. So you have got to state who you are, what you are and what you are trying to do and what you hope to do for the education of the people, for the education of society.

Advertising is a part of salesmanship, and salesmanship is psychology, filling the man with a desire to have the thing that you want him to have.

Business is founded on reciprocity, mutuality, co-operation. You help me and I will help you. We will not be here so very long, and soon death, the kind old nurse, will come and rock us to sleep.

And business now is ethical monism. That is a very foolish expression to use in an advertisement but I use it here because you know what I mean. Monism means oneness.

There is only one thing in the world, and that is Divine energy. And this thing takes a million varied forms. Man is the highest manifestation of this Divine energy.

Monism is a belief in oneness. When you have reached this belief and you have the imagination to put yourself in place of the other man, you feel that to cheat another man is to cheat yourself and to injure another is to injure yourself.

You think of the words of Walt Whitman when he saw the wounded soldier being brought in from the battle field, "I am that man."

You think of the words of John Wesley when he saw a man taken to Tyburn to be hanged. He turned to his friends and said, "But for the grace of God there goes John Wesley."

When you live monism you do not blame people. You have an imagination that puts yourself in the place of the other individual. You will not try to be exempt from the toil and labor and struggles in life but you will meet them.

A Real Hero at Fourteen

I remember, when I was eighteen years of age, being on the plains of Kansas, headed for the West. The prairie schooners were going westward in long lines, with animals, horses and cattle.

On the western borders of Kansas, one hot August afternoon, about the setting of the sun, a prairie schooner drawn by four horses. Down through a buffalo wallow the trail lies; no bridges there. This wallow was worn out by the floods in the spring, and when it became dry and dusty the winds dug it out still deeper. To cross it with a wagon they had to go straight down one side and up the other.

The driver headed his horses for the other side; something caused them to swerve; the wagon toppled; the man leaped from his seat; the hub caught him squarely in the breast.

The horses were stopped.

Several of us leaped from our horses and got him from under the load but the man was dead. His wife and six children were caught in the top of the wagon but were uninjured.

We laid the dead body of the man out on the grass. We did not know what to do.

Somebody said, "We will pitch camp here."

And so we pitched camp there and the sun went down and the stars came out in the sky, and they built a camp fire there. I remember laying my head flat on my saddle.

At the camp fire, twenty, thirty or forty feet away, sat the mother with her oldest boy. The other children were sleeping peacefully, but this oldest boy, a lad of about fourteen, sat there with his mother. At midnight I was awakened by their talk and heard the boy say, "Mother you are wrong."

She said, "We must go back. We cannot go along without Ben."

And I heard the boy say, "Mother we will go on. We know where father was going, what he wanted to do and hoped to do, and we will go on."

And then I fell asleep, and in the morning the sun came up out of the horizon and I was awakened. After breakfast I saw this boy of fourteen get a pick and a shovel out of the wagon and saw him go out on the prairie and dig a grave. Then others went and helped him dig the grave, and we wrapped the dead body with blankets, lashed it around with the lines taken from the wagon, and rolled the body into the grave. We then filled up the grave.

Then I saw the boy take the spade and pat down the grave. I saw him take a slab out of the wagon and mark the initials of his father, the day of his birth and death.

Then I saw him with a jack-knife cut out these letters, saw him take that slab, place it at the head of the grave. Then I saw him hitch up those four horses, saw him help his little brothers and sisters up into the wagon, saw him climb up to the seat in front, saw him with his strong bony hands gather up the lines. Then he got them all in one hand, swung the whip into the air, gave the word of command and swung the horses to the West and to the West they went.

And at night when we again pitched camp, I looked at that boy. He had become a man between the rising of the sun and its setting. He had assumed a man's responsibility. He had made a decision. He had decided what he would do and he did it. He did not run away from difficulty, hardship or privation. Perhaps he did not know what he was doing; sure he did not, but what a hero that boy was!

That is just what we should do when we meet difficulties. We should work our way through difficulties, trials and obstacles. And work is not work.

We find life good.

We are glad that we are here.

We are monists.

We believe in the Divine Intelligence that holds us in the hollow of His hands. God is with us now.

We are unafraid.

We will live our lives.

We will do our work, and when we pass from this plane to another we know that the Power that cares for us here will not desert us in the end.

After the address, there was applause prolonged for many minutes, until Mr. Hubbard rose and said:

I want to say that it has been a great pleasure and great satisfaction to Mrs. Hubbard and myself to be with you, to have the privilege of speaking to you and of looking into your bright, healthy, brown faces; to meet strong and able, hopeful men and women, self-supporting men and women, men and women who will make the world better.

I congratulate you that you are here in this beautiful place, that you have the help and encouragement of our dear friend, Mr. Sheldon, who has taught me and so many other people so many things.

It is good to be here, and I am glad I am here. I will remember you long. God bless you all.

The work habit is a sieve that separates the dreamer from the doer.

—HARRY LAHR

“Keep Your Eye on the Job Ahead”— Good Business Policy : by E. N. Ferden

ONE of the largest Bell Telephone companies in the country recently sent around a notice to all its employes that the company wanted every person in its employ to keep his eye on the job ahead.

The job ahead!

The company did not expect that any employe would neglect his own duties to study those of the man ahead, but it did expect those who desired promotion to get a general idea of the higher man's duties, so that when promotion was necessary there would be people at least partly prepared to move up. And parenthetically the company remarked that it didn't want anybody on its pay-roll who didn't desire to move up.

That company has gumption. What a contrast to the methods of a great many corporations whose watchword is: "Secrecy. Let no man know any more than is needed to enable him to do his work!"

The very thought of allowing employes to study the man ahead is enough to send cold shivers down the spines of hundreds of "astute" business men.

To them such a policy is nothing less than business suicide. It is granted that there are some businesses whose practices are so devious that secrecy is essential. But this is not true of most business.

The Responsibilities of Employers

Executives are always complaining of the lack of interest shown by employes. "They are machines," declare the employers. They are, and these same employers have made them so.

The man who works like a machine, without interest in his work, never does as much work or as good work as the fellow who is able to put a little life into his duties.

How different the course of other corporations! The writer has in mind one of the biggest combines in the West. It operates factories in half a dozen states and turns out a good product.

In the main office of the company there is a young fellow about twenty-eight or nine who is getting $140 a month now. Two years ago he got $12 a week. He had worked in one of the plant offices in a little country town as a minor clerk at $8 or $10 a week. He sought and got a minor job in the main office at a dollar or two advance. He wanted to get into the big city.

As he worked along from day to day a thought took root. It was that by paying attention to routing shipments and other details of shipping the company might save thousands every year.

He considered it from every angle until he was sure that he was right. But without access to other departments he could not tell just the figures. Timidly he approached the head man and explained that he had a plan that would save the company thousands of dollars, but before telling it he wanted to be able to say exactly. In order to do this he would like such and such data.

Now, in hundreds of concerns—the secretive kind—the young man would have been met with curt refusal and the admonition that he tend to his own work if he wanted to keep his job.

But this one is a red-blooded trust. The man got the figures, worked out the details of his plan, and when he submitted them there were no holes in his scheme.

"You're too good for the job you've got," they told him, and gave him one twice as good.

A "Trust" that Capitalized Brain Power

The same trust now has on the road as overseer of the erection and installing of new plants and the dismantling of abandoned ones a man who a few years ago was an ordinary—some said indifferent—machinist at one of the plants. But while other men were taking things easy this man spent nights and Sundays in the shop working out ideas for improvements. One was a new process for blueing steel. He told the company that he had a good thing and he'd like to give them first chance at it, though he had other offers.

The trust said: "We'll buy the process, give you this job for life and a royalty. We need men like you in the business."

It's just the difference between playing the game with good sense and the other way. One company has earnest, interested workers who are looking and striving for promotion.

The other accumulates a lot of listless, careless employees who say: "What's the use of working any harder than is necessary to keep my job." And if you've ever employed many people you know how fine employees can draw the line between working and being fired.

Secrecy in the employer breeds secrecy in the employee. The worker may not know much of what's going on in the business, but at the same time the boss is ignorant of lots of things he ought to know.

It is a poor rule that won't work both ways.

Metal From the Crucible of Experience

By LOUIS SCHNEIDER

Work Together

THE mere fact that there is "push" in the working force of a firm isn't enough to insure success. One may push and push and still be a clog. The great thing is to push together—team work, if you please.

When I worked on the farm I used to get a deal of amusement and instruction out of watching the antics of partners in various firms of the genus Scarabee, commonly known to the vulgar herd, of which I'm proud to be a member, as "tumble-bugs."

That there is "push" about the partners no one who knows anything at all about their habits will deny. They simply stand on their heads and push with every available pedal extremity. And so long as they work together they make headway. But if, as is often the case, when nearing the top of a long, hard slope, they get it into their individual heads that each alone knows better than the two together, and so walk out on opposite sides to register their respective kicks against the methods that have brought them in sight of the top, then their little world is bound to go "spinning down the ringing grooves of change," and it won't be a change for the better, either. They are both certain to lose.

Consider then the lesson to be learned from the humble tumble-bug.

If you are partners, for heaven's sake, be partners! But if you must fight, why, place your bets on the participants in the next heavy-weight slugging match, and let them fight it out for you. And then, when it's settled, clasp hands and work together, as partners should.

And don't think that just because you are a clerk, and working for day's wages, that this doesn't apply to you. The fact is, it applies to you more than to anyone else.

The men who have their money invested in the business can fight it out among themselves, and the fellow who gets whipped, if he doesn't want to "get in line," as Fra Elbertus says, can "get out" and start a business on his own hook. If they can really afford to fight, very likely it won't hurt either of them very much.

But you've got your whole future invested in the business. You've still got your pile to make. And believe me, you'll never make it unless you, your fellow-clerks, and the firm get the habit of working together.

The Missing Word

I once knew a salesman, the owner of his own business, of whom I had heard it said, "He can come nearer selling nothing than any man you ever saw."

Well, one day, out of pure curiosity, I watched his tactics. He had a good presence, and he knew his goods fairly well, but if any clerk in his employ had made concessions to the purchaser in the way of added incidental equipment, and had cut prices the way he himself did, it's ten to one that he would have fired that clerk instantan.

I went back to the fellow who had told me about the man's wonderful salesmanship.

"Say! About V——," said I, "You left out a word when you told me about him."

"How's that?" queried he.

"Well," said I, "you should have said, 'He can come nearer selling for nothing than any man you ever saw.'"

How about it? Are you guilty?

Sales Shots

Prove quality and service and your price will take care of itself.

Pull together. One balker will spoil even a "twenty-mule-team."

Refuse, absolutely, to recognize the word "impossible."

Remember—a squeezed dollar never expands.

Blow your horn! It's only the dead ones that don't care whether anyone takes any notice of 'em.

Forget the term, "Head-work." If you don't it's you for the scrap-pile. If you will only put your heart into your work you will keep sweet and sane, and the head-work will take excellently good care of itself.

Regarding that matter of getting just about what you pay for—I am reminded that the other day a sister sent to a mail-order house for a 4-cent song because she happened to have that much to her credit on the company's books. When it came many of the words and notes were cancelled, correction being made with pen and ink. On the margin were written the words, "Excuse printed errors." On being chaffed about it, she replied, "Well, what could you expect of a 4-cent song?"

Do you get anything out of that?

Scientific salesmanship doesn't consist in selling a man something he wants (any automatic machine can do that), nor yet in selling him something he doesn't want (which would be foolishness), but in selling him something he didn't know he wanted until the salesman, by his convincing sales talk, caused that article to pick up merits, like unto a full-fleeced sheep picking up burs in a dock patch, and the prospect simply had to have it. That's selling.

Again—Scientific salesmanship is the cold-blooded science of persuading the customer into exchanging his cash for your goods, and persuading him in such a warm-hearted, benefit-aforethought manner that both you and he will ever after be heartily and sincerely glad you met.

Misleading Copy

By E. C. Patterson, Advertising Manager of Collier's Weekly

IN THE various bulletins which I have published during the past twelve months there have been several that have touched on exaggerated and misleading statements as one of the abuses of advertising.

For my own part I believe that a certain allowance should always be made for an advertiser's natural enthusiasm and belief in his own goods. Probably most readers make due allowance for this. But there is a point beyond which enthusiasm must not go.

I recall an instance of this that occurred in connection with Collier's something over a year ago. Three different manufacturers, making the same kind of article, each ordered a full page advertisement in the same issue. When the three pieces of copy came in, our young man who has that in charge discovered that each of the three claimed its product to be superior to any other in the market, and attacked all others as "imitations." It was a plain case of the pot calling the kettle black.

We simply had to tell those three advertisers that we should have to so edit the copy that these exaggerated statements would be eliminated. Collier's could not put before its readers three statements of which two must necessarily be untrue.

Two of the manufacturers agreed to this and the copy was changed. The third notified us, just as we were closing our forms, that if we did not run the copy as submitted the page would be canceled. This was embarrassing, more on account of the make-up of the issue than the loss of the $1,600, but we could do nothing but stand firm.

A fundamental policy and principle is worth more than a page of advertising. This is what we told the advertiser and he did not cancel his order—the copy was changed and the page was run.

The Song the Steel Rail Sings to the Wheel

By A. ST. P. REYNOLDS

Click-click, click-click, is the song of the wheel,
Hurrying over the ribbons of steel,
Telling the fireman, scanning the dial,
The limited's eating up mile after mile,
Promising rest when the journey's run
And the panting mogul's stunt is done.

Click-click, click-click, the magnate starts,
For his fevered ear pressed the cooling pane
And the metal click of the steel on rail
Rouses his jaded senses again;
Awake again to the numbing fact,
The market's tumbling, he's hurrying back.

'Tis the click of the wheel on the good long rail
That lures the drummer after the sale,
After the sale, then on again,
He's our errant knight and his steed's the train.
To the lulling clicks his musings yield,
And he dreams of the tilt on a hard won field.

Back in the smoker, his soul on the rack,
As the clicking wheels hurry over the track,
Sits the fleeing teller, haggard and white.
Staring wide-eyed through the murky night,
On his ears fall the clicks that seem a sign
Of other clicks flashed over the line,
Clicks that race him, clicks that harry,
That tell of the sleuth-hounds a-hunting the quarry.

Up in the diner, the bride and groom
(Groom rhymes bully with honey-moon)
Running from Pa (just like Pa'd care!)
Joy riding reckless at Hymen's snare.
They ken no click that follows the wheel,
O'er the slender ribbon of shining steel.

But the click-click-click sings busily on Till the panting mogul's stunt is done
And it calls to duty, it warns of woe
It sings of joys and business, too.
Next time, lend ear to the click of the wheel,
On the good long rail of Bessemer steel.

Fleishman, "The Want Ad Man," and His "Little Talks" : by Arthur W. Newcomb

NOW it isn't every lad under thirty that has attained prominence—through successful work—in three distinct fields. But Jerome P. Fleishman, "The Want Ad Man" of the "Baltimore Sun" has done just that—and more—so this is to tell you something about him.

So that there shall be no misunderstanding about this, I will explain, right here at the beginning, why I am writing about this innocent youth.

In the first place, his modesty has stood in the way of his garnering most of the bouquets that ought to be tossed at his feet. In the second place, if some other young men—of all ages—do not learn something about how to succeed from this story, I shall have written mighty poor stuff about a mighty good subject.

In the third place, I want to show you some of the gingery "Little Talks" about classified advertising that Fleishman has been running in the "Sun." Not a mother's son—or daughter—of you but can learn something of value from these same talks.

Fleishman the Poet

Now that's understood, and we are all settled, nice and comfortable, let me tell you about a number of bits of rhymed verse that began to appear in the Baltimore papers some few years ago. They were bright, cheery, optimistic, full of rhythm and music, so they caught on. Other papers all over the country began to take notice of them and reprint them.

Then it was that the friends of the young secretary to the president of a big cotton duck industry in Baltimore began to have fears for him. They thought they could look a few years into the future and see him with long hair, a Roycroft tie, big, yearning eyes, and a pale, wan smile. Because, really, all jesting aside, the poetry was good.

That was Fleishman. And the verse was the first of the three distinctions he won. Also, it led him to the two that followed. Its excellence attracted the attention of one of the editors of the "Baltimore News," who saw promise in the young poet and cultivated his friendship. This led to Fleishman's appointment as private secretary to Mr. Charles H. Grasty, then the proprietor of the "News"—himself a newspaper man of rare quality.

Right then and there Jerry reformed, and since then he has written no more poetry. But some day he may break out again. Here's hoping!

But the man had to have an avocation. He is one of those rare mortals—even in this age of go—that have energy plus. He earned his living by his secretaryship—he got his fun by studying the newspaper game from every angle.

In the course of his rambles about the "News" office, Fleishman discovered the composing room. Here was fascination. Types, borders, ornaments, inks, and white paper! Did I say that Jerry quit writing poems? Forget it. He only changed the medium of expression a little, and began to compose poems in line, color, arrangement, and symmetry.

JEROME P. FLEISHMAN

Oh no, he didn't do this the first day his cherubic countenance lighted up the composing room from proof desk to hell box.

Before he got so he could see an advertisement in all its beauty with his mind's eye before the scratch of a pencil or the click of a type, he nearly drove the foreman, the comps, and the devil to homicide.

But he found out what he wanted to know.

After that, when he wrote his hieroglyphics on the margin of a piece of advertising copy, he knew just how that ad was going to look when the paper came off the press—if instructions were followed.

Well, as Elbert Hubbard says, "Heaven is all in getting there. When you sit down to enjoy it, it becomes hell."

It was a lot of fun to acquire this knowledge, knack, and skill. But when he had it, Jerry wasn't satisfied. He began to reach out for more.

Fleishman the Advertising Expert

So it was that he took up the study of the classified or want advertisements. Little things, these, but more potent than the average man dreams. Jerry Fleishman found them a most illuminating subject of study. And then he did his duty to the rest of us by illuminating the subject for us in a series of some fifty-odd preachments—or rather teachments—on the subject, in the "Baltimore News." In these he took up, one after another, the various classifications and showed how ads under them might be written so as to get results. While the copy for these articles was rather formal instead of the gingery style that Fleishman developed later, the display and lay-out was so strong and got so much attention that this kind of advertising in the "News" soon began to creep up. Then it came up in long strides, until even the Fleishman modesty had to admit that the growth was more than natural and normal.

Fleishman the Reporter

Once more, however, Fleishman's cosmic urge began to get behind and push. He had definitely arrived in his want ad talks for the "News,"

LITTLE TALKS

No. 24.

"GOOD advertising isn't noise. It is desire-creating salesmanship. Do you want to know whether you have written a good ad? Then ask yourself this question: 'Have I and anything that will make the other fellows WANT what I have advertised?'"

◀ The President of the Advertising Club of Baltimore delivered himself of the above tit of wisdom in the course of one of the many little talks on the subject of advertising that he and I have had at various times.

◀ This man, who is the executive head of an aggregation of the city's brainiest producers of advertising "copy," is as full of horse-sense as he is of genius. He is extremely practical—a personification of the sort of practicality that will tear the most effusive and elaborate piece of advertising to pieces with the query, "Will it sell the goods?"

◀ And that, after all, is the supreme test. Advertising is written by or for the man with something that he wants to dispose of to somebody else. The best advertising, regardless of copy critics and art connoisseurs, is that which does what it is intended to do—sells the goods.

◀ I have seen CLASSIFIED, or WANT AD, advertising that contained not a trace of salesmanship. So have you. It is possible to put salesmanship into even a four-line ad. The man who does know how to write a good WANT AD is the man who gets quick and sure results from CLASSIFIED advertising. If you don't know how to make your WANT AD attractive enough to make the other fellows want what you have for sale, get one of the clerks at the business counter of The Sun to help you make it so. He'll do it gladly, and without charge.

◀ Do your part—put some life and enthusiasm and "desire-creating salesmanship" into your WANT AD—and you will discover for yourself the truth of this. SUN WANT ADS GET YOU WHAT YOU WANT.

Le Want-Ad Man

LITTLE TALKS

BY THE WANT-AD MAN

No. 11

THAT street parade that you and I and many thousand other grown up kids "saw this morning" is good advertising. Circus and Wild West shows realize the value of a half-mile or so of variegated Suggestion marching through the principal streets of the town they visit. There are hundreds of folks in Baltimore right now who were lukewarm about going to 101 Ranch until they saw that procession of Indians, cowpunchers, larrikin kings and queens and huckling broncos. And now their Wild West appetites have been whetted, and you couldn't keep them away from the performance with a promise of a private exhibition of the comet's glories.

◀ But your business, Mr. Merchant, can't be advertised like a Circus or a Western Ranch. If you were to put your goods on horseback and parade through the streets, you would probably get the kind of advertising that would introduce you to an officer of the Traffic Squad, and later to a Police Magistrate.

◀ There are thousands of buyers in Baltimore who are lukewarm about you and your business. It is up to you, if you would grow, to interest these people in the goods you wish to sell. You can do that through the classified columns of The Sun. An advertisement in those columns goes straight into the homes of the great purchasing public of Baltimore. The Sun is read more thoroughly than any other Baltimore newspaper, and read by the very people you want to reach.

◀ Mrs. Jones and Mrs. Brown and Mrs. Smith and the little Joneses and Brownies and Smithies stood down there outside my office window last deep this morning to watch that Wild West parade. Their interest in the Wild West business is transient. In a day or two they will have forgotten the cowboys and cowgirls and rough riders. Their interest in your business—if you buy or sell any of the thousand and one commodities of human necessity is lasting—it is permanent, real. YOU CAN KEEP THAT INTEREST KEEN BY TELLING YOUR BUSINESS STORY IN THE CLASSIFIED COLUMNS OF THE SUN. AT A COMPARATIVELY SMALL EXPENSE. AND YOU MAY BE SURE OF THE SORT OF RESPECTFUL ATTENTION THAT BRINGS RESULTS TO THE ADVERTISER WHO SAYS SOMETHING WORTH WHILE.

Le Want-Ad Man

but he could not stand still and plume himself on the results. Meanwhile, Mr. Grasty had sold out the "News," going to St. Paul, where he made a real newspaper of the "Pioneer Press." So Jerry took up a new position in the game of letters. This time he leaped the boundaries and landed in the news field. He was looking for the kind of active newspaper experience that puts a permanent crimp in the souls of all those whose tender psychic vitals are not supported and protected by a backbone of solid masonry. He was given a regular police district, a reporter's star, a pad of paper and a pencil, and the usual city editor's gentle admonition that he was sent out to bring back the information, not excuses.

This was on the "Baltimore Star."

Well, Fleishman never brought back an excuse, which is some distinction for a cub reporter. Besides that, his experience in writing for THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER and other magazines had developed a vein of Attic salt that soon took him out of the ranks. He was made a "special" and given the unusual assignments—everything from fires to scandals. He spent a year on the "Star," and says that it was the bulliest time of his life. I am inclined to think that the press has lost a star news writer because salaries of reporters are so low. Mighty poor economy, that, too, should the inquiry be made of you.

Fleishman the Private Secretary

Along in February, 1910, Mr. Grasty, having sold out his St. Paul enterprises, returned to Baltimore and bought the "Sun." Two months later, he started the afternoon "Sun." Most of his former employes on the "News" flocked back to him. That is the kind of employer he is. Jerry was in the flock. Once more he was private secretary to Mr. Grasty.

Among the hundreds of cranks who are forever trying to get at the head of the "Sun" and tell him how to run it, Fleishman has earned the name of "Mr. Grasty's Watchdog." And Fleishman doesn't care. That title sounds good to him.

All kinds of people, from the rummy who knew Mr. Grasty twenty or thirty years ago and wants to make a touch on the strength of that, to the excited individual who has an imaginary grievance against the paper, help the secretary to keep from getting

LITTLE TALKS BY THE WANT-AD MAN

No. 12

WREITING a good story in a harder-than-easy-to-read, snappy yet well-told style. In three or four or five lines, the case says the you're got to tell your business story, tell it so interestingly and convincingly that it will make an impression on the other fellow and create in him a desire to do what you, the advertiser, want him to do.

Only a few days ago I met a man who appreciates the pulling power of the right kind of a water jet and the usefulness of the other kind. This man is in the paving business, and he needs good water-jets—ones that go from pipe to pipe and will spin around freely. "Will you write an ad for me if I come down to see you?" said he. "Sure," said I, "if you'll read that ad in The Sun." And then, in a spirit of looking for information rather than belief in what I was saying, I said: "But why should you want to take up my time to write a little wisp of?" You can do it yourself! He answered me: "I can do it, but I don't. I've tried it. The kind of work I want to do over the street-sweeping kind of advertising that I write. I'm willing to pay the man who can so word my wisp advertising that it will attract the salesman I want to attract."

☛ That man saw the light. He knows that advertising, even worst in advertising, is something more than a throwing together of words. He has experimented with what a noted writer calls "deadly dull," "lousy literature," and found that it lacks the poignance in persuade.

Now, I do not mean to say that every maker of The Sun with a wiser should employ an advertising man to put that wiser on paper. That is not necessary. Sun wiser are bringing results now — there are hundreds of people in Baltimore who know that from actual test. But what I am aiming at is the elimination of the average advertiser up to the fact that he can put greater pulling power into his copy by getting away from the beaten track and just being human.

"I've read that that horse I mean track sell will find the owner. You can find a good one. You can find just the right apartment. You can secure a position—no less—a nice place to board—you can sell that horse and carriage—you can get into touch with the men who want to sell his automobile— . . . Well, you can find the desire of almost anything that human beings are likely to be interested in through a way in the five great columns of the Sun. You can do that best by putting thought and honest interest into a few advertising lines. The more thought you read than any paper in Baltimore. Your ad in its five great columns is worth of attention. It is up to you, Mr. Advertiser, to turn that attention into something more—SOMETHING THAT WILL CAUSE WHAT YOU HAVE AD-VERTISED TO BEAR FRUIT

The Went-Hall Men

LITTLE TALKS

No. 14

TIMELINESS counts in advertising, perhaps more than it is given credit for.

▲ A week ago today, when nine-tenths of New York's population of several millions were thinking, talking, eating, sleeping, breathing Wiley's Comet, a Bond State company came out in an afternoon p.m.; 7 with three volumes right under dark advertisement, at the top of which there was a remarkably striking black-and-white drawing of a comet, shuddering along over a silhouetted skyline of the city. I venture the guess that not one man or woman who glanced through that newspaper escaped being attracted by that advertisement.

Review the drawing was the line, in neat black-face type

ONCE IN A LIFETIME

But what everybody does not realize is that at present through a man in a lifetime opportunity to make a very profitable real estate investment.

And then, of course, the rest of the ad. told in a brief and interesting way, about the particular lead or sale by that particular company.

☛ If I had a birth date range for sale I would not insert a WANT Ad in The Sun telling about it in the middle of July. With the thermometer flirting around the 100-degree mark people aren't apt to be enthusiastic about stress. Of course, the big national advertiser who spends thousands of dollars in newspapers, magazines, street cars, billboards and so on, knows an epidemic. The cumulative effect of advertising is what he is after. The immediate effect of advertising is what the WANT Ad advertiser is after.

❶ Make your Want Ad timely. Make it human. Put some heart interest into the copy you hand over the newspaper counter. Don't expect a two-line notice on the paper on the number 11 advertising an electric fan for sale to swamp you with eager purchasers. It won't. But if your advertising is tuned to the key of popular need and demand and if that advertising is inserted in the classified columns of The Sun, no power on earth can keep people from being interested and keeping you from profiting.

The Hunt-Ad-Man

sleepy during the day. Only those who have real business with Mr. Grasty get past his watchdog.

But that isn't all Fleishman does.

Fleishman, "The Want Ad Man"

He it is that has created the mysterious personality of the "Sun's" "The Want Ad Man." His "Little Talks" began running, double column measure some months ago. And they show how the stenographer has grown. Their lay-out and display are even stronger than those that built up the classified advertising of the "News," three or four years ago.

But the copy! That is what makes these "Little Talks" distinctive in advertising literature. I reproduce four of them here, so that you can see how he has arranged his display and written his copy. They are worthy the study of any advertiser.

"People want to feel," Jerry told me, "when they read an advertisement, that there is somebody tangible, something real, behind the ad—somebody who can be held responsible. That is the reason for my writing these "Little Talks" in the first person. Into each ad, wherever possible, I weave a news interest, draw an advertising moral from some local or national happening or situation.

"I might say, 'A Sun Want Ad Will Get You What You Want,' and say it in big type. People would read it once or twice, if it happened to be published every day or so, and then pay no further attention to it. What I am striving for is sustained interest. I am trying to make each ad newsy, entertaining, informative. The cumulative effect will be to make the people think of "Sun" want ads when they have that kind of use for printer's ink."

Speaking of the classified ad, Fleishman told me, over the coffee:

Some Effective Points in Classified Advertising

"Perhaps in no department of advertising is there so much need of 'getting yourself into the copy' as in the classified. The average man who wants to employ a cook or buy a gas engine or sell a horse writes a perfunctory little two-line notice, runs it once or twice in a newspaper, and then wonders why the Government doesn't have to build an addition to the postoffice in order to handle the answers to his ad.

"Being a good advertiser is simply being human. If I owned an automobile and wanted to sell that automobile so that, perhaps, I could buy a bigger and better one, it would be a practical waste of money for me to write an ad something like this: 'For Sale—A second-hand automobile; Winton car; seats four. Address The Want Ad Man, Sun Building.' Such an ad would indeed be 'deadly dull.' It does not awaken interest. There is nothing in it to catch and hold the attention of the man who might be looking for that car and lead him to get into touch with me for further details.

"How would I do it? Well, in the first place, I don't own an automobile and am not familiar with the 'talking points' of a car. But, offhand, how would this do? . . . 'I want to sell my Winton car simply because I have purchased a larger one. It is a 1910 model, four-cylinder, 18 horsepower; seats four passengers comfortably; dark green finish; lamps, windshield, hood, etc. In first-class condition. Phone me, or address The Want Ad Man, Sun Building.'

"Yes, that ad would cost a few cents more to insert than the other one, but its chances of getting results are a hundred per cent greater. Crude as it is—for no man can write enthusiastically and compellingly unless he has something to write about—there is yet something human in its frank statement of facts. If I were looking for a second-hand automobile and saw an ad like that, I would instinctively feel that the advertiser was honest and that by getting in touch with him I might find exactly what I was seeking.

"Advertising pays best the advertiser who puts some brains and thought into his copy. The wooden Indian has passed into oblivion as a cigar-store advertisement. The up-to-date cigar dealer shows something more interesting—he depends upon his windows to display attractively the goods he has for sale. Don't make your want ad wooden. Say something. You'll get results."

Get the service value of these "Little Talks." What "The Want Ad Man" is really doing is to give up a quarter page of the "Sun's" valuable advertising space every two or three days, for the purpose of giving his readers a terse and practical course in the science of effective ad writing.

Philanthropic?

Perhaps—Mr. Grasty is in a class by himself in the newspaper world. But, anyhow, the service to the "Sun" readers increases the "Sun" profits.

The greatest discovery in all the annals of business is the discovery of the principle that "he profits most who serves best."

And Fleishman—how has he, not yet thirty, made himself famous as a poet, an advertising expert, and a private secretary?

Just by hard, cheerful, thorough work. He is an absolute crank on thoroughness. The thing that goes through his hands has to be right or it doesn't go on. He told me that he could read his stenographic notes written six years ago as if they were print. His letters and manuscripts are visions of neatness and I might almost say beauty—as refreshing as a drink of cold water after a long day on the desert of sloppy, ill-spelled, poorly arranged, badly spaced, and much-erased typewriting. In Jerry's lexicon there is no such phrase as "Oh, that's good enough."

Personally, Jerry is a big heart-warmer. He has had to fight some big battles against adversity, but he has never lost his smile. He says that there is a silver lining to every cloud—even his—and he is on a hunt for silver.

And a man like that will find it—literally and figuratively.

Thoughts for Workers

By JAMES W. FISK

YOU give a good deal of thought to pleasure to be had after the store or shop closes, but have you ever focused your mind on the hours you spend in your vocation and the possibilities of these hours.

Up in Wisconsin, certain employes in a factory found that by having a fellow workman "punch" their time on the registering clock, they could enjoy a longer midday rest without detection. They worked this scheme turn about very successfully 'till one day the foreman noticed an employe marching past the clock without registering. An investigation followed with the result that a timekeeper was employed to check the arrival of the men.

A merchant in Iowa found that his clerks were growing inattentive and not being able to be constantly in charge of them was obliged to employ a floor manager to see that patrons were well served.

Carelessness on the part of workmen in a factory in one of the New England states was the cause of so many defective parts in the product of the factory that the employment of several inspectors became necessary.

Now, all these costs of supervision eventually come out of the employe's salary. In each of the three cases mentioned, the management was on the eve of raising wages but the additional cost entailed by disloyalty made such an advance impossible.

Possibly the same condition obtains to-day right at your counter or your bench. Possibly you are slated for promotion. In such a case you cannot afford to let any happening of this nature lose you advancement. You can do much to obviate such an event if you will only get the right viewpoint.

Look upon your work as a means of furthering your interests. You are engaged by your employer, but in reality you are working for yourself, and your advancement depends entirely on what you do and how you do it.

Subject yourself to a careful analysis. Ask yourself, "What am I doing that may hinder my advancement? What might I do that would secure promotion?"

In proportion as you make this analysis reveal the exact facts and, having determined your shortcomings, apply the remedy, so will you ascend the ladder of success.

Taking on the Extras of Knowledge and Power to Do Things : by W. H. Tennyson

YOU will remember this paragraph from Mr. Sheldon's talk "On the Front Porch" in the July number of THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER:

"The fact is, there is so much ignorance and laziness still clogging the wheels of progress in the business world that a young man who is willing to take the trouble to develop his qualities of industry, initiative, judgment, memory and imagination, has more opportunities pressed upon him than he can begin to grasp."

This paragraph, and the paragraphs that immediately followed (where, you recall, it was shown that every young man has the same opportunity today that Hugh Chalmers, Melville Mix and others had—the opportunity to work hard and to improve himself) appealed to me with particular force perhaps because I am myself a young man.

Still, the more I think about it, the more I feel that this is all true. Look about you—observe!

Wasn't George H. Lorimer about right when he said that "the great trouble with most young fellows is that they think they have learned all they need to know?" "But," he added, "there's no real limit to the amount of extras a fellow with the right sort of stuff in him will take on without losing his grip." There we have it.

The young man—or, in fact, any man—who profits by his own experiences and the experiences of others, the man who observes and serves, and who aims at all times to improve himself will never need a secret success formula.

The employer of men today demands that a fellow must believe in himself, must believe in the work he does, must be enthusiastic and painstaking in doing it, and must be willing and anxious to learn and to grow. He must be enthusiastic and industrious in his work; he must have initiative; he must have stability of purpose and continuity of effort; he must believe in his ability to accomplish that which he aims to do; and, lastly, he must aim to learn all that he can.

Suppose you look at yourself in the mirror of your achievements; suppose that I look at myself in the mirror of my achievements; what do we see?

This is an age of progress. What our fathers did isn't enough for us today, and we must do more and more in order to attain what the world calls success. The so-called "average" man hasn't the chance in the commercial or professional world today that he once had; for in the march of progress business men realize that the "average man" of today is the failure of tomorrow.

The man who attains success today aims high, has confidence in his ability to do what he starts out to do, and enthusiastically perseveres until he attains his goal, taking time by the way to improve himself at every opportunity. Having attained one goal, he makes that mark a mile-stone and looks higher. To reach the heights, however, he must pass through difficulties, and he must learn something new at every step.

One can't be too well educated in this Twentieth Century.

In the business world today, the first question asked is, "What do you know?" The first injunction is, "Show us what you can do!"

It is more true today than ever that "knowledge is power." The man who knows is he who makes good. Again, I say, one can't be too well educated.

In this age of evolution, for all progress is evolution, it is the fittest that survive. Your business and my business is to see that we are of the fittest; and, in order to be fit, you and I must never let the time come when we feel that we have learned all that we need to know, for "there's no real limit to the amount of extras a fellow with the right sort of stuff in him will take on without losing his grip."

Advertising, Salesmanship, and Public Speaking : by Arthur Bernard Freeman

An Address Delivered Before the Sheldon Business Normal Class of 1910

IN THEIR basic principles and their fundamental laws few divisions of human endeavor are so closely allied as advertising, salesmanship and public speaking. All have as their ultimate end the directing of thought, all seek to change or improve the mental attitude of men toward an idea, a piece of merchandise or a cause, all are subject to the same laws.

It is only in their application that they differ. Advertising might consistently be called a force addressed to the millions through the medium of the printed word; public speaking an address to the thousands through the medium of the platform, and salesmanship a proposition between one or more individuals.

Thus we arrive at a very reasonable classification for these three forces, which leaves us with a splendid basis from which to draw conclusions, make comparisons and gauge actions.

In other words, if you want to reach the millions of men, if yours is a proposition that will thrive best when addressed to the volume of people, advertise, and by advertise we mean everything that goes to make the printing and broadcast circulation of arguments, proofs and reasons in favor of the proposition you wish to advance. If yours is something best adapted to the exclusive thousands, where such thousands can be induced to congregate, employ public speaking. And if it is an individual proposition, then it is the ideal situation for salesmanship.

Proportion Between Numbers Reached and Forcefulness

It is noteworthy that there is a very fine point of equalization between these three divisions. As one of them increases in the numbers reached, it decreases in forcefulness. Thus, while salesmanship reaches only the few, it invariably makes the strongest impression, for salesmanship brings into play all those forces, natural and acquired, that make influence—personal magnetism, the privilege of meeting objections as they arise, the tactful covering over of mistakes, the great personal element, intimate contact with the mind to be persuaded.

On the other hand, public speaking reaches more hearers than personal salesmanship, and while it enjoys some of the advantages of personal influence and other salesmanship qualities, the man on the platform is never as near to his hearers as the man who is face to face.

Advertising, on the other hand, reaches by far the greater majority of "hearers" or readers, but there never can be, and there never has been an advertisement written that could make a stronger impression on any one individual than could a good speaker or a good salesman.

And yet it will be seen how each of these forces partakes of the other; salesmanship is a form of advertising and public speaking; advertising is a form of salesmanship and public address; and public speaking is salesmanship as well as advertising. Each has its place in the business world, each needs the other and it is only when two or more of these forces are working in conjunction that the most good may be expected.

It is not my purpose to devote the time allotted to me merely to point out the sameness between these three propositions, neither is it my endeavor to point out any particular advantage that either of these divisions has over the other. But as an advertiser and a salesman I recently made a close study of public speaking under the direction of Arthur Edward Phillips and immediately saw the close affinity between the three.

All of this has led up to the thought: Sheldon has scientized salesmanship. Phillips, public speaking; and some leader will soon arise to classify and organize the basic principles of advertising. Now, if advertisers and public speakers can learn from the founder of a salesmanship science, why cannot salesman and advertiser learn from the man who has made public speaking science?

I mean to give Phillips credit for most of the ideas that form this paper, and if I fail to do so, please appreciate my intention.

The General Ends of the Three Methods

The objects of a speech, or the general ends, as they are called, are found to be contained in these definitions: Impressiveness, Clearness, Belief, Action and Entertainment. Whatever the topic or the purpose, the end in view will be found under one or a combination of these heads.

When the speaker wishes his audience to feel, impressiveness is the end; when he wishes it merely to see, clearness is the end; when his purpose is to secure acceptance, belief is the end; and when it is his purpose to cause his audience to do, action is the end; while entertainment is the end when mere enjoyment is the purpose.

The Singer Sewing Machine Company advertises its magnificent new tower built in New York, the end is impressiveness that the public may feel the immensity of the institution.

When the Western Union Telegraph Company wants to make the public see the expediency of the night letter service, it merely explains with a view to education, not necessarily urging the reader to go and write a night message, but to understand its purpose should occasion arise. The end is clearness.

When the H. J. Heinz Company advertises the purity and cleanliness of its plant, the fact that it uses no benzoate of soda in its catsup and pickles, and endeavors to create the impression that everything that bears its label can be relied upon as being pure and wholesome—then the end is belief—the aim is the secure belief in their proposition.

When Kellogg's Toasted Corn Flakes tells you to "wink at the grocer," or the mail order man tells you to "mail this coupon at once for the free book," then the end is action.

And when some poor deluded mortal who thinks he knows advertising, puts a funny picture and a cute little joke in a suspender advertisement—the end must be entertainment, for it certainly cannot be selling goods.

Now, in salesmanship, if you'll stop to consider, the purpose of every salesman can be classified in one of these five divisions and in proportion to the way he keeps each of them in mind, will he succeed.

The general end of most salesmen is to bring back the order—action. But, the salesman who gets the order and "that's all," isn't the real salesman.

The man who leaves an impression of the character of his house, who makes clear what the house is doing, who secures belief in the house's reliability, and even he who can entertain the buyer and put him in a favorable state of mind, is more a salesman than the mere order getter.

This is an immense subject that can never be handled in one or even a dozen sittings, but we will have accomplished something at this session if we can get firmly fixed in our minds how to figure out what the general ends of a selling talk or an advertisement are, and how to bring them about in the best and quickest way.

How to Avoid Talking too Much

You have often heard of a salesman talking himself into an order and then out of one; you have often been told of the man who talked himself into a job and then out again. These mistakes can be explained by the fact that the men in question failed to appreciate the general ends of their talks and failed to realize when their point had been made.

As Phillips puts it: "The carefully prepared half-hour effort of many a preacher has been wasted because the burden of his talk was "believe," when what he really desired was action. Already they believed, but they did not do; and every phrase, sentence, paragraph, every argument should have been selected with especial regard to its power to influence the will. Often we find teachers amazed that their students remember so little of the lectures. The fault is usually with the instructor. He has made his subject clear when his duty was to make it not only clear but impressive.

In the same strain, the man above mentioned who talked himself into an order and out again was without doubt trying to get his hearer to understand his article and get him to believe in it, when in fact the hearer already understood and already believed, and was ready to be told to act.

A long winded salesman selling incubators will go to a local retail dealer and give him the kind of "clearness" selling talk that he ought to give a farmer who is buying his first incubator. Consequently he will go over the whole principle of incubation, try to tell all there is to tell about incubators in general, and thus lose the opportunity to talk his real "general ends," namely, belief and action. On the other hand, he might make the mistake of trying to get the novice farmer to believe or act before the proposition had been made clear.

First of all, then, let us dig out the short cuts to Impressiveness, Clearness, Belief, Action and Entertainment.

Reference to Experience

One of the great secrets of success on the speaking platform, according to Phillips, is what he has titled: "Reference to Experience." The more I can enter into your own experience as I talk here now, the more vividly I can connect what I say with what you have already experienced, the stronger my impression will be on you.

Phillips defines reference to experience, as reference to the known. The known is that which the listener has seen, heard, read, felt, believed or done, and which still exists in his consciousness—his stock of knowledge. It embraces all those thoughts, feelings, and happenings that to him are real. Reference to experience then means coming into the listener's life.

A moment's reflection will make clear the importance of this principle. What things are real to us? Of what are we most positive? Those things we have experienced. We know sugar is sweet, vinegar is sour, fire burns, because these things have actually given us those sensations. Our own experience is the standard by which we test the truth or untruth of an assertion. Similarly, it is the means of making the unknown known.

I tell a man, for instance, that I have bought a load of alfalfa. He does not seem to understand. Perceiving this I continue: "Alfalfa is a kind of hay," and at once a reasonable conception of alfalfa is formed. The unintelligible is made intelligible by coming into the listener's experience.

Another important consideration in the use of reference to experience is that it enables the speaker, the salesman or the advertiser to attain his purpose along the right psychological lines—that of allowing the listener or reader to use his own powers. The use of this principle gives the listener or reader the pleasant feeling that he is not driven or cajoled, but that he sees, feels, accepts or does the thing desired of his own free will and through his own processes.

For instance: When my friend entered the house the sky was cloudless. An hour later I come in and say there will be a storm. He contradicts me.

I then tell him that heavy black clouds are rolling up in the west, that flashes of lightning can be seen and that the wind is increasing.

He now agrees with me.

What did I do? I gave him three facts that were like his own experiences in respect to the conditions generally preceding a storm. He came to his own conclusions by means of my reference to his experience.

Suppose I had said: "It's about time for a storm, I feel there will be a storm, or the Farmer's Almanac says so."

He would not have believed me. I would not have touched his experience, but would have tried to force his acceptance of my thought.

If then, the coming into the life of the listener is a means of successful speaking, or advertising, or salesmanship, it logically follows that the more closely the reference touches the life, the greater the effectiveness. The more the speaker brings his idea within the vivid experience of the listener, the more likely will he be to attain his end. The less the speaker brings his idea within the vivid experience of the listener, the less likely will his end be obtained.

Reference to Experience Applied to Clearness

Clearness as already defined means simply seeing. It excludes all emotion, prejudice, opinion, and asks only that the hearer shall understand. To attain clearness the speaker or salesman must refer the listener to that seen thing in his experience that is most nearly an equivalent or most nearly resembles the unseen thing. In brief, show the unseen by the seen, the unknown by the known.

A salesman is selling an automobile to a business man. He tells how his car has made 10,000 miles with an average running expense of less than one-half cent a mile; how the machine in question easily generated a speed of twenty-five miles an hour up a hill with an incline of thirty-five degrees; that it made a trip from Minneapolis to Topeka in one hundred and four hours without a moment's trouble on the way, but, so far, the salesman has not entered into the experience of the prospective buyer. But this is a scientific salesman, who thoroughly appreciates the value of reference to experience when his end is clearness, or in other words, explaining his machine. And he covers up his weak arguments with these:

"Mr. Jones, you say you live in Suburbville and that it is ten miles from your place of business. My machine has an average record of making the distance between your house and your office 1,000 times—think of it! 500 times to work and back; about a year and a half of trips to work—at an average cost per mile of one-half cent. A proposition that will split your railroad fare into quarters, to say nothing of the incidental pleasure and the fact that you have the machine after you get through, ought to appeal to a business man. Another thing, Mr. Jones; my machine will easily carry you up the Main Street hill from Cross Street to Incline Street, which you know is a pretty steep hill, faster than the city ordinance will allow your fastest street car to go; and recently my machine made a trip between two cities, fifty times as far apart as your office and your home, with no stop or trouble."

Reference to Experience Applied to Impressiveness

When the end is impressiveness, the speaker, the salesman or the advertiser aims to have the listener feel. Here, as in the case of clearness, the problem is one of reference to experiences that have resemblance, but with this distinction; in attaining clearness the task was to discover the equivalent most vividly seen, with impressiveness the task is to discover the equivalent most vividly felt.

When the end is impressiveness, the need of the speaker or seller is to liken the matter to be conveyed to those ideas of the listener which have the necessary emotional association.

I am trying to sell insurance, and enlarge on the safety of my company, the value of its payments in case of death, and so on, but, where my end is impressiveness, I have failed to enter into the emotional experience of the listener.

But I say, "A policy in my company will mean that your wife and baby will be able to hold their heads just as high in the event of your death as they do now; that you can make them just as comfortable; that to do so will be fulfilling a duty that every honorable man loves to do. By taking out a policy in a sure company you will earn the gratitude of those you love and the respect of all men."

Here I have entered into the emotional experience of the listener, by likening my proposition to emotions which it is reasonable to believe he has experienced.

The mistake must not be made to infer that I think it stronger to appeal to a man's emotions than to his reason, but on the contrary I mean that while impressiveness must be one of the ends in selling insurance, it is only one of the ends, though few sales can be made without a successful appeal to the emotions.

Reference to Experience in Connection With Belief

As explained before, belief is more than seeing, more than feeling. A socialist may make his system perfectly clear, but we may not accept it; he may dilate upon it so as to arouse our emotion, but we may still deny its wisdom.

A life insurance salesman may make his policy perfectly clear to a prospective purchaser, and even arouse his emotions in connection with insurance in general. But before we accept either the socialism or the insurance we require that he show us that it is like something we already believe.

We might make a proposition clear by resemblances of simple perception, and in the same way prove impressive—but to secure belief in our goods, or our idea, or whatever we are seeking to advance, we must show resemblances of actuality.

Belief, then, demands references to experience that show the thing for which acceptance is sought is like something already accepted as truth—reality. And the most powerful reference will be that accepted actuality which most resembles the thing to be believed.

Suppose I were trying to sell a course in the Sheldon School to a young man in business. To attain my point I might employ all the ends of speech or salesmanship. It would depend a good deal on his attitude. But whatever that may be, belief would be my chief end, unless he already believed in my proposition. Suppose I found him to be a scoffer, who did not believe it were possible to put salesmanship on a scientific basis. Then all my arguments to secure Clearness, Impressiveness, or Action would be like butting up against a stone wall. I might even seek to entertain him, but I wouldn't begin to touch the proper chord until I had settled that belief was the chief end and that I must first accomplish that. If I could persuade him to believe, then, all other things being equal, he would listen and ask for clearness, and act as a natural course.

To secure belief then I would seek to show a resemblance between the Sheldon Course and actual realities in his life. Knowing my purpose and the means to it, is half the game.

Recapitulation

To attain clearness liken the known to the unknown.

To attain impressiveness, liken the unfelt to the felt.

To attain belief liken the unaccepted to the accepted, in every case trying to select from the listener's experience, as best you can, the seen, felt, accepted thing that has the most vivid resemblance.

Clearness will look for resemblance pure and simple, with no bias. Impressiveness will look for resemblance of feeling; belief for resemblance of actuality.

If the average salesman, advertising man or speaker will go over his utterances or writings he will find frequent evidence of the failure to observe laws as I have tried to explain them. Sometimes the fault is the use of material that does not come into the listener's experience; again it is a misplaced resemblance—resemblance of clearness when there should have been a resemblance of impressiveness, resemblance of impressiveness when there should have been resemblance of belief, and so on.

Thus far we have only dealt with the mind; the prospective buyer may understand, may be impressed, may believe in your proposition, but if I am not mistaken when you get back your boss is going to ask, where's the action—the signed order.

Action, according to Phillips, depends upon a proper analysis of the impelling motives, or a study of the various motives which cause men to do certain acts, and the extent to which you bring these motives into play when talking, writing, or selling. In another paper I expect to take up the subject of action, and the impelling motives, and in another one the subject of entertainment, which means more in salesmanship and advertising than the word here implies.

Sell Yourself

By Fred E. Andrews

A GOOD salesman virtually sells himself along with his goods. Start out with a determination to do and say the kindest and most tactful things in the kindest and most tactful way to everyone you meet from the smallest child in the street to the most influential of mankind. This does not mean to be a hypocrite or a freak, but it does mean to cultivate your love, nature and sympathies until you can "love your neighbor as yourself," and treat every man as you yourself would like to be treated.

When you cultivate a habit of this kind it shines out in your personality so strong that it can not be mistaken for sham or hypocrisy.

Man is not meant to live alone. He comes in daily contact with his fellows and the more necessary he is to them the greater is his success in life. For as Sheldon says, "He profits most who serves best."

This is the only foundation on which to build success and he who does not build success builds failure. As Longfellow says, "All are architects of Fate."

So let us build our life's temple by selling ourselves where we are most needed to our fellow men and we shall reap the greatest of rewards, a well rounded, successful life.

What the Prison Reform League Wants to Do and See Done : by Griffith J. Griffith

PERHAPS the question as to what we of the Prison Reform League have in view will be answered best by stating at the outset what we are not seeking. We are not attempting to boost any party, "ism," creed or private interest. We are not endeavoring to inoculate the public with any new philosophy. On the contrary, we conceive ourselves to be severely practical people, who have noted a series of appalling facts and wish to know how they agree with certain principles by which society professes to be guided. We mark the startling difference between theory and fact, we try to bring that difference to the notice of those whom we can reach.

Why Punish Men?

All thinking men and women acknowledge, as it appears to us, that punishment can be justified only by the necessity of protecting society and diminishing, as far as possible, the tendency toward barbarism. Surely that must be conceded; surely if we meet one who avers that deprivation of liberty, the whip, the straight-jacket, the dark cell, the scaffold, are good things in themselves, we instinctively put that person down as a barbarian. Over all this there seems to us no room for argument.

But most people think the admittedly cruel methods employed toward those accused or convicted of crime are justified by the exigencies of the case. They believe society can be protected in no other way; that it is protected in this; that the end justifies the means. This is the precise point at which we join issue with the majority, and we conceive that the question, "Which of us is right," must be of paramount importance to all the ninety millions of whom this great nation is composed.

You talk about a mission! What more important mission can there be than that of puncturing a fatal delusion and putting in its place a vital truth?

The facts are what we want, for on them ultimately the decision must depend.

Admittedly the state acts with great harshness toward the individual. It defends its course by declaring that without such deterrent measures crime would overrun us.

We say the theory is wrong; wrong because the ascertained facts do not bear it out. We add that the public is mistaken when it holds that the general weal can ever be served by subjecting the individual to injustice; and, since this appears to us to be the grand delusion, we pile proof on proof to show that screwing down the safety valve invariably results in ruin. Thus, in our judgment, we have proved beyond all doubt, that capital punishment does not check but (by suggestion and in various other ways detailed in our book, "Crime and Criminals") actually fosters the capital crime of homicide. Some of the leading critics of the country frankly admit that we have proved this to the very hilt, and we say emphatically we have.

The Whole Theory Wrong?

If this be so, we have established a fact of such vital importance that this country cannot continue much longer to ignore it without incurring the most serious misfortune. And surely it is laudable to attempt to save one's country from misfortune. Moreover, the matter grows in gravity when we consider that capital punishment is not an isolated error, but one that colors and falsifies all society's attitude toward crime. We know that the crime problem absorbs an enormous amount of the state's activities; that millions upon millions are spent annually in grappling with it. Obviously, therefore, it is a matter that touches our national existence to the quick.

Now we submit that every judge who passes what is called an "exemplary" sentence in the hope of checking crime; every warden or jailer who excuses brutality toward prisoners with the plea that they have been sent to jail for punishment; every police officer who conceives it to be his role to terrify malefactors by the display or exercise of force, is making the same false argument as that by which the up-holders of things as they seek to justify capital punishment. All these classes, paid by society to protect it against crime, are—in our view—victims of an utterly erroneous philosophy and intensify the very evil they are hired to cure.

The old Roman question, "Who shall guard us from our guardians?" has to be asked again by us and with more emphasis than ever, for the evidence shows that the methods they employ are infinitely worse than useless.

Here then is a pretty quarrel; one of stubborn fact; one that no smooth words can settle.

Either the deterrent policy, exemplified most pronouncedly by capital punishment but permeating our entire treatment of crime and criminals, does actually deter or it does not.

Every tree must be tested by its fruit; the proof of the pudding must be always in the eating. We insist that crime increases under punitive treatment; that brutality toward the individual by society, instead of saving society brings it into increasingly desperate straits. If we are right in this, the authorities, whom society pays so handsomely for alleged protection, are wrong. If we are wrong they are right, and the tighter the screws of repression are turned, the better. It is a quarrel that does not admit of compromise.

What the League Believes

We say that it never pays society to wrong the individual. We say the state wrongs him inexpressibly when it professes to seek his reform and debases him; that murder cannot be abolished or diminished in volume by the state turning murderer; that when the state compels a man to toil for it without remuneration it is itself a thief, and that such is not the way to discourage theft; that if the poor, isolated and therefore helpless, individual has duties toward the all-powerful state, infinitely greater are the duties of that almost omnipotent organization toward the individual. We say that side of the question has been overlooked, and we call attention to it in the very sharpest terms at our command.

Clearly the agitation of this question must cut very deep. Clearly we are calling on a whole nation to revise its thinking. Clearly we cannot hope to win until that thinking has been revised. To bring about that revision seems to us our task, and we are endeavoring to accomplish it by submitting proofs with such ability as we can muster and wherever we can get a hearing. Meanwhile we take much comfort at finding the subject more and more intelligently and widely discussed, and such an address as that delivered by Fred Kohler, chief of police at Cleveland, Ohio, before the recent convention of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, inspires us with the assurance that our dream of today will be the reality of a future far less distant than many may suppose.

Smiles, Five for Five Cents

By William R. Briggs

THE writer saw five, happy, sweet smiles bought for only five cents.

It was on a train from Boston to Providence. The conductor came up the aisle collecting and punching his tickets, as conductors are won't to do. Some kind angel must have lighted on this particular conductor's shoulder, however, and whispered a word to him.

"Dear Mr. Conductor," said the angel (I imagine), "don't you want a real, genuine bargain in smiles this morning?" And the angel was so good at salesmanship that the conductor immediately replied, "Sure, I want a bargain in smiles. I don't see any too many, and I—yes, I surely can use a few in my business."

No sooner said than done. Up goes Mr. Conductor's hand to his coat lapel where a five-cent carnation graced his manly breast. Out it came and into the chubby hand of a sweet, little four-year-old miss, who sat on her mother's knee.

The child smiled!

The mother smiled!

The conductor smiled!

The gentleman back a seat smiled!

The writer smiled!

One smile—two smiles—three smiles—four smiles—five smiles—all for a nickel—five cents—half a dime.

Hush! Perhaps that same little angel wants to whisper to you.

and gives them room in the world of action.

Education cannot be measured by reading lists. It is not a thing of statistics, but of mental and moral stature. It is a thing of manhood and womanhood. It is the educing, the leading forth into power, of mind and body and soul.

It is not the involution of particular facts, but the evolution of personal forces.

College diplomas do not prove that a man is educated. They only show that he has been exposed to it.

There are men who are walking encyclopedias of information, who nevertheless are not educated. There has been no expansion of personal soul, no broad grasp on the practical things of life, no development of vital forces, no unfolding of the man himself, in a large sense.

On the other hand, I have seen men who could not have told you the difference between the Eclogues of Virgil and the backlogs on a country fireplace, who were giants in mental and moral stature—educated men, I call them; men who did not know books, perhaps, but who knew themselves and the world they lived in; men, whose rugged minds grown strong through feeding on their own vigorous thinking, and sucking sustenance from the forces shot all through human experience, gripped hold of the problems of life with that sanctified common sense which much book learning cannot give—and a little may take away—and solved these problems and solved them right. Why? Because they had unfolded as men, and, though they did not know so many things, perhaps, they had the power to use all that they did know—which is education.

No, education is something far different from a dilettante dabbling in book lore. It is more than a certain glibness of speech about things talked over in a class room; more than an ability to chatter in French the things we would not dare say in English.

Do not misunderstand me. Book learning is a good thing, but it becomes education only when it is transmuted into personal force.

The dangerous man in any community, is not, of necessity, the illiterate man, but on the one hand, he is the man whose learning has not developed a soul in his body, and, on the other, the man who knows just enough to tickle his egotism, but not quite enough to appreciate the majestic sweep of his own ignorance.

The Poverty-Misery Tree

By ADELAIDE MONTROSE ROGERS

AREA philosophy is making the chips fly out of the Poverty-Misery tree. It strikes at the cause—false business principles.

Many men think that the way to success is to lie low, to keep things hidden, and to get the best of the other fellow by any means.

The Science of Business Building teaches that confidence is the keystone to success; that the law of mutual benefit is a fundamental law of business success and that "he profits most who serves best."

Philanthropists, great, kind hearted men and women, are working hard to relieve poverty and misery, but their efforts seem like trying to pour money through the small end of a horn of plenty. It falls out faster than they, with all their good intentions, can put it in and carries with it often the self-respect and independence of those whom they are attempting to help.

They are trying to remove effects and the longer they work, the faster is the growth of the almshouses, asylums, hospitals, reform schools, jails and penitentiaries. These places are fast becoming pest houses. The doctors and philanthropists are hesitating long before they will part with a foot of land near their own homes for such purposes.

The roots of this Poverty-Misery tree lie deep in the soil of ignorance. Mr. Sheldon's axe of "He profits most who serves best," is cutting right and left among these roots.

MARSHALL FIELD, who was discharged from a store not many blocks from where I am writing this because, so Deacon Davis said, he would never make a merchant, but who later

Action
the Life of Business

managed to eke out an existence in Chicago, gave us this bit of wisdom: "Successful merchandizing simply means keeping your stocks moving all the time. Action is the life of business."

Yesterday I was talking with a young lady who recently annexed a job as clerk in a department store. Just as though they had no use for money, the managers offered her six dollars a week.

Before she had been there a week, one of the managers came around with a fierce look and asked, "Do you think you are worth $6 to us?"

The poor girl didn't know what was coming. She was about to retreat behind that feminine shield commonly called tears. But the manager, wise in handling women, turned off the tear spigot by saying, "You may not know whether you are worth $6 to us or not, but I know you are not. You are worth $8 to us this week, and, possibly next week or the week after, you'll be worth $10. Now get back to work."

The ordinary clerk in this store is of the typical sapless variety. They are listless, lifeless, without apparent initiative. Also they are not interested. And since they are not interested, they are not interesting.

This new girl came from that region of the country where folks are unashamed to express such wicked feelings as joy and friendliness. She went into that store like a breath of spring. She radiated good nature, willingness, smiles and fearlessness.

When a woman comes in and sees that welcoming face, she makes a bee line for it. It is a magnet—a trade magnet.

Yesterday one of the wealthy women of the town came in to make a minor purchase. As she was about to leave she mentioned that some of these days she wanted to look at some womanly folderol, but that at the time her finances would not permit her to purchase.

"Oh, but it would be a real pleasure to show you our stock, even though you do not want to purchase. Don't you let me show you what we have? It may help you make up your mind."

And all this time the girl was taking down the stock and spreading it out in a way that commanded and held the customer's attention. Finally the customer could not resist making a purchase. And, what is to the point, as she was leaving she met one of the proprietors and said to him, "I want to thank you for having such a fine little girl to wait upon me."

It must also be said that, although this girl has been in the store but a trifle over a week, two department heads have almost come to blows in trying to persuade the managers to add her to one of their departments.

This girl has commanded attention. And this she did because of her Action. She moves like one filled with life. She is spontaneous, hearty, willing and courteous. She doesn't hang back waiting for a customer to come and wake her up, but wears a smile that extends a welcome the length of the store.

Of course this girl will become a department head. She is headed upward. Any employe is headed upward when customers take the trouble to thank employers for that employe's existence in a certain position. Any employe is headed upward who is spontaneous, willing, courteous, possesses initiative, can be depended upon, and manifests all these qualities and others in Action.

These clerks are the ones who enable merchants to obey Marshall Field's advice to keep stocks moving.

The wise employer hires only those who are like this girl, or who, when they cannot be hired, trains those in his employ to increase their efficiency. Money spent in making employes persons of action is money spent to make stocks move quickly.

And, as the master merchant said, success in retailing consists in moving stocks quickly and often.

The Race Not to the Swift

By MILTON BEJACH, in the McCaskey Bulletin

Keep On Keeping On

THE world admires the fellow who is game to the core, the man who, when everything seems dead wrong, still sticks to the game and snatches victory out of the jaws of defeat. The man who is capable of doing this sort of thing may not be a lovable fellow—but you cannot help admiring his nerve.

The men who finally get to the top in the business world are those who keep on keeping on after their nearest competitor has stopped for his second wind and when all the others have decided the goal was not worth the effort.

The great soldiers are those who do the things other mortals would not dream of doing.

The great scientists, Edison, Nicola Tesla, Koch, Pasteur, Curie and a host of others are the ones who kept on keeping on when the rest of the scientific world declared they were chasing rainbows.

I know a man who, after a half dozen others had given up trying to do anything in a certain territory not a thousand miles from the home office, kept on keeping on. He's still keeping on but in a different field.

He made good so hard and strong that the salesmanager decided he would be a good man to help others make good. There are some who do not like him but they cannot help admiring his tenacity of purpose. You may not love a bull dog but you can't help cheering his grit.

Everybody is willing to help the man who keeps on keeping on. But there are no cheers for the quitters, the fellows with a broad streak of ochre running up and down their spines.

The First Law of Business

To forever and eternally keep on hustling, is the way to find success.

To hustle, used in a colloquial way, is to work. And, to work, in plain, every day English is to work in hot weather as well as on the cool days.

Please paste this line somewhere where you can see it every day, or at least every time you think it is too hot to work. Or, you can write, print, paint, stamp, stain, cut, carve, mark or engrave it anywhere you wish, so long as you heed it!

Forever and eternally to keep on hustling is the way to find success.

There's a way to generate ginger. It is by hustling, not by reclining in the shade of a tree with a bottle of the stuff that made Milwaukee famous, close at hand.

Love of Work

I was in a paper mill in the southern part of the state a few days ago. The mill is the largest of its class in America. I was conducted through the plant by the general manager, who is the son of the president and largest stockholder.

The general manager is a young man, about thirty years old at the most. His father is rich enough to give him all the pleasures he wants. He might drive a racing automobile and flirt with chorus girls if he were so inclined and the family fortunes would not suffer.

But this man loves his work. He works twelve hours a day for the pleasure there is in it. His love for his work is evidenced by the fact that several times a day he wades through several inches of water across 26 acres of floor space, plunges in and out of heating and drying rooms where the thermometer registers 150 degrees and lives in a little town, where there is no Great White Way or kindred attractions.

The writer asked him the why and wherefore.

"What the use of doing anything if you don't like it," was the answer. "I wouldn't be here an hour if I didn't love the smell of pulp, old rags and new paper."

Think this over! How long would you work if you were not forced to do so by reason of the fact that your work enables you to live?

You can make a pleasure out of working, out of your work, no matter how dull and monotonous it seems, if you really, earnestly and conscientiously try. And then the quality of your work will be better and you will be better and broader.

If your job ever seems monotonous and unromantic, try loving the business. It will help boost your profits.

Doing Business by Telephone

By Morris Dushoff

THE method of doing business over the telephone entirely is so rarely appreciated and used, that it would be well for business men to look into this method of obtaining business from new people, as well as old.

Many writers preach the advisability of concentration in doing business. Take into serious consideration the remarkable efficiency of the telephone to help concentrate energy and time. Possibly ten times as much can be accomplished with this method in the same time as can be done in the ordinary way of calling on people.

Most people think that the only right and possible way of obtaining business, especially from new patrons, is to be introduced to them and get in a certain way friendly enough with them to inspire their confidence.

I find that in most cases this can be just as well accomplished over the telephone as meeting them personally, when one considers that the only thing the buyer takes into consideration, when approached on a subject of merchandise, is the value you are giving him and the position you are in to deliver the goods.

When a buyer is called up on the telephone, these two points are the things he considers in a hurry, and if your proposition really deserves any consideration, as far as he is concerned, you can get exactly the same encouragement over the telephone as you would by calling on him, if not more, for the reason that he appreciates your respect for his time.

You Are the House

By MORRIS DUSHOFF

MOST salesmen approach a buyer with the comparatively insignificant fact that they are representing a certain firm, instead of making it apparent that they are the firm, that what they say is backed by the whole influence of their house, and that their proposition is really an opportunity for the buyer to compare with other offers he has from other houses. All of this impresses the buyer with his own limitations and makes him appreciate the power of the salesman in the field of his line.

The salesman who possesses sufficient tact to make his firm appreciate the fact that he is a vital part of the producing end of the business, that instead of his livelihood depending on his house, the opposite is apparent, the life of his firm really to an extent depends on him, thereby wins half the battle towards success.

This brings to us the importance of working into the inside developments of the house.

Most of the big opportunities for a salesman are really those that his house as a whole is called upon to take advantage of, and the man who takes an active interest in the welfare of his firm as a whole, is here and there given an opportunity to work out big projects, which if he is sufficiently able to master, converts him from a walking advertisement to a ruling power.

Publicity as a Creative Force in Business —An Address : by E. St. Elmo Lewis

Continued from September Issue

Millions of Profits from Publicity

"Andrew Carnegie and James J. Hill have probably made more money by skillful advertising than any other men in America. In the line of shrewd advertising, as well as knowing how to accumulate millions, they are experts of the highest order.

"For years Mr. Carnegie kept himself and the Carnegie company before the public so effectually that the American people believed that by all odds his concern was far and away the greatest in the country. Very few knew that at the time the steel corporation was formed, another iron and steel company in Pittsburg had an output almost as great as Carnegie's. The world knew all about the Carnegie company, but it didn't know about others.

Carnegie capitalized his reputation and sold to the steel corporation for two or three hundred million dollars more than he could have made had he not for years known and practiced the art of the widest possible publicity. The steel corporation's issue of securities, based in part on the ownership of the Carnegie plant, had less water than many have supposed. It was merely the turning into securities of the tremendous asset of the world-wide reputation of the Carnegie company, and Mr. Carnegie thus capitalized and sold for some hundreds of millions the publicity work which he had carried on for years.

"This was equaled only by Mr. James J. Hill when he was getting ready to sell his iron ore properties in the Lake region. For several years Mr. Hill never lost an opportunity to keep before the public the increasing value of iron ores and the vast quantity which he owned in the Lake region.

"There were many suggestions of the fact that these could not be duplicated at any price and that they would be very cheap at a dollar a ton in the ground, as they might furnish the basis for some independent steel company. Nobody knew very much about these properties, but the public finally came to believe that they were so immensely valuable that they were almost necessary to the existence of the steel corporation.

"When the steel corporation decided to make the purchase of these properties on the basis of about $1 per ton in the ground, thus assuming an obligation of probably $500,000,000, it was regarded as a master stroke by the general public, who knew nothing in the world about ores or about these particular ore properties.

"Like Carnegie, Mr. Hill had capitalized his publicity work to the extent of several hundred million dollars.

"The steel corporation could never have been floated without taking in the Carnegie plant, not so much because of its magnitude as because of the reputation won by Carnegie's magnificent publicity campaign running over many years.

"The steel corporation could never have met public approval in paying such a price for the Hill ore properties if Hill hadn't made the public, by the most skillful work, believe that they were really essential to its welfare.

"The great fortunes of Carnegie and Hill are largely due to the advertising which made possible the capitalization of the public sentiment that they had created about their own enterprises. The creation of such public sentiment, of such widespread knowledge about any section or any business is one of its assets, often more important than the natural resources of the country, or the immediate direct results that follow a broad advertising campaign.

"The railroads of the Pacific coast have learned the facts and act accordingly. The railroads of the South have not learned them and therefore, are not in a position to capitalize public sentiment to the great enrichment of this section.

"If the wonderful story which could be told about Georgia's cotton crop and the millions it will bring this year, could be duplicated in the West, every railroad there would fill every magazine and every paper in America with such stories of cotton and its power for the creation of wealth, of the fact that cotton brings more than twice as much per acre as the wheat and corn of the prairie states, as to draw millions of capital for investment, but southern railroads sit down and say nothing."

Teaching the Key to Advertising Success

You will probably realize that the central principle of this art by which we create business is the teaching principle. We must first educate the man who has the whiskey to sell, teaching him the facts about his markets, which are necessary for him to know in order to get his product to a profitable market; then we must educate the people to whom he expects to sell, in order that after he has put the whiskey in the market, he will have purchasers to take it out.

This seems very simple, but it is very little understood. An American breakfast food concern spent $200,000.00 in advertising its breakfast food in France, a country where the people do not eat a breakfast as we know it.

We endeavor to market goods in South America with English advertising—sell flat last shoes to Spaniards—and one manufacturer tried to sell hard-coal stoves in Oregon.

Such men are practical; they have no imagination; they are not educated; they cannot conceive of a whole nation which does not eat an American breakfast, or a place where a hard-coal stove would be as useless as a fur overcoat in Colon.

At every stage of business development education is required on both the seller's and the buyer's side of the case.

Only within the past five years have bankers seemed to realize that the education of the public was required in order to bring into circulation the dead, inactive money hidden and hoarded in the parlor stove, the old stocking and in the tea caddy in the cupboard. It has been said that one-fifth of our total circulation was "dead" because of lack of confidence in our monetary institutions.

Some banker with a vision saw this condition and evolved a theory that he could educate the people to a greater confidence in banks, by letting them know more about banks and bankers. He had confidence in the people, and he let them see it. He advertised that confidence and created a new business.

The Exploded Dogma of Secrecy

It is an exploded dogma that either the banker, politician or public service corporation, can depend on the confidence born of ignorance, because it suggests that the very people whom you wish to believe in you, you do not believe in. You give your confidence to those whom you trust. The only sure thing is public confidence based on the public's knowledge, or we build on the shifting sands of moods, and the fickle opinions of the ignorant.

Business needs confidence based on conviction.

The politician, too, is learning that. He early found the price of victory and sought to buy it, but he had to learn the value of confidence that could not be bought.

He has worked on the cynic's principle, of "having the price of everything, while knowing the value of nothing."

The public service corporation with a cynical indifference to the public mind, dealt with the minority of a political machine and depended on manufactured sentiment that was false to facts. The public getting tired at last, cleaned house. Now the public wants to know who is responsible for bad service and bribery and double dealing. It will select the man to blame when modesty prevents an official from claiming the honor. The public service corporation is realizing it is more important to have a lobby that elects representatives, than to have one that buys them.

The public service corporations today have discarded the "Public-be-damned" attitude, and through printers ink are endeavoring to meet and guide public sentiment. It is not always as good as it reads, but it is in line with my theme—the creation of new business conditions through advertising.

In 1898, I urged the Republican National Committee that a plain statement of what the leader of the ticket stood for, given over his name, signed in facsimile signature to give it personal force, published in thirty-two of the leading magazines, seventeen of the leading agricultural papers, and seven thousand country weeklies, would do more good than a hundred spellbinders. That was a theory in 1898 which hardheaded, practical politicians could not see, and I am afraid some rather hurt themselves laughing over my absurd proposition.

You know what was done in 1908.

Now the idea is an eminently respectable one because it has been embalmed in the winding sheet of practicability.

Advertising Not Overdone

I am sometimes asked if I do not think advertising is being overdone. I see no signs of advertising being overdone, but I think a lot of it is underdone.

There is not a man before me whose advertising could not be done better than it is at no greater expense than now. Therefore, it cannot be overdone.

On the contrary, we need more of it; we need it in lines it has never touched; we need it to help as a nation as well as individuals.

There will come a time when every city, every state and the nation, itself, will pay men to do this creative work, which will make for a better city, a better state, and a better nation, just as advertising in a business makes for better business. This will come when, at last, the self-evident truth sinks into the reluctant minds of busy men that the conduct of a city, state and nation is a business and not a privilege.

Advertising a City

We see evidence of this at hand.

This club, fostered by you business men, having a pride in your city, is simply an expression of your belief that there is something in the competition of business which politicians and professional dogmatizers are not made to solve. The practical politician wants to keep things quiet—he doesn't want agitation, especially when he is in—he wants to preserve the status quo—all practical politicians are conservatives, because they believe in machines and playing certainties.

That they can't always have their way is good, but we must get used to having their viewpoint urged upon us in all progressive municipal movements that don't provide a lot of $2-a-day jobs for $1-men.

But what you business men of this city want is more people on your streets, more buyers in your stores, more factories, more homes, more contented working men.

What right have you to expect these things? What is there in this city to deserve these things? What spirit is there in this city to get these things?

Give these answers to the world—and tell the millions at your gates. Talk about, of course, and arouse the spirit of the town, but do something. Getting conventions to a city is a good deal like giving a dinner party to a prospective customer—you must be prepared to cash in on the good time you are giving your guest.

It is better to talk to the manufacturers of the country educating them to look upon his city as a good place in which to do business. Remember we don't move factories to, or build new enterprises in, a city because the grass is blue or the scenery restful—there must be business reasons. Detroit is distancing her sister cities because we have organized a sales department and are selling our wares—because we have educated our own people and outsiders to see that "In Detroit—Life is Worth Living."

That success did not happen, but somebody had a theory.

Then it was planned, worked out and is now being executed.

It is winning.

It requires organization, paid brains and experience, and a business man who has the vision of a sales manager and an advertiser, to carry the work forward to its logical development.

Advertising for the National Government

When I think of what a first-class, experienced advertising man could do for the governmental Department of Commerce and Labor, I wonder how it is possible for the business men who have anything to do with the national government to ignore the very palpable inefficiency of its present advertising policy.

This country of ours is a vast corporation in which over 90,000,000 of us are stockholders. We have the greatest resources of any nation of the world. We have more money; we have greater distribution facilities, greater production facilities, greater possibilities of expansion. This Department of Commerce and Labor is our official sales and advertising department for this tremendous corporation, "The American People, Unlimited."

Here is a department in touch, on the one hand, through thousands of agents, with the active wants of the earth, and in touch, on the other hand, with every factory, with every business house in the greatest business nation of the world.

No single house or association of interests could hope to obtain the sales-making material ready to the hand of this department. None could hope to study so carefully and minutely, the demands, the hidden and unknown wants of the world, because here is a corporation not organized for profit, but for the individual benefit of its stockholders, to each according to his needs and powers.

If we stop to think for a moment what could be done towards advertising America and American goods abroad through every consular representative who could handle the educational work in his district according to its needs, teaching the people in an aggressive and consistent way, in the language of a country, true to their racial instincts, what America could sell them and how and when and where—we would create a demand for the American Trade-mark, a prestige that would make it a standard of comparison the world over, and which would bring to our doors the trade that other governments procure for their commerce through diplomacy and standing armies.

Was there ever a greater advertisement than the globe-girdling trip of the battle-ship fleet? We gained new prestige—but we want to cash in on the oratory, the wind-jamming and hand-shaking.

Cash in on Your Popularity

When you send a salesman out on the road, and he comes back and tells you, "Well, I had a great trip; I shook hands with all our customers and all the fellows that are going to buy of us. I think I made a great impression."

That goes—the first time. When he comes in the second time and says, "Well, I have certainly deepened the impression of my first trip. I didn't get very many orders, but I feel sure we are the most popular house in that territory."

You begin to have suspicions.

The third time he comes in and starts to tell you how popular he is. You are very likely to say, "My dear friend, we expect you to be popular, because that is necessary to get business, but incidentally, the real thing we are after is orders. You get one more chance to cash in your popularity."

It seems the sole purpose of the Department of Commerce and Labor is to gather a great many statistics embodying very useful figures, which are carefully published in a great many very dry reports, written and arranged so as to carry the smallest amount of information to the least number of minds.

Utterly lacking in the observance of the journalistic dictum of writing for your people, so they will comprehend and gain something of interesting, enduring value from the reading, the Consular and Trade Reports offer to the trade interests of this country a fair example of what the blind adhesion to bureaucratic precedent can do towards making a thing ineffective.

I submit to you that we could have a publication, illustrated and filled with the very best, latest, most authoritative and suggestive news and articles from all points of the business compass.

We should have matter of a similar character going out to our consular agencies about American business and conditions. They pay more attention to the report that geese are being sold in Prince Edward Island to Boston epicures, than to giving details on the kind of cotton skirting worn by a Chinese coolie, or to the fact that the Japanese government has widened its roads, straightened its bridges, in order to make a place for the automobile in Japanese traveling.

The Ceylon government appropriated thousands of pounds to create a market in America for Ceylon teas. The Swiss Federal Railroad, owned by the Swiss government, is even now carrying on a campaign through our American railroads.

Just as there is this lack of business imagination in the conduct of this department, so there is the same lack in all business where the past alone determines the work of the future.

The Value of the Advertising Club

Advertisers need, in order to obtain the best results, the cooperation of all advertisers. The advertising club is a part of this movement for a greater and closer cooperation. At present it has a local mission in the education of the local merchants to do a greater business, through more consistent advertising and a better organized effort to educate the possible buyer.

We are commencing to understand how much the creation of a big market has to do with the greater human problem of how to cheapen production without grinding the soul out of man, how to pay labor higher and at the same time cheapen the price.

We are endeavoring to determine, as Ruskin says, "As the guides of every effort, some constant, general, and irrefragible laws of right—laws which based upon man's nature, not upon his knowledge—may possess so far the unchangeableness of the one as that neither the increase, nor imperfection of the other, may be able to assault or invalidate them."

When we find these laws, which will come only through experience, interchanged and compared, we may and will find a new prophet like Emerson who will give to this new activity a new name, and by the magic of his pen open up a vista that shall for all time add new worlds to our conscious life.

It is this spirit of cooperation of experience which now makes the granting of credit less of a game of chance, which is bringing an equitable law out of the chaos of freight rates. If we can get advertisers to exchange experiences and thoughts and ideas, making comparisons and deductions, we shall be able to benefit all by setting up certain signs that shall be a warning against the waste of time, the waste of money and the heartbreaks of failure.

The Japanese sent a commission of its most eminent experts and financiers to study the economic conditions of this country, to find what they could buy at a profit and sell to an advantage.

The Germans train their young men in a four years' course in business in the University of Cologne, before they are sent to South America to sell goods, with little or no competition from America.

* * *

Business a Civilizing Force

This life we call business, this great force we call commerce, is the civilizing energy of the race of strong men.

Publicity for profit is the voice of the spirit of the age—and is the spirit in which America was discovered.

Columbus discovered a new world for gold; Hudson opened up a new continent; DeSoto sought the spring of youth that he might sell its secret, and Perry, touching a nation with the magic of business courtesy, awakened it to a new and greater life.

As the evangel of Commerce, advertising has woven bonds of commercial and friendly interest between the hearts and minds of nations who formerly required treaties, wars and the chicane of diplomacy. Advertising has ignored statesmen and governments and sealed pacts of profit with the people direct.

It has done more to make war unprofitable than all the dreadnaughts afloat on the seven seas. While kings and generals have cried for war, their merchants have made treaties of peace, for where millions have been spent making a market, gold will not be spent to make a war.

Publicity Advertising, the Evangel of Commerce

Tariffs have been found futile against it, for advertising has paid the tariff and made the people want the goods it cried—and Canada buys our shoes—Germany admits our machinery. Our own people pay tribute to French dressmakers, milliners and perfumers, to Italian wine growers, because the advertising in every fashion column and on every menu makes our tariff wall a joke and our statesmanship a byword.

Advertising has created wealth, because it has brought new wants into life.

It has made happiness, because it has carried commercial security and profit, and poetry and art into the frontiers of the world.

It has educated people in business morals, for it has brought home to far-flung organizations the law "that he who serves best shall profit most." It has educated the people in liberty, for it has awakened desire in hopeless hearts and armored the weak with the power of the printed word.

It has carried civilization to the ends of the earth, where neither the self-sacrifice of a holy life, nor the bravery of fearless hearts could make an impression on self-interest.

In its practice it is a jealous mistress that calls for the best that any man yet gave to business; but its word shall fire the imagination of man, sound the deeps of his heart and soul, and shall tear him from untroubled ease to give him a vision for which his soul shall hunger until his day is done.

It was the word which flashed across the waters and the desert places that has made new visions stir in the dull and atrophied mind of a Hermit people, until, armed and unafraid, they stand a yellow giant curiously looking over the rim of our western world into the face of a civilization no longer new or strange to them.

Its word flashed into the scurry of London Strand has made Indian Consols jump a point or two, because it has been said that once more Indian shawls shall be the fashion, and a hundred thousand starving Hindoos shall be put to work.

With its word Capital shall buckler its timid soul, and find peace and profit with a people that shall know and trust its vast ambitions.

And finally, clamorous Labor, knocking with its million hands at the gates of "Opportunity," will find advertising to be the magic key that shall fling wide those portals to a work that shall be repaid with the riches of the earth.

How Service Solves the Problem

By C. FIRST JOHNSON

TO OBTAIN what you want you only need to establish your own atonement with the mind of things, and they will draw towards you.

You must work for the advancement of all into more abundant life, since nothing will be taken away from any man or woman and given to you, unless you give to that person more in the way of life than you take away.

God cannot be divided against Himself. He cannot be made to take from one and give to another. He will not decrease one man's opportunity to advance in life in order to increase another man's opportunity to advance in life. He is no respecter of persons and has no favorites. He is equally in all, for all, and at the service of all alike.

There is a great difference, you know, between leaners and lifters. This fact was emphasized in the life of the Servant of servants more than nineteen hundred years ago. Ever since He took His place among the working class and emphasized the rendering of the service that serves; or, in better words, the lifting effort of humanity, it has been hard work for any one of us to find better company than to be associated with those who are working.

It may be urged that the wage system prevents the workers from living full lives, hence they are not in that mental attitude to give their best service. Listen, dear reader, when the workers begin to render the service that serves, if the wage system stands in the way of their advancement it will be changed.

Service cannot become valuable by changing of systems, but systems will be changed by the rendering of valuable service.

The workers who are poor or having a hard time are those who are ignorant, lazy or incompetent. The workers really own the world. They have created it all and they could take possession of it today if they would. All they need to do is to give more in value than they receive, that is rendering the service that serves, and all things will move their way.

Motto: Working to lift and not to lean, I am succeeding.

Teaching Salesmanship in the Department Stores : by Elizabeth M. Bishop

IN ORDER to give the public what it demands, attention, service and value, it has become necessary in the large department stores throughout the country to train the selling force so that they will be able to meet all requirements, intelligently and courteously.

The theory of the progressive merchant today, is to make the vocations offered in the mercantile establishment as well worth while, from a financial standpoint, as an office position. Under the head of educational work in the big stores are many groupings that might be called welfare work, but all tending to the betterment of the salesperson.

The mutual benefit association, recreation room, sixth floor with trained nurse and doctor's services free of charge, a lunch room, an assembly hall, and club room for the boys are only a small fraction of the comforts placed at the disposal of the employee.

The employee's receptive and amiable attitude toward the new features added from time to time to the regular routine of the store's system is proof that they are willing to accept methods that are bound to better their own conditions.

A regular course of instruction in Educational Salesmanship has been found of great benefit in the department stores, to such an extent that it is now part of the store system in many of the big establishments.

The Merchant Meets the Public Through His Salespeople

The merchant must keep in close touch with the buying public through his assistant managers, namely his selling force.

The day has gone by when the merchant, Mr. Gray, meets Miss Brown at the door of his shop; he is represented today by executives who have able assistants to execute and carry out the policies of the store.

John Wanamaker and A. T. Stewart conceived the idea of centralized trade. A large store where one could purchase everything from a pin to a ton of coal was a wonderful achievement. The public were skeptical at first; to think of being able to shop all the morning under one roof and have every need supplied was indeed hard to believe. It meant saving of time, energy and money. A truly great undertaking and one to which the buying public responded quickly when they awakened to the fact that it was a response to the needs of the day.

The progressive merchant knows that his success in the commercial field depends largely upon the confidence he inspires in the public at large.

Beginning of the Educational Movement in Stores

Many methods have been tried to make life more agreeable and worth while in the department stores and at the same time to bring about efficiency.

Folders containing articles on how to get ahead in the department stores have been distributed among the sales people; lectures after the store closed have been held in the recreation hall, where a big crowd of bored employees were disgruntled because, when anxious to get home to fill an engagement they had to remain to hear a long discourse on how to sell more goods each day.

John Wanamaker, the pioneer of the department store, decided to install among his executives an instructor of salesmanship, the object being to elevate salesmanship to the dignity of a profession, thereby encouraging a higher order of intelligence, expediency and greater compensation; to prove that salesmanship could become both an art and a science.

The innovation in the store routine was watched with much interest by many merchants throughout the country. Success came of the efforts.

Willingness to follow the successful man is demonstrated by the followers. The present figures show a total of four large stores in Boston that have educational workers. Many of the progressive Western merchants have found the services of an instructor most valuable.

Some of the Things Taught

The history of the saleslip, its relative uses, the importance of it as a day book to the salesperson, is the primary course of instruction, as used in the class room.

Thoroughly understanding the saleslip is of great value to the new clerk, and the instruction received fits her for her particular department with a general idea as to the responsibility she has assumed as a co-worker in the big store. Many clerks assume more responsibility than they should in their position. This condition is talked about at length showing the evils that come from trying to settle claims, etc., with a customer when the matter should be referred to the floor manager.

The care of stock is one of the subjects most interesting to every employe from the salesperson to the president. The importance of keeping the department neat and attractive, having sizes always filled in and keeping the buyer informed as to a new article called for by the public, are drilled into the employes.

"Nothing must lie idle in a live department." The teachers' method of instruction at a lecture in stock is to make the topic of such interest that the talk will take the form of a discussion where everyone present is urged to join in.

"Service to the customer" is the greatest subject offered to the selling forces.

"Business is founded on service," we tell them, "good business on good service, the best business on the best service. The salesperson who gives the best service is bound to have a large following and an increase in salary. One must gain the good will and confidence of the buying community by good service; otherwise one has no foundation to work upon for future advancement. The merchant depends upon his selling forces to create the impression he wishes to make upon the public.

"Suggestive Salesmanship" brings out how many sales people are only "order takers" and not scientific salespeople. This lecture brings out the fact that one must know about what one is selling in order to talk intelligently.

Many customers depend upon the salesperson entirely when shopping, and the salesperson who is able to suggest to what uses the article can be put and to display an interested manner in carrying through the sale is a salesperson who is bound to get ahead.

Topics of a more advanced nature such as "Salesmanship a Science" and "The Psychology of Salesmanship" are taken up as the classes advance. These talks are to prove that by hard, intelligent preliminary work, selling goods can rank as a science, a vocation that offers an unusual field for the man or woman who is willing to climb up a rather hard and rugged road at first. Great opportunities are held out at the summit for the progressive salesperson. Positions of assistant buyer and eventually merchandise manager, await the proficient.

An up-to-date store in Paris is recognized as a unique establishment, due to the profit sharing methods that have proven a wonderful success. The average sales girl who receives four and five dollars a week has been able to increase her salary to seven and eight dollars a week, all through educational selling, by increasing her stock of talking points, her interest in her customers' welfare and a complete knowledge of her stock.

The purpose of educational instruction in the big store is to raise the wage to such an extent that grammar and high school graduates, instead of flocking to offices where the work is mechanical oftentimes, and the salaries limited can find a vocation awaiting them in the big store. There is no limit to the promotion and the remuneration they can receive if they are willing to work and absorb knowledge with the purpose of preparing for a big opportunity.

Educational salesmanship is only in its infancy, but the progress made at this early age can be seen throughout the country in the growth of the department store.

The Place of the Department Store

The live merchant realizes that the public demands good service, and that training will develop it.

Competition is so great that the merchant's idea in meeting it successfully is to render A1 service. Educational salesmanship is accomplishing many things pertaining to service and selling; demonstrating that more people selling could accomplish more if they attempted more; failure comes to many because they attempt too much, through lack of education and training.

The old adage that "Salesmen are born, not made," at this age is doubted. The qualities required are born in every one, and proper training is all that is needed to cultivate the latent qualities. When salesmanship is mastered it becomes a science, and an employment that holds forth the many chances of unusual advancement of a lucrative nature.

The department store of today stands out as a great monument of business building.

The store offers rest room, information bureau, telephone service, restaurant, post office section and even a booth where you can purchase theatre tickets, and best of all a place to check the baby while you shop. This is all furnished to you as part of the store's service.

The department store of today has been one of the greatest factors in developing the manufactures of the country and the progress is watched with great interest.

The Evil of Dogmatic Advertising

By T. J. McLAUGHLIN

IT IS too bad that common sense cannot be bought by the quart and given to some of the advertisers in this country to make them see the danger of the prevailing advertising dogma.

Figuratively speaking, dogma is the station at the end of the Narrow Street Subway and just as sure as they ride to that destination, just so sure will their project tumble down to decay.

As a race we are not sincere in our search for truth. True, we may have searched diligently for years in an effort to discover the truth, but we finally come across something that we recognized as the truth. Then ever after we were content to look for shingles, as it were, to protect this supposed truth from the weather.

But time did tell.

Truth is afraid of nothing, not even concealment. Truth is most powerful and it will ultimately prevail. We have evidence of this on every hand. For instance, in the pages of the magazines the public is asked such questions as: What's the matter with the Church? What's wrong in politics? Is Socialism practical? and scores of like queries.

And the public, on the other hand, is responding to the issues with logical answers, which goes to prove that they are thinking for themselves.

Here is food for thought for every advertiser in the land. The mental attitude of the public is a receptive one. The psychological moment is here. The times are wrought with opportunities for the man who has the moral courage to print the dark side as well as the bright side of his proposition. In this way he will reach these thinking people and gain their confidence.

Neither precept or discipline is so forcible as example.

Blaze the way.

For instance, don't say all wool when it has a cotton thread. Tell them about the thread, then they will believe the wool story. Remember you cannot pull the wool over their eyes today as you did in the days that are past. They want nothing but the truth and if you cannot afford to tell it—why your proposition as an advertising project will not prosper.

The straws show which way the wind is blowing. Shingles will not shield a faulty proposition. Nothing but a meritorious article can find a market, no matter how much printer's ink you may use. Such is the next page of advertising history. Watch and you will see it come to pass. I have had my say.

"It is of course true that many of the strong masters had deep faults of character, but their faults always show in their work."—John Ruskin.

Who Pays the Fiddler?

I DON'T see why you care," pouted Reggie, Wiggins' kid brother. "If I want to go down the line and see life for myself, what's it to you? I'm doing this."

"But, my tender relative," plodded Wiggins, "those things are wicked. One night in the Stingaree will leave a scar on your soul that all your too-late repentance can't remove."

"Well, what if it does," scoffed the lambkin, "it's my own soul, isn't it? 'Tisn't yours."

"Yes, it's your own soul, Reggie. You will be the one to suffer. You ought to know that it isn't on my own account that I am warning you—it's for your own good. Instead of being resentful toward me, and feeling that I am selfishly looking after my own pleasure in this, you ought to be glad that I take so much interest in you—that I am willing to spend my valuable time and try my patience for your sake."

"Well, my sainted brother, you can just save the rest of your precious time and bestow that holy patience of yours on the training of your scalp-lock—it's sticking straight up—but don't be so darned loving with me. Let me alone. I'm going to have a good time while I am young, all you middle-aged old owls can't stop me."

Reggie Willing to Take the Consequences

"I know that sounds very brave, very fine, and very manly, little one. I can see that you are the very devil of a fellow. Diamond Dick and Bad Bill will look like Sunday school scholars when you get to hitting your pace. But, remember, you will have to pay the fiddler. You can't do that kind of thing and not get your troubles—and plenty of e'm. You'll have to take the consequences. And I'm afraid you don't realize just what the consequences will be."

"Oh, yes I do, my platitudinous brother. I may be a kid, but I've been keeping my eyes open. I know that people get just what is coming to them—and that what comes is pretty hot, sometimes. But I've made my bargain. I know just how much of the gay life I want and just about what it will cost. And I am willing to pay the price without a grumble. When the bill comes in, you will find me settling up without a whimper, like a good sport. I am going into this thing with open eyes. I will take the consequences. So it's nobody's business but my own."

"Well, of course," floundered poor Wiggins, distressed, "if that's the way you look at it, perhaps—maybe—I don't know but—"

"Why of course, Wiggins," Socratic came in, "if he will pay all the bills, and do it with a grin, isn't it his own affair? Even if you are his doting brother, can you live his life for him? If you always think for him, will he give his own thinker enough exercise to make it strong?"

The salad kid looked gratefully at his rescuer. Then he lit a cigarette with true Wigginsonian flourish.

"Well, if there's anything that fatigues me utterly," snorted Wiggins, "it's a cheap, little, cigarette-sucking sport, putting on airs because he is 'bad.' As if self-indulgence and weakness were something to be proud of!"

How a Good Sport Pays Up

"Well, I admire a good sport, don't you, Reggie?" Socratic winked, wickedly.

"You bet your insurance policy," swaggered the youth, blowing out a cloud of smoke. "Mollycoddles don't make a hit with me."

"I like to see a fellow, like Reggie here, who is willing to take a chance now and again—to venture a little in the game of life—and to pay up like a little man when he loses. Isn't that your idea, Reggie?"

"Right O! Have a cigarette, Mr. Socratic?"

"Thanks, Reggie," murmured Socratic, ignoring the box, "I do like to see a man that has the nerve and the manhood to take the gaff, when he gets it, without a whimper—and without trying to shoulder it off upon someone else. Don't you despise a man like young Waddo Scadds—always whining around his father and begging the old man to pay his gambling debts and bar bills?"

"I should say I do," sniffed the lad, flicking the ash off his cigarette and swinging his leg with a careless abandon that was edifying to see.

"If a man wants to go the pace, let him go it while he's young, eh? But let him pay the score himself—all of it. Isn't that right?"

"Hurray for you Socratic! I didn't know you were such a bully old hoss. Come around to Pete's and have a drink."

Reggie Scorns the Welcher

"Don't care if I do, old fel'," swaggered Socratic, sitting solidly in his chair. "Pretty mean man that would make anyone else pay even a part of the price, don't you think, Reggie?"

"A rat-eyed welcher! That's what I'd call him, bugs crawl on him!" scorned Reggie, virtuously.

"Let me see, you studied physics in high school, didn't you?"

"Yep."

"Learned anything about the law of gravitation?"

"Sure thing. Every object in the universe attracts every other object in direct proportion to its mass and inversely as the square of the distance between them."

"Wasn't it with that law in mind that some poet wrote about the winking of the eyelids of the old man sitting in the sunlight affecting the most distant star?"

"Seems to me I have read something of that kind."

"Study political economy?"

"A little."

"What about the effect on the community of the production and use of wealth by any one unit in that community?"

"It has its effect, of course."

"Study physiology and hygiene?"

"Some."

"Know anything about the effect of the health of husband on wife and on children?"

"Good deal in it, I should say."

"Study psychology?"

"Quite a bit."

"Can any member of the community be miserable, melancholy, hopeless, and generally grouchy, or hateful, jealous, spiteful, and foul-minded, without affecting the mental condition of the whole community?"

"Seems not."

"Study philosophy?"

"Oh, a smattering."

"Believe that

'We are but parts of one stupendous whole, Whose body Nature is, and God the soul?'

"Oh, something like that."

"When one member of the 'great stupendous whole' suffers, then, all suffer?"

"Sure."

"Can you take all the consequences of your sporting life, then?"

"By the Hopping Hopkins! That's right! Why, a man couldn't side-step that logic to save his breakfast. You're too smart for me, Mr. Socratic. But you got me to commit myself, and I'm going to show you that I'm a good sport by standing by what I've said. I'm no gum-shoe welcher. And anyhow, I don't want any innocent people helping to pay for my high old times."

"True sporting blood, Reggie! Come on, Wiggins, let's all go out to the ball game."

And as we went, Reggie chucked his Egyptians into the sewer, put his hat on straight, rolled down his trousers, and quietly modified his strut.

Advertising a Service

ALL this rot about service makes me tired," fumed Fussberg, throwing down a magazine he had been reading. "Here is a fellow says that the science of business is the science of service—that he profits most who serves best. Now every man with even half an eye can see that he profits most who looks out for Number One and puts up the biggest bluff."

"Oh, come Fuss, you're bluffing now," objected Dubheimer. "You seem to do your best to serve your patrons, anyhow."

"Present company always excepted, Dub, old man. Look at Jerry Miller. Was there ever a more faithful devotee of the service idea. He lives for nothing else under the sun but to serve Buck M. Eatomm. And yet he has dubbed along on a dinky kid's wages for the last five years. Where do his profits come in? Then there is Penny Gibson—no better man than Jerry. And yet, by pushing himself forward, he is manager over at Kerr Swett's, at a salary five times as large as Jerry's."

"Penny renders more and better service than Jerry, doesn't he?" Socratic wanted to know.

"Well, perhaps he does, but he doesn't have as much of the spirit of service—the idea of losing himself in the interest of his employer."

"Suppose Penny Gibson were to refuse to hold his job as manager, but were to insist upon being put in the shipping room as freight handler, like Jerry. Would he be serving the interests of his employer as well as he does now?"

"No, I suppose not. He's worth more to them where he is. But he pushed himself up there for his own benefit, not because he was particularly keen to serve old Swett."

"Suppose Jerry were to wake up and show Eatomm his true worth, advertise his value a little, let Buck know what a jewel he has in him, and Buck should appoint him manager. Wouldn't Jerry be rendering greater service to his employer than he is now?"

"Yes, I guess so. But he'll never do it unless he gets a little ambition to do something for his own interests."

"Suppose 'Trouble' Toughser were to find some way of bluffing Eatomm into making him manager. Would he be rendering his employer greater service than he does now—doing mediocre work as assistant janitor?"

"No, of course not."

"And in the long run, would he be doing any better for himself?"

"Well, I suppose not."

"If you had a cheap process for making high grade rubber out of coal tar and asphalt, would you be looking out for Number One if you were to make only enough for your own auto tires and garden hose?"

"No."

"Would you be serving others?"

"No, of course not. This is on me, again. I ought to have known better. The interests of employer and employe, of buyer and seller are mutual. The power to serve involves an opportunity to serve. And to get the opportunity to serve, a man must advertise—advertise himself, or his goods, or both."

DEARLY Beloved: The world was made for you. All that has gone before was that you might be. If you desire wealth, it can be yours. If you desire fame, it can be yours. But you must pay the price. Industry is the only coin acceptable at the gate of success. Our Roosevelts, our Carnegies, our Whitmans, our Edisons have bought their way to Glory by hard labor. It's "the only way." The world and all therein is—that you want—is yours, if you pay the price in the free coin of the realm—industry.

GLEN BUCK

Some Random Thoughts on Business Building and Man Building: by A.F. Sheldon

Profit and Service

THE service rendered in quality of goods and excellence of attention in every way to the needs and the good of the patron is what persuades him to become your permanent and profitable patron. So the heart of all business is service.

I know that there are people, even today, who look askance at this idea of service in business and science in salesmanship. But I find that they almost all live in the backwoods. They remind me of the backwoodsman who came into town and for the first time saw the circus. He was able to accept everything as real until he came to the giraffe. He looked it all over, went around and got a rear view and then went outside. When he got out he took a chew of tobacco out of his mouth, threw it on the sidewalk, and said: "Oh, hell! there ain't no such animal."

And there are people today who say, "there ain't no such animal" as scientific salesmanship when it comes to the distributing end of the business.

The Majesty of Natural Law

You can't get away from penalty for the violation of natural law. We have to pay the penalty in the subtraction from the otherwise possible totality of our success. An employe is late in the morning—late again—gets fired.

Hard luck?

Oh, no. Violation of natural law.

Great men and great institutions reflect Nature's law; and Nature is always on time. The astronomer knows that so well that he can focus his telescope at a given point in the heavens and rest with faith, knowing that the planet will be there on time, even though it hasn't been there for one hundred years before.

We as men can't make any of those laws. All we can do is to perceive them as clearly as we can. Then, if we can go a step further and state them clearly, we have a science of success in business, because life and success in it is a matter of eternal law, not luck.

The Salesman and the Credit Man

Credit is that confidence that is reposed in men on account of their character and financial responsibility.

More and more I find that credit men—wise credit men—are placing greater emphasis upon the character of the man, upon his inclination to pay.

One great credit man said: "I would rather extend credit to a man with reasonable earning power with the inclination to pay than to a rich man with an inclination to avoid debts."

I believe that credit men, as a rule, understand better than almost any other aggregation of men the fact that confidence is in deed and fact the basis of all trade. It is in truth not only the basis, the foundation of trade, but the very atmosphere in which it grows.

And now just a word about the composite salesman, the institution itself.

Of business economics there are four grand branches: First, management; second, finance, or the science of raising and disbursing of funds; third, the providing department; fourth, the sales department, the channel through which the efforts of the institution flow out to the world.

No chain is stronger than its weakest link, and no business stronger than its weakest department.

It is wrong to charge the salesman for lack of public confidence in the business if either of the other three branches are weak. The profits made by good salesmen can all be made to go glimmering through the weakness of the other departments. It shows that the departments in a business, just as men in society, are neither independent nor dependent, but that they are inter-dependent. We are in fact but parts of one great whole.

I have known the good work of a splendid salesman to be all undone by untactful work of the credit man.

On the other hand, I have known the splendid work of a credit man to be undone and over-ruled by the unreasonableness of a salesman.

We must unite. United effort is what counts.

I have known the splendid work of a salesman to be undone and confidence in the composite salesman, the institution itself, destroyed by the sloppy, careless work of a stenographer even.

Every thought that we think, every word that we speak and every act that we perform—and that includes everybody in the institution—either adds to the sum of the confidence that the buying public has in the institution or it subtracts in some degree from it. There is absolutely no neutral ground. So we see the responsibility resting upon each and every individual in each department of the four branches of business economics.

Our reasoning carries us to this conclusion, that the profit making power depends upon each unit in the institution. Make the units in the institution all right, and then the institution is all right. Make each institution right, and then the community is all right. Make each community all right and then the state is all right. Make each state all right and then the nation is all right. Make each nation right and then the world is all right, and then we are all right.

But we must get back to the units in the units, the individual; and then the units must get busy with the units in themselves, and the units are the qualities in man.

Value of Organizations of Business Men

There is possibly no greater factor in the upbuilding of business knowledge than organizations of men engaged in the same lines of business. They are one of the signs of the evolution of trade to a higher plane of consciousness. Through them we come to realize that we are interdependent. They are splendid evidences of co-operative power.

A few years ago a man that had learned some good things about his business would be likely to keep them to himself. I wonder if there is one of my readers who, having good points that he knows make sales, guards them and does not pass them along to the other fellow. If there be one such, let's remember that learning is like love—the more we give, the more we have.

Let's not be like those two New England farmers that someone told about not long ago. They met each morning, going to their work. Neither was noted for talking much. The ordinary conversation was:

"Morning, Si!"

"Morning, Rubel!"

"Fine morning?"

"Yes, fine morning."

One day the conversation varied to this degree:

"Good morning, Si!"

"Good morning, Rubel!"

"Fine morning?"

"Yes, fine morning."

"What did you give your horse when it had the heaves?"

"Turpentine."

The next morning.

"Morning, Si!"

"Morning, Rubel!"

"Fine morning?"

"Yes, fine morning."

"What did you say you gave your horse?"

"Turpentine."

"I gave it to mine and killed it."

"It killed mine too."

It wouldn't have cost Si anything to have told Rube that, and it would have saved the life of Rube's horse.

The Honorable Work of Profit-Making

Is it sordid to talk of profits? Or are they the legitimate function of business? Let us remember that the profit we make, as long as it is legitimate profit, is but the pay we get for the service we render. If we serve well we are entitled to the profit.

All the laws of man and God back that law up. "The servant is worthy of his hire," and "The greatest among you shall be your servant," are literal truths—sound business truths.

Many salesmen, unprofessional salesmen, have a begging attitude when they approach a prospect. They act as if they hadn't just as good a right to go into that fellow's office as anyone else—a kind of apologetic air.

But I can hear the voice of the master salesman vibrating with the consciousness of his power to serve. There is no cringing in it. Neither is there an air of blatant egotism which you see in some men. But there is that modesty which is always an evidence of greatness and which makes the other fellow glad to deal with him.

Developing Power of Action

How are you going to do the right things? That is answered in the discussion of the will. The whole stream of consciousness is knowing, plus feeling, plus willing. That's all there is to your mind, my mind, anybody's mind.

Likening consciousness to a stream, we can liken the thought to the water in the stream, the feelings to the temperature of the water, and the will to the rapidity, its moving power, its current.

Thought intensified results in feeling, and feeling made intense enough results in action. Thought plus feeling equals conduct. But it musn't be the wishy-washy kind of thought; it must be the intensified thought, resulting in intensified feeling, which results in turn in intensified action.

Do you know, there are many men who spend so much time thinking about their thoughts and feeling about their feelings they don't have any time for action.

I once had the pleasure of listening to an address on "The Little Things." It was one of the greatest addresses I have heard for a long time, and it was really very beautiful. One of the things which rang true was this: "The reason boys," he said, "we don't sell more insurance is because we fail to do the things we ought to do, and know we ought to do, at the time we ought to do them."

King Will and His Advisers and Subjects

One of the first things to get in mind is that the will does two things—it decides and acts. Some authorities say, "one" just acts, and that the intellect decides. The intellect in forming a judgment doesn't decide; it simply enlightens the will.

I like to look upon my will as the king on my mental throne. His cabinet is the intellect. Among other things, it has the power of forming judgments. But the only thing a judgment is good for is to enlighten the king, the will. He has to decide the question.

I like to look upon my feelings as subjects pleading with the will. But the will sits up there on the throne. He's boss. Sometimes he's a weak boss, but he's boss just the same, for weal or for woe.

Look upon the will as the king in the sense of the old monarch who was absolute monarch of all he surveyed. His will ruled the kingdom. His cabinet could talk to him and enlighten him, his subjects could come and plead with him. He would listen to them all, and then would say, "Your head comes off." "You are rewarded," etc. "I am it. I am boss."

And your will, my will and everybody's will bears exactly that relation to the intellect and the sensibilities. It's the decider and acter.

Can I hear you ask, "How do you reconcile that with the statement you have just made, that thought plus feeling equals conduct. That if you make the thought intent enough and the feelings intent enough, then the will is bound to be the slave of the thought and the feeling?"

I wonder if I am in a corner. Have we reasoned in a circle?

No! I will tell you why. It's because of that plus element in mentality, that awareness of the ego. I know and know that I am knowing. I feel and can know that I am feeling. I can will and know that I am willing. Yes, I can will, and I can will to will; and I can will to know and can will to feel.

My will can say this: "Here, Sheldon, your thoughts are going along certain lines and they are causing certain feelings. I know the law that thought plus feeling equals conduct. I know these thoughts are negative thoughts; I know they are generating a corresponding negative feeling; and I know, according to natural law they will result in wrong actions. But I will not only will, but will to will. I will switch the current and your intellect will begin to think different thoughts that will generate different feelings; and then you, Sheldon, will act differently."

The will is supreme. Man can make himself what he wills to make himself. He's absolute master of himself if he wills to be, because he can switch the current—he can control his own thoughts.

Five Steps in Action of the Will

Get right down to the analysis of the action of the will, and there are five steps in it. The first one is the desire to do a thing. That's at the root of our growth; it's at the beginning of all action.

The second one is a reason, impelled by a feeling, which makes the motive for doing it; and the third is a decision of what to do; the fourth is a decision of how to do it; and the fifth is turning on the current and the act of doing it. That's all there is to the will.

I know some people who stop way back here with this first step. They desire to do a thing. Oh, how they desire health, long life, money and honor! They think they do, but they have a wishbone where the backbone ought to be, and the wishbone isn't very strong at that—just a cartilage sort of affair.

I know others who have that desire to do a thing, and they have a reason impelled by a feeling for doing it, but they stop there. I know others who seem to stop after they have decided what to do, having a reason for doing it. They make up their mind what to do, and then it takes too long to decide how to do it.

I know others who seem to have those four steps well defined—desire, a reason impelled by a feeling for doing it, decision what to do and how to do it. Still there is nothing doing, at least not very often. They need the turning on of the power.

When you have turned on the power, keep it up. Spasmodic effort doesn't count. The salesman out on the road who works as many hours each day as the average man and then makes one, two, three more calls after the other fellow with the wishbone has gone back to the hotel—watch him if you want to see a climber.

A Minor Detail, But—

By ESTHER THARIO

THOSE who have studied the reasons why the United States has been at a disadvantage in building up its export trade in manufactured goods, say that one fruitful cause of loss of confidence is the failure to put enough postage on foreign mail.

Here is the way a London firm turned that seeming disadvantage into a real advantage. They had sent out a form letter to advertisers in the United States, calling attention to their publication as a medium for increasing sales in the United Kingdom. The advertising manager of a well-known Chicago house had received one of these letters and, influenced by the excellence of the selling talk, had replied. A few weeks later, he received this letter:

Dear Sir: On April 8, we wrote you suggesting the possibility of your obtaining business in Great Britain by making use of our publication entitled "The Success Ladder," a copy of which we sent you.

We greatly regret to learn that this was insufficiently stamped and consequently twelve cents to pay by way of extra postage on this matter. We have the pleasure, therefore, of enclosing you herewith this amount, and regret any inconvenience which you may have been caused.

Yours faithfully,

KING-POTTER, CLEMENTS & Co., LTD.

The advertising manager was surprised to learn that his correspondents had discovered the shortage of postage, if there had been any, because he didn't think that anyone in his department would have complained about the shortage. So, in his letter acknowledging their courtesy, he added this paragraph:

We have your letter of May 10, enclosing twelve cents postage to cover an alleged charge for postage on matter mailed to us. Kindly accept thanks.

We are curious to learn, however, in what manner this came to your attention, as it was certainly not in any way through our office.

In their reply, the London firm said that their records showed that one letter, sent on that day, had been insufficiently stamped. They then mailed twelve cents to each of the firms to whom they had written about their publication.

Comment is needless.

Extracts from the Actual Correspondence between the Sales Manager of the Geo. F. Eberhard Company, San Francisco, and a Live Organization of Business Builders

Thoroughness Plus a Plan

*Being Part of a General Letter to
the Sales Force*

IF ALL the inquiry and speculation that is undertaken in a search for the secret of success could be compounded into energy and expended in an effort to "do something" thoroughly, or to carry out a plan in connection with some good work, it would show the searcher for the secret, the way to succeed.

In selling, the keystone in the building of the arch of success is thoroughness plus a plan.

The salesman who undertakes to sell goods on the road either learns this and succeeds and profits thereby, or fails to learn it and fails to profit. To him who has succeeded the proof is plain.

Thoroughness plus a plan means to see every possible customer—make every possible town—spend the full time and energy to make your goods understood. You carry a message that every dealer should heed. It is one of added sales, more profits and pleased consumers if they work with us.

To win you must be thorough. The dealer you overlook to-day would have been your customer of tomorrow. It's too true that the dealer you did not see had an order. And small dealers have a habit of growing into big dealers.

Remember, your competitor usually is not thorough, so here is an advantage you can cultivate without cost.

The Plan that Spells Success

The plan—well, that means you must know your goods, the policy behind the goods, the possibilities for their sale, and your competitor's weakness.

You must know every arrow in your quiver of sales talk.

You must keep right physically, mentally and morally—you must have a well thought out, effective way of calling on all possible trade—to use the 'phone, the mail, the advertising to gain time, supplement your work and cement the impression you want to leave in the dealer's mind. It also means correspondence answered promptly, orders made out correctly, expenses studied and your work recorded.

Some one once said, "salesmen are born, not made." I tell you that, as a salesman, you're a business problem in yourself, and being born did not solve it. Your day's work should be to keep interested, active and enthusiastic every minute, busy doing things.

Record what you can do next trip. When the present visit to a customer or town has been completed and before you go after the customer or into the town again, read up your past records—don't guess or trust to memory. Know, and then get ahead by taking advantage of your preparation.

That is where thoroughness and a plan help.

Be thorough and follow a plan as you work. Don't overlook a prospect or a detail and the result will make your work easier and more pleasant every day.

The more you do right the more you can do right the next time with less effort.

Get out your mental looking glass and clean house. Then start ahead with a better plan for the day's work and be thorough.

Value of Constructive Criticism

I HAVE read your letter in reply to my criticism I am glad it is well taken. I believe this is one reason Jeffries met defeat. Everyone that visited his camp would say, "Jeff, old boy, I have just been over to see the Smoke and it will be like running a drag net through a school of fish."

So Jeffries didn't train as he should. Had they criticized him and said, "the Smoke looks good," it would have set him to thinking and he would have trained better and maybe won the fight.

It is well for all of us to listen to criticism. I am willing to extend my co-operation at all times to you.

Co-operation in Sending Criticisms, Suggestions, Reports and Data

YOUR letter of July 11th while not a complete surprise, nevertheless contains some surprising information.

Your handling of daily reports and also the answering of correspondence is open to some little criticism. In saying this I must do so qualifying my remarks with the realization that you may not have received some of the letters to which I have been awaiting answers.

In the building up and carrying on of this business it is very necessary that each unit in the field should co-operate with the office when I find it necessary to ask them for suggestions or information.

The Strength of the Organization

Our organization is just as strong as the combined strength of the departmental units. Each department is only as strong as the combined strength of the individuals in that department.

Therefore, anyone who will not co-operate to the fullest extent of his ability in trying to suggest ideas or make criticisms of plans we are carrying on, when asked for, is weakening the department. If there are ten units and one does not co-operate, the department is just nine units strong.

When three or four stay out, its efficiency is reduced one-half.

The office can not undertake new work or endeavor to improve details of established work without the active help of the man in the field. This is one feature I would like to have you think over.

Don't jump to any conclusion, but by the time you come to San Francisco for the convention if you will have done your best and answered the several letters that will be sent to you regarding data wanted for the convention, I will show you clearly what I mean when I review this part of the development of our business at the convention.

Please see that reports come forward daily as soon as you start in work. In the meantime I trust that your rest has been most beneficial and that you feel in the best of spirits and have your enthusiasm back so that you can get what we are after or lay the ground for it.

Bracing Up an Apologetic Salesman

YOUR personal of the 13th winds up all right, but somehow, it seems that you are off wrong.

There is no need of your apologizing unless you overlook something. You have a certain territory to cover, definite plans and instructions to go by and as I understand it, the health and knowledge and inclination backed with the enthusiasm essential to carry the work to a successful conclusion.

If this is all correct and you are doing your part with a margin of safety, that is, doing a little more than may be necessary at all times, don't apologize and don't explain.

Put your teeth together occasionally and get off somewhere and think quietly what you are doing and if you don't start right off making a great big whirlwind success, stick.

You know that the work you have before you can be carried out successfully by someone and from both our analyses you know the most likely man in the organization for the particular work is yourself. The detail is up to you and you should put your full time and energy to it so as to solve all the problems at the earliest possible moment.

That I am with you and appreciate what you are up against and have the patience to let you finish, goes without saying. If you had not had the necessary attributes to back up the play I would not have let you undertake it.

The Right Mental Attitude in Training

I am interested in the reports you are sending in—also the business you are doing. There are a few things that occur to me that may help at this time.

When you have endeavored to increase the business of the various merchants or add new lines or new trade and you find an opportunity to do something on the established lines without interfering with the work you are doing, take the business.

If it does not do anything else it will make you feel more cheerful because I know the concrete returns are what we all like. But I leave it to you strictly in charge to not let this privilege interfere with the good and necessary work you have undertaken.

Keep on training, be thorough and don't train lop-sided as our old champion, Jeffries, did and by the time you get back from the try-out trip I am satisfied that you will be able to hold down the special work that you have undertaken throughout the entire territory.

Don't let the doing of it however, wear on you as the necessity of sustaining the reputation of the white race wore on Jeffries. Both you and I know that you can do what you have started out to do. All you have to do is direct your time, thought and energy to accomplish it. It is new work and calls for careful study and as in the case of all other new work a great many little difficulties will have to be overcome.

There will be a lot of trifles that will interfere that you will have to straighten out. Put your time and energy and enthusiasm to doing this, the rest is certain.

Don't take it from this letter that when you feel that you want some one to tell your troubles to that I am not here to receive them. Don't keep your troubles to yourself, because they get to be excess baggage and it wears on your mental and physical condition.

About Choosing a Permanent Location

YOUR interesting note of the 12th is a hard one to answer.

I realize that no matter what I say, my motive and understanding is apt to be questioned but I have found in my career that it is best to say just what you think if you feel you're right, so here goes:

I could loan you the money you desire, but I will not. My reason for refusing you is based upon several thoughts, the first of which is that I do not believe you know enough about that section of the country to invest that much money so early in your married life and undertake the burden of paying the interest and principal.

I don't believe that is a desirable section to tie to and I believe that there are other things surrounding the location there that would tend to disappoint you if you tried to live there.

I realize that this is your business but I also appreciate that the money is mine and assisting a good friend like yourself should always bear with it two elements: that of business and safety, and also that of helping the other fellow to do something worth while.

Ordinarily, I would not consider loaning more than half the value of any land and I don't take much stock in loaning money on improvements. The value of land in that section where you are is boosted so high that I should want to investigate personally before I loaned even my limit.

Why a Man Should Stay Put

I trust that you will hesitate before tying down to any new community until you and your good wife really know where you want to live. There is no need of your beginning permanently right away.

Follow your own inclinations for a little while and get stung a few times in a small way and then you will, between you, have arrived at a basis wherein you will know what you want permanently to tie to in the way of a locality to live in or work permanently to undertake.

When I speak of permanency I do so with the full appreciation that unless a man ties to a community or ties to some particular line of endeavor and lets time and continued identity in one place build him, he is going to lay himself open to being a "down and outer" in his old age.

Of course I realize that when one chap tells another what to do even though the advice is good, it is usually received with considerable mental reservation.

It is up to you, but this deal is not on my money. If you don't put it over and strike something else in your wanderings, don't be bashful, try again, you may find something that I like.

Service (An Appreciation)

*Being Part of a General Letter to
the Sales Force*

A REPLY to my last Bulletin, where I outlined my belief, that service was the vital force in business, asks the question:

"What has this Service ideal done for you?"

One of those typical, practical business questions—a bit direct and cold, but here goes for the answer.

This must be in the nature of a testimonial, and to start right, an apology for one who has been ill and is cured of a business, mental, moral or physical error should always apologize for being subject to error before testifying to the cure.

I can say with a complete foundation of fact that I have tried directly, or have been associated or employed in business ventures that used all the modern and some ancient methods before I understood the ideal of service. The appreciation of "service" as a scientific, fundamental business law was not born with me.

Sometimes I feel that very little was born in me. About everything worth while in my own and our business career is the result of close study and hard effort to overcome negatives and weakness, and to substitute positives and strength.

In the advertising and selling professions, that is the advertising and sales agencies as they are generally known, the big man was at one time the chap who could get the account.

The campaign director, sales manager, copy writer, artist, salesman, demonstrator and record systematizer were all secondary.

Today it is reversed. The big men are the ones who do the actual work. The getting of accounts comes from the reputation established by good service that the agency renders and the successful campaigns that they conduct.

The getting of accounts is easy. The big man is not the chap who secures a lot of agencies or advertising accounts. The actual conduct of the work, the attention to detail, the application of system, the actual traveling of the territory and the sales made are what count.

The smooth chap in the selling business has passed. Now, it is necessary to show a list of towns traveled, money expended in actual sales work and records of real salesmanship. Add that to the right handling of advertising, the placing of display material, the attention to all the minute detail and it leads to real success, as compared with the thousand and one manufacturers and advertising agents whose principal effort is expended in the securing of accounts, not in the building of business, or, in other words, rendering real tangible service.

Our business with a few campaigns, less than at any time in our history, is larger than ever before. Our sales record, compared to the results secured in other sections of the United States on the same line, show, in proportion to population, a bigger business than the eastern branches on the majority of our lines.

Where the result is not in our favor, there are physical or trade conditions that are readily apparent.

This is what the ideal of rendering service means to us.

It has put us in the lead, it has broadened us individually, and we always have more business offered us than we can attend to. Our rule to undertake only what we can do right in accord with our ideal of "Service" has made us successful.

"The men who get most out of God's great hours are they who get something out of every hour."—British Weekly.

FORD has a reputation with his house that most of the rest of us fellows on the road envy. Some of us may have a little higher mark in total sales, although some who beat him at that are very few, but they don't beat him much. But there isn't a man traveling these roads that can catch him when it comes to getting the price.

For a long time I watched his work whenever I had the chance, which was frequently, as we often happened to be together. But I couldn't quite make out how he did it.

Of course it did no good to ask him. He didn't know any difference between his work and that of the rest of us.

"Of course, I do my best to get good prices," he said, "but I have to come down, sometimes, just like the rest of you. I don't know why it is that they buy of me so often without my dropping."

Then one day, when I was loafing in a sample room, it came to me like a flash. Ford had a prospect with him, and was selling shoes.

"Why," I said to myself, "Ford handles the brogans as if they were priceless art objects! No wonder the buyer gets the bargain hammered in that they are valuable—and worth the price."

I had noticed before that Ford always had his samples clean and new. He always displayed them well, too, using artistic series that he never allowed to get faded, wrinkled, mussed, or worn. But there were a number of us that gave our samples the same, or nearly the same care. The difference was that Ford always displayed his shoes with his finger tips, gazed at them as if their beauty entranced him, never—oh never—threw them about, or put them down carelessly, or permitted his prospects to handle them roughly. If any of them tried it, he always found some excuse to get the goods in his own hands, tactfully, and show by example how they should be taken up.

I fully believe that this was the secret of Ford's mysterious power to get the price.

Men Who Attempted More

SHELDON says, "The reason some men accomplish more than others is because they attempt more."

I have been attending the 1910 session of The Sheldon Summer School, and I have learned a great deal about business getting and business building from the lectures, quizzes, and sales demonstrations.

The salesman, manager, correspondent, office man, professional man, or any other man or woman in business who does not attend these lively gatherings on the shores of Lake Eara is missing more than he will ever know. One idea among the thousands that fly around there, thick as flies in August, might be worth thousands of dollars to him.

But I didn't find the lectures and quizzes and demonstration sales the only mines of ideas—not by several city blocks. I picked up some of the best practical business selling, and advertising ideas I ever found in my life from different members of the Tribe of Area that was organized while I was there. Among them were a number illustrating the truth of Sheldon's stimulating aphorism about the men who attempt more.

A Sensational Sale

There is Baird of Winnipeg, Manitoba; one of the keen "Canadian Bunch" at the Summer School. One of his associates told me this.

On approaching a leading business man he found him bitterly hostile to the line Baird carries—didn't want to hear about it.

The man was loud of voice and arrogant of manner. The timid order taker would have put on the soft pedal, stammered his excuses and made his get-away as gracefully as he could. But Baird sized up the bluster as ninety-five per cent bluff—and dared to go after his man rough-shod. From facts right under the raging prospect's eyes he showed him where he was losing money every day—lots of it—by not handling that line. The prospect resented that and tried to defend himself with loud words. Baird showed that he could talk as loud as the other fellow and finally backed his man into a corner. When he had reduced him to submission, he changed his tactics, showed his natural suavity, and began to talk a big deal.

And when he walked out of the office where he had attempted so much, he had also accomplished much, for he had a big order, with the big man's name properly signed on the famous dotted line.

Why Set a Mark?

Just to show you what an incentive will do for a man in salesmanship, let me tell you a little about Benjamin, of Boston.

Benjamin is a specialty salesman. He sells, direct to the consumer, a high-class, high-price proposition. There is a tradition among some of the men representing the house on the field that business is dull in the summer months, and that there is very little use working up a perspiration trying to make any records.

"Just keep things going," is the motto of those who attempt little.

But Benjamin's house promised to pay all his expenses to the Sheldon Summer School if he would land a certain quota of orders before the school opened.

It was a big quota, and Benjamin had a mighty short time to make it—and in the good old summer time, too. But he had the courage to attempt it and went to work.

At first he had fair success, and the coveted trip to Area seemed within his grasp. But the weather kept getting hotter and prospects crosser and sleepier, and for a few days he fell far below the necessary number of autographs. He took a stiff horn of positive auto-suggestion every morning, a pony of courage before approaching each prospect, and a few fingers of good cheer after each turn-down. Still there were no interesting events.

The last week dawned, and if Benjamin hadn't been one of those who attempt more and then stick until they win, that would have been a mighty blue Monday for him, because he was still far behind. But he closed a few deals that day and the next, getting him a little nearer the goal. But still so far away that most men would have given up.

Then day after day went by without an order, although Benjamin worked like a man leading a forlorn hope.

The last day came along, as days will, no matter how unwelcome, and our friend was still six orders behind the quota. He went out that day, undaunted and cheerful, with "do or die" written all over him and soaked all through him. The people in the office were standing on tip-toe and holding their breaths by this time.

Would he get the six?

It seemed impossible after several days in which he had not landed even one.

But when Benjamin came into the office that night, he quietly laid ten perfectly good orders on the manager's desk.

And so I met him at the Summer School.

Why set a mark for yourself?

It will pay.

A Relief from Things

I WOULDN'T have missed going to Gene's for all the commissions on a week's business. I always go to see Gene when I am within reaching distance.

Gene is a successful business man. He is master of his own growing business. He knows every detail of it. He organizes, systemizes, advertises, sells, produces, buys, and finances it, through his subordinates, with a deftness, vigor, and efficiency that is winning.

I admire Gene for all this. I like to talk business with him because he is always full of new ideas—just bristles with 'em. I never talk with him that I don't get something that is worth the price of a ticket to the town where Gene is a prominent figure.

You can see by all this that my friend is no advocate of the masterful (?) policy of secrecy. Far be it from such! When he gets hold of a good idea, he passes it along—even to his competitors.

"The better service they give, the more money they make," says Gene, "the better the reputation of this line of business generally. I want people to get it into their heads that firms in our line of business can render great service, that we are honest and reliable, that our prices are fair but firm, that there are thousands of things that we can do for them that they never thought of. Then we shall all sell more goods, make better profits, and enjoy our work better. As I see it, the future of my business depends upon my power to educate myself, my employes, my competitors, and the public. So, as soon as I strike anything new and good, out it goes to everybody interested. If it will help anyone not in this exact line, I give it to him too, because more prosperity and better methods in any field of trade is good for my business."

But that isn't what I started in to tell you about.

After I had finished my business with Gene at the office, I went home to dinner with him, and spent the night. And I might just as well own up that I spent most of the night talking with Gene and his charming wife.

But, full of business as we both were, we didn't talk one word of shop. My goodness no! Now wait a minute, I'm not one of those that think that it is rudeness to talk shop. I like to talk shop, and I like to hear men talk shop. But I do think that it is bad business to talk shop all the time.

What We Talked About

Gene and his wife and I talked art, music, literature, philosophy, politics, farming, gardening, horticulture, travel, science, ethics, religion, history, character analysis, education, and a lot of other ideas. Get that? Ideas. Yes.

I get tired, at last, of talking about things—the weather, dress, base ball, prize fights, the food on the table, the furniture in the room, troubles with servants, dollars and cents, merchandise, real estate, diseases and their symptoms, the latest scandal, who's "going with" who, dogs, horses, "what's trumps?" what is good for warts, and "the perfectly killing thing Percy said at the dance last night—we all just shrieked." Things!

There are many people who talk about things until they starve their minds to death. Minds have to feed on ideas. When starved, they get so they can't even take in an idea—much less talk about one.

There are men with splendid brains who narrow down their mental activities to factories, mines, railroads, banks, ledgers, notes, mortgages, sugar, prunes, gingham, shoes, metals and stones, tobacco, stoves, peanuts, and pop corn. Things!

And the other areas of their brains finally dry up and die from disuse.

Now, we need to think and talk about things. We live in a world of things. If we don't look after things, we shall soon find not only brain but body as well drying up and dying. But the man whose brain can deal only with things loses his power to know, feel, appreciate, and enjoy truth, beauty, goodness, love, harmony, faith, justice, and most important of all, happiness.

You and I have known men who, in their youth, loved music and good books, Nature and beautiful pictures, purity and nobility of character. We have seen them set out to get wealth so that they might enjoy these soul gratifications. And we have seen them, their wealth acquired, pitifully trying to stimulate into at least a semblance of life their atrophied souls.

Now, Gene doesn't submit to being that kind of victim.

He keeps up his interest in the true, the beautiful, and the good. He uses the brain areas that function in their production and enjoyment. By use, he not only keeps them alive, but develops them, so that his enjoyment and appreciation increase.

And with it all, he is a good business man.

There is an increasing number of men like Gene in the business world. I meet them every day as I prospect around for orders.

They are one of the most hopeful signs of the times.

The PHILOSOPHER AMONG HIS BOOKS

If books cost in proportion to their grade or value, or if the higher levels of composition and creation were, of necessity, so written that they could be understood only by severe application, like that of learning a foreign language or the higher mathematics, how would society be affected with a fresh and worthy sense of the privilege of books and reading! If only the aristocracy of wealth could buy Dante and the Waverly novels, and the literature of the age of Elizabeth, or could read of Copernicus, or Herschell's astronomy, or could own the Prophets and the four Gospels! No, we do not say the empire of letters, the aristocracy or oligarchy of letters, but the republic of letters.—T. Starr King.

BUSINESS POWER—A PRACTICAL MANUAL IN FINANCIAL ABILITY—By Frank Channing Haddock. Albert Lewis Pelton, Meriden, Connecticut. $3.00.

This is another of the remarkable books of The Power-Book Library, all by this author, principal among which is the great book, "Power of Will." Mr. Haddock combines with a mind of singular analytical power a wide knowledge of men and things. This ability to think clearly and soundly all the way up to universal principles, combined with the solid ground-work of experience, has of course sent Mr. Haddock straight to the heart of the problem of business power—education. Likewise, he has seen the light—in a measure—of power for service as the aim of education. This is the way he puts it in his statement of "Principles Basic to Business":

"The broadest foundation of permanent business is that personal intelligence which operates by skill rather than by force, for community benefit in part rather than for individual interest solely, and for long-run development rather than for individual success. . . . These requirements resolve into magneto-practical personal adjustment, applied with confident courage to continuing gratification of developing community desires, to the end of a satisfactory balance of self-interest with other-interest, the two great polar forces of financial success."

In this, of course, Mr. Haddock is recognizing things-as-they-are in the business world, rather than setting up the perfect standard of things-as-they-ought-to-be. There is in reality no polarity of the forces "self-interest and other-interest" in financial success. True self-interest is other-interest, and true other-interest is self-interest.

But that is taking a high plane—the cosmic plane—and the average business man has not yet attained unto it. From his own point of view, Mr. Haddock is perhaps right in leading him gently. True it is, at any rate, that a development upon the lines laid down in this book, and a practical application of its concrete rules will lead the student considerable distance up the mountain of mutual benefit.

The book, which is a large volume of five hundred and fifty-six pages, takes up the subject of Business Power under four heads: The Personal Factors, Economic Laws and Business Maxims, Psychology in Business, and Business in Fact.

The work is direct highly ingenious, and practical. It is full of ideas of value to men and women in every department of business life, and deserves a place at the elbow, both as a book of reference, and as supplementary reading and study to a course in the science of business.

THE ATTAINMENT OF EFFICIENCY—RATIONAL METHODS OF DEVELOPING HEALTH AND PERSONAL POWER—By W. R. C. Latson, M. D. The Health Culture Company, New York. $1.00.

Dr. Latson, the able editor of the magazine, "Health Culture," is about as moderate and sane a "health crank" as we have among those who, for our own good, keep prodding us with reminders that Nature is an exacting executive of her own laws and never, no matter how "deserving" the accused, remits any of the penalty. In this little book, he takes it for granted that you and I wish to attain efficiency, and then tells us how we can do it—by getting into harmony with Nature's laws. And then, so that we may not walk entirely in the darkness, he tells us several of the most important of these laws.

Wisely enough, Dr. Latson begins his work by pointing out the supremacy of mind in man—supreme for ill as well as for good. Health, therefore, and disease, have their source in the mind. Many diseases are purely mental—the direct result of mental states. Other diseases are more indirectly mental in their origin—as for instance, rheumatism, resulting from gross over-feeding, the over-feeding being due to mental coarseness and lack of self-control.

The conquest of one's own mental realm therefore becomes the first requisite to efficiency. Dr. Latson devotes several strong chapters to this. Then he takes up, briefly, the principal laws for the development of personal magnetism, health, endurance, happiness, and long life.

The last few chapters of the book are devoted to the practical side of the question, and deal with rest, sleep, beauty, grace, feeding, and self-cure.

THE RATIONAL LIFE—BEING A BOOK OF ESSAYS ON VITAL THEMES—By Will J. Erwood.
Will J. Erwood Company, Baltimore, Maryland. $1.00.

I like this book immensely—in spots. The author's idea of what constitutes a rational life coincides pretty closely with my own—which means, of course, that he is just about right on the subject. In plain, forcible language, impelled by strong feeling, the author deals with the vital issues of life—the things that are so fundamental and important that they are discussed very little by people who don't like to think seriously. I am glad to see that there are beginning to arise men with either the fool-hardiness or the courage to speak plainly about love, marriage, divorce, the sex question, and social evils. I may be wrong, but I feel strongly that we shall never get out of the mire of impurity until such subjects become topics of as cool-minded and clean-hearted conversation as books, music, and flowers. The more men like Mr. Erwood write as he has written, the more sanely will the people think and talk.

But I said that I liked the book in spots. Brilliant and intensely in earnest as Mr. Erwood is, I fear that he has permitted his natural pessimistic tendency to color too darkly his picture of the state of modern society and civilization. And even if he has not exaggerated the evils he decries—as I think he has—I'm of the opinion that he isn't helping us very far toward the rational life by dwelling upon the negatives at such length. There is much that is pure, sweet, wholesome, noble, and uplifting in men and women as they live today—more, I believe, than at any other period of the existence of the race. And the negative conditions can be overcome only by dwelling upon and developing the positive or bright side of life.

True, ignorance is the cause of most of our ills, but I don't believe that ignorance of the "appalling conditions" of modern life ever hurt anyone.

GOVERNMENT BY INFLUENCE AND OTHER ADDRESSES—By Elmer Ellsworth Brown, Commissioner of Education of the United States.
Longmans, Green, and Company, New York.

Here is an exceedingly valuable book for anyone interested in the subject and problems of education—and that ought to be anyone that can read. It is in the nature of a series of addresses, delivered at various times and places by the author, and then revised for publication in this form.

The first address is based upon the words of Daniel Webster, referring to the public school system of Massachusetts, when he said:

"By general instruction, we seek, as far as possible, to purify the whole moral atmosphere; to keep good sentiments uppermost, and to turn the strong current of feeling and opinion, as well as the censures of law, and the denunciations of religion, against immorality and crime. We hope for a security, beyond the law, and above the law, in the prevalence of enlightened and well principled moral sentiment."

Commenting directly upon this dictum, the speaker says:

"It is easier, cheaper, and better to keep order by making men moral and self-governing than by maintaining more guardians of the peace. This is the doctrine in its lowest terms, for it takes account only of the police function of government and of education only as forming law-abiding citizens. But if influence is the better part of the power of the police, then in an enlightened state, when we come into the wider ranges of governmental activity, influence must play a still larger part and force a relatively lessening part. Government by influence, in other words, is destined to be a generally prevailing mode of government."

This idea, to a greater or less extent, is the text for all the other addresses in the compilation. These deal with a variety of specific subjects, but all have running through them the golden thread of this thought.

I have only one criticism to offer on the book, and that criticism nearly all books on educational subjects that I have read must share. And that is the apparent acceptance of the prevailing and traditional conception of education. Nowhere do I find any clear note of either destructive or constructive criticism of the one-sidedness of the curricula in our schools and colleges—the fact that the intellectual development is almost the only kind of development sought for, to the neglect of the even more important development of right feelings, a strong will, and an enduring body.

Let our life be one of action,

Our one aim to reach the top;

With endurance and ability,

Need we falter? Need we stop?

Each of us has his own value,

Yearn to put it to the test;

Concentration of our powers,

Ought to lead us to Success.

—John C. Donahue.

"To be glad of life because it gives us the chance to love and to work and to play and to look up at the stars."—Selected.

"There may be uniformity of individual insight into truth, there should be no conformity of one man's mind to another man's truth."
—Horne.

BUSINESS POWER

By FRANK CHANNING HADDOCK, Ph. D.

Author of the world-famous study systems "Power of Will",
"Power for Success", "Culture of Courage", Etc.

The value of this magnificent new volume is

$100 - $1,000 - $10,000 - $100,000

It is worth any amount you are willing to make its rare knowledge yield.
No other book or business library in existence can reveal to you the very heart of business science—the inner methods of man-power, mind-power, money-power—as does this epoch-making system

Its stupendous scope is understood by reading the partial synopsis of contents herewith.

CHAP. 1. ACTION AND THE UNDERGROUND MIND.

Action and the Underground Mind.

Special Requirements.

Inaction Spells Ruin.

Value of Variety.

Success-Action.

Experience.

The Subjective Self.

The three great stages of human evolution.

CHAP. 2. ACTION: ATTACK AND MAINTAIN.

How the value of action is determined
Business Action.

Courage and Confidence.

How Andrew Carnegie defined business.

How to Acquire Courage—Confidence.

The three great "rising principles" for actual mastery and domination of events and all desired goals.

The practical method by which any personal quality or goal may be won.

The three working plans in building Courage—Confidence.

Brain cell discipline and education.
Killing doubt and establishing unquenchable confidence.

The Artificial Line of Discipline.

How to make every effort help toward personal mastery.

The Practical Line of Discipline.

What business power means.

18 AXIOMS for throwing courage—confidence into creation of business power.

Practical Outcome: Courage—Confidence.

Auto suggestion for leadership.

The "everlasting word" of business.
What the skill is that makes Director and Power effective.

CHAP. 3. MAGNETIC POWER.

What produces highest personal power.

Unfolding Power.

We do not create power—we unfold.
Correct methods for asserting and assuming power.

How to develop business passion.

What is back of the winning personality in business.

How to Unfold Power.

The FOUR STAR METHODS for developing power.
The secret of unfoldment and growth.

Unfolding Magnetic Power.

How to apply skill in using ability.

How it is developed.

Different kinds of people and magnetism.

Magnetic Characteristics.

1. Physical Attractiveness—how impressive personal appearance and factors are arranged.

2. The Free and Open Mind—the direct plan for acquisition of knowledge.

The "Thought of Magnetism."

3. Right Inner Character: The Crystal Palace of Brain, Brawn and Banks.

4. Magnanimity in Trade—the mutualism of business.

Becoming the big, broad-minded, fair-and-square winner of trade.

5. Consciousness of Being Worth While: Worth in Self; in Others.

6. Tact—The thought or attitude of mind which yields magnetic tact.

7. Resourcefulness—blunders a winning personality never makes.

8. Adjustment or Adaptability—"mixing" with people for business success.

How to adjust to others to please and win them.

9. Avoidance of Clash—avoiding disagreeable and negative situations.

10. Attractiveness of Manner.

11. Genuineness.

12. Self Control—the every-day thought which surely creates this power.

Wealth.

All about it

The Foundation of Business Wants.

Wants and Utility.

Marginal Utility.

Social Marginal Utility.

13. Magnetic Physical Characteristics—the voice, eye, touch, carriage and hand.

Internal energy controlled.

How to interest people—special rules for this art.

14. Personal Poise—the calm mastery in all personal dealings.

CHAP. 4. THE HAND OF POWER. Practical Ability.

What it is.

Determining Aptitude.

One of the big main-line laws of business success.

What highest achievement depends upon.

The "Marble Stairway" of applied business power—rising to supremacy.

The One Method for development of Patience, Persistence, Power.

Considerations of immense importance.

Men who "over-use" and exhaust their power.

Practical Thinking and Practical Doing.

Connecting Thought with Action.

The right way to do a thing.

The 20 itemized elements of Practical Ability.

What Practical Ability Is.

Working these principles into your business power.

Power of Will.

What creates human power.

First evidence of real personal power.

The function of Will.

Two prevalent errors concerning the Will.

The Ideal Will.

The Hand of Power.

The hand, showing placing of Energy, Force, Firmness, Self-reliance, Independence, Resolution, Determination, Decision, Persistence, Patience, Endurance, DARING, Push, Restraint, Magnetic Will, What each power is, with explanations.

CHAP. 5. BUSINESS RELATIONS.

When business is organized.

A study of "How to acquire power in the study and use of relations which run through the whole financial world."

What a business relation is.

Foundation of Business Relations.

One of the fundamental mental maxims of successful trade relations.

How business relations direct the rest of humanity.

Relations Depending Upon Wants.

The "Wants" and how business "Service" meets them.

Continued next 2 pages.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

Personal Relations Based Upon Above.

The business man related to the people—8 statements.

Equals Related to Equals—7 statements.

Business Man's Relation to Employees—9 statements.

Relation of Employees to Employers—7 statements.

Three sets of questions for self-suggestion and improvements in business dealings.

The Development of the Psychic Meaning of the Relations.

The Four Stages.

Practicalization of Relations.

Increasing Wants and Increasing Adjustment to Human Nature.

The task of personal adjustment.

The Science of Character Reading.

Determination of Individual Cases.

Fundamental Principle of Personal Adjustment—Unceasing and Intelligent Appeal to Self-Interest.

The Seven Subordinate principles.

Determination for Direct Personal Adjustment.

Serving yourself through self-interest of others.

Observation of Personal Characteristics.

Main lines for Study and Adjustment in dealing with others.

The 21 required personal traits; 20 things to avoid.

Golden Laws of Business Adjustment.

The Laws of Confidence, Business Influence, Continuity, Business Character, Individuation, Business Inter-dependence, Business Humanity.

CHAP. 6. PERSONAL REQUIREMENTS.

Psychic Book-keeping.

Estimating the capital worth of yourself.

The Three Great Principles in Psychic Book-keeping.

Debits and Credits With Self.

How to determine your personal credit balance.

Different arrangements and lists.

The difference between Work and Labor.

Applications of the Illustrations.

Personal Requirements in Detail.

How your body's utility is measured. The Ten Diamond Rules and the Ten Subjective Brilliances, yielding superb health and keen, snappy mentality.

Twenty elements or rules to follow.

The Dr. and Cr. of Physical Health.

The Factor of Dress.

The Dr. and Cr. of Dress with 20 elements.

Personal Style.

The Dr. and Cr. of Style of Personality.

Making your ability and mastery greater than the work ahead of you, with the special 54 elements or requirements.

Business Language.

The Dr. and Cr. of the Speech of Business—48 elementary studies.

How to develop the winning, influential style of business talk—the underground elements.

Character.

28 Suggestions—Affirmations for Character.

Self-Mastery.

Personal Supremacy, Control, etc.

THE SIX ELEMENTS of Self-mastery.

Developing the 20 great Double Elements of Self-Mastery.

The Front of Business.

28 Affirmations for mastery of self and others; out on the firing-line of business

Level-headed Personal Valuation.

"Megalopsukia" vs. "swell head."

THE TEN RUBIES OF SUCCESS.

Increase of Income.

The Diagram of Compound Earnings.

CHAP. 7. ECONOMIC LAWS AND BUSINESS MAXIMS.

Instinct and Knowledge.

The value of instinct in business.

The Reign of Law in Business.

How practical financial ability and business progress are related.

The Wheel of Business Power (Diagram).

Value.

Analysis of Values.

Suggested Opportunities (12).

Value Returns.

THE NINETY-ONE EMPHATIC LAWS for pushing ahead any business. Also economic laws and explanations of all in operation and use for wealth and success.

CHAP. 8. MORE ECONOMIC LAWS AND BUSINESS AXIOMS.

Markets, Supply, Demand, Prices;

Remedies for Unskilled Use of Energy.

Training the Sub-conscious Self.

What the real creator of human power is.

Variation in Marginal Utilities, Market Price and Value, Competition and Prices. Nature of Competition. Forms of Competition, Cost, Profit, Credit, Leadership, Conclusions.

ONE HUNDRED AND ELEVEN business laws and maxims fully explained.

CHAP. 9. INITIATIVE.

The two factors making up every business man's life.

A Ton of Coal and a Man.

The Origin of Initiative.

About stored energy.

The power which liberates this energy.

Relation of the Will to Initiative.

Groups of the Initiative.

The five principle classes of people as related to the five kinds of Initiative.

The Supreme Leaders through Initiative.

The kind of Initiative which produces the pioneers and constructive builders of huge enterprises.

Outline of the Initiative Groups.

Initiative and the Quality Factor.

The goal of the highest grade.

The Two extremes to avoid in using Initiative.

About the "quality" of Initiative.

Initiative and the Time Factor.

Climbing by Initiative.

The path to leadership—how to travel it.

The requirements for standing first in any field of effort.

Initiative and Success.

Explaining the Six Levels of Initiative.

The Five Essential Traits.

Initiative Defined.

The rare link between perceiving or thinking, and actual accomplishment.

The Use of Initiative.

The Nine "extra-extra" studies in applying Initiative.

Development of Initiative.

Seven Methods—Acquiring Comprehensive knowledge. Extensive Knowledge. Intensive Knowledge. Knowledge of Men. Knowledge of Business Conduct. Prophetic Knowledge. Vital Interest. Psychic Power.

Expanding the "sense of consciousness."

Giving commands to the subjective self.

CHAP. 10. BUSINESS MENTALITY.

How occupation affects mental growth.

The Human Corporation.

Studies in the different departments of human psychology, activities, creativeness, etc.

About business mentality and mental processes.

The Elements of Attention.

Element of Ideas. Intensity of Ideas

Power of Will, Motor Interest

How to get best results from employees.

CHAP. 11. COMMERCIAL MEMORY.

Preliminary.

The Principles of Commercial Memory.

The brain processes

Memory and Consciousness.

Assimilation.

What memory depends upon.

Basis of Memory.

The Five Essential Laws.

Control of Mental Processes.

Depth of Consciousness.

Consciousness, Memory and Brain Cells.

The NINE SPECIAL VIEWS of memory processes.

Inhibition.

Three Laws of Memory.

Certain Types of Memory.

The Regime. "Do It Now."

One of the Prime Habits of business.

Regimes: Get the Habit, Push the Search. Cultivate Negative Powers.

Self-discovery

Diagrams of memory processes.

Memory Characteristics.

Mind and Memory in Business.

Conclusion—General Principles.

CHAP. 12. THE PRACTICAL MAN'S IMAGINATION.

Definition and Divisions.

Value of Imagination.

Imagination as Memory.

Tests of Reproductive Imagination.

Regime 1. Discovery of your Memory—Imagination; getting a detailed estimate.

Regime 2. Discovery of your Imagination Proper—how to attain highest practical Imagination.

Regime 3. Universal Scheme of the Practical Man's Imagination—24 important factors for improvement, observation and test

Tests of Productive Imagination.

Special Uses of Imagination.

The Four Magic Words.

Regime 4. Application of Imagination in General.

Regime 5. Application of Imagination in Your Case.

The great Chart showing plans for improvement and how carried out.

Suggested Applications of Imagination.

Regime 6. Suggestions for Application—making Imagination yield great returns.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

CHAP. 13. THE ENERGY OF SUCCESS.

Force and Energy.

Man a Fund of Energy.

About the bundle of forces which hide in the human personality.

Energy and Health.

Energy and the Brain.

Mental Energy.

Releasing Brain energy.

Pushing out the limits of one's sphere of action.

The amount and quality of mental power.

The Use of Energy.

Skill in the use of Brain power.

How men accomplish best work

Skill in handling self.

Four kinds of power in action.

The Man and the Business.

Best use of personal energy.

The "mind-body-man on the sea of business."

The Energy and Success.

Diagram of Ideal and Imperfect Use of Energy.

The Test of Success.

Examination of the Diagrams.

In the engine room of personal power.

Prevention of Waste Development of the Energy Sense; Unfoldment of Will Confidence; Psychic Inspiration of Others.

CHAP. 14. BUSINESS UNDER DIRECTION.

The World's Business Departments.

20 special divisions explained.

Business Under Direction.

The perfect law for attaining highest influence and success.

Special studies for employees in the different branches of business.

Permanent Employees.

Becoming indispensable to employer.

Common Laborers.

Seven "extra special" studies for climbing to a better position.

The Skilled Craftsman.

Five "extra special" studies in creativeness and skill.

Office Help and Clerks.

About their magnetism.

SEVEN REGIMES—Hand of Power;

Symmetrical Will; Magnetic Personality; Opposing Traits; The Long Run Goal; Living Illustrations; Golden Dynamics.

TWENTY-SIX TRAITS which put clerks out of favor; Twenty-six traits which make clerks in demand.

The Correspondent.

The 14 details of writing carefully explained.

Eight special requirements for dealing with the Principal.

The Business Transaction with 8 special requirements.

All Representatives.

Certain General Laws for Representatives with the 14 extra laws of Psychic Mastery.

Law of First, Second and Third Magnetic Adjustment; of Financial Comprehension and Large Financial Detail

Developing Management, Counter-revelation, Organized Omnipotence, Inspirational Driving Power, Subjective Business Automatics, Initiative Power, Two-fold Universal Law of Self-interest, Fidelity.

CHAP. 15. INDEPENDENTLY CONDUCTED BUSINESS.

Blending the Business Functions.

The Rule of Specialization.

Getting the master hand on what people need or want.

The Work of Planning, Business Action, The Other Man, Business Feeling, Business Attitude Factors of Attitude.

Interest, Alertness, Promptness, Completing Adequacy, Will—Spirit.

Specific Departments of Business.

Unparalleled studies in each kind of business—the inner power.

The Canvassing Agent.

The principles and essential power for success.

The Twelve "Iron Principles." Acquiring the "keys to orders."

The Jobber.

Seven "extra special" studies.

Ten further studies for mastery and dominance of the field.

The Broker.

What he requires.

Ten "extra special" studies for the financial worker.

Real Estate Man.

Real estate insight.

Courageous confidence.

Special studies.

CHAP. 16. THE LARGER BUSINESS.

Developing leadership and far-reaching business activity.

The Merchant.

The Eleven Elements of Energetic Practical Ability.

Grasping big business affairs.

One of the costliest things in the world—yet a downright necessity in business.

Publishers.

Nine "extra special" and miscellaneous instructions for meeting and creating popular demand in literature.

The Advertiser.

The heart of the science of influencing the human mind through "printer's ink."

The Aims of Advertising, with Six "extra special" studies.

Mediums of Advertising, with Ten "extra special" studies, including business competition, territory, classes, publicity, permanence of utility, permanence of reading, place, display, readers' tastes, etc.

The Purchasers—with Ten all-important facts to consider about people in reference to advertising.

The Characteristics of Advertising—in general; planning and preparing copy; the psychology of the thing.

The Man and his Business, with Thirteen "extra special" studies. Additional Regimes, with Nine "extra specials" and Five specialized descriptions of the Force and Art of advertising.

The Man in High Finance

Must master this entire volume.

Twenty-four "extra special" studies in masterful financial personality.

Fourteen "extra special" studies in Business Action.

Ten "extra special" studies. At Close Quarters in financial manipulations.

CHAP. 17. MASTERY FOR THE LARGER BUSINESS.

The Master Regimes.

Efficiency of Business Associations.

Maintenance of Courage.

Holding the Reserve.

Maintaining Low Level of Risk, with the Five Methods for Reducing Risks.

Maintaining the Passion for Business—the secret of masterhood.

Creating Inspiration by Imagination.

Maintaining Activity Worth While.

Going Aloft for Vision.

Utilization of the Law of Demand.

THE BOOK AND THE PRICE.

The 18 lessons are in 150 sub-divisions; there are 550 sections to the studies; there are a dozen or more unique charts and diagrams of special importance; and there are hundreds of laws, rules and suggestions for test and development of the powers and business activities. To be brief—the book is a reservoir of power in self-development for money-making: the more you draw upon it, the more the supply increases. You simply cannot drain it.

3.20

Postpaid

"Business Power" is uniform with all other Power-Books. Richly bound in purple, cover design in 22-carat gold. Inside covers purple and gold marbled lining, very choice paper and printing; 600 pages, gilt tops. Division titles in red. A masterpiece inside and outside. Boxed and mailed prepaid wherever mails go for $3.20 on the sales plan of BOOK BACK—MONEY BACK if remailed within five days from receipt. This magazine guarantees this offer 100% SQUARE DEAL.

Tear this page out, write your name and address and mail at once with remittance. If book don't suit you, send it back and immediate refund will be made.

ALBERT LEWIS PELTON, (The Power-Book Library) MERIDEN, CONN.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Ring the Bell Every Time

WHAT is it worth to you to be able to ring the bell every time you strike for a customer's order? What is it worth to you to be able, when he puts forth an objection, to knock that objection sky high with the irresistible force of a selling argument that has been tried and proven by the best salesmen of the best concerns in the world—concerns whose names are household words by reason of the enormous sales these very selling arguments have brought them?

What is it Worth to You :

—To know in advance the objections your prospect will make and the best answer to each that has ever yet been discovered.

—To have a number of answers (in some cases as many as twenty to thirty) to each objection—all irresistible—600 irresistible selling arguments?

—To know that every one of these arguments has been evolved by years of hard experience—improved and made stronger by constant successful use?

—To know that many of these arguments cost thousands of dollars in experience before they were discovered and perfected—and that many of them have sold millions of dollars worth of goods?

Every Page Coinable Into Money

A chemical formula written on the back of an envelope may be worth a fortune; a few figures giving the combination to a safe may unlock a door with millions behind it. Every page of this book contains a selling formula that you can coin into ready money. Every one of these 600 irresistible arguments opens a door that will lead you to more sales and more commissions. You could well pay, if you had to, a green-back for every page of this book; but the cost to you is slight.

Sign This Coupon —Can you afford to pay one-half cent for an argument that has sold thousands of dollars worth of goods—an argument whose discovery cost hundreds or even thousands of dollars in time and experience and actual money of star salesmen and great concerns.

—An argument that will surely close sales for you—that may clear you a hundred dollars in commissions the first day you use it, and hundreds or even thousands of dollars as you use it over and over again, throughout the entire year and for years to come.

Can you afford to pay one-half cent for what is worth anywhere from $10.00 to $1,000.00 in actual money-making power to you?

Then Sign This Coupon and Mail Today

THE SHELDON UNIVERSITY PRESS, Libertyville, Illinois

Enclosed please find $4.00 for your Two Big Volumes of Six Hundred Talking Points and Selling Arguments.

Name .....

Address, etc. ....

A Typewriter Built to Order

IF YOU could have a typewriter made to order, how would you have it? Built for show—or built for service? Loaded down with attachments, devices and mechanisms—or simple, durable and efficient? Would you demand the most machinery—or the best, in materials, workmanship and results?

The Royal Standard Typewriter

has every quality that you would demand in a made-to-order machine. It meets every requirement of efficiency, durability and economy.

The first thing you notice about the Royal is its simplicity. You see instantly that it is constructed on new and correct principles, with all needless attachments and devices eliminated. The Royal is built for service.

It has only about half as many parts as other standard machines. The simplicity thus secured works for your advantage in four ways: A saving in the original investment; low cost of maintenance; minimum of effort and maximum of convenience in operation; and the long life of the machine.

The price of the Royal is $65—a new standard price for a high-grade writing machine.

Royal Typewriter Co.

Royal Typewriter Bldg., New York ... 21 Monroe Street, Chicago, Illinois

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Effective Speaking

By Arthur Edward Phillips, Author of "Natural Drills in Expression," etc.,
Director, Department of Public Speaking, the Theological Seminary of the Evangelical Luther Church at Chicago; Principal, Phillips School
of Oratory, Chicago.

Adopted by Representative Schools and Universities Throughout the Nation.

IN THIS work is found the first presentation of the true principles of effectiveness in speech. It is a distinct departure from anything yet published on the subject. There is no book now in your library that can fill the place of "Effective Speaking."

This book presents the essentials of effectiveness in all departments of speaking—business, social and public. It trains the judgment in the use of the great principles that govern power and success in speech, and offers a logical way to develop skill as an extemporaneous speaker.

Further, this book presents a complete set of exercises covering every important point discussed; also, a complete set of questions. It gives over one hundred examples from master speakers illustrative of the principles developed.

If you wish to increase your power as an entertaining speaker, read pages 63 to 78; if you wish to increase your power as a convincing speaker, read pages 42 to 47; if you wish to increase your power as an impressive speaker, read pages 39 to 42; if you wish to increase your power as a persuasive speaker, read pages 48 to 62; if you wish to increase your power of memory, read pages 211 to 213; if you wish to increase your power to speak extemporaneously, read pages 88 to 171; if you wish to improve your style, read pages 181 to 201.

If you sincerely seek power in speaking you cannot afford to be without this book. It is a need.

Some of the Institutions Using "Effective Speaking:"

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO
UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA
MICHIGAN STATE NORMAL
UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA
MISSOURI STATE NORMAL
UNIVERSITY OF OKLAHOMA
UPPER IOWA UNIVERSITY
UNIVERSITY OF UTAH
UNIVERSITY OF GEORGIA
IOWA STATE NORMAL
NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY
ADRIAN COLLEGE
SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY

CORNELL UNIVERSITY
UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS
BELOIT COLLEGE
CORNELL COLLEGE
BAKER UNIVERSITY
OKLAHOMA STATE NORMAL
DRAKE UNIVERSITY
UNIVERSITY OF DENVER
GEORGIA STATE NORMAL
SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY
INDIANA STATE NORMAL
TOLEDO UNIVERSITY
OTTERBEIN UNIVERSITY
NORTHWESTERN COLLEGE

LELAND STANFORD UNIVERSITY
UNIVERSITY OF GEORGIA
KNOX COLLEGE
DRURY COLLEGE
LAWRENCE UNIVERSITY
BUCKNELL UNIVERSITY
WASHINGTON AND JEFFERSON UNIVERSITY
OLIVET COLLEGE
YANCKTON COLLEGE
AUGUSTINA COLLEGE
UNIVERSITY OF CHATTANOOGA
ALBION COLLEGE
UNIVERSITY OF NORTH DAKOTA
UNIVERSITY OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Price $1.50, Delivered

The Taylor Book Store, Rockefeller, Illinois

$5,000 a Year to Each Subscriber

---

That is What We Will Pay You if You Will "Make Good." If You Can Earn More We Will Pay You More

---

We Want Live Salesmen to get subscribers for THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER. It will pay you to devote your entire time to the work, but if you cannot do that—a few minutes each day will bring in the sheckels for you.

You can get your friends to subscribe with very little trouble.

You can pick up subscriptions on the trains or wherever you happen to be.

Every Salesman should have the idea of Service in his mind and get every one of his customers to subscribe for THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER. It will mean more business for the customer and more business for the salesman.

What THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER has meant to you it will mean to others. As subscribers you know the magazine. You can tell others, so that they will know.

---

WRITE FOR OUR PROPOSITION

---

Sheldon University Press
Agency Department :: Libertyville, Illinois

Learn to Size Up Men

DR. KATHERINE M. H. BLACKFORD

research and experiments, and then to formulate the whole into a sane, logical, simple, and practical science. After painstaking application, checking and rechecking, covering many years and travel to all parts of the country, she found that the new science always works out—that it is reliable. She has taught it to thousands of the keenest business men of many cities, particularly New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, Seattle, St. Paul, and San Francisco. They are using it in their business today with consistent success.

Through all these years, Dr. Blackford committed very little of her science to writing, her work being done entirely by lectures and private instruction. Within the last year, she has written two lessons on the Science in the Course in the Science of Business Building, taught by The Sheldon School. With the exception of these, scarcely a word from her pen has appeared in print. Thousands all over the country have called for something authoritative from her, but she has not been ready. NOW, AT LAST, has succeeded in making arrangements with her for a series on the subject, to run, for an entire year, beginning in the issue for NOVEMBER, 1910.

THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

In this series, Dr. Blackford will tell about the birth of the new science, and of the laws and principles upon which Human Nature Study is founded.

Dr. Blackford is the Discoverer of

- The Law of Color,
- The Law of Form,
- The Law of Proportion,
- The Law of Temperamental Combinations,
- The Law of Texture,
- The Law of Climatic Adaptability,
- The Law of Change of Temperament,
- The Law of Human Chemicals,
- The Application of Scientific Character Analysis to Education,
- The Application of Scientific Character Analysis to the Choice of a Career,
- The Application of Scientific Character Analysis to Salesmanship and Business.

Dr. Blackford Teaches How You Can

- Know your own powers and weaknesses,
- Develop the one and overcome the other.
- Read others at a glance,
- Approach the different types,
- Close with the different types,
- Adapt Education to needs,
- Know the trustworthy and the untrustworthy,
- Choose the right man for the right place,
- Choose the right partners and associates,
- Combine the different men in your organization.

These conclusions are based upon recorded data of twelve thousand subjects personally examined by Dr. Blackford, supplemented by observation of more than thirty thousand.

You can easily see that this is a most important series of articles for business and professional men—for men in every walk of life—the greatest that has been offered to the public for years. The formulation of the Science of Character Analysis is the most important event in the business world since the formulation of the Science of Salesmanship.

Remember, the series begins in the November number. Get your subscription in early. Be sure to get the whole series. Two dollars a year; twenty cents a copy.

The Business Philosopher, Libertyville, Illinois

SHELDON says that your success in life is in proportion to your obedience to four injunctions:

- Know yourself;
- Know your fellow men;
- Know your business;
- Apply your knowledge.

How to know yourself and how to know others are the two big problems. Take one hundred of the greatest successes you know—they are men who solved these two problems. They had to learn by hard knocks and expensive experience.

But today, Science has come to your rescue. It makes human character—your character and that of the other fellow—an open book.

Learn the Science of Character Analysis—then you can read yourself and others as easily as you now read the signs on the store fronts. The color, the form, the proportions, the features, the shape of the head, the texture of the hair and skin, the handshake, the posture, the voice, the walk of any man are the letters that spell to you, when a trained observer, the secrets of his character. The whole sentence is read at a glance.

Phrenology, physiognomy, anthropology, biology, physiology, ethnology, psychology, and the study of temperaments have been steps on the way. But by themselves they are a jargon, so far as any clear voice as to character reading is concerned—at best only the bases for more or less accurate guesses. It remained for

Dr. Katherine M. H. Blackford

to take these separate sciences, discover their general laws and their relations to one another, to add to them the record of her own extended

Improved 1906 Edition, 160 Pages, 6½x3½ Inches

ROPP'S New Commercial Calculator & Short-Cut Arithmetic

Is from beginning to end a greatly improved, enlarged and thoroughly revised publication. It contains an entirely new system of unique Tables, Short-Cuts and up-to-date Methods. It is unquestionably the most complete, useful and comprehensive Calculator ever published. It has more than twice the matter, scope and capacity of Ropp's former editions, of which

Nearly 1,500,000 Copies Have Been Sold

It is the most convenient and practical Labor-saving work ever used in the business world. It will make every one independent, sure and self-reliant in all practical calculations. It will prevent mistakes, relieve the mind, save time and labor, and often loss and trouble. Its Tables are adapted to all the trades and occupations in the city and country, and Show the Answer as Quickly as a Watch Shows the Time.

It also explains and simplifies the principles of Arithmetic, Mechanics and Mensuration. It will make the study and use of Figures easy and interesting for young and old. It will enable every progressive mind to become an expert, sure and rapid calculator. It will prove a boon to all whose education in arithmetic has been limited or neglected.

Its 48 new cuts clearly illustrate the elements of Mechanics and Mensuration. It defines about 70 points in "Commercial Law" which every man and woman should know.

It is the result of devising, and improving system after system; of spending thousands of dollars in experimenting; of making millions of miscellaneous calculations, and of doing some vigorous thinking during 38 years, by an analytic, practical and preserving mind.

It is especially designed for Farmers, Mechanics, Business and Professional Men, Bankers, Manufacturers and Dealers in Grain, Stock, Cotton, Coal, Lumber, Produce, etc.

|                                                                                |        |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------|
| OFFICE EDITION—9¼ x 5¼ inches—Cloth binding, gold stamp, large type.....       | $1.00 |
| POCKET EDITION—6¼ x 3¾ inches—Cloth, with pocket, flap and silicate slate..... | .50    |
| Leather, with pocket, flap and silicate slate, gilt edge.....                  | 1.00   |
| VEST POCKET EDITION—5¼ x 2¾ inches—Cloth, round corners, red edges.....        | .35    |
| Leather, gold stamp, burnished edges.....                                      | .50    |

*The Standard for Store, Farm,
Bank or Factory*

Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Ill.

Sherwin Cody's Latest Book

How to Do Business by Letter

and Training Course in Business English Composition

The most successful book on letter-writing ever published, now in its 47th thousand, eleventh edition, though but recently published.

Contains over 125 model letters of all kinds, including a number of the more successful pulling letters used by prominent houses.

Also the Rules of Grammar complete, with all common errors; the Rules of Punctuation, Words Often Misused, Rules and Regulations of the Postoffice (correct to 1910), etc.

Price, postpaid $1.00. See table of contents.

Sherwin Cody's Form Paragraph Letter-Writer

An indexed and gummed blankbook, full letter size, loose leaf, in which to paste form paragraphs to be used in answering all kinds of correspondence.

By this system an $8-a-week girl can write better letters than a $25-a-week correspondent, because she simply copies into her book the best paragraphs in the regularly dictated letters of the head of the business, and all letters are in his language, perfect in every detail of punctuation, grammar, etc., and may be signed by his name though he never sees the letter himself. This is a wonderful means of raising the quality of correspondence, as well as saving much time and expense. 80 gummed pages, 20 index pages, 100 pages in all; price, postpaid, $3; subject to approval and return at my expense.

Sherwin Cody's Compendium of All Card Systems

An instruction book on loose-leaf and card systems (the only book ever published clearly stating the simple fundamental principles of these systems), accompanying a neat box of 500 cards, size 3 x 5 inches, printed from specially engraved wax plates in the best style, representing 18 complete systems all ready for use, including forms for mailing lists, advertising, salesmen's report and route cards, perpetual inventory forms, cost systems, school forms, and loose-leaf and card ledgers of all kinds, for wholesale, retail, mail-order, instalment, and specialty businesses. Electrotypes of plates sold and directions given for printing systems at one-third the usual price. Price, complete, $3.00.

How to Make Advertising Pay

How to Write Letters that Pull

Office Salesmanship & Business Psychology

I have made a detailed personal study of forty-six leading lines of business: Manufacturing, wholesale, retail, mail-order, and specialty, and have taught presidents, secretaries and advertising managers how to make a success of their publicity—I know what will win in forty-six different businesses, yours among the number, and this information I give in my complete course, together with all the books and special features described above, with scores of others—everything I have for only $30, including twenty personal lessons. Write for complete catalogue.

SHERWIN CODY, LIBERTYVILLE, ILLINOIS

CONTENTS:

Using Words So as To Make People Do Things.
How to Begin a Business Letter.
How to Close a Business Letter.
The Body of the Letter.
Applying for a Position.
Sending Money by Mail.
Ordering Goods.
"Hurry-up" Letters.
How Money is Collected.
Letters to Ladies.
Professional Letters.
How to Acquire an Easy Style in Letter Writing.
Two Kinds of Letters—Buying and Selling.
When to Write a Long Letter and When to Write a Short Letter.
Answering Inquiries.
Talking in a Letter—Colloquialisms and Slang.
Complaint Letters.
Condensation—Writing Advertisements.
Advertising and Follow-up Letters.
Display in Letter Writing.
Salesmanship in Letters and Advertisements.
Customs and Regulations of the Post Office.
Social and Official Forms; the Rules of Grammar, with Common Errors; the Rules of Punctuation for Business Office Use.

IF YOU'RE not happy in your work, if you'd rather be doing something else, there's no reason why you should work on, being unhappy, but you should prepare yourself for the work in which you will be happy; work in which you can put your heart: Success.

It's not necessary for you to quit what you're doing now in order to get ready for your life's work, stick to what you're doing until you're ready to change; then change and stick.

The Home Study Courses prepared by our faculty are not equalled by any university or college in America. Through them you can prepare yourself for the work in which you will be most happy. The matter is in your hands. It's for you to decide. Do you want to be a factor in the large affairs of life? Are you satisfied with your present attainments? You're not, no live person is. The way is open. A request for particulars is the first step up. Take it! They'll come by return mail together with specific information on the subject you indicate on the coupon.

With your pluck and ambition no one can prevent your succeeding, excepting yours if. Don't stand in your own way. Send today for particulars.

The Peoples University

P. O. Box 1465

University City, St. Louis, Missouri

CUT HERE

THE PEOPLES UNIVERSITY

P. O. Box, 1465, University City, St. Louis, Missouri.

Please send me, without obligation on my part full information about the League and how I can take up the study of the course I have marked below.

Music
Art
Journalism
Short Story Writing
Teachers' Courses
Kindergarten
Domestic Science
Civil Service Preparation
Dressmaking
Auto Engineering
Photography

Stenography
Typewriting
Bookkeeping
Penmanship
College Preparatory Agriculture Horticulture
Veterinary Science
Floriculture
Poultry Culture
Bee Keeping

Name .....

Street and No. ....

P. O. .... State .....

Ask For Book You Want

Place check in the square below indicating number of book desired; write name and address on lines below and forward, with 10 cents postage attached, and the book is yours—without further expense or obligation, of course.

1—THE ART OF FINANCIERING

[Showing how business men may raise capital for business projects]

2—FINANCIAL HAND BOOK

[For promoters, fiscal agents and brokers]

3—BUSINESS BUILDING BY CORRESPONDENCE

[For the man who uses circular letters]

4—THE SELLING FORCE AND THE SELLING FARCE

[Showing why the great majority of selling plans do not pay]

5—THE GREAT LAW OF AVERAGE

[A new principle discovered by a business expert, bringing CERTAINTY to business affairs]

6—HOW $250 MAY RAISE $200,000

[For the man with a real opportunity]

If more than one book is desired add 10 cents additional for each extra book. Money refunded if not perfectly satisfactory. Each book conveys a MESSAGE. Each tells something NEW and VALUABLE.

The Business Development Co. of America

|   |   |   |   |   |   |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1 | 2 | 3 | 4 | 5 | 6 |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|

Founded 1901
119 NASSAU STREET
NEW YORK

October B-P

Read Below What Practical Business Men Say of These Books

"Booklets sent are fine and ideas O. K."—L. E. BAILEY, San Jose, Cal.
"Certainly 'Eye-Openers.'"—E. C. ELWOOD, Bridgeport, Conn.

"One of the best investments I have made for a long time."—LE GRANDE BUTCHER, Editor of "Profitable Publicity."

"Considered brochures of real value to me and worth many more times the price asked."—L. C. KELLY, Seattle, Wash.

"After carefully reading, I want to state that, if I could have had the information contained in 'How $250 Can Raise $200,000' I would have been saved several hundred dollars, much valuable time and been spared much humiliation. The idea is right. I paid hard cash and hard experience in proving it."—E. D. CRIBB, S. Highland Park, Ill.

"'How $250 May Raise $200,000' is the best article I ever remember seeing emanate from your establishment and 'HITS THE NAIL SQUARELY ON THE HEAD.' I have succeeded at last in promoting my mine, but I could have saved about three years of the time out of the four it has taken, if the proper course had been pursued from the first, as laid down. The course finally pursued followed closely along lines laid down now by you, save differing in details. The method was very much the same.

"I think the very logical and convincing argument set forth in 'How $250 May Raise $200,000' would wake up a mummy one thousand years old, for EVERY WORD IS ABSOLUTELY TRUE."

Very truly yours,

MARK E. DAVIS, Oakland, Cal.

"I was very much interested in 'How $250 May Raise $200,000,' for the reason that it appears to hit the situation exactly. I have read nearly all your issues for the past two years, and much of your printed literature, but never saw anything that covers the situation so completely as does this article."—J. T. RYAN, American Tire Armor Co., 816 Pacific Building, San Francisco, Cal.

"The Business Development Company of America is the publisher of five little books which are the most unique and interesting publications in the way that The American Banker has ever had the pleasure of receiving *** they contain a vast amount of information that will be of value to bankers, promoters and business men who are interested in building up their business.

"These books sell for ten cents a copy and are worth $10 a copy. We advise our readers to send forth m." Editorial extract from The American Banker, March 5, 1910.

N.A. Shryer's Collection Sense & Science

Shows You How to Own a Commercial Agency
← Like This

With a Bank Account That Will Be Welcomed Here and Support You In a Home Like
This

Thousands of Men Have Risen from Clerkships to be Heads of Successful Commercial Agencies through our brief, inexpensive course of commercial agency training—the science of collecting delinquent mercantile accounts—a business that pays the b'ggest commissions on the volume of money handled.

A merchant will pay a salesman 5% to 10%
to sell goods—but that merchant will pay you 25% to 50% to collect accounts for him—and your work, when you know how to do it—is easier than the salesman's work.

You Can Start With No Capital—But Ambition

If you are ambitious to earn for yourself the pleasures and comforts of a large income, you will tell yourself that—under like conditions—can do what other men have done.

Make the Start—Mail this Coupon

W. A. Shryer, President,
American Collection Service, Detroit, Mich.

Tell me how I can establish a Commercial Agency without capital, and explain your offer to train me in "Collection Sense and Science". Send me the names, addresses and photographs of the offices of men who have succeeded with your help.

Name.....

Address.....

Let me send you the interesting proofs of successes won by other men who have begun as I began and as you can begin—without capital, and even without at first giving up your present position.
You will simply grow out of your position into your own business.
Wherever you are, there is a rich field for you in this work. Make the start—mail this coupon today.

W. A. Shryer, President

American Collection Service

394 State Street,

Detroit, Mich.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

GET TOGETHER PAGE

In this page our subscribers will have the free use of a four line space for one insertion. In this space they may advertise themselves for sale or may advertise for the services of some one else. Others—not subscribers to THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER—will be obliged to pay 25 cents per line for classified ads. In sending in your ads you should figure seven words to the line so that there will be no trouble over the insertion.

WANTED — COSMOPOLITAN MAGAZINE RE- quires the services of a representative in all localities to look after subscription renewals and to extend circulation by special methods which have proved unusually successful. Salary and commission. Previous experience desirable but not essential. Whole time or spare time. Address, with references, H. C. Campbell, Cosmopolitan Magazine, 1789 Broadway, New York City. F

YOUNG MAN, GRADUATE OF THE SHELTON
School, desires position as local representative. Eight years' experience, selling, canvassing and collecting. Address A. L. Rowe, Roland Park, Baltimore, Md. F

WANTED—ENERGETIC, HONEST, TEMPERATE
specialty salesman. Two to ten thousand per year. No salary hunting order takers need apply. References and bond necessary. Call or write at once, Commercial Register Company, Buffalo, N. Y.

POSITION WANTED—BY MARRIED MAN, 30 years of age, student Sheldon School of Salesmanship. Sixteen years' experience in wall paper and painting, eight years as contractor. Desires resident agency for St. Louis and suburbs, or traveling surrounding states for a well known firm catering to the above line. References. Address, E. W. Murray, 6562 McCune Ave., St. Louis, Mo.

START AN EASY AND LUCRATIVE BUSINESS.
We teach you how to establish a successful collection business and refer business to you. No capital required. Little competition. Rare opportunities. Write for Free Pointers today. American Collection Service, 165 State St., Detroit, Mich.

SALESMEN WANTED—IF YOU ARE A CLERK
with natural qualifications as a salesman, I have an exceptional opportunity to offer you. If you are a merchant going out of business and looking for an opportunity to go on the road, my proposition will appeal to you. I want two or three capable men with the work habit, and who have energy plus. I want men with ability to sell goods all day long. I require references, also send an abstract of your qualifications. I have an advertising specialty proposition that interests all progressive retailers. Hundreds of the best retailers have endorsed my plan because they have found it profitable. Samples will go in coat pocket. My best salesmen are making from $55 to $1,000 a month. I want men who can do just as well or better. If you are of the right caliber, think you can handle a high-class, ready selling proposition, write me immediately before all territory is assigned. W. F. Main, Dept. 117, Iowa City, Iowa.

RETAIL ADVERTISING THAT WILL BEAT A
San Francisco earthquake to start town talk. Address G. C. Beaman, 115 W. Pitkin, Pueblo, Colo.

FOR SALE—TYPEWRITER BARGAINS. BRAND
new No. 5 Oliver, with tabulator, $60. No. 6 Williams, $35. Other makes. Good ribbons, 25 cents. N. E. Ramsey, Lincoln, N. C. Ref., First Nat. Bank.

AGENTS MAKE BIG MONEY SELLING OUR
new gold letters for office windows, store fronts, and glass signs. Anyone can put them on. Write today for free sample and full particulars. Metallic Sign Letter Co., 431 N. Clark St., Chicago.

WANTED—AGENTS TO TAKE SUBSCRIPTIONS to THE BACKBONE MONTHLY—"a serum against softening of the moral spine"—a magazine so different, both editorially and typographically. Show a sample copy and there's a sale on the spot. Agents are making money with THE BACKBONE MONTHLY. Come on in! Sample copies, terms and blanks on request. The Backbone Society, 144 Fox St., Aurora, Illinois.

LOCAL REPRESENTATIVE WANTED—SPLEN- did income assured right man to act as our representative after learning our business thoroughly by mail. Former experience unnecessary. All we require is honesty, ability, ambition and willingness to learn a lucrative business. No soliciting or traveling. This is an exceptional opportunity for a man in your section to get into a big-paying business without capital and become independent for life. Write at once for full particulars. Address E. R. Marden, Pres. The Nat'l Co-op. Real Estate Co., Suite 494 Marden Bldg., Washington, D. C.

WANTED—POSITION AS TRAVELING SALES- man—specialty line—am willing to work on commission basis. Can give best of references. Address B. T. Garrette, Jamestown, Tenn.

BUILD A BUSINESS OF YOUR OWN AND
escape salaried drudgery for life. Learn the collection business. Limitless field; little competition. Few opportunities so profitable. Send for "Pointers" today. American Collection Service, 165 State St., Detroit, Mich.

WANTED—POSITION AS OFFICE SALESMAN
with western realty firm. I have had experience, am a Sheldon man, typewriter, bookkeeper, advertisement writer. References given. J. C. Albright, Hutchinson, Kansas. F

WE WANT AN EXPERIENCED SPECIALTY
salesman—a man with energy and ability to close sales. We require the best of references and the applicant must be of good character and habits. Columbian Enameling & Stamping Co., Terre Haute, Ind.

WANTED—LIVE SALESMAN OR OFFICE MAN,
not over 35 years, unquestionable integrity and character. One whose reputation will bear closest kind of scrutiny. Must be either thorough office man on system and correspondence or up to now salesman. Latter preferred. Sheldon graduate or Christian Scientist desired. Must have $5,000 to $6,250 to invest in my business, which earned over $30,000 last year. Am preparing to expand. Money without the above qualifications will not admit you. I insist on closest inspection and grant as much freely. Confer first with my attorney as to preliminaries, in person. Leon S. Aischuler, Stock Exchange Building, Chicago.

WANTED—SALESMEN WITH RED BLOOD AND
determination to sell the Commercial Account Register and Duplicating Books. Territory guaranteed. References and bond required. Commercial Register Company, Buffalo, N. Y.

LOCAL REPRESENTATIVE WANTED—SPLEN-
did income assured right man to act as our representative after learning our business thoroughly by mail. Former experience unnecessary. All we require is honesty, ability, ambition and willingness to learn a lucrative business. No soliciting or traveling. This is an exceptional opportunity for a man in your section to get into a big-paying business without capital and become independent for life. Write at once for full particulars. Address E. R. Marden, President The Nat'l Co-op. Real Estate Co., Suite 494 Marden Bldg., Washington, D. C.

Correspondent who can swing Western flour and feed advertising to a milling publication, may hear of an opening with future prospects, by addressing WILLIAMS & CUNNINGHAM, 42 Madison Street, Chicago, Illinois.

YOUR SUMMER HOME

SHORE ACRES SUBDIVISION, LAKE EARA

OF COURSE you want to own a summer home. There is something in you that calls for woods, meadows, cool waters, and broad, comfortable porches, when summer comes and brick walls and paving stones shimmer and quiver with the heat. You need rest and relaxation.

You may have to be in the city on business during the day. But you are refreshed and renewed by the evenings and the week-ends at your summer home.

And it makes you glad to know that wife and babies are away from the glare, the blare, and the dust, getting strong and rosy at your summer home.

No, this is not a millionaire's dream. That summer home is within your reach. And, if your business is in Chicago, it is only an hour's run from that city—you can come out every night. If further away, you can come Friday or Saturday and stay until Monday.

For your summer home, I have just opened a new sub-division on the shores of Lake Eara—the most beautiful of all the famous lakes of Northern Illinois. It is only thirty-five miles from Chicago—three railways run from it into the city.

There are a limited number of lots, all at reasonable prices—first come, first served. When you buy a lot, you buy fishing, swimming, and boating privileges on Lake Eara. There is no lake property so near Cbicago at anything like the price.

My primary object in opening this sub-division is to finance the first building of Sheldon Commercial University.

I want these summer homes, as far as possible to be owned by Sheldon Graduates or those in sympathy with A R E A philosophy.

*Write me today, saying you are interested
and I will tell you all about it*

A. F. SHELDON
LIBERTYVILLE, ILLINOIS

SHELDON'S LAKE SHORE DRIVE, LAKE EARA

WALTHAM WATCHES ON CREDIT

FULL JEWEL WALTHAM $10<sup>65</sup>

1st Fine 20-Year Gold-filled Case. Guaranteed to keep Accurate Time
SENT ON FREE TRIAL. ALL CHARGES PREPAID.

You do not pay one penny until you have seen and examined this High-Grade, Full Jeweled Waltham Watch, with Patent Hairspring, in any style hand-engraved Case, right in your own hands.

Greatest Bargain EVER OFFERED. $1 a Month.

We trust every honest person. No matter how far away you live, or how small your salary or income, we will trust you for a high grade adjusted Waltham Watch, in gold case, warranted for 25 years, and guaranteed to pass any Railroad inspection. Write for our big free Watch and Diamond Catalog. It tells all about our
LOFTIS THE OLD RELIABLE ORIGINAL DIAMOND AND WATCH CREDIT HOUSE
Dept. L 811 32th STATE ST., CHICAGO, ILL.
BROS & CO. 1888 Branches: Pittsburg, Pa., St. Louis, Mo.
Easy Payment Plan—the "Loftis System"—and how we send Waltham, Elgin and Illinois Watches, 18, 16, 12, and "O" sizes, 19, 21, and 23 Jewel, anywhere without security or one cent deposit. Send for the Loftis Magazine. It is Free.

THE VERY LATEST THING IN DUPLICATORS

"CANTYPE" SPRING-FRAME DUPLICATOR

1000 Perfect Reproductions per Hour of Hand-writing,
Typewriting, Music or Drawing

Circulars can be taken direct from the Duplicator, and laid one copy on top another without off-setting or blurring. No other duplicator possesses this advantage. Circulars and samples of work on application. The only makers in America of all descriptions of ribbons, clean carbon papers, duplicators, stencil papers, inks, etc. Agents wanted in all unoccupied territory.

A Rapid, Medium-Priced Duplicating Machine

Simple, durable, rapid, clean, perfect work. Portable, inexpensive, practical, compact, noiseless,

Cheaper to Buy Cheaper to Run

CHAS. E. ARCHBALD, PRESIDENT

PEN-CARBON MANIFOLD CO.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.

Originators and Only Manufacturers of Non-Flake Carbon Paper for Typewriter, Pen, Pencil and Stylus

Health and Personal Power!

"The Attainment of Efficiency" Through Rational Methods

By W. R. C. LATSON, M.D., Editor of Health-Culture.

This new work by Dr. Latson indicates the avenues that lead to efficient and successful living and should be read by every man and woman who would reach their best and attain to their highest ambitions in business, professional, domestic or social life. The following are some of the many chapter headings:

How to Live the Efficient Life—Mental Habits and Health—Secret of Mental Supremacy
—The Noblest Conquest—Firmness of Power—The Power of Calmness—How to Be an Efficient Worker—The Attainment of Personal Power—The Secret of Personal Magnetism—How to Increase Vitality—The Prime Secret of Health—The Conquest of Worry
—The Attainment of Success—The Way to Happiness—The Secret of a Beautiful Voice—The Attainment of Physical Endurance—How to Live Longer in the Land—Secret of Rest—Sleeping as a Fine Art—Common Sense Feeling—Grace and How to Get It—Style and How to Have It—How to Have a Fine Complexion—How to Cure Yourself When Sick.

Each of these chapters is full of practical suggestions that will prove invaluable to the reader, bound in cloth, $1.00. A very handsome name-bound edition of this price, $2.00, will be given with each copy of the (31.00 a year) 6 months, both for 50c., money back if not satisfied.

HEALTH-CULTURE CO., 601 St. James Bldg., New York

HEALTH CULTURE CO.,
601 St. James Bldg., New York.

Enclosed find 50c for Attainment of Efficiency and Health-Culture to Jan.,
1911. Money to be returned if not satisfied.

DR. LATSON

ADDRESS:

Name .....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

.....

Wanted!

Agents to take subscriptions to The Backbone Monthly—"A magazine for and about people who are doing things worth while"—a magazine so different, both editorially and typographically. Show a sample copy and there's a sale on the spot. Agents are making money with The Backbone Monthly. Come on in! Sample copies, terms and blanks on request. The Backbone Society, 144 Fox St., Aurora, Illinois.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

$3,000 to $10,000 Per Year For You

I can make you prosperous. If you want to earn more money—if you want to establish yourself in an independent business requiring no capital—send me your name and address on coupon below (for a postal will do) and I will mail you, free, our Big 62-Page Book, fully explaining just how you can fit yourself to earn big money in the Real Estate, Brokerage and Insurance Business. Our thoroughly tested successful system not only equips you fully on every point of Real Estate, Brokerage and Insurance, we also give you, free, a valuable course in Commercial Law. Our Free Book is of great interest to anyone, but is of vital importance to Clerks, Book Keepers, Salesmen, Agents, Solicitors and others who are ambitious to be in a good paying business of their own.

International Realty Corp., 417 Manhattan Bldg., Chicago
Successors to The Cross Co. and H. W. Cross & Co.

This Book Shows You How to Succeed in Real Estate, Brokerage and Insurance

Send no money, but merely your name and address on a postal or on the Coupon below

NAME .....

ADDRESS .....

Need Envelopes?

"Write Hogan"

MAKERS OF

EVERYTHING IN ENVELOPES

Hogan Envelope Company, Inc.
319-331 West Ohio Street, Chicago

A Live Wire Connection for High Class Salesmen

A large manufacturer of a complete line of Cooking and Heating Stoves and Ranges, desires to secure the services of several strictly high-class traveling salesmen, who are able to deliver signed orders instead of promises. None but men who have received a High School or College education will be considered.

Please address with photograph and statement of qualifications, in own handwriting.

"Progress"—This Office

Stiffen Up Your Backbone!

The Backbone Monthly

"A Serum Against Softening of the Moral Spine"

It will help you develop more power, teach you how to control your forces and stiffen up your backbone. You will find its pages brimful of helpful, inspiring, scientific and man-building advice. Tom Dreier edits it! Typographically it's a gem! Men who usually criticise have only good things to say about it. One year, one dollar; one copy, ten cents—and it's worth more!

Special Offer! If you will send us one dollar and the coupon below, we'll send you The Backbone Monthly for one year, and as an appreciation we will mail you a copy of the "Backbone" booklet (a bouncer for the blues) without charge. Mail the coupon today!

-----SEND ME YOUR BACKBONE!-----

THE BACKBONE SOCIETY, Aurora, Illinois: Here's a dollar; send me The Backbone Monthly for one year and mail me a copy of the "Backbone" Booklet.

Name .....

Address .....

B.P.-10-10

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

3000 GUMMED LABELS $1.00
POSTPAID
SIZE, 1X2 INCHES PRINTED TO ORDER

Other styles & sizes for every purpose.
Send for free catalog — you'll find just what you need. Our high quality and low prices will surprise you.

VENTON LABEL CO.
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

GOOD SHORTHAND REPORTER

is the only kind you can afford to employ. I am well prepared to handle all kinds of law and general reporting.

FRED H. GURTLE

SHORTHAND REPORTER

10 Randolph 3038 810-811 Reaper Block, CHICAGO

I WILL MAKE YOU PROSPEROUS

If you are honest and ambitious write me today. No matter where you live or what your occupation, I will teach you the Real Estate business by mail; appoint you Special Representative of my Company in your town; start you in a profitable business of your own, and help you make big money at once.

Unusual opportunity for men without capital to become independent for life.
Valuable Book and full particulars Free.
Write today.

NATIONAL CO-OPERATIVE REALTY CO.
117 Marden Building
Washington, D. C.

Harden, Pres.

Early Arrivals of New Fall Woolens Now on Sale —

Suits or Overcoats
$25 to $55

NICOLL The Tailor
W. JERREMS SONS
CLARK AND ADAMS STS.
CHICAGO

if you have advertising troubles I can help you

I make sketches, layouts
and dummies or handle
your advertising campaign
complete — Write me.

Burton Gibbs Smith

ADVERTISING COUNSELLOR
1150 OLD COLONY BUILDING — CHICAGO

Salesmen Wanted

WE WANT a few strictly high-class specialty salesmen, preferably men with experience selling advertising campaigns. Proposition will pay from $300 to $500 per month or better. We have good territory open. If you can do justice to a proposition of high merit, write us at once, giving outline of your business experience and several references. This is a proposition for brainy, energetic, scientific salesmen who are willing to work intelligently for big money.

Box 623, Jacksonville, Florida

Dr. Lindlahr's Sanitarium for Nature Cure

offers complete sanitarium facilities to patients from a distance and to those who wish to live the natural life in natural surroundings. We successfully treat all forms of so-called incurable diseases without the use of poisonous drugs or surgery.

Nature Cure by Mail

In this department we are prepared to take care of patients at a distance who cannot have the benefit of instruction and treatment in our sanitarium. Free literature and diagnosis blank furnished on application.

Send for Valuable Free Health- Culture Literature

A LIMITED NUMBER OF VOLS. I. and
II. of the NATURE CURE MAGAZINE, cloth bound, are now for sale. Price $1.50 per volume,
postpaid.

Dr. Lindlahr's Sanitarium

525 Ashland Boulevard, Chicago
Telephone, Monroe 2246

Down town offices and Treatment rooms:
84 Adams St., Rooms 404-406
Telephone Harrison 6130

$100 in Gold Given Away

A GENUINE bona fide offer. Read our proposition. Are you a smart speller? We give $100 in gold and other prizes named below to those able to make the largest list of words from the words The Rountree Publishing Company. You can make at least twenty, we believe, and if your list is the largest you will get the greatest prize. In case of a tie, prizes will be divided between highest contestants. Here are the rules to follow: Use only words in the English language. Words alike, but with different meanings can be used but once. Use any dictionary. Pronouns, nouns, verbs, adverbs, suffixes, adjectives, proper nouns, allowed. Anything that is a legitimate word will be allowed. This is the way: Heart, temple, rain, only. Use these words and arrange alphabetically. The following is a list of the prizes:

$25.00 for the largest list of words as above. $20.00 set of Encyclopedia, second largest list. $15.00 third largest list. $12.00 set of dishes, fourth largest list. $10.00 Mission Lamp, fifth largest list. $10.00 cash, sixth largest list. $5.00 cash, seventh largest list. $2.00 each to the next twenty-two highest. Subscriptions to the Dixie Home one year to the next hundred highest.

We want you to know The Dixie Home, which is one of the brightest and best illustrated magazines in the world, and it is for this reason that we offer these premiums. We make no extra charge for the privilege of entering this word-building contest. To enter the contest it is necessary for you to send us fifty cents or subscription to the Dixie Home for one year, with your list of words. List should be sent at once. The lucky names will be published later. This is a great offer to those who take an interest in such contests.

Address

“Contest Editor,” Dixie Home, Dept. 13, Birmingham, Alabama

A Business Asset

The ability to speak and write English correctly is a business asset of no means importance. Yet how rare it is! You, Mr. Salesman or Mr. Business Man need this ability and it can easily be acquired. There is a fascinating way to

Polish Up Your English

It is by reading “Correct English—How to Use It,” a monthly magazine for cultured people, devoted to the use of correct English. It will pay you to get in touch with this unique magazine, as it is the only one of its kind. Read carefully this

Partial List of Contents—Shall and Will; Should and Would; How to Use Them; Correct English in the Home; Correct English in the School; What to Say and What Not to Say; Course in Grammar; Letter Writing and Punctuation; Business English for the Business Man; Compound Words; How to Write Them; Studies in English Literature

The subscription price is only $1.00 a year, but if you prefer to see a copy before subscribing—

Send Only 10 Cents

for a copy of the current issue. You will never regret it. So if you are interested in your own welfare, do this now before you turn another page. But better still, use the Coupon TO-DAY.

Correct English Publishing Company ... 212 Monroe Street, Chicago, Illinois

CUT OFF HERE

CORRECT ENGLISH PUBLISHING COMPANY, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

Name .....

Local Address .....

Postoffice ..... State .....

B. P.

SAY—“I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER”

Believe Your Memory

Depend on this convenient, useful, gentleman's memo book to keep your dates, figures, names, memos, etc., in better, neater style.

Bennett Everlasting Memorandum Book

—leather cover, 3.3-4 x 8 inches, pocket for cards, removable pads—the most convenient. Price complete with your name stamped in gold on the cover and four inside pads, only . . . . . $1.00

Send no money Simply send us your name and we will forward the book with your name printed. If satisfied, send us our $1.00. If not, return the book. Send today.

W. W. BENNETT CO.
Box 146, East End Pittsburgh, Penn.

ONE DOLLAR BRINGS YOU

"The Rational Life"

By WILL J. ERWOOD

The latest word on: Love—Marriage—Divorce; the Sex Question; Social Evils; The Rational Life; The Conquest of Self, etc. It is as fascinating as a romance. It is live thought on live issues.

It is written for you . . . EVERYMAN!
And for you . . . EVERY WOMAN!

And you too, mother and father, it has ideals for you! Send for it! Read it together! It will help to make "Home, Sweet Home!"
Finely bound, cloth and gold, about 200 pages; at from the press. Postpaid, only One Dollar.

Address: WILL J. ERWOOD

apt. B. 717 East 22nd Street, Baltimore, Md.

Embossed Business Stationery

Printed from Steel Dies
Send for Samples

Engraved Cards

We engrave a one-line plate and furnish 100 engraved cards, postpaid. Engraved in script, $1.25; block, $1.50; solid Roman, old English or French script, $1.75; shaded old English or block, $2.00; shaded Roman or French script, $2.25. Cash to be sent with order. Best stock used. Monogram stationery. Wedding and business announcements.

The American Embossing Co.

192-69 SENECA STREET, BUFFALO, N. Y.

Financing an Enterprise

By FRANCIS COOPER

TWO volumes that have helped hundreds of men win fortunes by showing them how to successfully finance and promote their business or their discoveries. Highly endorsed. Only successful work on promotion.

Volume 1 describes conditions necessary for successful financing: how to investigate, protect and capitalize an enterprise; experimental work and model making.

Volume 2 tells best methods for securing money, privately, or publicly, by advertising; how to advertise, how to write a winning prospectus. Important chapters on stock, bonds, incorporations, etc.

Invaluable knowledge gathered from fifteen years' experience. Save you hundred times its cost. Full descriptive circular if you want it.

500 pp. 1908 ed. Buckram binding. Two vols., $4.00 prepaid. Either vol. separately, $2.00 prepaid.

HELDON UNIVERSITY PRESS
LIBERTYVILLE, ILLINOIS

SPINAL IRRITATION

An elegantly illustrated booklet explaining the cause and cure of the disease that produces the following

SYMPTOMS:

HEADACHE or pains in the head, especially in the Back part or Base of Brain; Nervous or Bilious Headache; sensations that feel like the pulling or stretching of
CORDS in the Neck; trouble with the
EYES connected with pain or aching in back part of head or neck or upper part of shoulders; aches or pains in the eyes or back of the head; specks or spots before the eyes or blurred vision; a frequent desire to
SIGH or YAWN or take a deep, full breath, and in some cases, an inability to do so;
PALPITATION or irregularity of the heart; pains, oppression, difficult breathing, or very peculiar and disagreeable feelings in the region of the
HEART, LUNGS, STOMACH, or other parts of the body that doctors often call Neuralgia, Rheumatism, Indigestion, Heart trouble and various other names, but fail to cure; aches or pains in the region of the
KIDNEYS; BACKACHE; sensations of oppression or constriction like a
BELT AROUND THE BODY, or part way around;
PARTIAL PARALYSIS of arms, shoulders, hands, lower limbs or feet, causing pains in these members, or a
NUMB FEELING or sensations of coldness, heaviness, or a tingling or feelings resembling the
PRICKING OF PINS or needles or as if the parts were asleep;
SORE, TENDER OR BURNING points along the spine or in the limbs or feet; pains in the face, arms, back, lower limbs or feet, resembling those of
NEURALGIA OR SCIATIC RHEUMATISM (physicians often treat these symptoms as ordinary neuralgia or rheumatism, but such treatment will not cure them);
CHILLS UP OR DOWN BACK;
CREEPING sensations, coldness or numbness; pain
BETWEEN SHOULDERS.

If you have the above named symptoms, or any of them, you probably have SPINAL IRRITATION, a very serious disorder that but few physicians can cure. Yet it is very easily cured by proper treatment. Our elegantly illustrated booklet explains how. It also describes the disease and explains what causes it.

Price, 10 Cents

OHIO STATE PUBLISHING CO., 93-5 The Birmingham, Cleveland, O.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

If These Men Know it, Don't ? You Want to Know it Too .....

PROF. FLOURNOY, of the University of Geneva, Switzerland, says of it: "We have nothing so well done in French."

PROF. RICHET, of Paris, France—"I have read it with the keenest interest."

PROF. MAX DESSOIR, of Berlin, Germany—"I was especially pleased with its sound, original ideas."

PROF. SCHILLER, of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, England—"I was particularly pleased with this book."

DR. VAN EEDEN, Amsterdam, Holland—"The sort of a book I considered absolutely necessary for the enlightenment of the public on this important subject."

PROF. BARRETT, of the Royal College of Sciences for Ireland—"I trust this work will really have the wide circulation it deserves."

SIR WILLIAM CROOKES, F. R. S., of London—"This book should be read with the utmost interest and care."

DR. I. K. FUNK, of Funk and Wagnalls, New York—"A strong book on a most vital subject."

MORTON C. PRINCE, M. D., of Boston—"I am sure it is destined to do a great deal of good."

HON. LYMAN J. GAGE, banker, ex-secretary of the U. S. treasury—"It has made good its purpose, which cannot be said of all books."

PROF. ELMER GATES, of Washington, D. C.—"It is the best simple statement of the subject extant."

REV. SAMUEL FALLOWS, D. D., LL. D., Presiding Bishop Episcopal Church, Chicago—"Practical, reliable, and has rendered a great service to the world."

REV. NEWELL DWIGHT HILLIS, D. D., Brooklyn, N. Y.—"Fills a real want. All persons will find it most suggestive and helpful."

REV. H. W. THOMAS, D. D., Ph. D., Chicago—"It reaches the heights of a singular power over its readers. There is certainly coming, and very near, a new birth of life."

ELBERT HUBBARD, East Aurora, N. Y.—"It shows a sure insight into the heart of things that is bound to make the world better."

What are they all talking about?

About a New Book by DR. STANLEY LeFEVRE KREBS entitled

"The Law of Suggestion"

If you wish we can get a copy for you, cloth-bound, post-paid,
for 75 cents. (Stamps, check or money-order.)

Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Illinois

It Pays to Buy Your Goods From a Reliable House

Read What our Customer says
in Regard to Our Carbon Paper

"We have found the Carbon Paper which we have secured from you people to be the most satisfactory of any carbon that we have secured from any other firms, and we have bought Carbon from at least four other dealers since we got the last from you. We ordered some Carbon now and we enclose herewith check for $2.00 which we believe is the price we paid you for one hundred sheets before. On an old box which we have in the office which we secured from you is printed: "100 Sheets Durable Typewriter Paper, $2.00 a Box."

How is That for a Boost?

Don't you want to try a box of this good grade carbon? If so, send $2.00 along to the

National Office Supply Company
ZION CITY, ILLINOIS

"The Square Deal House" who will promptly fill your order.

We carry two kinds; "Favorite," the high-grade, light weight carbon for manifolding, $3.00 a box. Also, our "Durable" carbon at $2.00 a box per hundred sheets.

Agents wanted to carry our up-to-date line of office supplies
ALL GOODS GUARANTEED. SEND FOR CATALOG

THE ALAMO

Colorado Springs' New Fire-Proof Hotel

*Strictly First-Class—American
and European Plan*

RATES:

*American Plan—$2.50 to $4.00
per day and upwards.*

*European Plan—$1.00 per day
and upwards.*

*150 Rooms—Fifty Elegant Suites
with private baths.*

*Golf and other Outdoor Sports
accessible to guests.*

Colorado Springs, Colorado

HEN IN DETROIT STOP AT HOTEL TULLER

New and Absolutely
Fireproof

Cor. Adams Ave.
and Park St.

In the center of the Theatre, Shopping
and Business
District.

Has large Convention Hall.

Has grand Roof
Garden Cafe.

Music from 6 P. M.
to 12:30 A. M.

Every Room has Private Bath

EUROPEAN PLAN

RATES: $1.50 PER DAY AND UP

W. TULLER - - Proprietor

Get the Chautauqua Idea

Don't read at random. Read a definite course. Train your attention upon a group of related topics. Learn about "Democratic England" this year. A reading set of Magazine-teacher and four books, complete in itself. Four such courses of the Chautauqua cycle, read in spare minutes, will give the college outlook, renew the early vision of liberal culture, bring that comprehensive understanding of world movements which makes for personal efficiency. Course neither difficult or expensive. Begin now.

FOR PARTICULARS ADDRESS

Chautauqua Institution

CHAUTAUQUA, NEW YORK

Learn About England

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

The International Business Correspondence Course

CLIMB UP

Special Instruction for Home Study in

Higher Accounting and Manufacturing Costs

for those who desire to qualify for higher positions and higher salaries as Chief Accountants, Cost Accounting, Auditors, etc.

The Course Comprises

The International Business Encyclopedia; six lessons on Higher Accounting; six lessons on Factory Cost Accounting; twelve sets of Exercises to be worked out; twelve sets of Standard Answers, and the personal attention of the Board of Examiners.

THE COST

Special Terms until October 1, 1910—This comprehensive, complete and fully effective Business Correspondence Course is offered at the temporary and very low introductory price of $10 cash, or $12 payable in easy installments of $2 down or $2 per month for five months. On and after October 1, 1910, the price will be $20 cash, or $24 on the installment plan.

E. H. BEACH, Publisher ... Detroit, Michigan

IF YOU WANT TO KNOW ANYTHING ABOUT

Ohio

The State of Marvelous Natural Resources. The State of Great Manufacturing Advantages. Where Good Business is Encouraged and Bad Business is Discouraged.

IF YOU WANT TO KNOW ANYTHING ABOUT OHIO, YOU'LL FIND IT IN

The Ohio Journal of Commerce

a weekly journal published by the business men of the state in the interest of all business. Subscription: Two dollars a year. THE OHIO JOURNAL OF COMMERCE is read every Saturday by the progressive business men of Ohio.

If you want to reach this money-spending class of Ohioans, place your advertisement in THE OHIO JOURNAL OF COMMERCE. We will be glad to give you any information about Ohio and THE OHIO JOURNAL OF COMMERCE.

The Ohio Journal of Commerce Co.

339 CHAMBER OF COMMERCE BUILDING :: :: COLUMBUS, OHIO

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

PRACTICAL BUSINESS BOOKS!

Examine the List—Select Those That Will
Help You—Mail Your Order Today

Authorized American Edition of DICKSEE'S AUDITING

Revised and Enlarged
By Robert H. Montgomery, C. P. A.

The acknowledged authority in both England and America on all subjects connected with auditing. The present edition retains all the valuable matter of the first edition, revised and brought up to date, and in addition over 200 pages of entirely new matter. The subject treatment is (1) Auditing—Up to the Trial Balance; (2) Methods of Account; (3) Special Considerations in Different Classes of Audit; (4) Auditing—From Trial Balance to Balance Sheet; (5) Forms of Account and Balance Sheets; (6) What Are Profits? (7) The Attitude of the Auditor; (8) The Liabilities of Auditors; (9) Investigations; (10) Interest; (11) Professional Ethics; (12) C. P. A. Examination Questions. Contains 100 pages of model forms of Balance Sheets, Income and Profit and Loss Accounts, etc., etc. 6 x 9. 586 pages. 1909. Durable cloth, gold stamped. $5.00 delivered.

CORPORATE FINANCE and ACCOUNTING

By H. C. Bentley, C. P. A.

Every corporation treasurer and accountant should possess this book. It is a complete working manual covering the daily duties of these officials. In six parts, as follows: (1) The corporation treasurer, his legal status, the requirements of his office, his duties, powers and liabilities, his relation to corporate affairs in general, his bonding; (2) An extended exposition of the methods and forms for practical corporate accounting, describing the various forms of books and entries; (3) Corporate finances, including funds in general, bank deposits, checks and dividends; (4) Negotiable instruments, their nature and requisites, their general and special liabilities, their collection; (5) Corporate securities; (6) 44 model legal forms for signatures, checks, receipts, resolutions and certifications. 6 x 9. Buckram. 500 pp. $4.00 delivered.

A Manual of CORPORATE MANAGEMENT

By Thos. Conynghon of the N. Y. Bar

No corporation official can really afford to be without this book. In it can be found immediately a clear, accurate, non-technical answer to any question concerning the legal side of corporate management. Tells the purposes, scope, and uses of the Charter and By-Laws: the rights, duties, powers and liabilities of Officers, Directors, and Stockholders under all circumstances: explains fully the issuance, sale, record and transfer of stock: tells how to conduct meetings: how to keep all books of record; and discusses such important matters as Committees, Dividends, Consolidations, Re-organization, etc. A safe guide in any state. Contains also over 200 model legal forms, covering practically every matter in corporation work requiring a form. Third Edition. 1909. 6 x 9. Buckram binding. $3.50 delivered.

CONDITIONAL SALES

By F. B. Haring of the Buffalo Bar

No concern which makes credit sales should be without this book. It states clearly the requirements for a valid contract of conditional sale in every state of the Union, whereby title to goods sold is retained in the vendor until payment has been made. This information is arranged under uniform headings giving Legal Status of Contracts, how to execute them, acknowledgement or proof required, recording or filing necessary, recording fee, renewals, discharge, Landlord's lien, criminal liability of vendee, action for money judgment, claim on fixtures, when vendor or vendee loses, etc. Approved forms of contracts, acknowledgements, etc. Used as a guide by hundreds of the largest concerns in the country. "Send us another copy," say Lyon & Healy, Chicago. 6 x 9. Buckram. 1909. $5.00 delivered.

A Manual of CORPORATE ORGANIZATION

By Thos. Conynghon of the N. Y. Bar

Explains clearly and in detail every step necessary for the organization and incorporation of a new company or the reorganization of an old one. Describes ends sought by incorporation: stock subscription lists and contracts: tells where to incorporate and the expense: detailed explanation of capitalization and the stock system and the status of stockholders: describes the nature and functions of the Charter and By-laws: tells how to conduct meetings: how to elect officers and directors, and defines their duties, powers and liabilities; full information for the protection of minority interests, protection of an inventor, underwriting, promoters, etc., etc. Accurate, authoritative, up-to-date, and entirely free from legal technicalities. Second Ed. 1908. 6 x 9. Buckram. $3.00 delivered.

FINANCING an ENTERPRISE

By Francis Cooper

A practical two-volume work telling how to secure capital and successfully promote a business enterprise of any kind. Vol. I describes conditions necessary for successful financing: tells how to investigate, protect, and capitalize an enterprise, discusses experimental work and model making. Vol. II tells best methods for securing money, privately, or publicly, by advertising: how to write a prospectus. Important chapters on stocks, bonds, incorporation, underwriting, etc. Written from 15 years' promoting experience. Only reliable work on the subject. Third edition. 1909. 543 pp. Buckram. Both vols. $4.00 delivered. Either vol. singly $2.00 delivered.

Complete Descriptive Circular of Any Book on Request

THE RONALD PRESS COMPANY

Publishers of Business Books, and of
THE BUSINESS WORLD, a magazine of Practical Business

Rooms 14-20
229 Broadway, New York

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Increase Your A+R+E+A

The following books are recommended by The Sheldon School for home reading and can be purchased from The Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Illinois.

|                                                                            |         |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------|
| Art of Writing and Speaking the English Language; 4 Vols.....              | $ 2.00 |
| As a Man Thinketh. Paper, 15 cents; cloth, 50 cents.....                   | 2.50    |
| A. B. Z. of Our Own Nutrition.....                                         | 1.00    |
| American Commonwealth .....                                                | 1.75    |
| Art of Living Long.....                                                    | 1.50    |
| Art of Living in Good Health.....                                          | 1.35    |
| Art of Science of Advertising.....                                         | 2.00    |
| Art of Thinking.....                                                       | 1.00    |
| Adam Bede .....                                                            | 1.00    |
| As a Matter of Course.....                                                 | 1.00    |
| Auto Suggestion .....                                                      | 1.00    |
| Backbone, Ribbon-tied, Art Binding, 50 cents; Limp Leather, [de luxe]..... | 1.00    |
| Boy Wanted .....                                                           | 1.25    |
| Back in Harness.....                                                       | .50     |
| Brain Power Manual.....                                                    | 2.00    |
| Brain and Personality.....                                                 | 1.30    |
| Browning's Poems .....                                                     | .60     |
| Bryant's Poems .....                                                       | .75     |
| Business Law .....                                                         | 1.00    |
| Business Power.....                                                        |         |
| Business Short Cuts.....                                                   | 1.00    |
| Caxton Brochures .....                                                     | .14     |
| A Certain Rich Man.....                                                    | 1.50    |
| Character .....                                                            | 1.00    |
| Character Reader Vaughns.....                                              | 1.00    |
| Character Reader Symes.....                                                | .50     |
| The Clerk's Book.....                                                      | .25     |
| Story of Creation.....                                                     | 1.25    |
| Primer of Logic.....                                                       | .50     |
| Common Sense of the Exact Sciences.....                                    | 1.50    |
| Corporate Management .....                                                 | 3.00    |
| Compendium of All Card Systems.....                                        | 3.00    |
| Corporate Organization .....                                               | 3.00    |
| Correspondence Course .....                                                | 15.00   |
| Cosmic Consciousness.....                                                  | 4.00    |
| Creative Imagination .....                                                 | 1.75    |
| Credit and its Uses.....                                                   | 1.50    |
| The Crisis.....                                                            | 1.50    |
| David Copperfield.....                                                     | 1.00    |
| David Harum .....                                                          | 1.50    |
| Darrow's Farmington.....                                                   | 1.50    |
| Dictionary of English Synonyms.....                                        | 2.00    |
| Deserted Village.....                                                      | .50     |
| Dictionary of Philosophy and Psychology.....                               | 16 00   |
| Dictionary of Philosophy.....                                              | 10.00   |
| Diseases of the Will.....                                                  | .75     |
| The Doors of Life.....                                                     | 1.00    |
| The Dore Lectures.....                                                     |         |
| Duty .....                                                                 | 1.00    |

THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

|                                                                         |      |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------|------|
| Elementary Lessons in Electricity and Magnetism.....                    | 1.40 |
| Education of the Will.....                                              | 1.50 |
| Elegy in a Country Churchyard.....                                      | .75  |
| Empire of Business.....                                                 | 3.00 |
| Emerson's Poems.....                                                    | .60  |
| Essay on the Creative Imagination.....                                  | 1.75 |
| Essentials of Elocution.....                                            | 1.25 |
| Everyman Magazine.....                                                  | 1.00 |
| Everyman a King.....                                                    | 1.00 |
| Evolution of General Ideas.....                                         | 1.25 |
| Evolution of the Soul.....                                              | 1.50 |
| Fiction.....                                                            | 1.50 |
| Financial Advertising.....                                              | 5.00 |
| Financing an Enterprise.....                                            | 4.00 |
| First Lessons in Finance.....                                           | 1.25 |
| Food and Dietetics.....                                                 | 3.00 |
| Form Paragraph Letter Writer.....                                       | 3.00 |
| Franklin's Biography.....                                               | 1.50 |
| Freedom of Life.....                                                    | 1.00 |
| Funds and Their Uses.....                                               | 1.25 |
| Ginger Talks.....                                                       | 2.00 |
| Good English Form Book.....                                             | 1.00 |
| God's Good Man.....                                                     | 1.50 |
| Grant.....                                                              | .75  |
| Hamlet.....                                                             | .25  |
| Hand Book of Oratory.....                                               | 3.50 |
| Happiness as Found in Forethought.....                                  | 1.00 |
| Harmonics of Evolution.....                                             | 2.00 |
| He Can, Who Thinks He Can.....                                          | 1.00 |
| Help Essays.....                                                        | .40  |
| History and Power of Mind.....                                          | 2.00 |
| History of Sculpture.....                                               | 1.50 |
| History of Architecture.....                                            | 2.00 |
| History of Modern Banks.....                                            | 4.00 |
| History of Paintings.....                                               | 1.50 |
| History of United States.....                                           | 1.00 |
| Homer's Illiad.....                                                     | 1.00 |
| Homer's Odyssey.....                                                    | 1.00 |
| House of Seven Gables.....                                              | 1.00 |
| How to Advertise a Retail Store.....                                    | 3.50 |
| How to Become Quick at Figures.....                                     | 1.00 |
| How to Develop Power and Personality.....                               | 1.25 |
| How to do Business as Business is Done in Great Commercial Centers..... | 1.00 |
| How to do Business by Letter.....                                       | 1.00 |
| How to Get Strong.....                                                  | 1.00 |
| How to Grow Success.....                                                | .50  |
| How They Succeeded.....                                                 | 1.50 |
| Huckleberry Finn.....                                                   | 1.75 |
| Human Culture.....                                                      | 1.20 |
| Human Nature Explained.....                                             | 1.00 |
| Humanism.....                                                           | 2.75 |
| Influence of Mind.....                                                  | .75  |
| Inspired Millionaires.....                                              | 1.25 |
| An Introductory Logic.....                                              | 1.10 |
| In Tune With the Infinite.....                                          | 1.25 |
| Jiu Jitsu.....                                                          | 1.00 |
| John Martin's Clerks.....                                               | .25  |
| Julius Cæsar.....                                                       | .20  |
| Lady of the Lake.....                                                   | 2.00 |
| Law of Mental Medicine.....                                             | 1.00 |
| Law of Psychic Phenomena.....                                           | 1.50 |
| Law of Suggestion.....                                                  | .75  |

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

|                                                                          |       |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------|
| The Leopard's Spots.....                                                 | .75   |
| Treasures of Truth, Art Boards, 75 cents; [de luxe].....                 | 1.00  |
| Les Miserables.....                                                      | 1.00  |
| Letters From a Baseball Fan to His Son, Art Binding.....                 | .50   |
| Letters of a Self Made Merchant to His Son.....                          |       |
| Abraham Lincoln.....                                                     | .75   |
| Lincoln and Other Poems.....                                             | 1.00  |
| Lippincott's Reader's Reference.....                                     | 39.00 |
| Longfellow's Poems.....                                                  | 1.00  |
| The Making of the Great West.....                                        | 1.50  |
| Making of a Man.....                                                     | 1.25  |
| Making of a Merchant.....                                                | 1.50  |
| Making the Man Who Can.....                                              | .50   |
| Man Limitless.....                                                       | 1.25  |
| Manufacturing Costs.....                                                 | 2.00  |
| Man With the Hoe and Other Poems.....                                    | 1.00  |
| Marble Faum.....                                                         | 1.50  |
| Measure of Man.....                                                      | 1.20  |
| Memory Culture.....                                                      | 1.00  |
| Merchant of Venice.....                                                  | .20   |
| Mind's Attainment.....                                                   | 2.00  |
| Mind Power and Privileges.....                                           | 1.50  |
| Mind Training and Concentration.....                                     | 2.00  |
| Modern Advertising.....                                                  | 1.62  |
| Modern Bank.....                                                         | 1.50  |
| Modern Corporation.....                                                  | 2.00  |
| My Lady Beautiful.....                                                   | 1.10  |
| Mental Addition Simplified.....                                          | .50   |
| My Little Book of Prayer.....                                            | .50   |
| New Glutton and Epicure.....                                             | 1.00  |
| New Man and the 20th Century Problem.....                                | .25   |
| New Menticulture.....                                                    | 1.00  |
| Next Step in Evolution.....                                              | .50   |
| Ol' Doc Lint and Other Poems, Art Cloth, $1.00; Leather, [de luxe]..... | 2.00  |
| Optimism.....                                                            | .75   |
| Organic Evolution.....                                                   | 2.00  |
| Othello.....                                                             | .56   |
| Other Wise Men.....                                                      | .80   |
| Outline of Cosmic Philosophy.....                                        | 8.00  |
| Our Invisible Supply.....                                                | 2.00  |
| Partnership Relations.....                                               | 2.00  |
| Perfect Health.....                                                      | 1.00  |
| Paths to Powers.....                                                     | 1.00  |
| Physiology of the Senses.....                                            | 1.50  |
| Plutarchs Lives.....                                                     | 1.50  |
| Politics for Young Americans.....                                        | .75   |
| Power of Success.....                                                    | 10.00 |
| Power Thru Repose.....                                                   | 1.00  |
| Power of Will.....                                                       | 3.18  |
| Practical Journalism.....                                                | 1.25  |
| Principles of the Mail Order Business.....                               | 1.00  |
| The Promoters.....                                                       | .75   |
| Psychological Principals of Education.....                               | 1.75  |
| Prosperity Thru Thot Force.....                                          | 1.00  |
| Psychology of Attention.....                                             | .75   |
| Psychology of Advertising.....                                           | 2.00  |
| Psychic Treatment.....                                                   | 3.00  |
| Psychology.....                                                          | 1.60  |

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

|                                            |      |
|--------------------------------------------|------|
| Psychology of the Emotions.....            | 1.50 |
| Psychological Principals of Education..... | 1.75 |
| Psychology of Public Speaking.....         | 1.25 |
| Psychology of Suggestion.....              | 1.75 |
| Pushing Your Business.....                 | 1.00 |
| Riley's Poems .....                        |      |
| Romeo and Juliet.....                      | .56  |
| Rules of Order.....                        | .75  |
| Right and Wrong Thinking.....              | 1.50 |
| Ropp's Commercial Calculator .....         | 1.00 |
| Sales Plans .....                          | 2.50 |
| Sales Promotion.....                       | 1.00 |
| Scarlet Letter .....                       | 1.00 |
| Science of Organization .....              | 3.00 |
| Six Hundred Talking Points; 2 Vols.....    | 4.00 |
| Scientific Living.....                     |      |
| Scott's Poems .....                        | 1.75 |
| Self Culture.....                          | 1.00 |
| Self Help.....                             | 1.00 |
| Soul of Man .....                          | 1.50 |
| The Steam Engine.....                      | 3.75 |
| The Story of Creation.....                 | 1.25 |
| The Story of Electricity.....              | .35  |
| Story of a Grain of Wheat.....             | 1.00 |
| Story of The Mind.....                     | .35  |
| Story of a Piece of Coal.....              | .35  |
| Success in Letter Writing.....             | 1.00 |
| 100,000 Synonyms and Antonyms.....         | 1.00 |
| Talks by the Old Storekeeper.....          | .50  |
| Talks on Writing English.....              | 1.50 |
| Talks on Writing English.....              | 1.30 |
| The Great Work.....                        | 2.00 |
| Great Psychological Crime.....             | 2.00 |
| The Tempest.....                           | .56  |
| Thot Force .....                           | 1.00 |
| Thought Vibration .....                    | 1.00 |
| Thoughts on Business.....                  | 1.25 |
| Thusnelda .....                            | .75  |
| Tennyson's Poems.....                      | .60  |
| That Last Waif.....                        | 1.00 |
| Theory of Advertising.....                 | 2.00 |
| The Theory of Business Enterprise.....     | 1.50 |
| Transaction of Business.....               | 1.00 |
| 20th Century Dictionary.....               |      |
| Uncooked Foods.....                        | 1.00 |
| Unwritten Meanings of Words.....           | 2.00 |
| Washington, George .....                   | .75  |
| Whittier Poems .....                       | 1.50 |
| Works and Days.....                        | 1.25 |
| Wood Study .....                           | .50  |
| Words, Their Use and Abuse.....            | 2.00 |
| Wordsworth's Poems .....                   | 1.75 |
| Worth While Series.....                    | .35  |
| The Young Man's Affairs.....               | 1.00 |
| The Young Man and the World.....           | 1.62 |

How to Increase Your Mental Wealth at Small Cost—

TO BECOME a better Speaker of Words—and to be a scientific salesman one must know how to speak wisely and well—one should have a thorough acquaintance with the great classics of literature.

¶ The Caxton Brochures are exquisitely printed in two colors on high-grade paper—protected with a heavy cover—tied with silk—brightened with a special portrait of the author by Hillberg—and possess the great merit of fitting the pocket both in size and price.

¶ By special arrangement we have secured a limited quantity of these beautiful Brochures and while they last they will be sold for Fourteen Cents each or Ten for One Dollar.

¶ Of course you know we wrap all our goods with Satisfaction—which means that you can have your money back absolutely without question if you are not perfectly satisfied.

The Caxton Brochures

¶ A collection of Little Masterpieces, published one each month, by the Caxton Society, the aim being to present the most significant essays and short stories by the world's best authors, in a form that will appeal to all bookish people.

No. 1—CHARLES LAMB'S ESSAY, "A Dissertation upon Rast Pig," also "Detached Thoughts on Books and Reading."

No. 2—RALPH WALDO EMERSON'S "Essay on Compensation."

No. 3—"THE CHINESE PHILOSOPHER'S SON," by Oliver Goldsmith. This number is now out of print.

No. 4—"BIBLIOPHILE AND BIBLIOMANIAC," by Henry Houssaye and Henry Ward Beecher.

No. 5—"COLLECTANEA," being certain verses written by Rudyard Kipling.

No. 6—"POOR RICHARD'S ALMANACK," Shrewd wit of Benjamin Franklin as compiled by himself. With facsimile reproductions.

No. 7—"HENRY DAVID THOREAU, His Character and Opinions," by Robert Louis Stevenson.

No. 8—"BACON'S ESSAYS," being those contained in the first edition, published in 1597. With facsimile reproductions of some of the pages.

No. 9—"WISDOM OF CHESTERFIELD." Being extracts from letters of the Earl of Chesterfield to his son.

No. 10—"LOVE LETTERS OF HENRY VIII TO ANNE BOLEYN." The authentic love letters of a real king.

No. 11—"RUBAIYAT OF OMAR KHAYYAM," by Edward FitzGerald. This is a careful reprint of the first edition, introduction and notes.

No. 12—"SELF-RELIANCE," by Ralph Waldo Emerson. "Let a man know his worth, and keep things under his feet."

No. 13—"WILL O' THE MILL," by Robert Louis Stevenson.

No. 14—"RABBI BEN EZRA," by Robert Browning. This number contains a special analysis and study.

No. 15—"THE LEGEND OF SLEEPY HOLLOW," by Washington Irving.

No. 16—"THE ATHEIST'S MASS," by Honore de Balzac.

No. 17—"ODES OF ANACREON," as translated by Thomas Moore.

No. 18—"EVERYMAN," the great Morality Play. Facsimile reproductions from old editions.

No. 19—"ADDRESS ON ARTS AND CRAFTS," by William Morris.

We believe these Brochures are a little better than anything ever before attempted in special editions at a popular price. The numbers now ready are No. 1 to 19, inclusive; and with exception of No. 3 which is out of print. We will supply them at fourteen cents each, or ten for one dollar.

Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Ill.

DEPARTMENT 87

ALL good awaits the man whose desire to serve is the dominant passion of his life. —Sheldon

OCT 24 1910

The BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

ARTHUR·FREDERICK·SHELDON
EDITOR

SHELDON·UNIVERSITY·PRESS
LIBERTYVILLE·ILLINOIS

How We May Know Ourselves and Others : by Dr. Katherine M. H. Blackford

33 $\frac{1}{3}$ Per Cent Discount

IN ORDER to move an enormous quantity of the paper bound books of James Allen's writings we are offering the above discounts on all orders for ten or more copies. This discount will hold good only on orders received by us before December 10, 1910. Rush orders to us at once. We will make shipment on any date specified by you.

The Four Great Books of Power

Make most excellent Christmas Gifts and we will forward them to different addresses if you wish.

As a Man Thinketh

BY JAMES ALLEN

Said by some to be one of the most powerful books on Self-Building and Thought-Mastery ever published. Note the contents: Thought and Character. Effect of Thought on Circumstances. Effect of Thought on Health and the Body. Thought and Purpose. The Thought Factor and Achievement. Visions and Ideals. Serenity.

We say it reverently, this little book is worthy of Emerson. It is a prose poem, yet it is for the constant, every-day use of men and women who toil with head and hands, and love with hearts, in the midst of stress and burden-bearing. Here the author makes beautifully clear the power of thought, and throws a light on the way to its right application. Of it he says, in his foreword: "This little volume (the result of meditation and experience) . . . is suggestive rather than explanatory, its object being to stimulate men and women to the discovery that

"They themselves are makers of themselves" by virtue of the thoughts which they choose and encourage."

A noble and Godlike character is not a thing of favor or chance, but is the natural result of continued effort in right thinking."

—James Allen.

Morning and Evening Thoughts

BY JAMES ALLEN

Being some of the choice meditations of James Allen, lovingly gathered from his writings and compiled by Lily L. Allen and others.

Of these thoughts, the compiler says:

"Knowing, as I do, the writer as no one else knows him; seeing him as I have, for many years under all circumstances—in hours of work and leisure, in the days of joy and sorrow, in the sunshine and in the cloud—I know that these writings are not the words of an idle brain, nor are they gathered from other writings, nor picked up here and there, but they are the deep experiences of his heart, and were first lived and then written."

There are several choice selections, both prose and poetry, for each day of the month. A book to be carried next the heart. A book that wins the heart. This book should be a companion to every one wishing to develop his earning powers.

"The Universe is full with goodness and strength, and it protects the good and strong." James Allen.

Out From the Heart

A Sequel to As a Man Thinketh

BY JAMES ALLEN

"Make pure thy heart, and thou wilt make thy life
Rich, sweet, and beautiful, unmarred by strife;
Guard well thy mind, and, noble, strong, and free
Nothing shall harm, disturb, or conquer thee;
For all thy foes are in thy heart and mind,
There also thy salvation thou wilt find."

Thus writes the author on the title page of this simple and heart-searching little book. These words breathe the optimistic tone of the pages that follow. And through the truths presented, thousands have received the inspiration to the first steps in enlightenment and freedom. The author has not only given the inspiration, but shown the way. The directions on the formation of habit are invaluable.

You may search, but you will not find better books to give your children, your pupils, your business associates, and those who, in subordinate positions, are co-operating with you to make your business a success, than "As a Man Thinketh," and its sequel, "Out From the Heart."

Through the Gate of Good or, Christ and Conduct

BY JAMES ALLEN

This book is an interpretation of the mission and teaching of Jesus in the light of self-perfection by noble moral conduct, based upon the truth that spiritual enlightenment and the practice of virtue are identical. An illuminating commentary on present-day trends of thought, vital and valuable. In it Mr. Allen deals with The Gate and the Way, The Law and the Prophets, The Yoke and the Burden, The Word and the Door, The Vine and the Branches, and Salvation this Day—here and now. A companionable book.

"The essential difference between a wise man and a fool is that the wise man controls his thinking, the fool is controlled by it."—James Allen.

"That Jesus subordinated his own will to the will of the Father, it is inspiring to know, but it is not sufficient; it is necessary that you, too, should likewise subordinate your will to that of the over-ruling Good. The grace and beauty and goodness that were in Jesus can be of no value to you unless they are also in you, and they can never be in you unless you practice them, for, apart from doing, the qualities which constitute Goodness do not, so far as you are concerned, exist."—James Allen, in "Through the Gate of Good."

Regular Price Fifteen Cents per Copy

Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Illinois

ARTHUR F. SHELDON
EDITOR-IN-CHIEF

CONTENTS

ARTHUR W. NEWCOMB
MANAGING EDITOR

SHELDON'S BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER AND SALESMANSHIP

NOVEMBER, 1910

|                                                           |                     |
|-----------------------------------------------------------|---------------------|
| KATHERINE M. H. BLACKFORD.....                            | Frontispiece |
| EDITORIAL .....                                           | 639                 |
| By A. F. Sheldon                                   |                     |
| DELIVER THE GOODS.....                                    | 644                 |
| HOW WE MAY KNOW OURSELVES AND OTHERS.....                 | 645                 |
| By Dr. Katherine M. H. Blackford                   |                     |
| THE QUALITY OF LOYALTY AND ITS SURE REWARDS AND PROFITS   | 650                 |
| By Amos Burhams                                    |                     |
| THE PLACE OF WOMAN IN THE HOME AND THE BUSINESS WORLD     | 651                 |
| By Alice Hubbard                                   |                     |
| SOME PRIME ESSENTIALS THAT WIN IN THE BUSINESS GAME....   | 658                 |
| By Don E. Mowry                                    |                     |
| DISCOURAGEMENT, THE DISEASE—STICKTOITIVENESS, THE CURE... | 661                 |
| By H. P. Wartman                                   |                     |
| THE QUESTIONS OF SOCRATIC.....                            | 665                 |
| By Arthur W. Newcomb                               |                     |
| SOME FACTS ABOUT THE ADVERTISING OF LIFE INSURANCE.....   | 671                 |
| By Stewart Anderson                                |                     |
| THE STORE SPEAKS A WORD FOR ITSELF, ITS GOODS AND SERVICE | 676                 |
| By Arthur B. Freeman                               |                     |
| OPPORTUNITIES EVERYWHERE, ALL THE TIME, FOR THE SALESMAN  | 677                 |
| By Thomas Dreier                                   |                     |
| WITH THE EDUCATOR.....                                    | 681                 |
| By George Landis Wilson                            |                     |
| HOW ONE WOMAN SOLVES THE HIGH COST OF LIVING PROBLEM      | 683                 |
| By Mrs. B. R. Buflham                              |                     |
| LETTERS OF A SALES AND ADVERTISING MANAGER.....           | 685                 |
| By George H. Eberhard                              |                     |
| BRAIN PLUS GRAIN—ONE SEED THOUGHT ON ADVERTISING.....     | 687                 |
| By T. J. McLaughlin                                |                     |
| SOME QUALITIES AND METHODS OF AN EFFICIENT SALES MANAGER  | 690                 |
| By George H. Eberhard                              |                     |
| THE MENTAL BASIS OF PHYSICAL HEALTH AND VITAL POWER       | 692                 |
| By H. Lindlahr, M. D., D. O.                       |                     |
| LEAVES FROM MY ORDER BOOK.....                            | 695                 |
| By Morton Mayne                                    |                     |

Two dollars a year will bring the magazine to anyone in the United States or its possessions, $2.25 in Canada, and $2.50 in foreign countries. Requests for "change of address" must reach this office before the tenth of the month in order to insure the proper mailing of the current issue of this magazine. In sending in the new address please give your previous location.

Published by the Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Illinois

Entered as Second-Class Matter, December 15, 1908, at the Post Office at Libertyville, Illinois, under Act of March 3, 1879. Copyrighted by Sheldon University Press.

Learn to Size Up Men

DR. KATHERINE M. H. BLACKFORD

research and experiments, and then to formulate the whole into a sane, logical, simple, and practical science. After painstaking application, checking and rechecking, covering many years and travel to all parts of the country, she found that the new science always works out—that it is reliable. She has taught it to thousands of the keenest business men of many cities, particularly New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, Seattle, St. Paul, and San Francisco. They are using it in their business today with consistent success.

Through all these years, Dr. Blackford committed very little of her science to writing, her work being done entirely by lectures and private instruction. Within the last year, she has written two lessons on the Science in the Course in the Science of Business Building, taught by The Sheldon School. With the exception of these, scarcely a word from her pen has appeared in print. Thousands all over the country have called for something authoritative from her, but she has not been ready. NOW, AT LAST, has succeeded in making arrangements with her for a series on the subject, to run for an entire year, beginning in the issue for NOVEMBER, 1910.

THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

In this series, Dr. Blackford will tell about the birth of the new science, and of the laws and principles upon which Human Nature Study is founded.

Dr. Blackford is the Discoverer of

- The Law of Color,
- The Law of Form,
- The Law of Proportion,
- The Law of Temperamental Combinations,
- The Law of Texture,
- The Law of Climatic Adaptability,
- The Law of Change of Temperament,
- The Law of Human Chemicals,
- The Application of Scientific Character Analysis to Education,
- The Application of Scientific Character Analysis to the Choice of a Career,
- The Application of Scientific Character Analysis to Salesmanship and Business.

These conclusions are based upon recorded data of twelve thousand subjects personally examined by Dr. Blackford, supplemented by observation of more than thirty thousand.

You can easily see that this is a most important series of articles for business and professional men—for men in every walk of life—the greatest that has been offered to the public for years. The formulation of the Science of Character Analysis is the most important event in the business world since the formulation of the Science of Salesmanship.

Remember, the series begins in the November number. Get your subscription in early. Be sure to get the whole series. Two dollars a year; twenty cents a copy.

The Business Philosopher, Libertyville, Illinois

SHELDON says that your success in life is in proportion to your obedience to four injunctions:

- Know yourself;
- Know your fellow men;
- Know your business;
- Apply your knowledge.

How to know yourself and how to know others are the two big problems. Take one hundred of the greatest successes you know—they are men who solved these two problems. They had to learn by hard knocks and expensive experience.

But today, Science has come to your rescue. It makes human character—your character and that of the other fellow—an open book.

Learn the Science of Character Analysis—then you can read yourself and others as easily as you now read the signs on the store fronts. The color, the form, the proportions, the features, the shape of the head, the texture of the hair and skin, the handshake, the posture, the voice, the walk of any man are the letters that spell to you, when a trained observer, the secrets of his character. The whole sentence is read at a glance.

Phrenology, physiognomy, anthropology, biology, physiology, ethnology, psychology, and the study of temperaments have been steps on the way. But by themselves they are a jargon, so far as any clear voice as to character reading is concerned—at best only the bases for more or less accurate guesses. It remained for

Dr. Katherine M. H. Blackford

to take these separate sciences, discover their general laws and their relations to one another, to add to them the record of her own extended

Dr. Blackford Teaches How You Can

- Know your own powers and weaknesses.
- Develop the one and overcome the other.
- Read others at a glance.
- Approach the different types.
- Close with the different types.
- Adapt Education to needs.
- Know the trustworthy and the untrustworthy.
- Choose the right man for the right place.
- Choose the right partners and associates.
- Combine the different men in your organization.

30 Editions Since Publication

It is Only Once in a Decade, not Oftener, that a Really Great Book is Written—this is One

We want you to read Jules Payot's "EDUCATION OF THE WILL," because it is a great book. No matter what your present position in life may be, this book will help you to greater achievement—greater success.

¶ If after reading "The Education of the Will" you tell us that you have not been benefited, have not been inspired to higher, nobler thoughts, have not been clearly directed to a better standard of life, send the book back to us and we will refund the purchase price paid by you.

The author, one of the foremost educators of France, proves that character is not wholly a matter of birth or heredity, but that through the education of the will, character can be formed and developed to the highest degree.

All that is necessary is that one possesses the desire for mental superiority.

No matter how richly endowed you may be mentally you can only go as far as your will will carry you.

If you follow the suggestions in this book you can secure mastery of your will, and that means not only spiritual but worldly supremacy, because your will is the force that drives and directs your faculties; the higher its development, the more profitably you may capitalize your talents.

While the author's thesis is based upon the soundest laws of psychology, the book is written in plain, frank language, unclouded by abstruse scientific terms, and it is easily understood by the ordinary reader.

Every father and mother should insist that their children, from seventeen years of age upward, read this book not only once but several times.

CAUTION—Be sure that it is Payot's book that you buy as there is another book with the same title, but which has no relation to this.

THE EDUCATION OF THE WILL, by Jules Payot, Litt. D., Ph. D., translated from the French by Smith Ely Jelliffe, M. D., Professor Clinical Psychiatry, Fordham University, New York, 12mo, cloth, 450 pages, $1.50; post-paid, $1.60.

Sheldon University Press, Area P. O., Rockefeller, Ill.

Seventeen Cents a Day Buys an Oliver Typewriter

This amazing offer—the New Model Oliver Typewriter No. 5 at 17 cents a day—is open to everybody, everywhere.

It's our new and immensely popular plan of selling Oliver Typewriters, on little easy payments. The abandonment of longhand in favor of clean, legible, beautiful typewriting is the next great step in human progress.

Already—in all lines of business and in all professions—the use of pen-and-ink is largely restricted to the writing of signatures.

Business Colleges and High Schools, watchful of the trend of public sentiment, are training a vast army of young people in the use of Oliver Typewriters.

The prompt and generous response of the Oliver Typewriter Company to the world-wide demand for universal typewriting, gives tremendous impetus to the movement.

The Oliver, with the largest sale of any typewriter in existence, was the logical machine to take the initiative in bringing about the universal use of typewriters. It always leads.

Save Your Pennies & Own an Oliver

This "17-Cents-a-Day" selling plan makes the Oliver as easy to own as to rent. It places the machine within easy reach of every home—every individual. A man's "cigar money"—a woman's "pin-money"—will buy it.

Clerks on small salaries can now afford to own Olivers. By utilizing spare moments for practice they may fit themselves for more important positions.

School boys and school girls can buy Olivers by saving their pennies.

You can buy an Oliver on this plan at the regular catalog price—$100. A small first payment brings the machine. Then you save 17 cents a day and pay monthly.

And the possession of an Oliver Typewriter enables you to earn money to finish paying for the machine.

Mechanical Advantages

The Oliver is the most highly perfected typewriter in the market—hence its 100 per cent efficiency.

Among its scores of conveniences are:

- the Balance Shift
- the Ruling Device
- the Double Release
- the Locomotive Base
- the Automatic Spacer
- the Automatic Tabulator
- the Disappearing Indicator
- the Adjustable Paper Fingers
- the Scientific Condensed Keyboard

Service Possibilities

The Oliver Typewriter turns out more work—of better quality and greater variety—than any other writing machine. Simplicity, strength, ease of operation and visibility are the corner stones of its towering supremacy in

- Correspondence
- Card Index Work
- Tabulated Reports
- Follow-up Systems
- Manifolding Service
- Addressing Envelopes
- Working on Ruled Forms
- Cutting Mimeograph Stencils

Can You Spend 17 Cents a Day to Better Advantage than in the Purchase of this Wonderful Machine

Write for Special Easy Payment Proposition or See the Nearest Oliver Agent

The Oliver Typewriter Co., The Oliver Typewriter Building Chicago, Illinois

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Ring the Bell Every Time

WHAT is it worth to you to be able to ring the bell every time you strike for a customer's order? What is it worth to you to be able, when he puts forth an objection, to knock that objection sky high with the irresistible force of a selling argument that has been tried and proven by the best salesmen of the best concerns in the world—concerns whose names are household words by reason of the enormous sales these very selling arguments have brought them?

What is it Worth to You:

—To know in advance the objections your prospect will make and the best answer to each that has ever yet been discovered.

—To have a number of answers (in some cases as many as twenty to thirty) to each objection—all irresistible—600 irresistible selling arguments?

—To know that every one of these arguments has been evolved by years of hard experience—improved and made stronger by constant successful use?

—To know that many of these arguments cost thousands of dollars in experience before they were discovered and perfected—and that many of them have sold millions of dollars worth of goods?

Every Page Coinable Into Money

A chemical formula written on the back of an envelope may be worth a fortune; a few figures giving the combination to a safe may unlock a door with millions behind it. Every page of this book contains a selling formula that you can coin into ready money. Every one of these 600 irresistible arguments opens a door that will lead you to more sales and more commissions. You could well pay, if you had to, a green-back for every page of this book; but the cost to you is slight.

Sign This Coupon —Can you afford to pay one-half cent for an argument that has sold thousands of dollars worth of goods—an argument whose discovery cost hundreds or even thousands of dollars in time and experience and actual money of star salesmen and great concerns.

—An argument that will surely close sales for you—that may clear you a hundred dollars in commissions the first day you use it, and hundreds or even thousands of dollars as you use it over and over again, throughout the entire year and for years to come.

Can you afford to pay one-half cent for what is worth anywhere from $10.00 to $1,000.00 in actual money-making power to you?

Then Sign This Coupon and Mail Today

THE SHELDON UNIVERSITY PRESS, Libertyville, Illinois

Enclosed please find $4.00 for your Two Big Volumes of Six Hundred Talking Points and Selling Arguments.

Name.....

Address, etc.....

"SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

1/2 — MARK

FORMER
PRICE

MARK TWAIN is undoubtedly the most representative of American writers. He is an American, blood and bone, heart and head. Not only is he the world's greatest humorist; he is a wonderfully versatile writer—the entertaining story-teller, the historian of periods and the intimate chronicler of local conditions, the historical novelist, the philosopher of life, the keen observer, the brilliant essayist. He has those qualities that are typically American — “Huckleberry Finn’s” genial tolerance united to the high ideals of his “Joan of Arc”—and he is uncompromisingly honest, with a hatred of pretence, affectation, and sham.

AUTHOR'S EDI

SPECIAL FEATURES

Mark Twain himself has written a preface to the edition. Brander Matthews has written the biographical criticism of Mark Twain and his work which prefaces the first volume. There are portraits of the author from photographs and paintings taken at periods when the different books were in process of writing. This edition includes his later collected writings, such as “Christian Science,” “A Dog’s Tale,” “Eve’s Diary,” etc.

— MARK

TWAIN

1/2

FORMER
PRICE

It has been Mark Twain's ambition to have his books in every American home, and he has made a great personal sacrifice, which brings about this remarkable situation—for the first time in the history of publishing, copyrighted books are sold at the price of non-copyrighted books.

NATIONAL TION

THE ARTISTS AND ILLUSTRATIONS

There are many illustrations—half-tone reproductions on plate paper of the work of such artists as

|               |                   |                  |
|---------------|-------------------|------------------|
| J. G. Brown   | W. T. Smedley     | E. W. Kemble     |
| A. B. Frost   | T. de Thulstrup   | C. Allan Gilbert |
| Peter Newell  | B. W. Clinedinst  | F. B. Oppen      |
| F. V. Du Mond | Frank J. Merrill  | Dan Beard        |
| F. Luis Mora  | Frederick Dielman |                  |
| C. D. Weldon  | Etc. Etc. Etc.    |                  |

BINDING AND OTHER DETAILS

The binding is a beautiful dark-red vellum book cloth, with blue title labels stamped in gold. The books are printed on white antique wove paper, especially made for this edition. The size of each volume is 5x7½ inches.

TITLES OF THE 25 VOLUMES

THE INNOCENTS ABROAD. (Vol. I.)
THE INNOCENTS ABROAD. (Vol. II.)
A TRAMP ABROAD. (Vol. I.)
A TRAMP ABROAD. (Vol. II.)
FOLLOWING THE EQUATOR. (Vol. I.)
FOLLOWING THE EQUATOR. (Vol. II.)
ROUGHING IT. (Vol. I.)
ROUGHING IT. (Vol. II.)
LIFE ON THE MISSISSIPPI
THE GILDED AGE. (Vol. I.)
THE GILDED AGE. (Vol. II.)
THE ADVENTURES OF TOM SAWYER
HUCKLEBERRY FINN
PUDD'NHEAD WILSON
THE PRINCE AND THE PAUPER
A CONNECTICUT YANKEE IN KING
ARTHUR'S COURT
JOAN OF ARC. (Vol. I.)
JOAN OF ARC. (Vol. II.)
SKETCHES NEW AND OLD
TOM SAWYER ABROAD, ETC.
AMERICAN CLAIMANT, ETC.
LITERARY ESSAYS
THE MAN THAT CORRUPTED
HADLEYBURG
THE $30,000 BEQUEST
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE

S. H. II

HARPER & BROTHERS
Franklin Square
New York City

Please send me for examination, carriage free, a set of MARK TWAIN'S WORKS, Author's National Edition, twenty-five volumes, cloth binding. It is understood that I may retain the set for five days, and at the expiration of that time, if I do not care for the books, I will return them at your expense. If I keep the books, I will remit $2 00 a month until the full price, $25.00, has been paid.

Signature .....

Send books to .....

TWAIN

KATHERINE M. H. BLACKFORD, M. D.

The Business Philosopher

A. F. SHELDON, EDITOR

VOLUME VI

NOVEMBER, 1910

NUMBER 11

By the Fireplace

Where We Talk Things Over

WHEN I was a boy, I used to get a lot of fun out of figuring out new inventions in my head. Then I would wonder how these new ideas would work. I wanted to try them out.

When I got hold of one I thought was especially good, I would study over it and perfect it, in my mind, until it seemed to me that it would surely work.

Once in a while, I would get so enthusiastic about it that I would forget my boyish modesty and tell some grown up person about it. And these wise ones would tell me to run along and play, "There are lots of smart men who have spent their lives in studying those things. If there was anything in your idea, it would have been discovered long ago."

And so I would drop my notion. In time, I would forget all about it. I wish that I could remember some of them now. There might be something valuable in them. Because, you see, I have learned since then that the smart men who spend all their lives studying a thing are usually the very last, not only to see anything new in it, but to accept the new thing when someone else has discovered it.

Look it up in your histories, and you will see that the men who have spent a lifetime in the study of some specialty are very rarely guilty of giving the world anything new about it. And they usually want to hang the man who does. They are splendid mausoleums of sainted dead ideas and mummified traditions, rich depositories of the ancient and the established. But they have about as much capacity for progress as a safety deposit vault has for speed.

Then, I have found out another thing about these great specialists. They have narrowed themselves down to their specialty for so long that it has grown out of its true proportion in their minds. Or, in other words, they have been so close to it for so long that they have forgotten entirely how it looks in perspective. They can't see it in its true relation to other things at all. Their sense of proportion is twisted all out of shape and their judgment is badly warped.

And so it happens that the prudent man is very shy of the dictum of a specialist, unless the work has been carefully checked up by some clear-eyed, intelligent, disinterested person.

NOW WHAT I started out to tell you was this: Have the courage of your own ideas. Never mind if you are a novice in the field. It doesn't matter if all the pundits of the realm of your thought are against you. The chances are that they are wrong. They are puffed up with the knowledge of Day Before Yesterday. You are a-thrill with the knowledge of Today and reaching out for the fringes of the knowledge of Tomorrow.

The word of authority, in the realm of thought, is usually a bar to progress. When a man says, "This thing is so because I say it is—I am an authority," he is probably wrong. If the thing were really true he could give a satisfactory reason for it, and wouldn't have to back it up by his authority.

Mind, I don't say this about all authorities and all specialists. Many of them have had the wisdom to keep their minds young and pliable, and are always on the alert for new ideas. But the best and newest ideas usually come from amateurs.

When I first began to talk to business men about a science underlying the art of salesmanship, a great many high "authorities" laughed at me. They said that the idea was preposterous. Hadn't they been salesmen all their lives—and had they ever so much as caught a glimpse of anything bearing the faintest resemblance to a science? Why, they had sold goods before I was born! What presumption for unknown and youthful me to come around and try to tell them how to do it!

But by this time I had learned something about "authorities," so I let them laugh. And the business world of today freely acknowledges that salesmanship is a science.

And, just to show you a little about that, let me tell you about a few amateurs and their ideas. It may help you to have the courage of your own unauthorized thoughts.

AWAY BACK there by the banks of the Nile a little slave boy was born. For forty years, he played princeling as the foster son of one of the royal ladies at the palace. Then he spent another forty years tending sheep out on the plains. After that he was traffic manager of a long excursion of several thousand people through several hundred miles of barrens and mountains.

About this time he got up a code of laws. He was no lawyer, you understand—hadn't spent a lifetime poring over the ponderous tomes of Egyptian law and court reports. He was just a hard working man with a big crowd of cantankerous people on his hands. And he needed some laws to run them by. So, without any reference to precedent—he couldn't have lugged a law library around with him on this trip anyhow—he just sat down and wrote out a lot of laws that appealed to his practical mind and seemed to fit the conditions. I don't suppose he had any idea that he was doing anything unusual.

But his code of laws still stands, after three thousand years and more, as the fundamental code for all the law that has followed.

And the law books of the legal authorities of his time have been buried so deep in oblivion that even their existence is a question.

HERE IS another—a stone cutter's apprentice—and an amateur philosopher. He got a wife, as he grew up to manhood, and she made him hustle for the sake of the family larder. So he didn't have much time to spend digging into the works of those who had made philosophy a specialty. He was a patriot, as well as a stone-cutter, so he sometimes went out to fight his country's battles—and he fought like a fiend while he was at it. But fighting by day and sleeping out on the cold ground at night doesn't give one very much time for loafing around the public library reading the works of the masters on philosophy. He just had to be contented to dabble in the fascinating study, shrewdly asking questions of those who knew more than he did—or thought they did.

Well, hardly anyone but the college professors knows anything about the philosophy of the authorities of Socrates' time, but every school boy knows the fundamental principles of that stone-cutter-soldier's philosophy.

BACK IN old London, three hundred years ago, there was a wide awake theatrical manager, actor, club-man, hunter, and business man. Having a taste for poetry, but no university training in letters, he was an amateur poet, turning out a few verses now and again for his own amusement, to please his friends, and to do honor to his queen. Then he needed some plays for his theater, so he sat down and wrote some himself. They were well received then. Today—three centuries later—they are still the most popular plays on any stage, and their writer is hailed as the greatest writer of the English language in any age—the greatest playwright in any tongue.

A HUNDRED years ago, in Europe, men who had made military science their lifetime study were as thick as flies in summer time. England and the continent fairly bristled with the plumes and sword-points of great generals. If there was anything worth knowing about the science and art of battles and campaigns that they did not know, it belonged to the unknowable. And then along came a mere stripling of a boy—a little Corsican corporal—and upset their old apple-cart in a scandalous way. Once more an amateur had bowled out the professionals. Napoleon Bonaparte had snapped his fingers in the faces of the "authorities," and got away with it—for a time, at least.

I COULD go on and tell you of hundreds of cases like these. But you can think of them for yourself.

For instance, there was Lincoln, the backwoods rail-splitter and lawyer, who came to the front in the hour of the nation's greatest need and did for her what none of the men with a lifetime training in statesmanship could have done.

Consider Ben Franklin, the printer, who dabbled in science for a recreation—and was the founder of the modern science of electricity.

Then there was the boy watching Newcomen's crude engine and opening and shutting the valves of the steam-chest. All the specialists in physical science of the day had studied the steam engine and not one of them had discovered the very simple device that this lad fixed up with a bit of string. An adaptation of that lad's string is used on practically every reciprocating steam engine that puffs today.

Stephenson, the inventor of the locomotive, was laughed at for his crazy dreams by the learned scientists of his day.

Samuel F. B. Morse was a portrait painter who played with electricity for fun. But every telegraph instrument that clicks is a product of his pastime.

Then there is Edison, the telegraph operator, who had the courage of his new ideas and invented more things than I have time to describe; Hubbard, the ad writer and country printer, who is the unquestioned master of all the writers of English living today; Fletcher, the business man, who has done more for the science of hygiene than all the professional doctors and hygienists that ever lived; the Wright brothers, bicycle makers, who beat all the physicists in the world to the solution of how to fly; Hill, the village station agent, who taught the world's railway specialists something about financing, building, and operating railroads; Eli Whitney, the school teacher from the North, who went to Georgia, and in a few months solved the problem that had been bothering the lifelong specialists of the cotton industry for ages; and hundreds of others.

So, MY BOY, have the courage of your own ideas. But, first of all, you have to get the ideas. And right there comes in the necessity for training your imagination.

The imagination is a part of the knowing power of the mind. Its materials are gathered by the intelligent use of the five senses—and senses to be intelligently used, must be trained.

The senses having been trained, and the materials gathered, the next step is to store them, in an orderly way, in the memory, where they can be readily recalled when wanted.

The next step is the use of that greatest of all mental powers, the imagination.

The wonderful thing about the imagination is that it can take the concepts and thoughts gained by observation, reading, and study, and combine them in new ways, thus constructing, out of old materials, a brand new idea. For example, Morse had in his mind the old concepts, electric battery, electro-magnet, bits of brass and steel, and wire. Thousands of other students, including the men who made electricity a life study, had the same concepts and many others. But Morse combined these concepts in a way that they never had been combined before in any human mind. The result was the idea of the telegraph.

But mark this: The thing was as yet but an idea.

Two more steps were needed to make the telegraph a practical instrument for the service of man:

First, the new idea had to be tried before the bar of judgment—Morse's reasoning faculty—to see that it was logical and sound in its mental construction;

Second, the idea had to stand trial before the bar of Nature—had to be given an actual, physical test—to see that it was in conformity with the laws of nature—of electricity. That is, to see whether it would work in actual practice.

The new idea came through both trials victoriously. The telegraph was an accomplished fact.

This is the mental history of every step in progress.

Every new idea—in practical affairs, science, literature, art, business, government, philosophy, and religion—has been the product of imagination, working in the manner I have described.

The world waits for new ideas. It must progress or decay. The highest prizes in all fields of endeavor are handed over to the men of imagination—the men who produce new ideas.

Your success depends very largely upon your initiative, which is nothing but your power of imagination plus your power to get action upon the new ideas to which your imagination gives birth.

Therefore, train your senses.

Train your memory.

Train your imagination.

Train your powers of reason and judgment.

Develop your positive feelings of courage, self-confidence, hope, and faith.

Train your will for action.

Then gather your materials.

Remember what you learn. Combine the concepts and ideas. Try out your new ideas before the bar of your own judgment.

Try out your new ideas in actual practice.

This is the way of progress—of success.

Golf

☞ Golf is a science, the study of a lifetime, in which you may exhaust yourself, but never your subject.

☞ It is a contest, a duel or a melee calling for courage, skill, strategy and self control. It is a test of temper, a trial of honor, a revealer of character. It affords a chance to play the man and act the gentleman.

☞ It means going into God's out of doors, getting close to nature, fresh air, exercise, a sweeping away of the mental cobwebs, genuine recreation of the tired tissues. It is a cure for care, an antidote for worry.

☞ It includes companionship with friends, social intercourse, opportunities for courtesy, kindness and generosity to opponents. It promotes not only physical health but moral force.

D. R. FORGAN

Deliver the Goods

---

The World will buy largely of any one who Will deliver the goods;
It is ready and eager to barter if you
Can deliver the goods.
But don't take its order and make out the bill
Unless you are sure you are able to fill
Your contract, because it won't pay you until
You deliver the goods.

And rude or refined be your wares, still be sure
To deliver the goods;
Though a King or a clown, still remember that you're
To deliver the goods.
If you find you are called to the pulpit to preach,
To the playhouse to play, to the forum to teach,
Be you poet or porter, remember that each—
Must deliver the goods.

The world rears its loftiest shafts to the men
Who deliver the goods;
With plow, lever, brush, hammer, press, or with pen
They deliver the goods.
And while we their eloquent epitaphs scan,
That say, in the world's work, they stood in the van,
We know that the meaning is "Here lies a man
Who delivered the goods."

How We May Know Ourselves and Others : by Dr. Katherine M. H. Blackford*

A Brief Outline and Review of the Laws, Principles, Nature, and Use of the Science of Character Analysis

PSYCHOLOGISTS are such discouraging creatures! They tell us that we must gain all our knowledge through the physical senses of touch, taste, hearing, sight and smell. And that this gleanings of knowledge through the senses is a somewhat complicated and laborious process. From sensation to the forming of judgments and the perception of laws and principles seems an interminable journey when one stands aside and contemplates each step. To those who would like to believe that knowledge can be gotten by endosmosis, topical application or hypodermic injection, the methods outlined by science for its acquirement are prosaic indeed.

But the psychologists are right. All knowledge of the outside world must reach us through the sense avenues. This applies to knowledge of men as well as things.

Character Reading by Intuition

Frequently I have men say to me, "I am a pretty good judge of others."

"How do you form your judgments?" I invariably ask.

"By intuition," they reply.

"What is intuition?" I often query. Few even try to explain.

What is this something we call "intuition?" If it is not a product of the five senses, and is not dependent upon them, we should be able to utilize it independently of them. For example: There is a man in the next room whom you have never seen and of whom you have not heard. You have not even heard his voice. You are wholly without knowledge of him except that he is there. How much can you tell me about his character or disposition?

You cannot even tell whether he is black or white, old or young, grave or gay. But the moment that I bring him into your presence you can tell me many things about him.

You have had an opportunity to gather knowledge of him through your physical senses.

That quality we call "Intuition" used in connection with forming judgments of others is nothing more nor less than the sum total of all past observations. It is a product of the physical senses.

The True Source of Knowledge of Human Nature

Since childhood you have been observing people. You have watched the expression of their faces to see whether or not they were pleased with you. You have observed their mannerisms and have probably gone so far as to trace likenesses between individuals whose manner or physical appearance was similar. So when you saw a man who looked like John Jones, whom you know well, you expected him to have the same kind of character. If you liked John Jones you instinctively sought the acquaintance of the man who resembled him. If Jones was an undesirable character you avoided that man, or at least were on guard in dealing with him.

And that is scientific. Men who look alike are alike in some degree, and to be able to trace their likenesses and differences is a great aid in judging character.

By actual test I have found that those with deficient physical senses are poor judges of men.

Women are said to be better natural judges of human nature than men, and the contention is not without some foundation in truth. As a rule women have not dulled their physical senses with the excessive use of narcotics and stimulants as have men. Characteristic feminine traits are to criticize, to observe small detail, to sympathize with and be interested in the doings of others.

These are natural requirements for a good character analyst, and either a man or a woman with these qualities will be a good natural judge of others and through study and practice may become an efficient analyst. In order to judge the worth of anything you must have a standard of measurement, and if we can create a standard by which to judge horses, or dogs, or poultry, we ought to be able to formulate one for correct observation of men.

* Copyright, 1910, by Katherine M. H. Blackford, M. D.

It shall be my endeavor to give the reader a standard of measurement for men, so that by training his senses to acute observation he will be able to determine their relative value.

Ancient and Modern Attempts to Read Character

Every thinker of every age has made conscious effort to understand human nature, for, in final analysis, we are interested only in what men are, what they say and what they do. Even the elements, interesting as they are, would have little attractiveness for us were it not for the direct influence they exert on human life.

Perhaps the oldest record of an attempt to read men in a practical way is that contained in a papyrus now in the British museum. The observation was made by an Egyptian scribe of the XII Dynasty, about 2,000 years B. C., that one's occupation stamps its impress on the outward expression.

That was a long time ago, but we are still far from being expert judges of men in their relation to occupation. Many can detect the farmer, the minister, and the doctor if the men observed have followed these callings for any length of time, but to know what qualities a youth needs to become a success in these various vocations and to be able to recognize them in time to direct his education intelligently is quite beyond them.

But there is hope. Only yesterday a psychologist of some note announced that "We are to take moving pictures of the brain in action; it is the next step in scientific development and it will mean mercy and proper treatment for so-called criminals, justice for self-willed criminals. By such pictures taken at certain established intervals, we need no longer make the matter of higher education mere guess work."

This particular psychologist is a trifle behind the times, for we do not need to wait for the development of an instrument that will photograph the brain in action before we can solve the problem of "higher education" and the proper treatment of the criminal. The Science of Character Analysis has already demonstrated these to be well within its scope.

Development of the Science of Character Analysis

Let us for a moment trace the development of this science to which such an important mission is committed. Through all ages much knowledge of men has been acquired by students and given to the world in various forms. History, literature, art and the natural sciences, have all contributed much of value, but until recent years very little has been done in the way of collecting, classifying, correlating and testing these truths. These processes are necessary in the formation of any science.

Nearly every science that today adds to the richness of our lives grew out of a pseudo-science. Astronomy grew out of astrology and chemistry out of alchemy. Astrology and alchemy saw the phenomena but did not perceive the laws underlying them, so attributed them to superhuman power of "magic." When the laws and principles underlying these phenomena were perceived, the superstition vanished and a science was born.

Just as astronomy and chemistry are the composite product of many minds, so the Science of Character Analysis is a correlation of truth from a myriad of sources, each truth tested in the crucible of experience and found worthy before being admitted to a place in the science. It has drawn upon all the human sciences for contribution. From anthropology is gleaned knowledge of man as an animal; from anatomy, knowledge of his structure; from physiology, knowledge of the functions of his body; from biology, knowledge of living tissue; from phrenology, knowledge of his inherent capacity as expressed in form and proportion; from physiognomy, knowledge of the operations of his mind and degree of culture; and from ethnology, knowledge of his racial inheritance.

This Science Still Developing

Truths in these studies, together with the discoveries of the writer, organized, correlated and tested in actual practice constitute the Science of Character Analysis.

In this series of articles it is my purpose to trace for the reader some of the analogies between nature and human nature, for it is my contention that the same laws govern both.

I shall proceed upon the hypothesis that "the laws and ways of nature are uniform and harmonious," and that "effects follow causes in unbroken succession."

The inference naturally follows that there are laws underlying human construction and that their correct interpretation will give a science of character and their correct application to any given individual, will result in the art of reading his character.

Is this new science, made of world-old truths, a perfected one? the reader asks. No—a thousand times No. New discoveries are being added daily and it should continue to grow and develop as long as humankind exists. Not until mankind reaches perfection can the science having for its object his interpretation approach the ultimate. My only contention is that it is now a practicable, usable, teachable, demonstrable one, a knowledge of which is useful to any man and will help him climb the ladder of success with greater ease and added assurance.

Let us see to what uses this science can be put, so that we may determine if it is of sufficient value to justify our pursuit of its tenets.

Character Analysis and Education

One of the most perplexing problems with which society has to deal is the education of the child mind. Education is today an experimental process. All children are "ground through the same mill." The results attained are variable. Some emerge with minds equipped for a successful career, but by far the larger number do not. The whole process reminds one of an amateur chemist tossing a number of unknown ingredients into a retort and applying heat, not knowing what the resultant compound will be. The chemist who understands the science of chemistry does not experiment in that way. He knows that to do so might generate an explosive that would destroy him. So in the unwise mixing of human chemicals noxious compounds are often generated that result in destruction of the individual.

What would you think of the horse trainer who placed the lightly-built, spirited, speedy colt alongside of the squarely-built, heavy-limbed draft horse and expected them to work together in harmony. The expert judge of horses knows by looking at a colt what kind of training it will require. He can judge at once whether it should be educated for the dray, for the race track, the road, the saddle, or the hurdle.

So great is the need for some system by which the capabilities of the youth can be determined that the vocation bureau came into existence through the life efforts of a good man who had thought deeply on its need. Its method is to give the applicant for knowledge a long series of questions to answer. It is a system of self-analysis, which no doubt has some merit, but the weak point is here: No man, woman or child can form an accurate estimate of himself. The very fact that they have deficiencies and excessive developments precludes the possibility of an accurate measure.

But any sincere effort to solve this problem is laudable and should meet with hearty encouragement, and so the work of the vocation bureau, crude and imperfect as it is in its practical application, will be productive of good.

The earth is teeming with the wrecks of lives of those who might have succeeded had they been educated for and directed into their proper vocation in the early days.

Character Analysis in Handling Men

Every one who is at all mentally capable knows that men are not alike in their character or disposition that each man is an individual problem which presents itself for solution, and yet in trying to manage men the average man attempts to use the same tactics with all. Naturally he is often surprised and usually disappointed in the result.

Through sheer physical strength one may extinguish the blaze that threatens property, but turn the right chemicals on it and the same result is attained with a minimum loss of property and expenditure of energy. Then, too, one may by wholly unscientific efforts extinguish a small blaze but fail with a larger one. So with little knowledge of human nature one may influence a few, but the larger number escape.

There is much pleasure to be gained from the mastery of the elements, the subduing of animals, or the development of ideas, but the keenest sense of joy comes from the feeling that one can consciously mould and fashion men's thoughts and acts for good. To accomplish this successfully requires accurate knowledge, and so in its commercial uses this science is a great asset.

I once asked a young man who had been in the business world less than ten years and who draws a salary of $25,000 a year, for the secret of his success. "Knowing how to obey the men above me, and to control those under me," was his reply.

It takes some men a lifetime to learn that. Many never learn it at all.

Most of our troubles in life are the result of failure to understand others. Many men are capable and have all the requisites for success except the ability to harmonize with others. They choose business partners, friends, a life-mate, wholly ignorant of the laws underlying harmony in association and the results are, in many cases, almost too painful to contemplate.

The commingling of minds results in a definite spiritual compound, just as surely as the mixing of chemicals results in a definite material compound, and as long as these combinations are made in ignorance one cannot expect more than a partial success.

Character Analysis, Self-Knowledge and Self-Development

There comes to mind a man of splendid ability and tremendous power of personality, who would undoubtedly rise very high except for the possession of one or two serious negatives. They are faults which stand out so clearly and are so antagonistic to others in contact with them that he is rendered a partial failure thereby. It would be worth untold wealth to that man to correct these faults—yet he is scarcely conscious of their possession. He is sensible of failure in many cases but he does not understand why. Scientific knowledge of himself and "the other fellow" would correct this. It is accomplishing that result in thousands of similar cases.

Knowledge always promotes harmony, lessens friction and increases efficiency. So knowledge of men enables one to appeal to the best that is in them, fits one to harmonize with different types and broadens the scope of one's life.

Character Analysis Basis for Real Philanthropy

Knowledge of men and their needs also gives its possessor the power to help humanity as nothing else will. After all, is it not the highest form of philanthropy to help others to help themselves? To give of one's material possessions may but serve to make indolent the recipient, thereby further pauperizing him, but to have within one's grasp the means of arousing to action the latent ability of an individual is to serve him in the highest sense.

Character Analysis in Salesmanship

There is no starting point for a sale until one can establish a point of contact with the other mind. This is most easily accomplished through knowledge of what will appeal to a given type. In selling a piece of fabric to a blind man one would not at first dilate upon the beauty and richness of its coloring, because this would be a quality that the prospective customer could not appreciate. One would first establish confidence by satisfying him with the texture of the fabric, since this is a quality which he can appreciate through the sense of touch. After his favorable attention is secured, interest aroused and desire awakened, then one might add something about the beauty of coloring and have it find response in his mind.

Some men with good eyesight are color blind; others reason blind, others money blind, others socially blind, and so on. It is a waste of time to appeal to reason when a man is governed by his sentiments, or to make a sentimental appeal to the man who is money-mad. And so a knowledge of the type enables one to save time and energy by eliminating in the early stages the "unfit" for a given proposition.

Not long ago a sales manager told me that he had "tried out" over three hundred men in an attempt to secure an efficient sales force of twenty-five. With their system it costs this particular house about $300 in money to determine the fitness of a given man for the work. That means an expenditure of $90,000 for twenty-five men. Think of the loss in time, money and energy, to say nothing of the loss incurred by incompetent and disloyal representatives. Yet science can reduce this loss to a mere incidental.

Guarding Against the Untrustworthy

Not long ago the chaplain of a penal institution told me that he could detect a pick-pocket wherever he saw him, whether in citizen's dress or convict's garb, but he felt rather uncertain as to anyone's ability to detect the honest man by the same process.

There would not be much hope for science were it not that Nature's ways are exact. She brands each individual with the label of his particular variety, quality, condition, capacity as to natural inheritance and acquirement so that those who understand her language may read and be enlightened. This gives protection from the unworthy, greater capacity to enjoy and appreciate the worthy, and naturally leads to a higher standard of personal conduct.

At times one must deal with the designing and unscrupulous, and almost every mature person with any considerable experience can recall a number of instances when he has been victimized. The power to detect and thereby avoid contact with the unworthy is knowledge worth having. Confidence men are invariably expert judges of human nature. They can detect the over-generous and credulous at a glance. Success in plying their trade depends upon this knowledge. If the dishonest man can, with unerring judgment, detect the honest, may it not be possible for the honest man to learn to detect the dishonest with like precision?

In salesmanship we are taught to analyze our goods or proposition—that is to separate a thing into its component parts for the purpose of a thorough understanding of it in all its relationships.

Analysis is a means to an end—the end is synthesis, or building up. Through analysis of our business we determine its weak points and strong ones so that we may correct the former and intelligently use the latter.

So, too, the mission of the Science of Character Analysis is Character Synthesis. It enables men to attain greater heights in character development through definite knowledge of their individual needs. And after all a good place to start is with the individual, for if each individual is right the whole world is right.

This is the first of a series of twelve articles by Dr. Blackford on the Science of Character Analysis, of which she is the formulator. The second on "The Law of Color," will appear in the December number.—Editor's note.

SELF HELP

[Don E. Mowry]

STUDY yourself. Learn what you are best fitted for. Make your plans accordingly. Bend every energy in that direction. Size up men. Glean information—don't accept everything that is told you. Investigate. Help others while helping yourself. Make friends. Be active and up-to-date.

The Quality of Loyalty and Its Sure Rewards and Profits : by Amos Burhans

JUST hesitate long, enough, dear pilgrim, to read the following dispatch and ponder over what it encompasses. There is a whole sermon bottled up in the matter that is between the lines, inexpressible though it may be to the tongue that whispers through the lines, trying to get all the meaning from them:

Lexington, Ky.—Margaret Pryor, the richest negro woman in Kentucky by virtue of the will of Major B. G. Thomas, whose slave and housekeeper she was for years, died in the mansion left to her by the master of the Hircilla Stud. The money that was accumulated by Major Thomas during his lifetime will be divided among the negro relatives of the aged woman.

The will of Major Thomas, one of the most remarkable documents ever filed for probate in this county, caused a storm of protest from his relatives and friends, as in addition to bequeathing the bulk of his vast fortune to the negress, he also inserted a clause that at her death she should be buried at his side in the Lexington cemetery. The latter clause, however, was finally compromised by Margaret and she will be buried in the cemetery set aside for those of her color.

Since the death of Major Thomas, "Aunt Margaret," as she was known to practically every horseman of note in this country and Europe, had resided in the handsome city home willed to her and there she had been visited by people from every part of the country who had known her master and who were anxious once again to look at the priceless paintings that adorned the library.

A Jewel in a Black Casket

One cannot picture in his mind, to say nothing of trying to get it into words, the devout loyalty of this old negro woman. Somewhere beneath her black skin shone a bright jewel. It may commonly be termed her heart, though it wasn't. This jewel was the gem named loyalty, the one thing so many otherwise beautiful souls seem to have covered up with negatives.

But loyalty is not omitted from the make-up of any one of us. Only it must be brought out where it will shine.

This old woman was young at heart, for it goes without more than mere mention that she was always kind, willing, cheerful, never took unto herself the task of dispensing gloom to the Major during any of his dark moments, attended his wants and needs in sickness and health, was a friend in times when others, perhaps his nearest of kin, deserted him.

Such a woman is an honor to her sex. She is a rare spirit among humanity.

The reward with her was probably incidental. She would have been the same kindly soul under almost any circumstance that befell her master.

Devotion and loyalty of this kind is indeed beautiful. It is certainly a manifestation that there is some of the God spirit in us if we will but cultivate it.

And how many of us are throwing away this trait that might make our inner shrines!

The Princely Loyal Man

Loyalty is not akin to fickleness.

Loyalty means that one must overlook little annoyances, especially if he is working shoulder to shoulder with others to make a great success of a complex business.

The loyal man is the man with loyalty sticking right out of his eyes. It beams through his countenance. He possesses that inexplicable characteristic that causes one to know he is tooth and nail in the work.

Loyalty is in every movement of the employe who is loyal down in his heart. He neither knocks a member of the crew, hangs his sign out at the smoke house nor berates the family for his hand labor.

The boss has his eye on the loyal man. Loyalty makes up for a few other deficiencies, and the boss knows it. He knows that one good man loyal to the cause can sometimes hold the mutiny down.

If the really loyal man does not get his idea adopted by the boss he never gets temporarily stubborn; generally the boss knows his business, for that is what he is there for. The loyal man will be a boss himself some day and can try out his own ideas.

When the boss discovers a loyal man he begins planning to take him into partnership. He knows that when away from business some one at the helm will steer.

The True Place of Woman in the Home and the Business World : by Alice Hubbard

An Address Delivered Before the Faculty and Students of the Sheldon Summer School, Sheltonhurst, July 30, 1910

MR. PRESIDENT and Kind Friends: What Mr. Sheldon has just said to you reminds me of what he said to you last night, and what he said to you last night reminds me of something a gentleman said to me down in South Bend the night before last. The gentleman in South Bend said he heard that I had the care of the business end of the Roycroft Shop.

This reminds me of a story Mark Twain told some twenty years ago. There went out a report that Mark Twain was dead. The newspapers announced it and wrote a most beautiful obituary. They told of the beautiful qualities he possessed, of his surpassing wit, wisdom and versatility. Alas, and alas, he was dead! One morning his friends brought Mark this printed report. He read of all his wonderful virtues; he also read that he was dead, and, passing the paper back, said calmly, "The report of my death is slightly exaggerated."

And so the reports of my work at the Roycroft Shops are "slightly exaggerated."

I will have to protest one thing farther. There was a hint in what Mr. Sheldon said about there being greatness in East Aurora when Mr. Hubbard and I are at home—Mr. Hubbard especially. You know the great people are all dead, and if they are not dead they live a long way off. You never really see them. Perspective is necessary to greatness, even for the greatest.

People are always disappointed when they go to the shrine of greatness. I advise you not to do it. It is better when you go visiting to go to people who are like yourselves.

We are farmers; perhaps not first, but we are farmers and we are trying to raise all the things that we and our large family consume. We are workers, hard workers. We are observing what other people are doing. We came here to see what you are doing and to see how your ideas confirm our own. Then, too, we want new ideas from you, and we want to give you of what we have.

It occurred to me last night as I sat feeling very much at home among you that everybody is a salesman and everybody is advertising. We advertise the wrong thing sometimes. Advertising is an art, just as great, just as fine as that which Velasquez, the painter, had. Velasquez was great in that he knew what not to paint. An advertiser is great if he knows what not to advertise and if he knows how to relate the things that he advertises.

Women and Advertising

Mr. Sheldon has put something into my mind so that I cannot get away from it. I did not intend to say very much about women, particularly until the very last moment. But now I must say just this: It is time for women to learn advertising. Advertising is a fine art, and advertising is a necessity of life. I am using every opportunity to see how people advertise and what is the art of advertising.

We women have been advertised. It has been done for us, willy, nilly.

I think it is time we took the agency ourselves, began to advertise for ourselves and advertise the right things. We have been misrepresented until we have a reputation—a reputation in some instances that we do not want. There is a reputation that we want.

An advertiser who does the right thing is able to sell the right kind of goods. If a person gets the wrong kind of advertising, no matter how good his goods may be, people do not want anything to do with him.

We women have a reputation of weakness that we do not want, and there is no need for our having it. We have a reputation of being physically weak, mentally weak, and of having a few other weaknesses. These are the wrong things for us to advertise. I do not say we have not a few qualities that good taste would never advertise, because we have. We are quite companionable to men!

A Solution of the Cost of Living Problem

There has been much talk this past winter and spring about the high cost of living and the cost of high living, either way you choose to contemplate it. The fact remains that we have to pay more for produce than we used to do. I know this because I have a very large family to provide for. The bills have to be met. We have to have a cashier's office, the same as you do here. This has led us to investigate the subject of production, and it has led me to consider the subject of production as I have never done before.

Production is the primary necessity of life. Production is the first. It is the fundamental.

Along with that comes transportation. Now, transportation involves salesmanship. There must be a sale for the produce before there is any use in transporting it.

These two fundamentals of production and transportation are followed or involved in salesmanship. That transaction is called commerce—intercourse with other people and with other nations.

"Commercial"

We have heard the term, "commercial," used as an epithet more often than in compliment. I will be personal, if you will allow, and say that the Roycroft has been called commercial, and the term was used as an epithet. We have many artists visit us. Quite a goodly number of artists live with us. They sometimes use the word commercial with a little slanting accent.

Then there are people with the "artistic temperament!" The artist isn't so bad, but the people with the "art temperament" and the people who have the "artistic taste"—those are the hard ones to take care of. You have to take care of them because they haven't developed the art of taking care of themselves.

They say that we are so commercial! I am not sorry to say, I am happy to say, we do sell what we make at the Roycroft Shops.

Before you sell it is necessary to arrive at an equitable price to place on the goods. When an artist comes, bringing a very beautiful product, or when we ask an artist to make a beautiful product, the matter of price must be determined. We sometimes say to him, "What should that sell for?"

"Oh, don't ask me anything about price! I make the article."

"But how much time did you use in making this and what is the cost of material?"

The answer often is, "I do not know."

"You shouldn't have a catalogue even," one artist told me just the other day. I said, "We are commercial and we will have to have them."

These artists, however, are all on the pay-roll, and they are not the least paid of our workers either. Nor do they show any indifference to the pay envelope.

The Sacredness of Human Service

The other day I was thinking as to what commerce is, and what these people mean by this term as an epithet: "Commercial—you are commercial."

Why shouldn't we have a catalogue? Why shouldn't we inform people what we have to part with for a consideration? Why shouldn't we turn this article of commerce into terms that the ordinary man will understand? You people want to buy some things of us occasionally and you need to know what the price is.

Anything that you do well is a part of your heart, a part of your brain.

Everybody who is civilized is commercial. Everybody has something to sell.

The artist has something to sell. He places a price upon his time and talent.

We have something to sell. One thing is energy. Everybody has that to sell. That leads to the thought of health, for energy is dependent upon health, and the difference in the degree of success of people is the difference in the degree of their energy and their ability to direct it.

I realize as I have never done before why the matter of health is of so much interest to the whole community.

The Increasing Interest in Health

We have meetings at East Aurora. When we post a notice, "There will be a discussion on health at three p. m.," everybody will be there—even if they have to have a carriage to take them.

Health is a topic of vital interest to those who haven't it. Out of these health discussions there has been impressed in my mind and heart this: The necessity of making a dynamo of energy of oneself.

An engine of power is one of the fundamental principles for endurance. It is the subject of greatest importance.

In these health discussions there has been a good deal of talk about food. We are not cranks. You know the food crank. We have seen them. There isn't anything so effective in curing you of a fad as to have around you people who have faditis worse than you.

Some Cranks

There are people who ask us to refund fifty cents every time they do not eat breakfast. It is worth it, but I refuse because I believe the principle is not right. You know the people who say in a superior tone, "We never eat breakfast." You don't care whether they eat breakfast or not, but you care if they tell you of it. It is not a vital thing to anyone when they take their food. Where they get it might be interesting. That's one of the points it's just as well not to advertise.

There are people who eat only cereals or drink only bran coffee, or something of that kind. The cooks in the kitchen know them by name without ever seeing them. They know when they leave and when they arrive again. They are always well advertised.

Incompatibility of Foods

We had with us one of those beautiful cranks, however, Dr. Tilden of the Stuffed Club, Denver. We had a great many discussions in which he entered to our delectation and also to our benefit, and out of these discussions I got one thing I have carried with me and with very great benefit.

These are not his words, but this is his idea: If you had two dogs that were incompatible, and you wanted to sleep, you wouldn't put those dogs in a room next to you and lock them in. Neither should you put incompatible foods into your stomach. They will fight, and they will make trouble.

Do not put incompatible foods into your stomach. You see that brings us right to the point toward which we are all tending—simplicity. Did you ever think how many incompatible foods there are? One thing at a time won't be incompatible. If you are a busy person it is safe to keep just as close to one thing as possible.

One happy day our friend, Horace Fletcher, came to us. You know him Horace Fletcher lured me by this: "Eat anything you want." Doesn't that sound good? "But be sure you want it before you eat it." Then Horace Fletcher told us about a wealth we have that we haven't known about, which the human race has known at some time but has forgotten to use since we became so highly civilized that we eat predigested foods and forty kinds at a meal.

The Natural Way of Eating

It is this: Your food is digested mostly in your mouth. If you watch a horse or a cow eat you will realize that is the natural way. Any of the animals that are closely related to us know this, that digestion for the most part takes place in the mouth. But that hasn't been the way with the twentieth century race we have been running. We order all kinds of drinks—plenty of coffee, plenty of tea, water and milk, and if we are in a hurry when we begin chewing a piece of bread or other solid we take a drink to liquify it so we can swallow it. Then we wonder what is the matter with us afterward. We haven't realized that nature has provided us with a wonderful apparatus, and if we go back to instinct and follow nature that we will be all right in every sense of the word. We won't need the dentist so much—let the dentists advertise or not advertise as they choose. We won't need the doctors and we won't need the hospitals.

There are papilla at the back of the tongue and the soft palate. This part of the mouth provides the digestive fluid when you are hungry. If you have been tramping five hours past meal time when you haven't had a chance to eat, the smell of food will make your mouth water. We are provided with this digestive fluid in the mouth and the food should be digested there. Only a few foods are digested in the stomach.

What to Eat

You can eat anything you want provided you wait until you are hungry and are in need of the food. Your appetite will tell you what to eat; you won't have to go into long consultations with any physician. Your appetite will tell you. That's what your appetite is for.

When the animals want salt they know where to find it, when they want water they know where to get it, and when they want a different kind of food they know where to search for it.

This matter of food we have made a very great burden, and it ought not to be. We ought to be more particular how we use our gray matter. We ought to take more care in the selection of the food and the preparation of it, then its mastication, and then forget it.

We want to remember about breathing; and in breathing, exercise is important. You may omit your meal through the day, you may fast if you want to—if you don't tell about it—but don't miss your exercise! Don't miss your exercise!

If we follow a few fundamental principles with regard to health we shall become dynamos of energy. We all have energy to sell, or should have. If we haven't, nobody wants us around and we don't belong to this present world.

We have energy to sell.

It is for us women particularly to see that we become dynamos of energy, engines of power, because nature intended that we should be that absolutely. Nature intended that woman should take care of herself, and more. The wild animals do it, and we used to do it before the fall of man, which was when man owned woman.

The Sale of a Woman's Time

Another thing that we have to sell beside energy is time. We have our whole lifetime, and whether it be long or short depends very much upon this first thought that I have given you, of the ability to generate power, to be a dynamo of energy and an engine of power.

But we all have time.

Now here, right here, is where we women need to study salesmanship. We need to think of the value of our time.

I refer again to the Roycroft Shop. We have many people who send their applications for work. And many who come there asking for work. This is frequently the letter we receive or the message we get: "I should like to come to the Roycroft Shop and work on account of the artistic surroundings. I care only for my board and enough money to buy very simple clothing."

And I always reply, "I am exceedingly sorry, but we do not have need for you. I cannot find any place that I can offer that will be of value to you."

Why do I give this answer? Because I know there is a principle involved that is not right. No one has any right to sell his time for his board and clothes. Either you are not worth more, and if you are not there is no place on earth for you; or, if you are worth more than that, you haven't acquired the important ability of knowing values. You don't know values if you say that board and clothes are all your time is worth.

We women need to study salesmanship. I want Mr. Sheldon to get out a course particularly for women. We want to be taught the value of time.

John Wesley's mother taught him the value of time. She taught him to methodize his time.

Time is valuable! Every instant of it is valuable either for work or for play, for eating, for digestion, for exercise, for sleep; and you must use it with all your mind whatever you do.

If you rest, rest absolutely. It is precious time. Every moment of the twenty-four hours is precious. Value your time! We women must be taught that, and then salesmanship with regard to selling our time.

Woman's Past Failure in Salesmanship

I told you that everybody sells something, has something to sell. We have been somewhat like the artist. We have made some demands, some very weak demands, and we haven't known what our time was worth. But some of us have demanded that the school board shall pay the women teachers just as much as it does to men for equal service.

We are working along on that line. We are all working in what is termed the commercial world. We now demand that woman's time shall be recognized as just as valuable for a like service as man's is. She must not work cheaper. A woman stenographer must not ask a less price because she is afraid she won't get a job unless she does.

I am ashamed of men and women who employ women because they can get them cheaper for an equal service. Possibly men's services have been over-estimated. I am sure that their heads will have to come off—at least a little portion of them, that bump of self esteem. They have over-estimated their time. They have felt their time was so valuable that women must serve them—even the men of least value.

The Rights of the Wife and Mother

Today a woman is on the plane that she is because woman's time hasn't been accounted as valuable.

And now I have reached the danger point—and it is a very dangerous ground I am about to enter.

If you don't agree with me, I hope you will disagree violently. Agitation is what this subject needs. After awhile you will recognize that there is justice in it.

I said everybody had sold his time. I must make some exceptions. Infants do not, imbeciles do not, the insane do not, criminals do not. They get it sold for them sometimes. Wives and mothers do not.

You never heard of a man paying his wife for keeping house for him, did you? You never heard of a state or town recognizing the value of a mother who was the mother of beautiful children who never became criminals, who were the benefactors of the town, who made the money for the town. You never heard of the state paying a woman for that.

In New York State I know of mothers who are the mothers of beautiful children, who have grown up sons who are valued because they earn a great amount of money. And yet this mother, with all that she did for her children, was able to conserve besides, to keep, protect, to take care of the property that the man earned until he was what is termed wealthy.

Women the Conservators

It is easy to earn money. I have earned it. The difficult thing is to protect it, to conserve it, to keep it. You men know that. That is where the nerve and energy are required.

There are women who do all that for their children and their husbands, and what does the generous State of New York allow? It allows these mothers the use of one-third of the property that she has helped earn and conserve, beside caring for her family. Isn't that generous?

I have seen this and you have seen it, and it is the rule not the exception when a woman who is a mother, or a wife and not a mother, has to ask her husband for every cent of money that she uses. He thinks he is giving her something when he gives her this money.

We women are to blame for that. We have no right to sell our time for nothing.

What is this woman to the man who doles out the money? She surely has the attitude of mind of a pauper who has to beg!

Women are terribly close to being in that class. And a wife! A mother!!

Marital Tyranny

Here is a very miserable little incident that was forced upon my attention. At the Roycroft Shops we have some little leather books bound for souvenirs, called "An Essay on Silence." Mr. Hubbard says it is the best thing he ever wrote, and he says there are lots of people who agree with him. It was made for a joke at first. Its cover is made out of small pieces of leather about 4 by 2½ inches, and inside there isn't a printed word.

At the Roycroft Inn a great many buy these for autographs. There were many people there and we had a pile of the books on the desk.

A man and his wife came to visit us for a day. The woman wasn't his sweetheart. She had been a hard working woman. She had conserved and had used what energy she had to take care of him and his children. She was small, weazened, depressed, most unattractive. The man was very good looking, healthy, and he wasn't thin at all.

They sat at a double desk. He was writing business letters. This poor little woman had no business letters to write. Her children were grown and gone, so was her occupation. She didn't dare get very far away from him.

"With all my worldly goods I thee endow," was a fairy story to her and she knew it. After the marriage ceremony he probably said his courtesy compelled him to make all decisions for her, and his gallantry compelled him to say what she should have, what she should do and what she shouldn't. And so she had no mind of her own. That is the deplorable part of the disuse of any part of the body; it atrophies and dies.

The woman wandered around and finally picked out one of these little Essays on Silence that sells for thirty cents—and they are worth it. She chose a red color. It took a long time to pick it out. Then she timidly brought it around to the desk where her lord and master was writing business letters, and she said, "I kind of like this."

"What do you want it for?" he snarled. "I don't know, but I just felt as though I kind of wanted it."

"But what do you want it for? What does it say?"

That was a poser. I thought she would drop. She replied, "It doesn't say anything but I just thought I wanted it."

"How much does it cost?"

"Thirty cents."

"Well," he said, "you can't have it."

Life had developed in her a dogged persistence that surprised me. She stood there.

"Is that the only color they have got?" he growled.

She said, "No, they have brown and gray."

He said, "Go and get a brown one."

"But I have a fancy for red."

"Go and get a brown one."

She obeyed. Hers not to reason why, hers but to do and die. She fetched a brown one.

My position as hostess compelled me to put distance between myself and that man, but I had a friend who watched it through.

The husband took out some money. He couldn't find anything smaller than fifty cents, so he gave it to her and said, "Bring back that change." She got the change, came back and gave it to him, then took her little brown book, went away and got what comfort she could.

The man took out a little notebook. It wasn't very polite, I grant, but my friend had the courage to go around and see him put down, "Expenses for Mrs. Jones, one book, 30 cents."

I should have thought he would have felt worse than that. Wouldn't you?

You couldn't find it in your heart to genuinely respect that woman. You only felt pity. You wanted to put some energy into her, some power to work for her. I wanted to annihilate the man, but that wouldn't help the case.

The time is near when women will know that they are individuals, divine individuals, just as divine as anything that ever came to this world or to any other world, just as great as any man who ever lived.

We must realize that we are individuals. Possibly that's about all there is to it.

The Basis of Woman's Rights

I had a little discussion with a gentleman the other day, and he said, "You want women to have their rights because they are the mothers of men, don't you?"

I said, "No! I want women to have their individual rights because they are women. Never mind the men. That has nothing to do with the case."

However, women will be the mothers of magnificent men when women are free.

I have talked on this subject when my audience did not like it. They said, "What? Would you have a husband pay a wife for working? Sentiment forbids."

Sentiment has never forbidden his letting her become like a pauper! And when she loses this brain power that makes a woman attractive, when she loses this fleeting thing called beauty, when she comes into a state like this woman I described, and there is nothing of charm about her, sentiment has never provided that such a woman had wishes that interested anyone. Sentiment does not forbid her becoming a burden when she is unlovely and disabled.

I have no disregard nor disrespect for sentiment. I am a sentimentalist in very many ways, but I do believe in commercialism. I cite you again to the case of the artist who says that his services are worth so much, although he doesn't sell his product for money.

Sentiment Will Not Pay Grocery Bills

A woman doesn't want to sell her services—which are given in love—for money, but what is she going to do? If she is left a widow in New York State she is allowed by law the use of one-third of the property she and her husband have earned together. Before this time she is allowed by law what her husband gives her.

Women have not realized that money is necessary to an intelligent life in this world. You have to put everything on a commercial basis in order to be intelligible to people if you are going to make any interchange or exchange. Are these not always implied in mother love?

I am told that the mother is going to get her reward in heaven. We have all kinds of promises: "Love is its own reward," they say. But you can't convince a grocer that it is enough. You can't convince a clothier of it. You can't convince the boarding house lady. She can't use it exclusively in her business.

Think how ridiculous it would be if the mother of ten children should go to the grocer and say, "I will give you mother love for some groceries."

Can she buy a railroad ticket with it, or shoes, or bread, or a house? We must have some basis whereby woman can be independent. We want to remember that if we forget every other interest.

We have got to do this.

We must do it. The time has come when every woman must have a brain and use it for herself.

It is the age of the brain. Every time a machine is invented that means to every workman, "You have to develop your brain more because this machine demands more knowledge than work did without it."

Economic Value of Freedom for Women

As a state, as a nation, we must realize that women must be independent. The tendency of the time is toward giving the mother freedom. Husbands may not realize this, and mothers may not realize it, but it is coming.

I can remember when the poor man with six children had to pay for six children's tuitions in the district school, and the rich man who lived up on the hill and had no children didn't have to pay a school tax at all. You may remember the objections that these people made when they had to pay a tax and sent no children to school. After a little they forgot all about it and paid without a murmur. Later we made the district buy the books for the children. It was no hardship to give the children the books, and it made schooling possible for many children.

Still later came the idea of giving these little ones a noonday luncheon of good food. That will come to be a part of our school system soon. The child is educated by the state, he will be properly fed and clothed by the state by increasing the common tax.

What is the next thing? Economic freedom for mothers. Then and not until then shall we have free-born children. Then and not until then shall we have—not slaves for citizens, but gods in the making.

We will give what energy, what time, and what courage can do to speed the day.

Some Prime Essentials that Win in the Business Game : by Don E. Mowry

YOU ask me to tell you what I consider the prime essentials that are bound to win in the business game, and, in so doing, you put up a difficult problem for me to answer. I must base my answer upon conditions that have come to my direct notice and upon my observations of successful business men. My view may be a purely personal one, nevertheless, I feel that the statements that I am about to make will apply throughout the business world.

There are exceptions to all rules and many of us are compelled to work out our own salvation in various ways.

Here is my old friend William Rawson who, by careful application to his work, won the esteem of many men with whom he came in contact and was later offered a valuable and trusted position—a position which he filled with credit. His success was not due to the fact that he kept himself in touch with men of affairs and conditions but to the fact that he was “discovered.”

Rawson was mighty poor as a “mixer” and he was termed a “plugger” by his immediate friends.

The modern game of business calls for men who are planning ahead, men who are making a study of themselves, trying to find out just what they can do to best advantage. Then, the whole nervous system must tune itself up to the battle, prepare for the fight to obtain the desired end.

Make Friends

Friendship will play an important role from this point on because there is nothing in this world that man can hope to secure that is worth while, without the aid of friends. Select your friends from among those who are well thought of, those who are a figure in your community.

Get in touch with your special field and learn to know of the men that are successful in it.

Don't dally around with careless men. Let them say you are different and odd.

Build for your own future. Apply yourself to your task and, to put it broadly, “cut out the comedy that you see everywhere about you.”

Study men. This is one of the important facts so many of us think of minor importance.

Notice how your neighbor, who is or who is not successful, handles his cigar, for example. Does he consider the mere act of smoking a diversion—a part of the formalities of his work in his receiving capacity—or, is he a so-called crank on smoking cigars? Does he appear to think that he cannot work without smoking? Consider his type. See if you discover men with similar features who look at a cigar as he does. Then, compare character traits in men who have the same ideas with respect to cigars and cigar smoking. You will be surprised to note how many traits such men will have in common and how easily you will be able to size up your man.

Rawson never chewed the end of his cigar. He smoked it evenly and always deposited the ashes in a receiver before it was time for them to drop. Rawson was not nervous, he was not erratic; he had a cool head and was careful. When he cast his stub away he appeared to do it with the sole idea of depositing it safely in its receiver. Whenever you called at his office he was not smoking. When a visitor entered he was often known to hand him a cigar and smoke himself.

I give this simple illustration to show how essential it is to observe the little things in your daily contact with men who are successful in their line.

There are hundreds of ways that you can observe men and come to learn of their character without ever giving them an idea that you are gaining the information. This information, gained in this way, will enable you to use the proper tactics with men whom you desire to approach. After some study, you will be able to size up your man at a glance and in this way you will be able to determine your method of attack.

My friend, the cashier in one of our national banks, makes it a business to keep track of the men who do business with his bank. He does not take the judgment of anyone else. He knows, first-hand, just what each man is doing in and out of office hours. Appearances are often deceiving, he says, and for this reason he gets at the bottom of things.

This brings me to another side of the business game that may not appeal to some, namely, the offensive. The great American tongue is so careless about what it says about men, in all communities and in all lines of endeavor, that many of us refuse to consider or believe anything that is said. The saying goes: "Believe nothing that you hear and only half what you see." This is an apt phrase to apply to idle women and to those who hear such information solely for the purpose of spreading the news. To the man of business, however, such information should be taken with a grain of salt, salted and preserved, for future personal reference.

You can never tell what the future will bring forth. By observing men whom the "town talk" seems to place under suspicion you are placing a safeguard about your own future. For no other purpose would I consider such gossip and then I would hold it intact as a purely personal business asset.

Be hopeful, and at the same time, suspicious. This statement seems contradictory. By it I mean that, in whatever you are undertaking, maintain a hopeful attitude, have confidence and play to win. At the same time you must necessarily keep a close watch of events and keep one eye on the outlook for surprises.

Don't take every man at his word. See to it that he is carrying out his end of the bargain. There are many good men in the business world and some bad ones and it is necessary for you to be suspicious to a certain degree in order to safeguard yourself.

Be Charitable

Charity is a good thing. There are times when it becomes necessary for each and every one of us to do things that require some labor and worry. There is no return from such efforts, or, at least we think so, if we are strictly practical. So it is our first thought, to plead a rush of business. Experience has taught me that this very charity pays two-fold. Practice it whenever you can. Give the other fellow a helping hand. He may be able to return the favor some day. If he does not do so, you will know his type better for having had the experience.

There are, of course, many other essentials that one must keep in mind in attempting to gain ground in the business game; but they have been discussed at length so many times that it seems hardly necessary to repeat them.

You Can't Come Back

By MILTON BEJACH

Assistant Advertising Manager, The McCaskey Register Company

MARCUS AURELIUS lived, moved and had his being a considerable number of hundreds of years ago, but he left behind him a few good things in the way of precepts and sayings that are as good now as they were when they were first uttered or written. I'm not certain as to the form or manner in which they were first dispensed.

One of the good things Marcus left behind was the saying, "In the morning when thou art sluggish at rousing thee, let this thought be present: 'I am rising to a man's work.'"

We cannot do much better than this in this day of airships, wireless telegraphy, great white ways, four color printing and society scandals.

Ever since the first man felt ambition stir within him he was helped onward, nearer his ideal by the thought that what he was doing was a good work.

Somewhere in the Scripture it is written, "The race is not always to the swift," and in that is encouragement for the salesman who is not a genius, but who steadily, carefully, even ploddingly takes care of everything in his territory, who, even though slowly, garners every prospect.

"In the morning, when thou art sluggish at rousing thee, let this thought be present: 'I am rising to a man's work.'"

Several tons of copy were written about that affair at Reno last Independence Day, but the best thing that came from the contest between the gentlemen with pugilistic inclinations was the phrase uttered by Jeffries when, awakening from his stupor, defeated, he cried, "I couldn't come back."

You can't come back and save the minutes and hours and days you've wasted, you can't come back to your youth if it has gone, you can't come back to the pleasures, you can't come back to your sorrows even.

You can't come back to a whole host of things.

But there is one thing you can do. You can make it unnecessary to want to go back. You can stop wasting your hours and days, you can make the most of the present so that you won't have to want to go back.

There's one thing I learned in the newspaper business and that was, to Do It Now. The story that gets away today will not be as good tomorrow. The tip you fail to cover today will be worthless tomorrow. The scoop you fail to land will be the other fellow's beat tomorrow. So Do It Now.

Now, let's take this thing to heart in this business. The sale we lose today we cannot make tomorrow. Why? Well, for as many reasons as we have competitors, for one thing; the prospect may die, he may burn out, sell out or give away his business. You can't come back on the sales you lose. You've got to get them now.

Every day you lose is a dead loss. You may wish you could come back to them, but you can't. This is one of the places when the word "can't" is permissible, because it describes an actual condition and physical impossibility.

Suppose you take ten minutes next Sunday afternoon, go out under the old apple tree in the back yard and figure this thing out for yourself. In about twenty-three seconds by the clock you'll agree with us that you can't come back and that you'd better hustle while both spirit and flesh are able and willing.

Changing Interest to Desire

By Jerome P. Fleishman

A MAN who has traveled this country from the Mississippi to the Atlantic for many years in the interest of various technical publications, told me an advertising story the other day that forcibly illustrates the cumulative value of the right sort of advertising.

This man passes the time on trains between cities by reading the magazines. He says he reads nearly all of the "big" magazines of the day, and a great many of the "little fellows." Of course, he reads the advertising sections.

For some time he had been conscious of a peculiar appeal in the advertising of a certain well-known make of safety razor. Time and again his attention had been attracted by the advertising of this razor, until finally his interest was aroused. This man, by the way, was quite an expert in mechanics, and something in the construction of that particular shaving device appealed to him as being mechanically sound.

One day, not so awfully long ago, while riding in an elevator in one of the skyscrapers of Chicago, this man noticed that the manufacturers of that razor maintained headquarters in that building. Remembering the generous offer of a "thirty-day free trial," as advertised in the magazines he had been reading, he entered the firm's showrooms and asked to be shown one of the razors. A courteous clerk, who was shrewd enough to size up the temperament of the visitor and allowed the goods to speak for themselves, effected a sale in short order.

The cumulative effect of all those magazine ads was responsible for that sale. Strangely enough (although this has no bearing on the point I wish to make) I, too, had been interested in the advertising of that razor and was considering buying one. After my little talk with this man, I went right out and bought one, for his satisfactory experience with the article changed my interest to desire.

Don't expect, Mr. Merchant, to put a little ten-line advertisement in today's paper and be forced to close your doors to keep the crowds out of your store tomorrow.

Advertising isn't magic. It is power, and this power grows through repetition.

Don't lose sight of advertising's cumulative value. Keep your name and your goods in the public eye—keep at it—and you'll reap the reward of all persistent advertisers—more business.

Discouragement, the Disease—Stickto-itiveness, the Cure : by H. P. Wartman

THIS preachment is not for the seasoned salesman who, having served his apprenticeship in the severe but thorough mill of experience, accepts vicissitudes as matter-of-fact happenings common to all men, whistles a merry tune, goes his way wearing his habitual smile and is affected not at all. It's the beginner, the young salesman ambitious for success, who conscientiously does his best, seems to make no headway and has come to believe that he is the one particular mark picked by his nemesis to be pursued. He's the fellow I want to reach.

You know that excellent bit of verse that begins

"It's all very well to be pleasant
When life flows along like a song" and you've wondered sometimes how the devil it's possible to smile "when everything goes dead wrong." Well, it isn't exactly easy on the start and you can't always smile. But this you can do with that nemesis; you can side-track it, and keep on side-tracking it until finally, some day, you'll ask yourself, "I wonder where I shook that thing?" And you won't be able to remember.

And right here, observe, please, that I am not by nature an optimist. Thirty odd years (don't bother about the "odd"—actual figures have no particular bearing on the subject) have brought to me a generous share of set-backs, but they have taught me as well the utter futility of wasting energy worrying over the unpreventable.

"Never Say Die"

Once, in my school age, I went to a show. "Never Say Die" was the name of it. It was only the usual blood-and-thunder melodrama in which the hero in the first act is bidden to go hence from the old home and in the three following successively escapes being murdered by the villain, run over by the lightning express, cut in two by a circular saw and drowned in the mill race, to return finally in the nick of time with a bag of gold to pay off the mortgage and hand the villain—cur-r-se him!—over to the authorities.

The play, while it made quite an impression on my immature mind was, of course, in time, forgotten. But somehow, the title lingered, for it isn't such a bad phrase. Say it over again to yourself.

Later, when my business life was in the bud, there fell into my hands one day a circular of which just one line stands out clearly in my memory, "keeping everlastingly at it brings success."

Read it again, it's a good one. And what was that other one?

Making a Start as a Salesman

Now to get down to "brass tacks."

You've landed the job. The "Boss" has told you all about the line, patted you on the back and said, "Now go out and get busy," and away you go, feeling like a three-year-old.

H. P. WARTMAN

ASSISTANT SALES MANAGER CAMPBELL SOUPS

Your line is a mighty good one. You know this is so; not only because the boss himself has said it, but because you can see for yourself. It's one the public ought to buy; the price is right and if anybody can sell it, you're the man.

Why not? You're a salesman; no doubt you've just completed the Sheldon course. Now, you're in just the right frame of mind. The day is perfect and as you walk down the street with your sample case you figure that in a year or two you will have done so well that the boss will take you into partnership. You're going to put your whole heart and soul into your work and failure is a word your vocabulary knows not.

Here is your first prospect. You've decided that time is money and made up your mind to waste very little of it on a "preliminary."

You open up something like this, perhaps: "Good afternoon, Mr. Prospect. I have a line here that I think you'll want to handle as soon as you see it. Highest quality! good profit! your trade will—" and here the cloud in the sky no bigger than a man's hand that you didn't see at all out in the sunshine has suddenly settled down and enveloped you and your ambition, for the prospect has turned on his heel and is even now closing the rear door behind him.

Never a word; no opportunity for argument; you just got your grip open and that's all.

Now what can you do in a case like that?

Of course the fellow was a curmudgeon (whatever that means) and his action contrary to all business ethics. Literally, he insulted you and in the presence of his clerks. Your temper (I hope you have one) is right at the boiling point. If you could only get the scoundrel outside for just one minute, you'd show him, etc., etc.

How to Take a Hard Turn Down

What are you going to do about it? This—if you're wise. You smile; you laugh; heartily if you're certain the rear door is tightly closed. You remark to whoever is within hearing, "It's a beautiful morning this afternoon," or some such irrelevance; pick up your sample case; say further, "Now I've got to come back again—and this is my busy day." Blithely depart with head erect, having parted with not one iota of your self respect.

Is it difficult to do this? Not at all. Once on the outside, if it will relieve you to jaw a little, do so (this won't get you anything, however) and then—forget it. Just that. Dismiss the entire incident from your mind. You think you can't do this? It's the easiest thing in the world.

It would be the height of imbecility to permit the ungentelemanly behavior of a buyer who ought to know better to spoil your day.

Look above you. The sun still shines. Your line's all right. You're all right. Your salesmanship hasn't even been given a chance to prove itself; only your pride has been jolted. And right across the street is Prospect No. 2. What was the title of the melodrama?

You are yourself again. You frame up a good quick opening and enter the store—we'll say it's a grocery store; there are more of that kind than any other—and find just nine customers waiting to be served and in two minutes three more make the total twelve.

The time slips by; five, ten, twelve, fifteen minutes; the proprietor is a very busy man and seemingly short of help.

A busy store has money to spend, you reason, and you're not far wrong. Meanwhile, you are figuring that all this time you might be making a sale somewhere else on this, your first day, when you are so anxious to give a good account of yourself.

Up Against Another Obstacle

Finally the last customer goes her way and the man you have been waiting for looks up and says, "Well!!" and his voice may not be likened to the merry little brook rippling down the mountain side. You step up briskly and he throws this at you: "I'm too busy to talk to you today." He looks it.

Now, right on his shelf you see your own line which, for a name, we'll say is Campbell's Soup. There are twenty-one kinds of it. He's entirely out of one of the best sellers and he's low on several other kinds.

You know he ought to buy. Your firm are generous advertisers and as sure as fate some woman is certain to want the very kind he hasn't got.

You tell him this and everything else that you can remember the Boss at the factory told you about a case of this kind (for the "Boss," if he's on to his job, has fully posted you before he let you get away).

While you are talking, the grocer stands on one foot and then the other, looks frequently and longingly at the bunch of orders that must be put up before dinner time and, finally, seeing your earnestness and perhaps sensing your "newness," remarks, "I really haven't time today to check up my stock. Come in next time you're 'round," and in just six seconds he's in the back of the store with his head in a sugar barrel.

Now, you have some arguments yet unsaid but this is not a Campbell's Soup story (you'll find that in the December '09 number of THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER and it's worth reading).

You may or may not follow your prospect and anyhow, it's the purpose of this article that you do not sell him after a good half hour wasted—as you think, forgetting that some buyers have a good memory, particularly if you've a "personality," which, if you haven't, you should cultivate immediately.

Also, you do not sell the next half-dozen grocers on whom you call. This must be unusual, you reason, and so it is, for the line you carry.

You've just about lost heart for good and, coming to a public square, an empty bench invites you and you accept the invitation—which is a very good move on your part—you're "new."

Getting Back Your Nerve

You sit down. Perhaps you consult your watch and think, "It'll take me about a half hour to get back to the factory and turn in my sample case; it's plain to be seen I'm not cut out for a salesman"—a perfectly natural thought under the circumstances, but very, very lacking in originality.

Listen! That little bird that flew away as you approached is sitting on a twig just above you. His chatter is insistent. Listen again! You can hear him very plainly. "Che-e-up! Che-e-r up!" he chirps and he means you. "Happy bird," you say, "with nothing to do but sing in the sunshine. No trouble, no care—" Hasn't he, though? What about his wife and four children to feed?

It's a good two hours till sundown. Presently the humor of the situation strikes you. "What a chump I am!" you say. "Did I tackle this thing to give up after a few hours? Well, I guess not." For I am presuming you are the right sort and have grit.

Now you use the brain God gave you. Something must be wrong. What is it? What's the matter with your talk?

You rehash many of your arguments. There was a time when you believe if you had said this to Smith instead of that things would have taken a different turn. And the point you wanted to bring out with Jones, somehow got by, and after that you felt intuitively he was lost. What was that phrase that stood out so clearly on the circular?

Sticking to It—And Winning

Ten minutes more and you're talking to Robinson; talking convincingly. You've made up your mind that you're going to sell him if it takes you the rest of the afternoon, and you do sell him—in five minutes by the clock.

You make a few more sales and you miss a few more—you miss more than you make, very likely. When you drop in at the factory for fresh samples for tomorrow, the Boss asks, "What luck?" and you tell him. Then he says, "Well, that isn't so bad for your first day; you'll do better tomorrow"—if he's the right kind of a Boss and has grown to be what he is because he understands how to handle men.

The days come and go. Some are very good; some very bad. Sometimes the fault lies with yourself; frequently causes beyond your control seem to conspire against you. Steadily, however, you forge ahead and after awhile, when you have become seasoned and immune to the hard knocks that come to most of us in this life, you look back at times and laugh to yourself at how you used to worry about the trivialities that were, after all, but incidents; little pebbles in your road to success requiring but a kick of your advancing foot to clear your pathway. That is, you do this if you have learned to be a philosopher. Some never acquire this knowledge, but all may.

And so, I say to you, young man; having selected your vocation, stick to it.

Let nothing deter you.

Make up your mind to succeed and be satisfied with nothing short of success.

If you are to be a salesman, determine to be a good one; the kind the Boss picks for the hard knots and says, "There's just one man to handle that proposition and if he loses out, we'll forget it; it's impossible."

And remember, "He who would win, must work," not forgetting that he who works almost always wins—provided he works along the right lines.

Floriday Flowers

By R. H. LAMPKIN

THIS is the first time I have ever written for the PHILOSOPHER, but it will not be the last time. This is not conceit, for I have heard it said that Riley, the Hoosier Poet, tried for twenty years to get into a certain magazine in this land of magazines, before he succeeded. And my wife said she had to marry me to get rid of me.

I thought a good deal of my wife then, but nothing like my growing appreciation now. I liked the PHILOSOPHER of former issues, but if there is a best it was the June number—I was born in June. The disparity between the yearly subscription price and the worth of this one copy is an impassable gulf. I don't see how anybody can afford to produce that kind of writing for the money, or how others can afford to do without it.

That leads me to say that business men do not gather enough of this kind of cream from the pan of life, but like flies are swimming around in the blue of a pan of skimmed milk, into which a greediness has bewitched them. Newspaper reading is all right but like skimmed milk it is likely to produce colic or costiveness in the mentality, if it is made a too steady diet. What is needed to preserve the good fruit of a broad mind is the sugar of mutual benefit, and not just that spice that can be rung up on a cash register, or one might find that his preserves are pickles—and vinegar goes to make up the latter compound.

Here you are. Listen:

"There was a maid named Perkins
Who dearly loved Heinz's gherkins,

But she ate a whole quart,
Which was more than she ort,
And it pickled her inside workin's."

Yes, too many of those fellows behind the glass doors and gilt indications of importance are in this maid's dilemma. They need to read the lines of Nixon Waterman:

We are, most of us, selfishly slow to confess
How much others aid us in winning success;
But the Fourth of July and the oyster must see
What failures, without any crackers, they'd be.

The crackers of success accompaniments do not always come in sealed packages of selfishness, but are found in bulk. Though they may sometimes lack in crispness, it is usually because they are kept too long under the counter of irritation. All that is needed is the quick oven of human sympathy, heated by just a few twigs that have hitherto served as perches for those above.

Get down, my brother, and let those twigs do the work, for the real success problem you will solve by letting the top figure be counted in. For "the success of an institution is the sum of the successes of each man in it."

Here is the end of my string and I am going to use it to tie up my posies for you—they grew wild. "You're welcome."

"If a man wants to live the great life, all the laws of the universe range themselves on his side."—J. D. Jones.

"God, Immortality, Virtue, are the three pillars on which the Universe rests."
—Jean Paul Richter.

Resuscitating Oscar Holland's Business

ONE of the first of the autumn rainstorms was dropping straight from the clouds to hardpan—everything between was so dry that the water didn't find a stopping place. So, of course, the day was "cold and dark and dreary," and all the rest of the poetic things that Longfellow says about it. The radiators had not been connected up after summer repairs, so Socratic and I were glumly working away in our fall overcoats when Oscar Holland thickened the gloom by casting his chill shadow into the office.

Now, Oscar was no habitual Jeremiah. He had been foregathering with the after-hours galaxy of stars in our office, and had usually done his own share of scintillating.

But Oscar had not been himself since his summer vacation. He seemed to be working harder than ever, but the thermometer of his spirits had been going down, down, down—until we could see the deep, black ice on the brooks of his good nature, the hoar frost on the flowers of his sense of humor, and the heavy, damp snow on the once sun-drenched meadows of his good cheer.

An Unburied Corpse

"Well, I'm through," he groaned, falling limply into the big chair. "My business is dead, defunct, decayed. And I haven't money enough to pay for the obsequies. Know where I can get a job as bookkeeper at twelve dollars a week?"

A gust of wind spattered a handful of cold raindrops against the window. Oscar shivered.

"Last year at this time," he wailed, monotonously, "I was making about three sales a day of my office systems, with prospective profits of twenty dollars each. Now, I don't sell one in a week."

"What's the trouble, Oscar?" I soothed. "We use your system here and find that it is the best thing of its kind that was ever devised. Flushton uses it over at his store, and wouldn't trade it even for a stenographer that doesn't wear rats or chew gum. Seems like you ought to have a bunch of boosters in this town, after your work last season, that would send you to the top of Old Baldy to get a rest from raking in the money."

"Put away your pipe, old man. I had the same dream when I started in work this fall. But somebody kicked me and I woke up."

"Perhaps you have worked out your territory," I suggested, by way of getting at the answer.

"The thought doesn't comfort me, old man—first, because it's all the territory I've got; second, because the tear-wringing truth is that I had worked only the fringes of my territory. All the biggest and best offices I reserved for this season, when I should have the weight of having made good in the smaller ones. But, they will not come across, although I have used enough perfectly good salesmanship to have sold a carload of bucksaws at a hobo convention."

"Then how do you diagnose your desperate case?"

"You don't mean diagnosis, son. you mean post mortem—the autopsy."

"Well, the autopsy, then, Little Sunshine. What carried off your child?"

"I wouldn't pay five cents—if I had it—to know. What's the use? That wouldn't raise the dead."

Socratic as Coroner

"So you don't know why your business has passed away?"

"Listen, simpleton! To begin with myself, I am a better salesman this year than I was last—or was before I died. Next, take my proposition. It has been greatly improved since last fall as a result of our experience with it. Then comes the customer. As I have already imparted to your darkened understanding, I saved most of my best and biggest prospects for this season. In addition, business in general is better, people have more money to spend, and I have the advantage of a good many satisfied customers. Do you see any large, jagged holes in that analysis?"

"Can't you see the big hole yourself, Oscar?" Socratic had spoken at last.

"Why no, I must say I can't. Looks to my crude intelligence as if the argument was as thick and solid as a stone wall. Where is the hole?"

"How did you begin your work here, Oscar?" Socratic wanted to know.

Where the Line of Least Resistance Led

"Why, I had a lot of good leads from advertising when I came here. First of all, I went around and sold as many of those as I could. Then I got the names of others from them, and so worked along the lines of the endless chain idea?"

"What kind of people were on your list as leads?"

"Well, there were one or two big ones—the rest were small dealers."

"And what kind of people were the first ones you sold?"

"Well, the small ones, of course. They are easier to approach than the big fellows, and, not being pestered so much by salesmen in my line, are easier to sell."

"And the names that they gave you—were they the names of leading firms?"

"Well, no, not noticeably. They referred me to people in their own class, of course."

"A good many of them are easy marks, no?"

"Well, I suppose they were. You see, I was new in the field, and wanted to get my systems into actual operation somewhere just as soon as I could. So I naturally followed the line of least resistance."

"Now, answer me truly, Oscar. Have all the people you sold your system continued to use it?"

"No, of course not, the fish! Even when they have invested their money in my service and the forms, they haven't the enterprise to go ahead and get their money's worth. The system would save them a lot of money if they would only use it, but they are such inert mud that they let it lie idle in their desks and vaults."

"You think that you have a right to sell a man the system when you know that the chances are that he will never get his money's worth out of it?"

"The service is worth ten times what it costs to any man that I sell it to. If he hasn't the enterprise to get the value out of it, that's none of my affair."

What Might Have Been

"Do the firms that have allowed the service to go by default generously admit that the fault is their own?"

"Oh, no. Hardly ever. If they are such paralytic victims of strabismus and myopia as not to use what they have paid for, they are usually too demented to put the blame where it belongs. Some of them even try to get me to give them their money back. As if they could return to my stock the hours and days that I spent in installing the system and hooking it up to their business."

"And when you refuse to rebate, I suppose they are full of kindly and generous feelings toward you?"

"No, there are a whole lot of them sore. But that always happens when you sell your services. It's a part of the business that has to be expected."

"Did you ever sell a real, live, business-like man or firm your services and system that quit using it afterwards?"

"I don't remember any now. But the money of the little fellow is just as good as that of the big one, in proportion to the service rendered and forms sold—and a lot easier to get."

"Do you think, Oscar, that a swarm of little gnats, buzzing dissatisfaction with their investment, is the best kind of advertisement you can get?"

"By the hammer of Thor! Knockers! Of course they would knock. I'm a good one to talk about strabismus and myopia. Thanks for the specs, Socratic. With them I can see a whole lot of things I never saw before. It's all as plain as day. There was the Pierce & Higby deal. I had that all but closed. Then it fell through, and I couldn't make out why. But I remember now that Field, the little upholsterer, is a brother-in-law of Higby's. And I put in a system there that Field never used. Field is a meek little cuss, and never would have the nerve to jump on me about it, but he told his brother-in-law how he had been stung. I remember now that Pierce asked me if I hadn't installed my service at Field's."

"If you had made it a point to sell Madsen the very first one that you put in anywhere in town, don't you think that his name would have been worth more to you than those of a dozen small retailers whom everyone in town knows are easy marks?"

"Of course, of course! They are follow the leader. It would have taken a little longer to get started, but I should have been in the right company. Why, when I had bagged a half dozen of the biggest firms in town, the rest would have followed like sheep. All I would need to do this fall would be to sit in my office and take their money, hiring men to go out and install the systems. But the mischief is done. And now, I don't see any way out."

"Have you ever analyzed Madsen's business and devised an office system for it?"

The Corpse Revived

"No, I'll have to own up that I was waiting until I could go to him with the names of several of the other big fellows on my list of clients. But I see your point. Why, dog bite my cork brain! I have known all the time that the way to sell a real business man was to get together something that would show right on the face of it just how much I could serve him. But I was too busy nosing out the line of least resistance to do it. A lazy man's makeshift. Will each of you kindly place an able-bodied and well-directed kick where it will do me the most good?"

The wind had risen to a gale and was howling in the cornice. The rain volleyed against the window panes, washing off the last of the summer's dust. But the steam was clanking in the pipes and the winter of Oscar Holland's discontent was melting in one of his old time smiles.

"I'll sell Madsen the very next thing I do, if it takes me all of next month," he crowed, buttoning up his rain coat. "And if any man that hasn't the backbone to keep going comes around to me with his money, I'll refuse it with hauteur."

Why He is Judge Lex

WE ALL went down to the court house, on Wiggins' invitation, to hear the arguments in the Mordave insurance case. The good old fellow had promised us that they would be worth hearing. And I suppose they were, no doubt—to Wiggins.

The court room was warm and poorly ventilated. I had been up late the night before, demonstrating the timewreathed bit of wisdom that "a little nonsense now and then is relished by the wisest men." So I was soon placidly escaping the prickings of my conscience, with my head pillowed on Socratic's shoulder.

Just as the Big Gun of my dream was signing the contract for a half-million-dollar advertising account, I felt Socratic's rude elbow in my ribs. I could have tied a bow-knot in his smooth-shaven throat without a thought of the coroner. Why couldn't he have waited until the magnate had signed up?

Then I heard him whisper into my agonized ear: "Listen to this, you snoring virtuoso. The man is talking law in plain United States."

The First Impression

I stopped—looked—listened.

What I saw was a shabby, middle-aged man with a great dome of a head, standing in an apologetic attitude before the court.

What I heard was a thin voice, haltingly addressing his honor on the law in the case. At least, that was all I heard at first. But in a minute I was drinking in the purest rill of English that ever trickled from a man's lips. And it was making the law in that case so plain that even a rank outsider and layman like me was on his side, body and soul.

"Who is he?" we all demanded of Wiggins, like a college yell, as soon as the dome of thought sat down.

"Job Lex. He represents one of the minor parties to the action before the court. Lives out in Osseo. Back country lawyer."

"Do you know him personally?" Socratic wanted to know.

"Oh, yes, I've met him several times in connection with this case. Why?"

"I want you to present me, if you will."

"Certainly, just as soon as court adjourns."

There were two or three other prosy arguments, during which I made up sleep. Then the scuffling of feet told me that the session and my nap were over.

"Come along, you, if you want to meet Lex," ordered Wiggins. So we all trailed after him into the jury room, where we found Lex alone, getting ready to eat his lunch out of a little, folding tin box.

Getting the Man Fed

Wiggins did the thing handsomely for all of us, poor Job Lex looking a little scared all the while. After the opening exercises, Socratic used this:

"Won't you come over to the club to lunch with us, Mr. Lex? There are some business matters I should like to talk over with you, if you can spare the time."

Lex accepted a little dubiously, and we were soon using our imaginations on Phil's irresistible menu.

Socratic had some mining claims that had got into some kind of legal sticky fly paper, and he thought that Job Lex was just the man to pull them out of the pitch and clear them of the mess. Lex wasn't at all certain that he could do it, suggested his friend Vivian, the noted expert on such cases, but finally had to admit that even now, with what little Socratic had been able to throw upon the tangle, he thought he saw a short cut to clearing the claims. From Socratic's manner, I could see that Lex's plan was much better than anything he had hoped to do. And so the deal was made.

By this time, we were stirring our coffee, and Lex had warmed up and begun to feel at home. Conversation became general. And then we found that our guest was one of the brightest, kindest, and wittiest conversationalists that had put his feet under the Cuyamaca club mahogany for many a long and dreary day.

A Brilliant Failure

In the good fellowship and confidence of the coffee cups, Lex finally let it out that he had a miserable practice, and had never been able to make ends meet.

"But, so far as your knowledge of the law is concerned, and your ability to win cases, you yield nothing to the most successful lawyer in this part of the state, do you, Mr. Lex?" murmured Socratic.

"Oh, I would hardly say that, Mr. Socratic. 'I am just a back country lawyer.'"

"I appreciate your modesty. It is a beautiful virtue in a violet, but it seems to me that it is shockingly poor medicine in an attorney. As a matter of fact, and just between friends, haven't you prepared yourself for your profession with more painstaking care and thoroughness than any of your confreres of this bar?"

"Well, perhaps I have. In some respects, I am sure I have. But, notwithstanding, it's results that count. And I have to own up that I have not attained to the degree of success of some of the poorest prepared of any of them."

"Isn't it true, Mr. Lex, that you win practically all the cases you undertake?"

Some Causes of Failure

"Yes, I suppose it is. But then, you must remember that I have been retained only in the most simple and unimportant cases. The big, reputation-making cases go to the more successful and better known men."

"Mainly because you have the habit of recommending the other men when a big case comes to you, isn't it?"

"To be sure, Mr. Socratic. I give my clients the best advice I can, and it seems to me that I ought not to let them take chances on causes involving important financial or other interests with so obscure an attorney as I am."

"But you know, down in your own heart, that you know the law and can make the pleadings better than these fellows in the lime-light. Why shouldn't you serve your clients by giving them the benefit of your superior wisdom and skill?"

"I have sometimes thought the same thing, but, even when I have tried to act upon the thought, I have been unable to induce my clients to let me handle such cases. Besides, my health has not been of the best for the last few years, and I have had to go a little slow with myself."

"Even so, wouldn't there be more money and less hard work in a few big cases than in many petty ones?"

"Yes, that is true. But I am handicapped by my unpopularity. I have a poor memory for names and faces, and so often estrange my friends. I am a very poor mixer, and have often ruined my chances by my thoughtless and tactless manner. I am sorry to say that I do not read men well, and, knowing this, am unduly suspicious. No, I'm afraid that I am fated, by my temperament and limitation, to stub along at the poor dying rate I have been going."

A Poser for Lex

"Why don't you study salesmanship, Mr. Lex?"

"Salesmanship? I'm surprised. I'm too old to change my profession. Besides, I'm utterly unfitted to sell goods. I should make a worse failure on the road than at the bar. I don't understand you, Mr. Socratic."

"Did I ask you to take up the profession of salesmanship, Mr. Lex?"

"No, come to think of it, you didn't. But why study it unless I do take it up? You puzzle me more than ever."

"Have you ever stopped to think just what the study of salesmanship might involve?"

"I can't say that I ever did. But, on first thought, I suppose it must require a knowledge of the goods to be sold, their prices, and the terms of the contract between buyer and seller."

"Well, that would be very easy to acquire, wouldn't it? You could learn that in a few hours, with your trained mind, couldn't you?"

"Yes, yes. I suppose I could. But a man ought to be naturally adapted for the business as a foundation to all that."

"What would you say are the natural qualifications for salesmanship?"

"I don't see why you are putting me through all this catechism, but you must have some purpose, so I'll answer you the best I can. Why, a salesman ought to have good health, first of all; then the power to be a good mixer—a hale fellow, well met—remember names and faces like the rogue's gallery, have stacks of self-confidence and courage, be cheerful and enthusiastic, be alert and original, prompt to think and decide, have a good voice and be a ready, logical talker, a keen judge of human nature, know something about practical psychology, and well up on the technique of business."

"And all these are natural qualifications, Mr. Lex?"

"Well, nearly all of them."

The "Natural-Bornness" of a Lawyer

"You have the natural qualifications necessary to keen analysis of legal situations, don't you, Mr. Lex?"

"Yes, I may say that I have."

"And you were born with this mental power at its full vigor?"

"Why no, of course not. I'm surprised! I may say that I had the mental tendency. But I have developed the power by long years of careful training."

"Then don't you think that the study of salesmanship ought to involve training in the qualities you have named?"

"You're right, Mr. Socratic. What follows?"

"Have you, or have you not, some little mental tendency, as you call it, in these directions? Or do you think that you are utterly deficient in them?"

"Oh no, not utterly deficient, by any means. I have a little, but that's the reason I think I should be so dismal a failure as a salesman—I have so pitifully little."

"But, since you have a little, you will admit that the little could be developed by training into much, just as you have developed your powers of legal analysis?"

"Certainly, but what's the use? Why throw away all the years I have spent in preparing myself for the law?"

The Breaking of the Light

"Why not use salesmanship in building up your law practice?"

"Wh-wh-what? I'm surprised! But wait a minute, wait a minute. It isn't so absurd after all." Lex was musing to himself. "Good health—a good mixer—a good memory—sure, sure! Self-confidence, yes—courage, yes—cheerfulness—enthusiasm—initiative, umhuh—quick thought, quick action, to be sure—trained voice, ready talker, yep—judge of men, of course! Why it's the solution! I'm surprised! And I couldn't see what you were driving at, Mr. Socratic. Very stupid of me! But, listen! How does a man go about it to develop all these things, and the others that must go with them to make a successful salesman—or a success in any other profession, as I now verily believe?"

"Do you believe that there are natural laws that control the development of man's faculties and qualities?"

"Certainly. There must be. Everything develops according to natural law, from the amoeba swimming in a drop of ditch-water up to the highest and finest attributes of the human soul."

"And you believe that these laws can be searched out by diligent students and observers, stated, classified, and correlated?"

"Yes, of course, of course. And that would make a science! I'm surprised! And has this been done?"

"Have you not heard that all the progressive business houses today are demanding that their salesmen should be educated in the science of salesmanship?"

"Why yes, now you remind me of it. How stupid of me! That's my treacherous memory again, you see. Get me into touch with those who can teach me salesmanship right away, Mr. Socratic. The residence and law practice of Job Lex, at Osseo, are for sale. I'm coming to town."

It was a different Job Lex that went with us back to the court room that afternoon, some years ago.

And now, it is Judge Job Lex, of the Federal bench.

Facts versus Fiction in Advertising

By T. J. McLAUGHLIN

THE hero comes just in the nick of time to cheat the incoming tide and lets down a rope over the edge of the cliff. The terror stricken heroine fastens the rope under her arms and the hero draws her up hand over hand to safety.

You have read this sort of thing in novels. Yet you surely know that the average man can raise only half his own weight in this manner. Therefore, it never makes an impression upon your mind, consequently, you treat it as it is a work of fiction.

I have before me a food advertisement which makes the following claim:

"We use California peppers, selected by hand, for which we pay $1 a pound. That is seven times the price of some peppers."

Personally, I have never eaten any of those "hand selected" peppers, therefore I am not in a position to judge. It seems to me, however, that the average person would read that statement and then treat it as they do the reading matter in the novel.

On the other hand, if the advertiser had a word from the California rancher printed in the advertisement stating that such and such was the case, I know that I for one would surely eat this brand of peppers. So would you, because as Lowell says: "One does not need to advertise squirrels where the nut-trees are."

Stop teaching dogs how to bark and roosters how to crow, and strive to make a brain impression upon the reader.

The public as a whole, is a good natured thing. It has accepted the highly improbable without protest—but, beware, even a worm will turn—then, perhaps it will be too late.

Don't lose sight of the fact that "the man who just got back from Missouri" is to read your copy.

If you do this your "headlight" will burn brightly. You will leave the fiction for the novel, while you stuff your copy with facts—facts—FACTS.

Some Facts About the Advertising of Life Insurance : by Stewart Anderson

An Address Delivered Before the Publicity Club of Springfield, Massachusetts

LIFE insurance advertising differs from general advertising at two points: First, in its absence from newspapers and magazines; and, second, in that it is never regarded as being more than aid to personal salesmanship.

Why is life insurance advertising, with one or two brilliant exceptions, generally absent from newspapers and magazines?

In nearly all businesses the greater the volume the larger the profit and the fuller the measure of prosperity. In other words, big business means big dividends. But in life insurance this is not true, for a too big new business from year to year would mean smaller dividends to the policyholder. The policyholder in a participating company, is, however, eager for large dividends, because by reducing the size of his premium payments, they diminish the cost of his insurance.

Now, the proper object of life insurance management, and the primary function of the business itself, is to furnish safe insurance at the lowest possible cost. To accomplish this, satisfactory dividends must be paid to the policyholder, and, as they cannot be paid if the volume of new business is excessive, you will at once see why publicity campaigns are avoided.

Why too Much New Business is not Wanted by Life Insurance Companies

Why is it that satisfactory dividends and the largest obtainable volume of new business do not yoke together?

This is the reason: the first year's premiums paid on new policies do not cover the first year's cost of such policies—there is a loss—and the excess of cost, which is pure expense, eats up moneys which otherwise would have gone into the surplus funds of the company and thence have been returned to policyholders in dividends. So that a disproportionately large volume of new business defeats the proper object of company management.

Outstanding business—that is, business on which the premiums have been paid for a year or more—can digest a reasonable amount of new business without dividend disturbance, and as the old business grows in bulk from year to year it can assimilate a proportionate, a restrained, a reasonable increase in new business.

Now, the companies are able to secure this reasonable amount of new business without general publicity; why then should they—as they are so often urged to do by advertising agencies—spend policyholders' money upon that form of advertising?

And since an excessive volume of new business would result in a higher cost of insurance to existing policyholders, do not both duty and good judgment require that company executives should leave well enough alone?

In a word: General publicity, enormous new business, less surplus funds to be distributed, smaller dividends, larger net cost of insurance, grumbling policyholders, embarrassed agents. Or, conversely: No publicity, moderate new business, normal amount of distributable surplus funds, satisfactory dividends, low cost of insurance, contented policyholders, enthusiastic agents.

This is why life insurance is not widely advertised in newspapers and magazines.

Large Place of Personal Salesmanship in Life Insurance

The second point of difference between life insurance advertising and general advertising is that it is never regarded as being more than an aid to personal salesmanship.

By means of the newspaper or magazine advertisement or the catalogue or the booklet or the follow-up letter, you can either sell by mail numberless things that the American people use, or else so affect the will of the reader that he sets forth to buy what is advertised. But this is not true in life insurance—it can be sold by mail only in isolated cases, and it never has been extensively sold except through agents.

When we reflect that there are more than ten billions of old line life insurance in force in this country (not including industrial insurance)—which is evidence that life insurance is woven into the lives and encircles the homes of the people—is not the fact singular that it is almost the one only thing which the average man will not buy unless an agent goes to him, often again and again, and overcomes his reluctance by argument or appeal or persuasion, or else batters down his defense and drags him into the kingdom? This has been the universal experience of life insurance throughout its history.

Here, in Massachusetts, added proof is being wrought out before all men's eyes. I refer to savings bank insurance under state control. This was devised that life insurance might be sold cheaply and direct to workingmen, in the hope that they would en masse flock to the savings banks and buy it, and that, consequently, the cry in Massachusetts for old age pensions, then and now being heard at the state house, would cease and would never again be raised.

But that hope was futile.

The police have not been called upon to keep in line the thronging applicants, the savings banks have not been forced to increase the number of their employes, and the working man, indifferent, passes by the doors, unconscious, probably, of the boon—and it is a real boon—which awaits him inside.

Though they weep over him, how many times, he will not gather under their wings.

I would it were not so, and I speak not in hostility but in extreme regret, for I believe that until the golden era comes when society shall care for all who are helpless and old and indigent, life insurance, because there is no other instrumentality, must be the chief support of the widow and the orphan and the aged.

Glance at your own life insurance experience, gentlemen.

How many men among you are there who needed no urging, but who eagerly invited an agent to call and without demur applied for a policy?

Very few, I am certain. And I am as certain that after a policy was issued, even though you did demur, you at once were ready to boast that you were insured and sagely to say that it was a good thing and that it was the duty of every man to be insured. They all do.

Then why do men wait for the agent? It is not that they do not believe in life insurance, for, as the diplomatists say, they "look upon it benignantly" and "accept it in principle."

I believe they wait for the agent because strength looks upon the possibility of near-by mortality with disbelief, and because the man of normal health does not realize what a chance he takes—or rather makes his family take—when he delays his decision until to-morrow or next week or next month—until the more convenient season.

But whatever the cause, neither an advertisement nor a booklet nor a card nor a follow-up letter nor any other similar device can subdue his will into immediate obedience to its suggestion.

The most that anything of the kind can do is to familiarize the reader with the company's name and the agent's name and possibly with the name and chief feature of some policy that it is advertising. Then when the agent calls, he finds a man who possibly shows a little pride in saying, "Oh yes, I've read the advertisements of your company." That is all—a good deal it would be in other businesses, I admit, for it is the open gate—but the signing of the application in the citadel is still a day's journey farther on. In life insurance it is the agent and not the advertisement.

How Life Insurance is Advertised

What are the usual media of life insurance advertising?

The card or small flyer which is slipped into the general mail stating a financial fact, or bearing an insurance suggestion; the follow-up letter and the follow-up card; the illustration blank in which are entered the various figures of a policy; the annual statement book, which tells of the previous year's operations, and details the financial strength of the company; and chiefest of all is the line of booklets, some of which are devoted to an analysis of policy provisions, and others of which are designed to arouse interest in and excite a desire for the several plans of insurance which the policies carry into effect.

Life insurance booklets commonly are not prizable for richness in dress and typographical and pictorial display. Their subject is not easily illustrated, and all that readably can be said upon it may be kept within the limits of eight pages and cover in a 6½ envelope. That is an economical size for the printing department and the mail and is a convenient one for the agent's pocket. I do not mean that the booklets of our business lack dignity and taste, for I believe that the best of them are easily comparable with the best similar booklets used in any other business, but that, because their office is a subordinate one, and because the thing they describe pertains to a contract and not a commodity, and because economy is the watchword of almost all the companies nowadays, in the printing department as well as in the executive offices, the life insurance booklet is not in the family of expensive pamphlet productions.

How the Booklet is Used

How is the booklet used? I must speak in the most general way, of course. It is used as a herald of the agent, sent by mail to a selected list of names to prepare the way for him; also it is often sent after the first interview, to be read by the prospect in his quiet hour, and to reinforce the agent's argument or else to give a new view of the subject.

Successful users send only a few of them at a time, and sedulously follow them up with personal interviews. Sent out broadcast, all that such literature accomplishes is the making known of the company's and the agent's names to a large number of people who will not afterward be called upon. This is wastage—wasted booklets, wasted envelopes, wasted postage, wasted clerical labor.

These booklets usually contain a return card, which the reader is invited to fill out and send to the agent. When it is received the agent promptly calls, with a specimen policy, perhaps, and with a resourceful, and usually tactful, tongue. Of course he would in due time call, even if the card were not returned to him, but its receipt is sure to hasten his call.

A word about the return card, true of the booklets of every business in which such a card is used. Its detaching line should have either a post office perforation—the round hole—or else some other kind of perforation that will as surely say to the reader that there was no doubt that it would be filled up and returned. If that line is defective, so that he tears the leaf in trying to remove it, and if his desire to have the sample or the further information promised in the leaflet is not excessively keen, he is liable to throw the booklet away in disgust.

The return card is the crown of the work, and its detaching line is so powerfully suggestive that its quality may either make the booklet fruitful or else kill it.

How Names of Prospects are Secured

There is not time enough for more than a hint of how the names of prospects are secured. The man who puts a mortgage upon his house or upon his factory—how the agent looks over the registry of deeds for such cases, and speedily suggests that a low cost term policy to run during the term of the mortgage be secured; the commercial reports; the city directory; the telephone directory; the marriage registry—an ever-fresh list of names; the birth registry, which tells of increased paternal responsibility and of a boy or girl to be educated in the years to come; the social item, which speaks of journeyings, making new or additional insurance desirable; the tip given by a friend; the overheard conversation; the news item about a business to be started or enlarged or the forming of a partnership. There are a thousand sources of material for the agent's canvass.

Suffer me now to say a few words about the psychology of life insurance advertising. Its chief principle is the same as that in all scientific advertising: find the motive, work upon it.

Many men, many minds.

True, but motives are few.

There is the desire to save, the desire to lay aside for old age, the desire to safeguard the business, the desire to educate the children, and, above all, the desire to protect wife, children, or other dependents.

Covering the Grave with Flowers

Now, life insurance would never have been born were not life uncertain, yet men are chilled if you urge upon them the possibility of untimely death, and if you urge it too strongly they are liable to become angered.

For example: "Mr. Harrison, I see by the paper that a new baby came to your home last night, and I have called to talk to you about life insurance. You, as an observing man, must know that you are liable to die to-night; people are dying all around you, and it is just as liable to be your turn next as any other man's. Is your family protected? Can you look them in the face? What would happen to them if you did die to-night?"

Mr. Harrison by this time is frozen up, but, as politely as he can, he tells the agent that he is busy this morning. The agent asks when he may call again, and Mr. Harrison perhaps replies that he may call any time—next week, if he wants to. So next week the agent comes in.

"Good morning, Mr. Harrison, I have come to talk to you again about life insurance and protecting your family. You had a narrow escape this week, for young Jonathan Jinks was suddenly called to his long home. Poor Jonathan! You had better fix it up today, Mr. Harrison—many stronger men than you have been cut off without a moment's warning—death is all around us."

By this time, Mr. Harrison is frantic, and he cries, "Get out, go to —, —well, get out, anyhow."

He knows that what the agent said was true, but the method made him furious.

Suppose, however, that the agent had come in and said, "Good morning, Mr. Harrison, I saw by the paper this morning that a little girl came to your house last night."

"Yes, yes," said Mr. Harrison.

"May I ask if everything is all right at home?"

"Yes, everything is going fine. Bouncing eight pound girl."

"That's good, let me congratulate you; I know how it is because I had a little girl come to my house six months ago—nothing like 'em!"

"No sir," says Papa Harrison.

"I suppose that, as we all do, you want a little more protection now to cover this little one?"

Papa Harrison's heart is pretty warm this morning and it opens wide to the agent's suggestion, and he signs an application for one or two or five thousand additional.

So in our appeal we keep away from the grave as much as possible, and cover it with verbal flowers when we can. We walk with the prospect all around it, with our backs to it, and talk personally and intimately of other things—thrift, old age poverty, duty and love—which may lead him to sign the application.

Would he save for his old age? Life insurance will aid him.

Would he make certain that his business shall continue if anything happened to his partner?—life insurance will give that certainty.

Would he, as he is in duty bound to do, protect his wife and children, whom he loves?—there's nothing so perfectly adapted to it as life insurance.

If he signs the application the flowers on the grave are all that he sees, but if he refuses, or if he says "I will take a policy, but not now," then we brush aside the flowers and show him the grave, and the graves of men whom he has known who too early "passed the door of darkness through."

In describing the workings of our principle I have not meant to speak flippantly, for the stories that come to life insurance offices are sad witnesses that the reality of suddenly-opening graves is far more grim and pitiable than the pictured graves to which our booklets point, and the misery they reveal amply justifies our methods.

Opportunity and Optimism

Finally, as advertising and salesmanship go hand in hand let me say that the spirit of life insurance salesmanship is the spirit which animates all successful salesmanship—optimism, the ever-new opportunity. Not the dismal optimism of life's single opportunity, sung with such beauty by Ingalls—that would be fatal to salesmanship:

"Master of human destinies am I;
Fame, love and fortune on my footsteps wait;
Cities and fields I walk; I penetrate
Deserts and seas remote, and, passing by Hovel and mart and palace, soon or late
I knock unbidden, once, on every gate.
If sleeping, wake; if feasting
Rise before I turn away;—it is the hour of fate!
And they who follow me reach every state
Mortals desire and conquer every foe
Save death; but those who doubt or hesitate,
Condemned to failure, penury, and woe,
Seek me in vain and uselessly implore;
I answer not, and I return no more."

Rather is it the glowing optimism of opportunity so inspiringly voiced in the reply made to Ingall's poem by Walter Malone:

"They do me wrong who say I come no more
When once I knock and fail to find you in;
For every day I stand outside your door,
And bid you wake and rise to fight and win.
Wail not for precious chances passed away,
Weep not for golden ages on the wane;
Each night I burn the records of the day,
At sunrise every soul is born again.

This is the spirit that life insurance instills into its ambassadors, and strives to keep aflame.

The Beauty Doctor

By DR. H. LINDLAHR, M. D., D. O.

IF YOU would be beautiful, purify your body and beautify your mind and soul.

A fine skin and a pure complexion depend entirely upon pure blood and good circulation. The purity of the blood depends largely upon the purity of the foods you eat. If you fill your system with meat, coffee and tea poisons, nicotine and alcohol, the morbid conditions within will surely express themselves in outward appearance, in the dullness of the eyes, in a sallow complexion and in unsightly skin eruptions.

Keep the system well ventilated and the fires of life burning brightly by learning how to breathe deeply and regularly.

Remain in the sunlight as much as possible; nothing beautiful or sweet ripens in the darkness.

Remember that the cold bath is the finest cosmetic. It is the best tonic for the circulation and the most effective eliminator.

Remember that all the food you eat beyond the body's needs, acts as an irritant and poison, and needlessly encumbers the body.

If you wish to beautify the outer, you must first beautify the inner, for every thought and every emotion shapes the delicate tracings of your face for ugliness or beauty. Inharmonious and destructive attitudes of mind will warp and mar the most beautiful features.

Most destructive to beauty of face, sweetness of expression and delicacy of coloring, are fear, anger, jealousy, pride, and above all, self-pity. All such inharmonious emotions poison the secretions, jar the nerves and distort facial expression.

Mental Cosmetics

The beautiful face is produced by harmony of mind, sweetness of thought, cheerfulness, joy, kindness, and the inward consciousness of the beautiful. Feel the beautiful and you will express that feeling in your face, and your ordinary appearance will give place to the loveliness of a charm that is attractive and beautiful.

Do not try to improve the beauty of face by painting the surface. There is nothing so repulsive as the dead, mask-like expression of a painted face.

Keep your system clean, your mind wholesome, and express in your face the harmony you feel in your soul, and your complexion and expression will soon become far more beautiful than any artificial product of the beauty shop; the expression of your face will not be that of a painted wax figure, but the living reflection of a fascinating mind and a beautiful soul.

On your birthday do not worry because you are growing older, but say to yourself: "I am one year younger, in mind and soul."

The youth of the real man, the spiritual man, does not depend upon the worn appearance of the outer garment; it depends entirely upon the purity, richness and harmony of the soul life.

The Store Speaks a Word for Itself and its Goods and Service : by Arthur B. Freeman

I AM a store, your servant.

"Please look to me as an individuality with feelings, with physical capabilities and with mind; believe that I cherish ambitions and hopes and suffer from ingratitude and abuse, even as you may do.

"I was conceived and have thrived on the idea that there is a tangible value in service which can be reckoned in dollars and cents.

"I am not a producer of merchandise, yet a creator of value. Like the lilies I spin not, neither do I sow, but unlike them, toil incessantly.

"Clever artisans and artists, skilled mechanics and expert tailors fill my shelves and cases season after season with the fruits of their labor. Into my confines they pour the results of their handiwork, gathered together from the four corners of the earth.

"Of all this beautiful merchandise, this wealth of the comforts and necessities of life, you, dear reader, are the consumer. Men are at work the world over striving to excel that you may be pleased; endeavoring to improve and by improving win your favor and choice.

"Some achieve even beyond your expectations, others fall short of your requirements. But in all, it is for you, Consumer, that they work, and right here, I, your store, make my entrance.

"From all this mass of production, some perfect, some medium good, some poor, I seek out that which you have intimated is your desire. By the process of elimination, enhanced by years of experience and painstaking effort, I am enabled to discover the best results, separating the chaff from the wheat.

"I penetrate the remotest fields of man's endeavor, seeking to find his best accomplishments and striving also to discover the heart of economic production, that what I do bring may conform at once with your taste and your purse.

"I do more.

"I know long before hand what modes and fashions are most likely to prevail, and arm you against disadvantageous selection

I bring you style from its fountain head, I bring you quality from its purest source and I bring you prices only in just proportion—sometimes even less than you'd think fair.

"And yet more.

"I tell you in the daily press of these researches as their fruits arrive. I keep you in touch with news from the fashion centers of the world by means of the public prints.

"My house is ever at your disposal to come and enjoy that which I have brought to show. And while you look and inspect I plan your comfort and ease. All that I have is at your command.

"If perchance I fail to please you for the moment, you leave without obligation or importunity, welcome to repeat the action.

"But when you choose to buy, I convey the purchase safely to your door and after you have it, aye after you have begun to enjoy it, I add value to the possession by lending my guarantee that what is not right will be made so.

"My growth and progress depend solely upon you, which in turn depend on my ability to serve you. Yet the greater I become, the more I am able to do for you and my success redounds tenfold to your benefit.

"Thus I have explained my right to be respected. My task is a severe one, yet the returns I ask for the service rendered are trivial in proportion. And all I seek is the continued opportunity to serve.

"In one sense I am a producer of wealth for those who have made me—to them I owe a fair return for the investment of time and capital which they have made.

"But in a larger sense, it is a labor of love, in which I, your store, enter with all my heart, for, after all, my character and my individuality are but a reflection of like qualities in the men to whom I owe my existence."

"The opportunity of a lifetime must be seized during the life time of the opportunity."—Clarice E. Newlin.

Opportunities Everywhere, all the Time for the Salesman : by Thomas Dreier

A SMALL manufacturing concern in an eastern city is struggling along solely because it lacks an officer with sales ability. Its plant is modern and its product is of the quality kind. The head of the manufacturing department is recognized as one of the best in his line in his section of the country. The man who possesses ability to formulate big business plans is forced to play the part of a giant confined in a prison cell because the concern is not blessed with the necessary capital to swing the plans at this time, and because there is no trained sales head to dispose of the factory's product at a profit.

The officers of the concern got the idea into their heads that they could get the necessary money if they would incorporate. They had no trouble in getting incorporated and had even less trouble in securing some beautifully printed stock certificates. When they looked at those beautiful pieces of paper, they really hated to let the crude, unappreciative public possess any of them. But finally they did go forth to the strains of "The Conquering Hero Comes,"—music furnished by themselves. And then they came back with a grieved expression upon their faces because the unappreciative public did not unloosen the strings of the money-bags.

All for the Lack of a Salesman

Now, this institution is good. It is manufacturing a product for which there is a market. Today it has so much work on hand that if it had double the equipment and three times its present force of workers it could keep busy for weeks without taking in another order. But its officers have no desire to do this work for others. They would rather concentrate all their efforts upon the manufacturing of goods bearing their own name. They take this outside work simply because they must have it in order to meet the payroll. They haven't the money needed to carry the business along until they could manufacture and place their own product upon the market.

If there came to them today a real salesman—a man who could go out and raise money by selling that stock—he would be given a share in the company that would eventually be worth many thousands of dollars to him. With the money obtained from the sale of the stock the plant could be enlarged and almost immediately big profits could be made. Then, just as soon as the manufactured goods were ready for the market, this salesman could take upon his shoulders the work of building up a sales department.

Without such a man this concern will be forced to struggle along for years and they will probably witness other institutions in their line outstripping them. In the meantime they are wasting their money in useless experiments in their selling department and cannot see that they cannot achieve great success unless they add a big salesman to their equipment. The officers would not hesitate a moment over investing a couple of thousand dollars in a machine. But they cannot see that a few thousand dollars invested in a sales department would eventually put them on easy street.

The Essentials of a Business Institution

Every business institution has what we may call the Four Master Departments. They are:

1. Department of Production.
2. Department of Administration.
3. Department of Conservation.
4. Department of Sales.

All these departments are of equal importance. Unless each of these performs its duties efficiently the institution will fail of perfect success to just the extent of the failure of the departments to grade 100 per cent.

The production department must concern itself with manufacturing or securing the right goods.

The department of administration must concern itself with executive work—the correlating of all departments so that they will work together harmoniously.

The conservation and disbursement of money is that which with the third department deals. Unless the treasurer handles wisely the money of the concern, the institution cannot succeed.

And, finally, the sales department must sell the goods at a profit to an ever increasing number of persons.

Men Who Grew Great Through Salesmanship

Two men who stand out conspicuously as business builders who appreciate the value of the sales department, are, Hugh Chalmers of the Chalmers-Detroit Motor Company, and Melville Mix, president and general manager of The Dodge Manufacturing Company of Mishawaka, Indiana.

Both of these men took charge of institutions which were successful but not conspicuously so. They saw that the manufacturing departments were all right. Then they concentrated on the sales. You know that the Chalmers company is one of the best known in the automobile field, while the double-page spreads of the Dodge company in the Saturday Evening Post has made millions acquainted with split-wood pulleys and power transmission devices.

But did you know that the growth of this great concern was due entirely to a salesman who had faith in himself, faith in his employer, faith in his goods and faith in the public?

It's a fact.

One day there came into the Dodge shop in Mishawaka a young man who was keen, alert, quick, likeable. "My name is Melville Mix," he said, "I have come to take charge of your sales department."

"Wha-a-at?" stuttered Mr. Dodge.

"I have come to take charge of your sales department," calmly and patiently repeated Mix.

Then it came out that Dodge didn't have any sales department of any importance and also that he couldn't afford to hire a real sales manager. The talk of Mix made him feel that the new sales manager was worth a young fortune.

Mix went out and found that he could live in Mishawaka for $15 a week and not suffer for food, clothes and shelter. With the cost figures on a piece of paper he went back to Mr. Dodge and convinced that gentleman that he couldn't afford to be without Mix as a sales manager.

You know the rest. Mix kept on climbing up by building business for the Dodge institution, and, when Mr. Dodge died, he was made head of the concern.

This man was just a salesman—a man with constructive ability who was long headed enough to see that Mr. Dodge had a big idea and that if properly presented to the public it would make a fortune for all concerned.

Out in Chicago lives a young man of twenty-six who is paid $7,000 a year by a tailoring firm because he is a salesman of a high order. He handles the advertising and follow-up system and since he took charge his firm has stood out conspicuously in its field.

When this youngster was in his teens, he and another boy started an advertising agency somewhere in New York State. So business-like were the letters they sent to magazines that many of the big publications sent special representatives out to see these men who were putting up the Big Talk.

These special representatives came in and found themselves before two small boys in short pants. The language used was unsanitary.

One of the representatives didn't swear or laugh. He saw the stuff in the boys and took them back to New York with him. Both made good.

The Salesmen Get the Big Prizes

The world has always been full of opportunity. It exists everywhere for those with eyes to see it. The climbers are those who use it constructively.

It seems to me that every youngster in the public schools should be taught that in order to succeed he must be a salesman.

I mean by that that he must learn that his business first of all is to sell his services. He must understand that every person is a sales person. The great personal success is the individual of great efficiency who understands how to sell his services at a great price.

The man who cannot sell his services for more than $1.50 a day is either a man of little efficiency or, if he does grade as an efficient worker when once properly placed, he possesses little sales ability.

The man who secures promotion in any institution is the man who promotes himself. And the man who promotes himself is the man who is able to sell more of his services at a greater profit.

A writer once became famous by writing an essay the best part of which was the reiterated statement about "a man who can carry the message to Garcia."

The world is crying out for men who can carry things of all kinds to where they are needed. It wants salesmen—men who can create a desire for goods where there was no desire before. It wants employes who can increase their efficiency and can then sell their services at a profit to themselves and to the institution that employs them.

Why Some People are "Underpaid"

In New York and Chicago there are thousands of girls who are paid a pittance working in the large department stores. The store owners are condemned for not paying these girls more. Personally, I believe that every worker is entitled to sufficient money for the purchase of the three primary requisites, food, raiment and shelter, but after watching some of these department store girls at work I am sure that they are getting about all they are worth.

These stores need saleswomen and salesmen. With efficient sales people they could do infinitely more business and give greater satisfaction. With the persons they are compelled to employ they are limited in the good service they can render.

That these department store employers are looking for efficient service is proven by asking for the personal stories of those men and women who have climbed higher. Investigate and you will discover that these men and women started close to the bottom and that they were picked out of hundreds of employes and raised higher solely because they had increased their value to their employers and had attracted the attention of those employers to that value by doing work above the average.

Not long ago a young man came into my office and asked how he could get more money from his employers.

I laughed at him and told him that he was putting up to me an individual problem that he was better fitted to solve than anyone else.

He told me that he had worked for that institution a long time and deserved a raise.

"Listen for a minute, old man," I said. "Just get this truth solidly in your mind: It isn't length of time spent in any institution that counts. It isn't the amount of work you do that counts. But it is the efficiency of your service that does count for much.

"You say you have not been promoted. Tell me, what have you done to deserve promotion? Have you really tried to render your institution some signal service? Have you succeeded in bettering the work you are doing? Have you demonstrated that you would be of greater value to your employers in a higher position than you are right now? Have you persuaded your employers—and that is salesmanship—that you are worth more than they are paying you? Have you done anything to prepare the way for promotion by becoming either a master of Things or a master of Persons?"

"What do you mean by that last statement about Persons and Things?" he asked.

"I mean this: That every employe should better the work he is doing every day. He should become master of more detail. He should reach out for a knowledge of the things pertaining to his own department, to the department above him, and of the relations of those departments to the institution as a whole.

"Next he should make those persons above him and below him think well of him. He should make those folks think he is helping them. He should make them feel that he is interested in them and wants to help them succeed in their work. And the only way to make those folks think he desires to help them, and to keep them thinking that way, is to really help them better the work they are doing. Selfishness never won a promotion. The man who is helped is the man who helps."

And that is the secret of successful salesmanship.

Independence of the Salesman

When Melville Mix went to Mr. Dodge he carried with him a plan that would help Dodge build business. When he sold Dodge products to manufacturers he sold them something that they needed to make their plants more efficient. He rendered service. Since he rendered Dodge and his customers great service, Dodge and the customers turned right around and made it possible for Mix to become one of the greater business men of his time.

Hugh Chalmers started as an office boy in a branch office of the National Cash Register Company. He was a good office boy. He went to night school and studied bookkeeping and stenography so that he could render more service and thus secure bigger rewards for himself. Next he sold a cash register during the noon hour when everybody else was out, and as a result of this became an office salesman. He kept making himself stronger by reaching out after more work and doing it—became a salesman—branch manager—district manager—assistant sales manager—sales manager—and, finally, general manager at a salary of $72,000 a year. And all this before he had more than touched the hem of his thirtieth year.

The salesman is the one man who can go into business for himself without money and without any plant except that represented by his body and mind.

He is even more independent than the oft mentioned "independent farmer."

The farmer has money tied up in land, in machinery, in crops. Drought, hail or bugs can play havoc with his investment. Fire may wipe out his buildings.

Always a Job for the Salesman

But the really efficient salesman, with a strong mind in a strong body, can make infinitely more money and do it easier than almost any other kind of a business man.

He can become a book agent, an insurance solicitor, a seller of fruit trees, a representative of a correspondence school, an advertising solicitor—or he can secure a place with the big manufacturers and jobbers without the investment of a cent. All he must do is to prepare himself to sell the product manufactured by the house he represents.

If he can convince the sales manager of a concern that he is fit to sell that concern's product he will have little trouble in securing work. Some companies will take in the applicant, pay him a small salary at the start, send him to the company's school for salesmen, send him out with an expert to get practical training in the field, then send him to a territory of his own and loan him—on a drawing account—the money he needs to keep him going until his own orders produce profits.

During the late financial unpleasantness one of the big typewriter companies was prepared to spend $1,000,000 to keep its sales force intact. Few typewriters were bought at that time, but the company retained its men and paid them their salaries just as if business was booming. The company had been years in trying and testing salesmen and its force represented the leading sales machine of its kind in the world. It did not want to dismantle this machine for fear that the parts could not be reassembled so as to render efficient service.

Office people, stenographers, bookkeepers, clerks—these are plentiful. But real salesmen are so scarce that stars are as valuable as the egg of the famous roc. The market is begging for more star men who can sell things, and the young man who is anxious to achieve success and who is willing to pay the price of study can do nothing that will help him gratify his desires more rapidly than to master salesmanship.

When a customer enters my door, he is king—forget me

John Wanamaker to his employees

How to Meet Price-Cutting

YOUR remedy begins with a careful study of analysis. While you furnish your customers with meats, canned goods, vegetables, and fruits, you probably give more value in service than in the goods themselves.

The difference between the net profit that you make on a given carcass and the gross margin that you are compelled to add to the prices of the different cuts, is just what it costs to render this service. The price-cutter almost always fails to deliver the full measure of service along with the meat.

It requires most careful analysis to locate wherein these points of difference lie. But you can find them. And when you do find them you can tell people about them. Your trouble is now that you have not analyzed the situation, and can't tell people about the differences in service.

Never talk about your competitor at all, either to your friends, in your business men's meetings, or in your advertising. You know, every knock is a boost. Instead, it is wise for you to talk about your store, and how you do things.

In the meat business, the white coat, white apron, white sleeves, and white cap are distinctly worth money.

Fine displays tempt people to buy—and many yield to the temptation. It does not take so very much in the way of material to make a good showing. It is largely a matter of selection and arrangement.

While it is undesirable to meet the price-cutter on his own ground, it is desirable for you to select leaders for the different days as the market yields them. Display them prominently. If they are goods that you can arrange for in advance, tell the people about them in the public prints. If not, you are limited to your display, with signs and prices attached.

Make it a specialty with certain classes of trade to suggest when and how some of the cheaper and more economical cuts can be used. I know of one meat market which issued, every week, on a fair-sized card suitable for tacking up in the kitchen, a bulletin that told the people the best methods of utilizing certain cuts. You know, there are many families now buying lamb chops and sirloin steaks, who should be buying lamb stew and hearts a considerable part of the time.

The Agricultural department at Washington has been issuing a series of bulletins on this subject. It will pay you to get them and make the experiment.

Service to your customers is your salvation. But, especially at the beginning, you must make that service something very specific and concrete in its nature.

To One Who Thinks Good Service is not Rewarded

THERE is a strain of pessimism running through your letter that must be a handicap to you. While it must be admitted that there are too many employers who are cajoled into rewarding the men who "work" them rather than the men who work best for them, still you will have to admit that the employers who make the greatest successes in business are of the other kind.

A man owes it to himself to be tactful in his relations with all people, whether they be employers, fellow employes, customers, or those who may look as if they would never become customers.

There is a great difference between manly independence and inconsiderate aggressiveness, but there seem to be many employes who confound the two mental attitudes. When they do, the employer misunderstands, and the employe is discredited, so that he loses the benefit of the standing he would otherwise have as the result of his ability, reliability, endurance, and action.

There are employers who demand from the people about them a servile attitude—one that no self-respecting man can assume. They can retain only a very poor class of employes.

Some wise man has said that success in life depends very largely on the wise choice of an employer. As I grow older, I think more and more of this epigram.

If your son has happened into a place where the servile attitude is demanded, he will show his wisdom by seeking employment elsewhere. This is not so much because of the reaction upon himself, as because it spells ruin—or at best only mediocre success—of the institution. Employes do better in the more successful concerns.

Do not misunderstand me. I know of one employer, usually kind, considerate, and loyal to his helpers, well along in years, who has a strong aversion for flashy clothing. Can you blame that man for giving preference, other things being equal, to the men who avoided the extreme in their raiment? He figured that the man who ignored his employer's desires in this minor respect could readily acquire the same habit of thought toward business policies and other things of far greater importance.

A Man Among Men

By FRANKLIN H. COLLINS

IN THESE strenuous days of the twentieth century we find many types and races of men from the lowest tribes of savages in the heart of Africa to the races who have attained the highest point of civilization.

We always find men leaders among their people—men who are looked upon by the populace as the doers of deeds.

Some of these men are experts in their vocation such as music, art, literature, and science, while others are proficient in finance, statesmanship, military affairs, politics or business in general.

The man who takes advantage of opportunities is the man who succeeds.

"Success" is a strange word and may have many interpretations, because success holds a different meaning to different people. And that is well enough, for if every man was striving for the same end, all the world would be in a turmoil.

All men start their lives on the same level at birth and end on the same level at death. While their paths lead in many directions while living, life is guided by that which is controlled by the rule of the universe. We, the people, must have a leader. The majority are followers.

Every people and race of ancient and modern life since the beginning has had a leader.

We often hear our popular men spoken of as men among men. But what are such men? Many different answers have been given to such a question because of the many ideas of people on existence and true living. To take the phrase at a glance, "Men among men," it would naturally signify all the men of the universe. But if followed out word for word, the expression would signify one particular class of men above their fellowmen in the world's activities.

They would understand and be in harmony with existing conditions.

The reason a man succeeds in any special vocation is because he understands and knows his own work in every detail far better than his competitors. We are all competitors one of another, in a certain sense.

A man should "keep office hours with his own soul."

How One Woman Solves the High Cost of Living Problem : by Mrs. B. R. Buffham

The problem of how to live, for a woman dependent upon her own efforts, has always been a vexed one. Today, it is even more difficult than ever, on account of the increased cost of living and the continued low rate of wages paid to women workers in nearly all fields. Here and there are women of stout hearts, tireless energy, and independent spirit, who have attacked the question with foresight and determination—and have solved it even more successfully than the average man. Such women are in a position to teach both men and women something about the practical principles of business building. For this reason, we have requested the writer of this article to tell us something about the way in which she has wrested prosperity from adversity and made herself a business and social force in her community. Mrs. Buffham is the successful manager of a ranch at Roswell, New Mexico, and Secretary of the Woman's Wild Life Protection Club of America. She is also a member of the Roswell Commercial Club, and active in pushing the growth, prosperity, and civic well being of that thriving town in the Southwest.—Editor's Note.

FOR many years I lived fully up to my income of from one hundred and fifty to two hundred dollars a month. Then misfortune came, and everything was swept away.

I gathered together what little I could and built a small house on a bit of land, so that I should be certain of a roof over my head. Then I began to look around for some means of keeping the pantry shelves stocked.

About this time I saw an advertisement telling about how one could make a living upon five acres of land. I had known of some rare souls who had been able to make a living raising poultry. This gave me my idea, and I determined to make the attempt—and to win.

Paying for Tuition by Experience

With what little money I had on hand, I bought a few hens, and started in. Eggs being what I wanted, I began to feed my birds all they would eat. They liked the feed and grew fat, but there were few eggs. Then I realized that I was working without knowledge of my chosen business.

After some study, I sold my fat hens for the table and bought a small pen of pure bred single comb white Leghorns. It took my three pretty hens a few days to get to feeling at home in their up-to-date hen-house. Then they began to lay. Day after day I found the three eggs in their nests. Getting some scrub fowls to do the sitting, I put under them every pure bred egg I got.

Meanwhile, I had started a garden on part of my land. Soon I had garden truck to sell at good prices. It was hard work, but it paid.

With the money, I bought every work I could get hold of on "Raising Poultry for Profit." I found nothing that would exactly fit the conditions in my part of the country. So, taking what I had learned from books, and what I had learned from experience, I worked out a system for myself. Taking an iron wash-tub, I put into it a quart of bran, a quart of clover meal, and a quart of kaffir corn. I mixed the stuff well, and told my hens to help themselves. At noon, I fed a mash of one-third alfalfa meal, one-third bran, and one-third shorts, scalded for an hour. At night I threw the hens a handful of corn.

MRS. B. R. BUFFHAM

I keep the houses clean, sprayed with lime wash and carbolic acid.

By these simple means, I have made the business pay.

For over six years, now, I have been living on the product of seventy-five hens. In all the laying contests of the world, I cannot find their equal.

I have never bred a hen until her second year, and try not to sell pullet eggs for hatching. But people throw their money at me. Then I try to explain that they had better pay more money and get eggs of stronger vitality.

Buying for Profit

I buy all supplies and feed from first hands, as far as possible. I discovered in New Orleans, at the French market, where I bought direct from the producers, that the butcher and the grocer were making a profit by buying from gardeners and breeders and selling to me—so I determined to get those profits for myself. I get out among the farmers with my horse and spring wagon, and pick up all the bargains I can find. This puts my costs at the lowest possible figure.

Just now, I am receiving many letters about the raising of pheasants, a very profitable "back to the soil" enterprise. It is a very profitable business, if rightly conducted. Pheasants at four dollars and a half a pair is easy money—even better than poultry.

"Back to the Soil" the Way of Escape

I have found that "back to the soil" is about the only way to escape the increased cost of living. By that I do not mean that I should advise any man or woman to leave city life, plow up one hundred acres of land, and raise fifteen bushels of wheat to the acre. Better take five or ten acres and raise thirty-five bushels to the acre by intensive cultivation, through better knowledge. Let them use their own heads and some one else's hands.

The west is the easiest place to begin, as land is cheap.

The hardest disease and misfortune for the beginner to bear is homesickness. I had been surrounded by friends and luxuries, and I had to give them all up. But I like the life of freedom. During the hot summer months, I can get into a clean gingham suit, take my gun, fishing tackle, and dog, and go fishing. I can take a rest whenever I want to. No clerkship for me! I tried it once and have enough. No one can drive me to work when I don't want to work—or am unable. I can do my work and irrigate my small fields in the cool of the morning and evening, resting or enjoying the open air in the heat of the day.

My leisure time is taken up as promoter and secretary of the Woman's Wild Life Protection Club of America, saving for future generations the valuable animals and birds of our country.

"Back to the soil" means strong, healthy bodies, cheap, wholesome food, and independence. It is the nation's only hope.

Let educators show the people how to produce larger and better crops. Let the people who find industrial and financial conditions too hard for them get on small farms all over the country.

That will solve a great many of the problems of the high cost of living—if not all of them.

To "Prisoners of Chillon"

Let thy spirit fly,
From thy prison wall,
And roam where birds with each other vie,
To sing sweetest. Let the call
Of unexplored mountain wold,
Beckon thee from thy dead past.
Prison walls ne'er held the soul,
Of him who was not content to stay.

Even so, no cell,
Is need to hold, he
Who despairs and feels not the heart swell
Of patient courage. Let thy past be
In the grave with thy dead, and prevail
Not with the soulless clay. Rather Let thy past distress be the travail,
Of a new birth, that shall mock thy jailer.

Extracts from the Actual Correspondence between the Sales Manager of the Geo. F. Eberhard Company, San Francisco, and a Live Organisation of Business Builders

How to Make Advertising Help Salesmen

I AM enclosing photographs, one each of the new boards being built in and about San Francisco and suburban towns. These are the new boards that will gradually be built in accordance with the system of having boards radiating along the travel railroads from each of the big Pacific Coast trade centers, such as San Francisco, Los Angeles, Portland, Seattle, Spokane, and Salt Lake City.

It will take some time to complete this system, so don't promise that they will be along in front of every railway station that you stop at. Tell the very facts of the case.

We want you to follow the plan of reporting in the condition of these boards as you go over the territory in the usual way. The boards are numbered and we have records at this office so that if you will give us the nearest station with the number we can always locate the bulletin board.

This department deserves your interest. You should look upon every sign, and every bit of advertising that is maintained or that goes into your territory as though it were a friend of yours.

Each one of the painted railway bulletin board signs built in your territory or at the trade center of your territory, every sign placed in a store, every display you get on the dealer's counter, every sign in his window, or on his door is helping you sell goods.

It pays you to show up and talk the advertising department's work. Use as much care in placing the advertising before your prospective customer as you would in placing the merit of the product or the service we endeavor to render.

Don't say, "Our products are advertised nationally and locally in the magazines, on bulletin boards, newspapers and the rest of it," and then ask the dealer if he has seen our stuff.

This may be an exaggerated way of putting it but we have heard talks almost as bad from salesmen who didn't appreciate the value of advertising in connection with his sales talk.

The Right Way to Do It

Go to your dealer, showing your late proofs of our printed magazine and other advertising and be sure you study them so that you can explain how we are appealing to his customers.

Each advertisement is a finished sales talk. If you read them carefully you will find when you are showing your proofs and the photographs of our bulletin boards and the actual material for display in his store that you can interest him if you explain our reason for using each character of advertisement and also how we select and check each part of the work.

Then show the dealer how it pays to be connected directly with this advertising by displaying in a part of his store the various selling helps in the way of small signs, displays and fixtures that we furnish him.

Explain that it is the object of the advertising campaign to sell the product through him not to him, and that he can profit by co-operating and bringing the sales in his neighborhood to a conclusion in his store. It means added trade without cost to him, to act for us in concluding the sales that we are developing among his customers by our advertising.

If this is all put before the dealer, using your knowledge of types and temperaments as to the words to use, it means that your customers will learn to have a kindly interest in all our advertising work, and incidentally the advertisement will help your customer sell himself every time he reads one.

A Promise of Improvement

YOURS of the 23d received. My hat is off to you when it comes to writing letters, which, one after another for months make a man feel way down inside, "that the only real answer is to go out and get a bunch of orders and send them in."

You know, regardless of what I may, at times, write to you, that I do not doubt your intentions at all times to help each salesman so far as it will really be to his own good and the general good of the business. My work will continue to improve.

Two Letters from Salesmen Commenting on the Sales Manager's Philosophy

WHILE I have been offering no comment of late I have nevertheless been alive to the issues at stake and the means and selling helps placed at my disposal to attain them.

Mr. Eberhard has issued some forceful bulletins recently in which he strikes the nail squarely on the head and I, for one, appreciate that what he says is true.

There is absolutely no question but that if I or anyone else acted fully in accord with all we have learned and would do all we know we should do—that as salesmen we would be far above the average and our bank accounts would be ahead in the same ratio.

I know just what I should do to make myself the star salesman of the force, and the chances are that each of the others are equally well informed.

I know that health, enthusiasm, knowledge, energy, thoroughness and ambition are absolute requirements for success. There is a combination that does not permit of the omission of any one item for the man that aspires to be a successful salesman. While a man may argue that he lacks some one of them and yet is successful, he can't show that he is as successful as he would be if he did not lack that one quality. Therefore he is not a success in the full sense of the word.

An ordinary boy can have health, energy and thoroughness; but lacking knowledge and ambition ever remain an ordinary boy; a man can have all qualifications but one and ever remain an ordinary man.

The Combination of Qualities

As a little mental exercise—try to beat the combination. Leave out health. You may without health still have knowledge, ambition, thoroughness and even possibly enthusiasm—but lacking energy, which means health—where are you?

Leave out enthusiasm and you leave out a quality that nine out of ten salesmen never possess. And it's the enthusiasm of the tenth man that carries the dealer off his feet and cops the order that the other nine with their other five qualifications couldn't quite get.

Leave out knowledge; you might as well leave your head at the hotel.

Leave out energy; without it hours, weeks, and years are wasted.

Thoroughness is a volume in itself.

Ambition lacking and an ox cart would still be plying up and down Market street, and it's just possible some other few things around the country would be missing.

What's the answer? Well, write these six things on a card—carry it in our pockets—check up every day and any check up that shows 100 per cent is the day that you can truthfully say, "I did my best."

Life is Good

"Oh, the breath of life is Good!

This sun and air I drink,

These hills I look upon,

These stars that quivering sink

Into the day that's gone,

They stir the laggard blood

With breath of Brotherhood!

And life, I say, is Good!

IS GOOD!"

Brain Plus Grain—One Seed Thought on Advertising : by T. J. McLaughlin

THAT wonderful aggregation of nervous matter, weighing less than four pounds has wrought some of the most important changes which have taken place in the world. I am speaking of the human brain.

To me the brain of man comes the nearest to a creative god of anything I know. Columbus' knowledge of geography, Newton's knowledge of gravitation and Herschel's knowledge of astronomy were all generated in that mass of matter known as the human brain.

Who can describe the operation of the brain in producing a thought? When the image of an object is in the eye, who knows exactly how that image affects the brain to produce sight? When something produces waves in the air, who will tell just how the waves affect the brain so as to produce what we call the sense of hearing.

Every invention is completed in the brain before it takes material form. Who, for instance, knows the operation of Howe's mind while constructing the sewing machine.

As an experiment write your thoughts upon one side of a sheet of paper, and also what occurred yesterday and the day before and all that occurs day after day. When the page is filled begin right back at the top of the same page and write over it again. This process cannot be kept up long before the page becomes a black spot, which can convey no idea.

This is not so with the human brain. There will be no blot there. The transactions of your life are written there clear and distinct—a perfect photograph of a life time. This is why the salesman of this day tells the truth—the whole truth—and nothing but the truth about the product he is trying to sell. He has studied human nature and especially the human mind.

We may refuse to seek for evidence, and by so doing prevent our minds from being impressed, but if we do seek and find evidence, just what impression will be made upon our minds we can neither help nor avoid. If these words seem reasonable and logical to you, you cannot make them otherwise if you wanted to, and if they sound silly you cannot make them sound logical if you wanted to. Therefore you have to believe or disbelieve, whether you want to or not.

After you put a bit of quinine into your mouth no salesman under the sun could make you believe that quinine tasted like sugar or that sugar tasted like quinine.

After you get a good whiff of the offensive odor of a skunk, no amount of argument could ever make you believe that a skunk smelled like a rosebud or that a rosebud smelled like a skunk.

You say you have a right to disbelieve. I say it is not a question of right but one of can.

For instance, I have a right to believe that Cook discovered the North Pole, but I cannot. The evidence is not strong enough. On the other hand I have a right to believe that Peary went to the Pole in order to give some of our advertisers a talking point for their goods. In this I have evidence. If he did not, then a number of advertisers have lied.

A personal experience:

Some five years ago I bought a hat at one of our big stores. Now when I want something in that line I go to that store and ask for Mr. Jones. Why? Simply because he told me the truth. I generally have to wait because he is busy, which goes to prove that my case is not a singular one.

Hugh Chalmers tells us that salesmanship gives individual lessons while advertising conducts a public school, because a salesman is privileged to talk to but one person at a time, while the advertising man is a man who is talking to millions of people at one time.

Now if Mr. Jones were an advertising man and used his pen instead of tongue to persuade me to purchase that which he had to sell, and I did make the first purchase and it proved to be exactly what he represented it to be, it is reasonable to suppose that I would come back again when on the market. So would you and the millions of others, which goes to prove that no amount of words will make you think quinine tastes like sugar, or a skunk smells like a rosebud.

Just imagine for the time being that this is a newspaper and these two advertisements are printed thereon:

OUR ANNUAL CLEARANCE SALE

$1 Shirts Marked Down to 50c

Everything must be sold to make room for our summer goods.

Then on the same page something like this would greet your eye:

OUR ANNUAL FAKE SALE

$1 Shirts Marked $1

Everything must be sold in order to replenish our stock.

Now frankly, which one of these ads. ring true?

Obviously, the seed for thought is the only grain that will make an impression upon the brain, thus causing the mind to act according to the dictates of the conscience. There is but one way to do this and that is to strip your proposition of everything but the facts, negative and positive. That is all the public are interested in. They are the jury to decide your fate. And, after all is said and done they are the people who are to supply your bread and butter. Therefore, it is up to the advertiser to interest them through their point of view. The truth—the whole truth—and nothing but the truth is all that they want to know about any advertised project.

The Right Use of Pictures in Advertising

By ARTHUR BERNARD FREEMAN

NO ONE denies the efficacy of imitating ideas or methods which others have found successful, and no one will call intelligent imitation bad business.

But most imitators, alas too often, instead of modifying or adding to an idea to fit their own proposition, adapt the whole thing bodily, with very deplorable results.

This error is very prevalent in almost every branch of business activity, but rarely more so than in the choice of pictures in advertising.

A scribe once said in all sincerity that "never so long as color, grace and charm have their wonderful hold upon a beauty loving race, and never while beautiful pictures continue to attract, delight the eye and rivet the attention, will they cease to be rich in advertising possibilities."

Here the scribe stopped, but the stoppage was fatal, as page after page of advertising today will indicate. Yet it seems this idea was enough for the great army of blind imitators, and they took it literally. Henceforth, pictures, no matter what the subject, so long as they be pretty and interesting, should be a prime factor in advertising copy.

It is interesting to contemplate what a vast amount of money might have been saved to advertisers, what a deal of worry might have been spared and what a better respect for advertising power might have been inspired if the scribe referred to had but gone a little further.

He said, "No matter how 'proof' a person may be against the deadly, dull presentation of plain, blunt business facts, the almost breathing beauty of a perfect picture strikes straight at the inborn love for the beautiful and clutches the imagination."

Well and good. But in a larger sense he might have told what an added force a fine picture can be in advertising if the imagination is clutched and the attention riveted in a manner directly connected with the article advertised.

And, on the other hand, he might have pointed out the fallacy of pictures which turned the imagination toward bears and pickaninnies while the text which followed tried to plead for breakfast foods, or pictures which made you think of chickens when the advertiser meant scouring soap.

Unless pictures in advertising have a very clear connection with the proposition exploited, and unless they concentrate the imagination on some point akin to the advertising of which they are a part, their use not only means wasted space and wasted energy, but weakened copy as well.

The writer has in mind the advertisement of a well known physical culture expert, since retired, which was illustrated by a railroad train in full steam, possibly to suggest force and action. As his eye caught the illustration his thoughts reverted back to a very pleasant vacation trip recently taken and his imagination played sweetly upon the anticipation of other trips which a railroad train might suggest, while he found little time to analyze the expert's offer. In fact, the latter had been completely forgotten.

This point is too clear to require comment. How much more receptive the reader would have been if his imagination had been stirred in the right vein.

There seems to be a serious mania for pictures of pretty girls in advertising appealing to men, and while admitting all of man's susceptibilities, it does seem that such illustration has a tendency to detract from the copy rather than add to its efficiency.

Calendars and other good media are turned out annually by the billion, beautiful things to look upon, classic works of art, but their variance with the articles advertised seems deplorable. Banks send out pictures of beautiful horses, dry goods stores show Dutch windmills and the corner grocer presents us with the "Last of the Mohicans."

We do hang these pictures in our homes, and while it is true that the sender's name goes with them, how much stronger the impression might be if there were some happy connecting link between the two, some touch of kin, however delicate.

Every business, it matters not how prosaic or how technical it may be, is rich in illustrative possibilities, and the time is near at hand when, before an advertiser accepts a picture for his advertising, he will first—and last—ask himself: "Does this picture call to mind what I am trying so hard to say in the copy that is to go with it."

The Idle Hours

By MILTON BEJACH, in the McCaskey Bulletin

YOU'VE heard the use, intelligent use, mind you, of every hour, preached since you were a schoolboy. Signs like "Do it now," stare you in the face in every office, every store, and in some street cars.

And still you—and I—let's say "we," waste our hours.

Ever think about what you could do in your idle hours? A certain worldwide fraternity, more ancient than Rome, instructs its initiates to spend one third of the day in labor, one third in service to God and man and the other in refreshment and sleep. You will notice that eight hours are to be spent in service to God and Man. "Man" takes in yourself. The noblest work you can do is to make yourself better. I'm not speaking from a spiritual standpoint, but rather from an intellectual one.

I once knew a reporter who learned Spanish between the hours of one and three in the morning, when he was on the "dog watch" at police headquarters. He used his Spanish later on; when the war with Spain began he went to Cuba as a representative of the biggest news gathering agency in the world.

Another reporter studied law across the table from the man who was learning Spanish. This man is now city solicitor of an Ohio city.

The point is, what are you doing with your idle hours?

I'm not going to ask you to write daily reports for the benefit of the advertising department. I merely suggest that you spend a few of your idle hours in studying approaches and closing arguments. The man who wins the battle is the man who plans.

When do you do your planning?

When will you begin?

Some Qualities and Methods of an Efficient Sales Manager : by George H. Eberhard

Read Before the Convention of The National Sales Managers' Association, Chicago, Illinois, August, 1910

THE subject assigned to me by your president, "Should the sales manager apply himself to his salesmen or should the sales manager be a model for his salesmen," is answered from my experience and analysis as follows:

"The sales manager who desires to get the best out of his salesmen should both apply himself to them and serve as a model for them in every way possible."

The sales manager should above all things be a man who has had actual and extended selling experience. He should be one who has made good mentally, morally and physically while doing actual sales work.

I am of the opinion that the sales manager is the deciding factor in the high or low efficiency of each unit in a sales force. In other words the salesmen cannot get away from his directing influence. They will become more efficient or their efficiency will decline in proportion to the strength or weakness of the sales manager's personality and ability.

Experience Needed for Sales Management

The sales manager should have road experience—not necessarily the largest sales record. It takes more to make a sales manager than a record of selling a large amount of goods in a given period or to a given customer.

The sales manager who has had actual and extended road experience can get closer to his salesmen and they will feel closer to him. They will have confidence that is lacking when they know their chief has not worked as they are working.

If added to this sales experience, he has first hand knowledge of at least part of the salesman's territory and trade, providing the sales manager is square mentally and morally and physically sound, he has half the battle won. It is not essential that he should try to be a model from a sales viewpoint after he has reached the high position, although part of his time should be spent each year going over different territories and doing some actual selling work to keep in first hand touch with the situation as it is not as it was.

If in addition to serving as a model that his salesmen know, believe in and respect, he is given the authority and the opportunity by the firm to apply himself to his salesmen and their interests, he will be a success.

A sales manager, in applying himself to his salesmen, must use tact and diplomacy in his individual talks and letters to his salesmen, not overlooking the fact that there are always a few salesmen that have a disposition to doubt or question statements of their leader and are always ready to call together their fellow salesmen in little cabals—not necessarily for intrigue or for an ulterior purpose but to talk things over, compare notes and generally discuss things said or written to them by the sales manager.

Holding the Confidence of the Men

To hold the entire confidence of each individual and prevent the sowing of seeds of discontent is where the exercise of diplomacy and tact comes in. The best disposed salesman is liable to have his off days and it is then that he is awake to every opportunity to compare notes with his associates. Then any little apparent discrepancy or deviation from the exact facts is dug up and made ground for gossip. The result is often a lack of interest in the business and confidence in the sales manager. This will happen even when he has been perfectly truthful in his reports and remarks. Such misunderstandings destroy the highest efficiency in the sales force—a large part of which is the result of helpful interest and suggestion.

These discussions among salesmen are not confined to moments of personal intercourse. The opportunity also presents itself through a more or less regular correspondence which is usually kept up among the members of the sales force, especially a few of the most friendly. While a sales manager<sup>1</sup> should have no unjust suspicion against his salesmen, it is the part of the wise one to be prepared for just such a condition.

When the sales manager is tactful and has to face a condition of this kind, then his judgment will usually tell him that it would be the exercise of diplomacy to weed out the disturbing element.

The time is here when the sales director will have charge of both the sales and advertising departments in large organizations. This will overcome a great weakness in the present work of most sales managers. This weakness is the tendency of the heads of firms to pass to them work not directly connected with his problem of making each salesman a growing, efficient, result producing unit in the sales force.

He Should Represent His Men as Well as the House

To get the "limit" out of each salesman in a sales force calls for sincere co-operation with each salesman on the part of the sales manager, a proper distribution of territory, the right handling of his orders, reports and correspondence, the prompt posting on prices, credits, complaints, mail orders and other matters that transpire in his territory.

The friendship of the sales manager for his salesmen and their interests should be fostered by the firm.

If the sales manager is a sound, clean, efficient model and a man capable and willing to apply himself to his men, he should be kept from being forced to fight his men for the house.

A salesman's service should either be satisfactory or not, making of course, due allowance for human frailties, and if the salesman is working for the firm he should, if possible, be made to feel right toward the firm all the time.

How to Hold Good Friends

By Glenwood S. Buck

THERE is a man of my acquaintance—a printer and a good one too—who is far famed as a "jollier." But this term is really not applicable. He has many friends because he finds many things to like in many people. Like a ray of sunshine, his happy optimism penetrates into the dark corners, and finds there real nuggets of gold, which others had mistaken for lumps of dry earth.

"My mother taught me never to be ashamed of expressing my best thought," said he at luncheon the other day. "I was made to see, early in life, that I should really be ashamed of all vicious, unprofitable thought, but never of that which discovered good things in the heart of a friend."

Our modes of thought are channels of habit. Good thoughts are as easy to think as bad ones. High thoughts are more profitable and pleasurable than commonplace ones. The direction of our thought channels determines our best thought. This good printer has good friends because he holds good thoughts concerning them.

The Soul of Man

ALL goes to show that the soul in man is not an organ, but animates and exercises all the organs; is not a function, like the power of memory, of calculation, of comparison, but uses these as hands and feet; is not a faculty, but a light; is not the intellect or the will, but the master of the intellect and the will; is the background of our being, in which they lie—an immensity not possessed and that cannot be possessed. From within or from behind, a light shines through us upon things and makes us aware that we are nothing, but the light is all. What we commonly call man, the eating, drinking, planning, counting man, does not, as we know him, represent himself, but misrepresents himself. Him we do not respect, but the soul, whose organ he is, would he let it appear through his action, would make our knees bend. When it breathes through his intellect, it is genius; when it breathes through his will, it is virtue; when it flows through his affection, it is love. And the blindness of the intellect begins when it would be something of itself. The weakness of the will begins when the individual would be something of himself. All reform aims in some one particular to let the soul have its way through us; in other words, to engage us to obey.—Emerson.

The Mental Basis of Physical Health and Vital Power : by H. Lindlahr, M. D., D. O.

THE new psychology teaches us that the lower principles in man stand or should stand under the dominion of the higher.

The physical body with its material elements is dominated and guided by the mind. The mind is inspired through the inner consciousness which is an attribute of the soul.

Wherever this natural order is reversed there is discord and disease. Too many people think and act as though the physical body was all in all; as though it was the only thing worth caring for and thinking about. They exaggerate the importance of the physical and become its abject slaves.

The physical body is the lowest and least intelligent of the different principles making up the human entity. Yet people allow their minds and their souls to become dominated and terrified by the sensations of the physical body. When the servants in the house control and terrify the master, when the master becomes their slave and they can do with him as they please, there cannot be order and harmony in that house.

We must expect the same results when the lower principles in man lord it over the higher.

Physical Results of Negative Thoughts and Feelings

When physical weakness, pain and sickness fill the mind with fear and dismay, reason becomes clouded, the will atrophied and self control is lost. Fear and worry contract the blood vessels, the nerves, and the other channels through which the life forces are conveyed from the innermost source of life to the physical body. The flow of life currents is impeded and diminished. Such are the actual physical effects of fear and anxiety.

The dismay and confusion in the mind are telegraphically conveyed over the nerve strands to every cell in the body, and as a result these little workers and soldiers become panic stricken and incapable of rightly performing their manifold duties.

The health of the human body as a whole depends upon the health of the billions of minute cells which compose it. These cells are so small that they have to be magnified a thousand times before we can see them. Yet they are independent living beings, which grow, assimilate food, multiply and die, like the big cell, man.

These little cells are congregated in communities which form the organs and tissues of the body, and in these communities they carry on the complicated work of citizens living in a large city. Some are carriers, bringing food materials into the body. Others carry waste and morbid matter out of the body. Other cells manufacture chemical substances for the production of which men need complicated factories. Still others act as policemen and soldiers which protect the commonwealth against the invasion of bacteria, parasites and other hostile invaders.

The marvelous work performed by these little organisms and many things we have observed in the dissecting room and under the microscope strongly indicate that these cells are endowed with some sort of individual intelligence. They do their work without our aid or conscious volition. But still they are greatly influenced by the varying conditions of the mind. While their activities seem to be controlled through the sympathetic nervous system, they stand in telegraphic communication with the headquarters in the brain, and every impulse of the mind is conveyed to them.

If the health of these little citizens is good the whole community prospers. If they are sick the entire organism suffers.

The Body a Vast Army, the Mind its Commander

The cell system of the body resembles a vast army. The mind is the general at the head of it. The cells are the soldiers, divided into different groups for special work. Much of the work of the army is done automatically, through the different well established departments, as the commissary, the hospital service, the scouts and pickets. These departments correspond to the sympathetic nervous system in the body. Though the life and the work of the army is so well regulated that it seems automatic; nevertheless, much depends on the mind of the commander.

The vital processes of the body, digestion, assimilation, elimination, respiration, circulation, etc., are carried on, awake or asleep, without our volition. These involuntary processes are impelled through the sympathetic nervous system, while the voluntary functions of the body are executed through the motor nervous system. But the division is not a sharp one, and the functions of the two departments overlap.

The sympathetic nervous system corresponds to the commissary department of the army, which attends to the physical welfare of the soldiers; while the motor nervous system, with headquarters in the brain, corresponds to the commander with his executive staff, the nerve ganglia in the spinal cord and other parts of the body being the subordinate officers in the field.

While the physical welfare of the army depends upon the almost automatic work of its organization, its mind and soul is the man commanding it. He determines the spirit, the energy and the efficiency of the vast organization. If the commander-in-chief lacks insight, energy and determination, the discipline of the army will be lax, and its efficiency impaired. If the commander be a craven without faith in himself and in his cause, his lack of courage, his doubt and indecision will communicate themselves to the whole army, resulting in discouragement and defeat.

The great generals have been those who were possessed of absolute confidence in themselves and in the efficiency of their army; who in the face of gravest dangers and discouraging situations, with dogged courage and determination pressed on to the predetermined goal. Courage and pertinacity of this kind create the magnetic power which imparts itself to every soldier in the army and makes him a willing slave, even unto death, to the will of his commander.

One of Napoleon's Greatest Deeds

When the pest was invading Napoleon's army, that great general entered the hospitals where the victims of the plague were lying, and conversed with them and touched their bodies. He did this to overcome the fear in the hearts of his soldiers, and thus to protect them against the dread enemy. He said, "A man whose will can conquer the world can conquer the plague." To my mind, this was one of the greatest things the Corsican ever did.

At a time when the new psychology was unknown, the genius of this man had grasped its principles and was making them factors in his apparent success. We say "apparent," because, while we admire his genius, we detest the ends to which he applied his wonderful powers.

Many a time when the battle seemed lost, Napoleon went to the front where danger was thickest, and by the mere sight of him the hard pressed soldiers under his command were inspired to superhuman efforts and final victory. As long as the glamour of invincibility surrounded him, he was invincible, because he inspired his soldiers with a faith and courage which nothing could overcome. But when the cunning of the Russian broke his power and decimated his ranks on the ice-bound steppes, the hypnotic spell was broken, and friends and enemies alike recognized that, after all, he was but a man, subject to chance and circumstance; and from that time on he was vulnerable and suffered defeat after defeat.

How it Works Out

The power of the mind over the physical body and its involuntary functions, which are regulated through the sympathetic nervous system, is best illustrated by the demonstrated facts of hypnotism. Through the exertion of his imagination and his will power the hypnotist can so dominate the brain, and through the brain the body of his subject, as to influence profoundly, not only the sensory functions, but also the heart action and respiration. By the power of his will the hypnotist can retard or accelerate the pulse and respiration.

Some are strong enough to subdue the heart beat so that it becomes hardly perceptible.

If it is possible thus to control by the power of will the vital functions in the body of another person, how much easier must it be to control these functions in our own bodies. Herein lies the domain and the work of mental therapeutics.

Through the power of a vivid imagination and of a strong will we can learn to dominate and direct the vital activities and the life currents in our bodies so that they do their work intelligently and serenely even under the stress of danger or of sickness. We can, by the power of will, direct the vital currents to those parts of our bodies which need them most and we can relieve congested parts by equalizing the circulation all over the body and thus drawing away from the surplus of blood and nerve currents.

We must be careful, however, to use our higher powers in conformity with nature's intent; that is, we must not endeavor to suppress nature's healing and cleansing efforts. These may be suppressed by the power of will as well as by ice bags and drugs.

Mentally and emotionally, as well as physically, we must work with nature, not against her. When we understand the fundamental laws of disease and cure we cannot very well do otherwise.

Mental Power Should not be Used to Suppress Symptoms

To illustrate: Suppose you have "caught a severe cold" affecting the lungs. You become frightened lest the "cold" turn into pneumonia or consumption. You picture to yourself in darkest colors the dreadful symptoms of these diseases. These confused and destructive thought vibrations are conveyed instantaneously to the millions of little soldiers fighting your battle in the bronchi and lungs. They also become panic stricken, confused and paralyzed. Is it to be wondered at if you actualize in your lungs the destructive thought pictures in your mind?

On the other hand you should not employ your intelligence and your will power to suppress the mucous excretions, the coughing and the expectoration. This would only serve to turn nature's acute cleansing efforts into chronic disease.

Understanding the laws of disease and cure on the physical, mental and spiritual planes of being, you would not become alarmed nor convey alarm to the millions of cells battling in the inflamed parts. You would speak to them like a commander addressing his troops:

"We have perfect confidence in nature's wisdom and in the efficiency of her healing forces. This is merely a good spring house cleaning. You are eliminating the morbid matter accumulated during the cold winter months. Rejoice over the purification and regeneration now taking place in the affected parts and benefiting the whole body. Fear not. Attend to your work quietly and serenely. Open yourselves wide to the inflow of life from the source of all life in the innermost parts of your being. The life in you is the life of God. You are strengthened by the divine life and power which animate the universe."

The serenity of your mind, backed by absolute trust and by the power of a strong will, will infuse the cells with new life and vigor and enable them to turn the "acute disease" into a beneficial cleansing and healing crisis.

A Good Business Creed

THE FOLLOWING creed of the Charles H. Brown Paint Company is good enough for general adoption in business institutions everywhere:

We believe in our organization, every man from the digger up, and in our ability to get results.

We believe that honest goods can be sold by honest methods.

We believe in working, not waiting; in laughing, not crying; in boosting, not knocking; and in the pleasure of doing business.

We believe that a man gets what he goes after; and that no man is down and out until he has lost faith in himself.

We believe in a square deal, in kindness, in generosity, in good cheer, in friendship and honest competition.

We believe in expanding our business and the way to do it is to hustle for it.

HARCLIFFE is in the mail order business. No, he isn't one of the big fellows that cover several city blocks with one of his buildings. Nor is he one of the little hole-and-corner chaps, conducting a mail order business from a three-dollar-and-a-half near-oak desk. He is marketing a limited line of specialties

Harcliffe and His Employees

from an airy, comfortable suite of offices in one of the many office buildings in Chicago. He is sole proprietor and general manager of the concern, employing about a hundred clerks and stenographers to help him get rich.

Oh yes, Harcliffe is getting rich! His specialties are high-grade goods that sell to people of comparative affluence, and there is a good profit in them. By selling only by mail, he has reduced market expense to a minimum. And he has a large and growing business.

Now that last is the puzzle.

I know something about Harcliffe's lines—have met specialty men selling them on the road. And I know that it takes a first-class salesman to make anything selling the stuff. He has to be a man of discernment, so that he can fit the particular thing sold to the character of the customer, or there is bound to be dismal doings. So it looked like hunting for trouble with bloodhounds for a man to try to do it by mail.

Easy When You Know How

Harcliffe is a keen, clean, likeable fellow, strictly business but with social qualities that draw me to a lunch table with him every time I visit Chicago. Of course, being an inquisitive person, I just simply had to ask him how he had made the thing go.

"Easiest thing in the world," he said, "Once you get the secret of it. And after all, it is the true secret of success in any line of business."

"Cut the copy-book mottoes, 'Cliffe," I begged. "Just take it for granted that I have heard all about the square deal and all that, and that I fully accept it. Tell me the real reason."

"I was on the point of telling you when you butted in," he replied. "Now listen, it may sound like platitude, but the secret of my success is the efficiency of my organization."

"Oh, come off," I scoffed, "didn't Deelow & Hertson have an efficient organization, handling these lines of yours through men on the road? And didn't they have to give it up because they couldn't make it pay? You can confide in me, 'Cliffe. I'll never tackle so ticklish a proposition."

"That's right where you are mistaken, Mort," he came back. "The reason why the Deelow & Hertson people had to drop the lines was because they didn't have an organization that could give satisfactory service. Tried hard enough, but they didn't know how. They were all the time breaking in new men, and the greenhorns made lots of mistakes that got the house in bad with its customers."

"Tell me," I pleaded, "what is the way to get together an efficient organization?"

How to Build an Efficient Organization

"Well, that also is simple when you know how. First of all, you have to determine just what you have to do with your organization. The next thing is to decide how you are going to do it. Then figure out just what kind of an organization you want to carry out those plans. I had settled with myself just exactly what type and temperament of person I wanted for every job in my place before I hired even an office boy."

"How did you get the people to fit your ideals?" That seems to me the hardest thing of all."

"Well, in the first place, I wasn't looking for any ready-made material. I was willing to take inexperienced help if they measured up to my standards in natural qualifications. I preferred to train them myself. The schools don't train their pupils for business—the teachers know nothing about business, as a general rule. And the training most employes get in the average business institution is such a hit-or-miss process that there is about ninety-eight per cent of inefficiency to two per cent of efficiency. So I advertised for help, 'experience unnecessary,' and looked out for the types and temperaments I wanted. Always, during this sifting process I had in mind the compatibility of those whom I intended to work together. In every department, the employes were temperamentally suited to the foreman or forelady, and to one another. Then I began their education. In addition to teaching them the routine of their work, I organized them into a class for the study of scientific development of their intellects, moral natures, will power, health and endurance, character analysis, logic, business psychology, and the laws and principles of business practice. By leading the class myself, I directed the work along lines that harmonized with my plan—also got into close touch with the individuals and helped each one according to his or her needs.

"That was five years ago, and, with the exception of two or three of the girls that have married, and those that I have added on account of growth, I have exactly the same force today that I had to start with."

Big Profits in High Priced Men

"But how do you hold them like that? I never saw an office force yet that wasn't as restless as a Hackney in fly-time—full of ambition and discontent. When I was in the office with Stanwood, people were always getting too big for their jobs and going elsewhere. Stanwood, as you know, is a splendid trainer of help. Other employers are always keen for someone who has had a couple of years in Stan's place. And so Stan has to let them go, because it wouldn't pay him to give them such salaries as they can get in the bigger places."

"Yes, and that is just where Stan is making his mistake. I made up my mind at the very beginning that no one could ever hire away one of my people by offering bigger wages. If, after I myself had trained the man, he couldn't earn more for me than he could for anyone else, then there was something wrong with my business methods."

"But you couldn't afford to pay a man ten thousand dollars a year in your little business. And yet you must have developed some of that kind of material."

"Oh, couldn't I? Let me tell you something. If ever you are so blessed as to connect with the services of a ten-thousand-dollar-a-year man, nab him, and nab him quick and with a death grip. That man will make you twenty thousand dollars a year."

"But I haven't anything I want such a high-priced beauty to do."

"Never mind! If he is a real ten-thousand-dollar man, he will find something to do—he'll start something. He'll extend and intensify your business, no matter what it is. Why, a ten-thousand-dollar man has made a fortune out of a peanut and popcorn stand before now. I am always tickled to death to raise an employe's wages to hold him. It always increases my profits."

"But don't other employers sometimes offer your people more than they are really worth?"

"Sure they do. And that fellow always returns—a chastened soul."

Whence Offenses Come

"But even high wages won't hold some people. They get miffed at imaginary grievances, want to try another line of work, want a change of climate, or any one of a thousand other causes."

"Your first head covers them all—only cut out the adjective. Grievances are often imaginary in the ordinary business institution, but where the relations between employer and employe are open, frank, and above-board—when the employe feels that he will be given a fair and courteous hearing with his grievance, whether real or imaginary—all grievances are short-lived. My people are human, and subject to undue ideas of their own importance, jealousy, supersensitiveness, and greed. But I chose them in the first place so that a little friendly, easy, confidential talk would soon straighten them out. I know a sullen, back-biting, brooding, trouble-breeder by the shape of his head and his features. I didn't hire any of that kind. A truly loyal employe, who is enthusiastically interested in his work gets paid in money, not promises, for all that he does, and is in frank, friendly relationship with his employer, is usually contented and happy. He likes his work and has no desire to change for something else. A different climate does not interest him."

"But isn't it true that the bigger salaries men get, the more they want?"

"Sure it is. That's what keeps them progressing. But it's all right when you make them feel that you would much rather pay them five thousand dollars a year than three, when they earn it, and that the best place for them to advance is right in their own organization, their ambition works in your favor."

The Right Way to Hire New Help

"But what about the labor that is almost purely mechanical? Isn't there a limit to what one can earn in that? And don't people grow out of it?"

"Most assuredly. I never keep anyone doing that kind of work who has the ability and reliability to do anything better. And there is the logical place for my new timber. I have never hired anyone above the lowest grade from outside the organization. I develop them myself. As the business grows and expands, all the new material is taken in through the bottom—people chosen for their inherent fitness for higher positions."

The "New Blood" Fallacy

"But what about the popular idea that men from other institutions bring you new ideas, new methods, and fresh energy?"

"Mostly bosh! Rises from the fact that too many employers let themselves and their forces get into ruts. I am studying other institutions and their methods all the time. So are a number of my men and women. And I am perfecting my system and methods all the time. Everybody in the place understands that the excellency of this year is not good enough for next year. Everyone has caught the spirit of keen competition with their own past records. The worker in any position who makes a valuable suggestion is always commensurately rewarded. No, my business doesn't need any new blood. I never let the blood in it get impoverished and sluggish."

Well, right there I gave it up. No argument can upset a man who has plain common sense and successful experience on his side.

Represent Your House

By E. N. FERDEN

I HAD occasion to call upon a certain firm quite often, and every time I went I marveled at the different quality of the office boy.

He was a regular boy, was Jimsie—not an old man in a small package. His English was a bit Boweryesque, and on one occasion I noticed an indigo patch beneath one eye. It never came from turning away wrath with soft answers.

But he was a jewel of a boy, just the same.

The moment a visitor entered that office he got attention from Jimsie. If there was waiting to be done, he got a seat and a newspaper and a word to the effect that "Mr. Smith'll be wit ye in half-a-minute."

And if Mr. Smith's half-a-minute was a little prolonged, Jimsie would make an apparent investigation and return with the words, "Mr. Smith'll see yous purty quick now."

All day long Jimsie would hover about the visitors in the outer office as though they were his heaven-sent charge, lowering a blind to keep the sun off an old lady caller, fetching a glass of ice water for a crotchety old man.

I really believe that however violent a grievance a caller may have nursed, if he remained long enough under the soothing conciliatory influence of Jimsie before registering his complaint, he would forget what he came to kick about.

Never once did I see Jimsie drop his respectful mien, never once did he seem to forget the serious importance of his duties.

I chanced to go there near the close of a hot afternoon, and as my wait was long I noted that Jimsie had been bombarded with an assault of fool questions that would have rasped the patience of a saint, but Jimsie remained unruffled. Finally I asked him quietly:

"Jimsie, how in the name of all patience can you refrain from showing in some way that you consider them Darwinian dough-heads?"

Jimsie only smiled and said: "It'd be bad business for me to go off me nut—because ye see I represents de firm."

And he meant it. His little soul was as earnest as his words.

Right then and there I stopped to wonder how many of us are equally conscientious—how many of us stop to repress our tempers, to possess our souls in patience, to govern every little action with that thought in view, that whatever we do we continually "represent the firm."

It isn't all, that a salesman go out and take the required number of orders to keep him from getting fired. It isn't all, that we say "good morning" to a customer who comes into our place of business and thank him when he has bought.

We've a never-ending responsibility—that's even more than a man-to-man square deal with our employer—a faith to keep with the house whose name we carry on our business card.

"The house" is your house as long as you're on its pay roll.

Boost for it—in your actions as well as your words.

Regardless of political complexion, I've always admired the sentiment of the old time campaigner who said, in effect: "My party all the time; when it's right, I'll stick to it; when it's wrong, I'll stick by it tighter still, and help to right it."

And that's the way to feel toward the house that delivers the pay check.

Nobody on this side of the river Jordan ever had an ideal job.

No house was ever perfect.

But it's your house as long as you're with it.

Represent the firm.

How Not to Live

By H. Lindlahr, D. O., M. D.

Most people have no time to discover how to live—they are too busy dying.

Their favorite mode of self-annihilation is progressive suicide in various forms. For the benefit of these busy ones we will give a choice selection of popular routes to premature decay and self-extinction.

Slave by day and worry by night; cudgel your brain how to beat your brother in the scramble for money and position. Just about the time you have scraped together a pile of useless stuff you will be sufficiently starved in body and mind so as to shuffle off this mortal coil without much trouble.

You can help matters nicely by bolting a ten-cent quick-lunch at noon, by sitting up until midnight with a cool bottle and a hot bird, or playing whist and poker into the wee, small hours of morning.

Some prefer suicide by the liquor, tobacco or morphine route.

Our sisters can facilitate the descent down the devil's slide most effectively by assiduous devotion to pink teas, matinees, bridge-whist, corsets, high heels and French novels.

Don't forget that the cook is special purveyor to his majesty, King Death. Let him tickle your paralyzed palate with highly spiced viands of various descriptions; with rich wines, tea, coffee and condiments, Worcestershire sauce and chop-suey.

Mentally steep yourself thoroughly in envy, anger, impatience, petty selfishness and self-pity.

When the delicate mechanism of your body under these corroding influences begins to squeak with aches and pains then fill your already poisoned system with noxious drug poisons. It's nearly certain death.

But—

If you wish to live, enjoy life, and prosper, take the road leading in the opposite direction.

Our Christmas Present to You

Ten Per Cent Discount on all Books

ARE you looking for just the right Christmas present for someone? Perhaps you are an employer, looking for presents that will express your appreciation of their loyal services to your employes, and at that same time, provide them with something that will be of more than temporary value.

¶ There is no more appropriate present, under any and all circumstances, than a good book.

¶ Most of you who read this advertisement have learned from past experience that we are able to serve you well with books that will live and grow in value as time passes—our man building and business building books.

¶ As a rule, our prices are fixed. Our books are standard, and worth all we ask for them. But our Christmas present to you this year will be a ten per cent discount on all books listed on the last three advertising pages of this magazine and in our catalog—provided the order reaches us not later than the tenth of December.

---

Order Early—There is Always a Big Rush in Our Book Department in December

---

Sheldon University Press
LIBERTYVILLE, ILLINOIS

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

SUCCESS-POWERS

FOR YOU IN

"Power of Will" tells you

The Law of Great Thinking.
The Four Factors on which great thinking depends.
How to develop analytical power.
How to think "all around" any subject.
How to throw the mind into deliberate, controlled, productive thinking.
Detailed directions for Perfect Mind Concentration.
How to acquire the power of Consecutive Thinking, Reasoning, Analysis.
How to make any topic yield ideas, instructions, material, for essays, speeches, compositions, descriptions.
How to acquire the skill of Creative Writing.
How to guard against errors in Thought.
How to make the Will supreme in the Mental Realm.
How to drive from the mind all unwelcome thoughts.
How to follow any line of thought with keen, concentrated power.
How to develop Reasoning Power.
How to handle the mind in Creative Thinking.
The secret of Building Mind Power.
How the Will is made to act.
How to test your Will.
How a Strong Will is Master of Body.
What creates Human Power.
The Six Principles of Will-training.
Definite Methods for developing Will.
The Seven Ways that Moral development builds Will-Power.
How to develop to a high degree the Mental Moods of Interest, Feeling, Energy, Permission, Decision, Continuity, Understanding, Reason.
The Six Crown Principles for multiplying Will-Power.
The NINETY-NINE STAR METHODS for using Will-Power in the Conduct of Life.
The Seven Great Principles of drill in Mental, Physical, Personal power.
The FIFTY-ONE MAXIMS for Applied power of Perception, Memory, Imagination, Self Analysis, Control.
How to make the Eye a great power in Influence and Observation.
How to develop a strong keen gaze.
How to make the Eye yield values in Mind-Power.
How to concentrate the eye upon what is before you—object, person, printed page, work.
How to school the eye for power in business, society, public.
How to force Will into the eye.
How to cultivate a bright, attracting, intelligent eye expression.
How to become aware of Nerve Action.
How to keep the body well-poised.
How to open the Mind and Body for reception of incoming power.
How to exercise the nerves.
How to throw off the mood of Worry.
Affirmation of Supreme Well-being.
How to overcome the tyranny of the Nervous system.
How to secure steady nerves.
How to keep the body quiet, controlled, conserved in power, eliminating all nerve-force destroying habits.
How to train the great executive servant of the Mind—the Hand.
How to maintain the Central Factors of Body health.
The First, Second and Third difficulties in Mastering Harmful Habits.
The Law of Will-Power in Habits.
The Mental Law of Habit Cure.

"POWER OF WILL"

By FRANK CHANNING HADDOCK, Ph. D.

This great Training-System builds

Power of MIND WILL CULTURE
MAGNETISM INTELLECT INFLUENCE
LEADERSHIP
MASTERY FINANCIAL ABILITY

Makes Masterful Men and Queenly Women.
Contains a vast amount of Direct Personal Instruction. Its hundreds of fascinating pages are crowded with the diamond-value discoveries of 18 years research by a keen scholar-philosopher-scientist. It tells in clear, pointed, easily understood language exactly what to do and HOW TO DO THAT for multiplied Success-Powers. Its instructions will make you a leader in any Business, Art, Profession, Society. Claimed by authorities "the most searching study of psycho-physical man in print." Read the very brief analysis given here and answer: "Can I afford to be without this lifetime Manual and Guide to Business, Financial, Personal, Social Success?"

Price $3.00 Postpaid.

A noble volume, 400 pages, gilt top, choice paper and printing, 28 chap., 30 original power poems. Superbly bound in royal purple rib-silk, size 6x9. "Edition Royale" now ready. Delivered anywhere on earth. Order your copy at once.

So extremely good that I will buy the book back from anyone who will part with it inside five days — from receipt.

Descriptive booklet "SECRETS OF SUCCESS" mailed to anyone not already convinced of the NECESSITY of owning this Peerless Guidebook.

Tear this page out, write your name and address on the bottom, enclose remittance and mail immediately to

Albert Lewis Helton,

Associate Manager: POWER-BOOK LIBRARY,

Meriden, Conn., U. S. A.

"Power of Will" teaches you

The Seven Laws for ridding yourself of Profane Speaking.
The Fifteen Star Methods for mastering Anger and Irritability.
What the Psycho-Physical cause of the Drink Habit is.
Nine long demonstrated regimes for mastering this curse (Rare Value).
How to overcome embarrassing Hesitation of Speech.
How to develop a direct, forceful, effective style of talking in business, society, anywhere.
How to eliminate Mind-wandering.
How to hold the mind closely upon any desired line of thought.
How to speak tersely, emphatically, and think ahead for best expression.
How to school yourself against Thoughtlessness.
How to overcome Indecision.
How to develop abundance of Thought.
The Principles of Memory.
How to throw Attention and Energy into Memory culture.
The Psychological Principles for memorizing words, sentences, anything.
The Inner Law of Memory.
The Star Method for remembering the substance of any book.
How to plan ahead in your career through the great Pioneer Power-IMAGINATION.
How to plan conduct so as to avoid former mistakes of Thought, Action.
How to make the imagination fill the mind with Life, Action, Energy, Beauty, scenes of Pleasure, Profit.
How to work the Imagination for discovery and invention.
How to improve mechanical devices.
How to create and build new devices.
How to make Imagination create for Literary Ability.
How to make Imagination suggest improvements in business, the home, your environment, conduct.
How to look into the Workshop of the Mind — and give ideas and thoughts Practical Creation.
How to cure diseased Imagination.
How to banish unhealthy mind states.
How to banish fear of Men, Ill Luck, Death, Hell, Misfortune.
How to arrive at best decisions.
How to use the power of deliberation.
What Francis Bacon said you must do to work (influence) any man.
The First Principle for success in contact with others.
The Mental Attitude you must hold to impress people.
The Secret of Control of Others.
How permanent Influence over others is secured.
The Best Rule in the Control of Others.
The FIFTY-FOUR MASTER RULES in the control of others.
The chief difficulty of Public Speaking.
How to use the Skill-Art of Influence before any audience.
How to acquire Thought, Develop Language, Exercise Expression.
How to be instructive, impressive, pointed, effective, clear.
How to overcome stage fright and embarrassment.
How to secure poise, power, persuasive ability.
How to handle eyes, voice, body.
How to deeply impress the audience.
A scientific treatise with hundreds of rules for training the child's will.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

GET TOGETHER PAGE

In this page our subscribers will have the free use of a four line space for one insertion. In this space they may advertise themselves for sale or may advertise for the services of some one else. Others—not subscribers to THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER—will be obliged to pay 25 cents per line for classified ads. In sending in your ads you should figure seven words to the line so that there will be no trouble over the insertion.

WANTED — COSMOPOLITAN MAGAZINE RE-quires the services of a representative in all localities to look after subscription renewals and to extend circulation by special methods which have proved unusually successful. Salary and commission. Previous experience desirable but not essential. Whole time or spare time. Address, with references, H. C. Campbell, Cosmopolitan Magazine, 1789 Broadway, New York City.

SALESMEN WANTED—LARGE MANUFACTUR-ing company desire four experienced salesmen, age not exceeding thirty-five; salary, twenty dollars per week and expenses. Booster, care Sheldon University Press.

START AN EASY AND LUCRATIVE BUSINESS.

We teach you how to establish a successful collection business and refer business to you. No capital required. Little competition. Rare opportunities. Write for Free Pointers today. American Collection Service, 165 State St., Detroit, Mich.

YOUNG SHELDON MAN DESIRES TO REPRESENT manufacturer of motor buggy or runabout, in Kentucky territory. Best of references and bond furnished if desired. S. H. Shaw, Pleasureville, Ky. F

WANTED—AGENTS TO TAKE SUBSCRIPTIONS to THE BACKBONE MONTHLY—"a serum against softening of the moral spine"—a magazine so different, both editorially and typographically. Show a sample copy and there's a sale on the spot. Agents are making money with THE BACKBONE MONTHLY. Come on in! Sample copies, terms and blanks on request. The Backbone Society, 144 Fox St., Aurora, Illinois.

LOCAL REPRESENTATIVE WANTED—SPLENDID income assured right man to act as our representative after learning our business thoroughly by mail. Former experience unnecessary. All we require is honesty, ability, ambition and willingness to learn a lucrative business. No soliciting or traveling. This is an exceptional opportunity for a man in your section to get into a big-paying business without capital and become independent for life. Write at once for full particulars. Address E. R. Marden, Pres. The Nat'l Co-op. Real Estate Co., Suite 494 Marden Bldg., Washington, D. C.

FOUR SPECIALTY SALESMEN, ONE DISTRICT manager, one state manager will be placed within ninety days. Business more than doubles yearly. Address J. H. Mears, 22 Michigan St., Chicago. F

SHELDON STUDENT NOW ENGAGED IN BANK-ing business wants a position as traveling salesman. Some staple article with Philadelphia or New York firm preferred. Reasonable but living salary. Address J. G. McLoughlin, 127 Highland Ave., Chestnut Hill, Philadelphia, Penn. F

WE HAVE AN OPENING FOR A BRIGHT, ENER-getic young man who has some knowledge of advertising, for the purpose of using him as a traveling salesman, covering one or two of the southern states, selling advertising novelties, printing, etc. It is a good opportunity for a bright young man to advance himself if he makes good, and there is no doubt that we can make him do it, if he applies himself. Address Commercial, care Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Ill.

WANTED—SALESMAN FOR FIVE-ACRE TRACTS of fine fruit land underlaid with fifteen feet high grade coal; installment plan; greatest value ever offered investors; easy to interest people; liberal commission to producers. Get proof and prospectus. W. P. Records, Lawton, Oklahoma.

SALESMAN — EXPERIENCED IN PLUMBING, steam and hot water heating lines, and specialties, wants exclusive territory in Texas, representing factories or jobbers handling these lines and selling the trade only. If you want to increase your sales, I am the man; 34 years old, married, in good health and a hustler. First class references. Address B. I. T., care Sheldon University Press.

AGENTS MAKE BIG MONEY SELLING OUR new gold letters for office windows, store fronts, and glass signs. Anyone can put them on. Write today for free sample and full particulars. Metallic Sign Letter Co., 431 N. Clark St., Chicago.

WANTED—ENERGETIC, HONEST, TEMPERATE specialty salesman. Two to ten thousand per year. No salary hunting order takers need apply. References and bond necessary. Call or write at once, Commercial Register Company, Buffalo, N. Y.

!!!! SUCCESSFUL SIGN SALESMAN !!!!

Large Exclusive SIGN Manufacturer, selling to large manufacturers only, will entertain earnest application from man with Advertising or Sales Ability. High class, quantity proposition, no canvassing. R. quite go-d, capable man. Exclusive territory. Strong co-operation, extensive advertising campaign. Write stating EXPERIENCE. INTERNATIONAL SIGN & LETTER CO., CLEVELAND, OHIO.

AN ILLINOIS corporation located in Chicago, manufacturing and jobbing a line of staple novelties has for ten years successfully sold its product by mail to clothiers and furnishers. The owner is now increasing the line, has abundant capital but wants a few good, reliable salesmen to become interested and sell the goods. They may take stock, if they desire. Arrangements to become effective January next. Young men desiring connections where immediate financial advantage will accrue, and where they may acquire substantial interest, if they so desire, please address, BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER, LIBERTYVILLE, ILLINOIS.

Situation Wanted as Advertising Manager

ADVERTISING man, wide executive experience, would like to connect with manufacturing concern or commercial house as advertising manager. Especially qualified for producing all kinds of business literature—catalogues, follow-up systems, sales promotion plans. Have conducted successful campaigns for large national advertisers and can furnish references showing that I have made good. Engaged at present but will be open for contract shortly. Will work on profit sharing basis, or salary and percentage. Would make investment if desirable. Age thirty. Address, 304 Saint Bernard Building, Evansville, Indiana.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

The Sheldon Business Normal

ARE you interested in a proposition that will help you to fit yourself for a position that will pay from $3,500 to $10,000 a year?

Here it is in a word or two. The first session of the Sheldon Business Normal closed on September 30, 1910. There was a large class started. Every member of it finished the course, and several were added during the term.

Upon graduation, every member of the class had more positions open to him than he could fill in years. Large employers who knew about the School were writing to us asking for graduates. And they were wanted for high positions. Most of them closed contracts that will net them incomes as high as those I have mentioned.

Elbert Hubbard visited the Normal during the session, and delivered an address before the students. Afterward he wrote, "I should rather have anyone I was interested in attend the Sheldon Business Normal than spend four years at any university."

Now, the next term of this great post-graduate school of business opens here on the Sheldonhurst estate, near Libertyville, on Monday, July 3, 1911. It will continue for ten weeks, or until Saturday, September 9, 1911.

The course of instruction will consist of:

First—Personal study and class instruction in:

- (a) The Science of Business Building, which is the fourth edition of the Science of Successful Salesmanship;
- (b) The Science of Service.

Second—An extensive series of personal lectures by me, assisted by specialists, in Salesmanship and Business Economics.

Third—A course of lectures on Character Analysis, or the reading of Human Nature.

Fourth—Frequent drills in the Art of Salesmanship and Sales Management.

This course of study leads to the appointment of those students who desire to take up our work, and whom I shall select as being worthy and qualified, to immediate positions in connection with the work of the Sheldon Schools.

The gross earnings of those who prove successful in these positions will not be less than $3,000 a year. Experience shows that earnings of $10,000 can be realized by men thus trained and employed.

You who are now well placed in a congenial line can get here the training you need to ginger up and build up the work of your sales department.

The class is also open to employers who find the training of competent sales managers a problem.

You find here quick, sure, sane, tried, plain, direct, and scientific training for efficiency in sales management.

Now is the time for you to begin to get data on this most unusual opportunity. Time is short. You can begin planning now to come.

Write to me right away, and I will answer, giving full particulars.

Sheldon

A. F. SHELDON, Libertyville, Illinois

1910

Will you please forward full particulars regarding The Sheldon Business Normal School, as advertised in THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER for November.

Name.....

Local Address.....

Effective Speaking

By Arthur Edward Phillips, Author of "Natural Drills in Expression," etc.,
Director, Department of Public Speaking, the Theological Seminary of the Evangelical Luther Church at Chicago; Principal, Phillips School
of Oratory, Chicago.

Adopted by Representative Schools and Universities Throughout the Nation.

IN THIS work is found the first presentation of the true principles of effectiveness in speech. It is a distinct departure from anything yet published on the subject. There is no book now in your library that can fill the place of "Effective Speaking."

This book presents the essentials of effectiveness in all departments of speaking—business, social and public. It trains the judgment in the use of the great principles that govern power and success in speech, and offers a logical way to develop skill as an extemporaneous speaker.

Further, this book presents a complete set of exercises covering every important point discussed; also, a complete set of questions. It gives over one hundred examples from master speakers illustrative of the principles developed.

If you wish to increase your power as an entertaining speaker, read pages 63 to 78; if you wish to increase your power as a convincing speaker, read pages 42 to 47; if you wish to increase your power as an impressive speaker, read pages 39 to 42; if you wish to increase your power as a persuasive speaker, read pages 48 to 62; if you wish to increase your power of memory, read pages 211 to 213; if you wish to increase your power to speak extemporaneously, read pages 88 to 171; if you wish to improve your style, read pages 181 to 201.

If you sincerely seek power in speaking you cannot afford to be without this book. It is a need.

Some of the Institutions Using "Effective Speaking:"

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO
UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA
MICHIGAN STATE NORMAL
UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA
MISSOURI STATE NORMAL
UNIVERSITY OF OKLAHOMA
UPPER IOWA UNIVERSITY
UNIVERSITY OF UTAH
UNIVERSITY OF GEORGIA
IOWA STATE NORMAL
NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY
ADRIAN COLLEGE
SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY

CORNELL UNIVERSITY
UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS
BELOIT COLLEGE
CORNELL COLLEGE
BAKER UNIVERSITY
OKLAHOMA STATE NORMAL
DRAKE UNIVERSITY
UNIVERSITY OF DENVER
GEORGIA STATE NORMAL
SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY
INDIANA STATE NORMAL
TOLEDO UNIVERSITY
OTTERBEIN UNIVERSITY
NORTHWESTERN COLLEGE

LELAND STANFORD UNIVERSITY
UNIVERSITY OF GEORGIA
KNOX COLLEGE
DRURY COLLEGE
LAWRENCE UNIVERSITY
BUCKNELL UNIVERSITY
WASHINGTON AND JEFFERSON UNIVERSITY
OLIVET COLLEGE
YANKTON COLLEGE
AUGUSTINA COLLEGE
UNIVERSITY OF CHATTANOOGA
ALBION COLLEGE
UNIVERSITY OF NORTH DAKOTA
UNIVERSITY OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Price $1.50, Delivered

The Taylor Book Store, Rockefeller, Illinois

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Your Power to Command

---

It depends directly upon the efficiency of those under your direction.

No executive can do great things unless backed by an efficient organization.

And no organization is more efficient than the sum of the efficiency of the individual units in it.

Are you satisfied with the results of the old way of hiring and firing, and the everlasting jars in the machinery that go with it? Don't you get tired of breaking in new help all the time?

Then why not educate your help yourself?

You, yourself, will learn by teaching, because teaching educates the teacher. You will get into closer touch with your help. You will get a more accurate line on their ability.

You take a great deal of thought and pains and spend a great deal of money in educating your own family. Why not put a little thought, time and money into the education of your business family?

What your business needs is not more men and women, but better trained men and women. And if they are to become better trained, there is no one but yourself to do it.

It is up to you to make your wheelwrights master mechanics, your bookkeepers auditors, your salesmen sales managers. You can, if you will, manufacture your own specialists, right in your own plant and office—and make them right—fitted to your needs.

Let your business be a gymnasium and training school, not a hospital or morgue.

What is your greatest bugbear? Inefficiency. It emanates poison. Error begets error. Just when you had the whole fabric of your organization perfected for some most important work, one of the minor parts—an individual—dropped out or committed a costly error, and the loss made you sweat blood.

Which is the better investment—money spent in developing the man-power and brain-power of your organization, or that spent in paying for errors and loss caused by inefficiency?

Insure your business against these costly errors by education.

You realize that the biggest expense in your business is labor.

Why not increase the quality and quantity of the product of that labor? You can do it by increasing the efficiency of the units in your force.

While equipping your office and plant with the latest and most expensive furniture, devices, and machinery, why not spend a little money in building up a better force to operate all this.

Let me tell you how I can help you to educate your people.

Let me show you how you can set them to educating themselves.

Let me prove to you that I can help you to make of every employe a greater power in building your business.

Let me put you in touch with many firms and corporations in the United States and Canada that have used my methods. Don't take my word for it. They will be only too glad to tell you how much better their business has been and how much more money they have made. That's what talks. We have nearly two thousand such clients and over forty-six thousand students.

These people have spent the money, tried out my method, and proved it profitable.

So it is not an experiment for you.

Write to me, right away, and I will answer, telling you all about it.

A. F. SHELDON

1087 Republic Building, Chicago, Illinois

"I can make YOU a confident, convincing Public Speaker!"

at DINNERS and all SOCIAL GATHERINGS in POLITICS
in BUSINESS ANYWHERE

When the toastmaster arises, looks over the expanse of tables, and says, "We have with us to-night"—how would you feel if he means you?

Grenville Kleiser's Personal Mail Course in Public Speaking takes only fifteen minutes of your time daily in your home or office. It makes men easy, forceful speakers on all occasions—it develops mental power and personality, and increases your earning capacity. The cost is very reasonable.

"I consider your Course as worth its weight in gold. I have spent some time and money with vocal teachers, but I regard your lessons as the most helpful, the most economical, of any I have ever taken."—Arthur J. Whiddon, Waterville, Wash. (Aug. 31, 1910.)

Write to-day for full particulars of Course

FUNK & WAGNALLS COMPANY, Dept. C NEW YORK

Simplicity, Convenience Light Action
Fine Work & Durability

are the distinguishing features of the

ROYAL
Standard Typewriter

Price,
$65

ROYAL TYPEWRITER CO.
Royal Typewriter Building, New York
21 Monroe Street, Chicago, Illinois

Wanted—Men Who Can Earn $5,000 a Year

I WANT about twenty-five live men, previous experience unnecessary, who are willing to spend two weeks' time to prepare themselves to earn from $5,000 a year up, as general agents for Sheldon University Press. I have personally demonstrated that a man can easily earn at the rate of $10,000 at this work. And I am willing to devote two weeks of my time to the personal instruction of twenty-five men in the way to do it. This class will be open to the twenty-five selected out of the list of applicants, free of all tuition, on Monday, January 2, 1911, and will close Saturday evening, January 14, 1911. It will be held in the Administration Building of The Sheldon School near Libertyville, Illinois. Mail me this coupon today for further particulars.

MR. A. F. SHELDON, Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Illinois:

Please send me full particulars about general agency for Sheldon University Press.

Name .....

Address .....

City and State .....

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Now is the Time for You to Plan to Attend The Sheldon Summer School for 1911

TO JUDGE from what they all said, about one hundred and fifty people acquired the life habit of attending the Summer School last summer. No, that is hardly accurate. There was a goodly number there who got the habit during the summer of 1909, when the first session of the School was held.

There is something about the atmosphere of Lake Eara, the unusual fellowship among the students, and the character of the instruction given that makes every one who attends the Summer School, even for a day or two, yearn to come back.

It was the unanimous verdict of the one hundred and fifty who attended the School in 1910 that they had never had a better time in their lives, and had never known any other crowd of people to have so good a time.

When Elbert Hubbard lectured before the Summer School, he said that he had never spoken to a finer, more intelligent and responsive audience anywhere.

The Summer School for 1909 set a high mark. Those who were present said they didn't see how any crowd could have a better time. The Summer School for 1910 not only far eclipsed the first one, but it showed the way to make these occasions more and more instructive, entertaining, recreative, inspiring, and profitable to the students as time goes on. Already preparations are being made for the session for 1911 that will make it more profitable and more enjoyable than this year's.

So, of course, you want to be there.

You see, the Sheldon Summer School offers you a two weeks' vacation in company with the finest, liveliest, keenest, and brightest business and professional men and their wives, daughters, and sisters. In addition, it offers you personal instruction in the science of business and allied sciences, under the direction of Mr. Sheldon himself and a faculty of specialists.

The School is held on the great six-hundred-acre estate of Sheldonhurst, with its two hundred acres of forest and its beautiful little mile-long Lake Eara, near Libertyville, Illinois.

The session for 1911 will open Monday, July the third, and close Saturday night, July the fifteenth.

The students live in a delightful camp and all eat together at one of the best camp tables you ever put your feet under. At least that is what they all said last summer.

Here is an investment for you that will pay big dividends in health, long life, money, and all else that is worth having.

---

WRITE TO US FOR PARTICULARS

---

The Sheldon Summer School

LIBERTYVILLE, ILLINOIS

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Sherwin Cody's Latest Book

How to Do Business by Letter

and Training Course in Business English Composition

The most successful book on letter-writing ever published, now in its 47th thousand, eleventh edition, though but recently published.

Contains over 125 model letters of all kinds, including a number of the more successful pulling letters used by prominent houses.

Also the Rules of Grammar complete, with all common errors; the Rules of Punctuation, Words Often Misused, Rules and Regulations of the Postoffice (correct to 1910), etc.

Price, postpaid, $1.00. See table of contents.

Sherwin Cody's Form Paragraph Letter-Writer

An indexed and gummed blankbook, full letter size, loose leaf, in which to paste form paragraphs to be used in answering all kinds of correspondence.

By this system an $8-a-week girl can write better letters than a $25-a-week correspondent, because she simply copies into her book the best paragraphs in the regularly dictated letters of the head of the business, and all letters are in his language, perfect in every detail of punctuation, grammar, etc., and may be signed by his name though he never sees the letter himself. This is a wonderful means of raising the quality of correspondence, as well as saving much time and expense. 80 gummed pages, 20 index pages, 100 pages in all; price, postpaid, $3; subject to approval and return at my expense.

Sherwin Cody's Compendium of All Card Systems

An instruction book on loose-leaf and card systems (the only book ever published clearly stating the simple fundamental principles of these systems), accompanying a neat box of 500 cards, size 3x5 inches, printed from specially engraved wax plates in the best style, representing 18 complete systems all ready for use, including forms for mailing lists, advertising, salesmen's report and route cards, perpetual inventory forms, cost systems, school forms, and loose-leaf and card ledgers of all kinds, for wholesale, retail, mail-order, instalment, and specialty businesses. Electrotypes of plates sold and directions given for printing systems at one-third the usual price. Price, complete, $3.00.

How to Make Advertising Pay

How to Write Letters that Pull

Office Salesmanship & Business Psychology

I have made a detailed personal study of forty-six leading lines of business: Manufacturing, wholesale, retail, mail-order, and specialty, and have taught presidents, secretaries and advertising managers how to make a success of their publicity—I know what will win in forty-six different businesses, yours among the number, and this information I give in my complete course, together with all the books and special features described above, with scores of others—everything I have for only $30, including twenty personal lessons. Write for complete catalogue.

SHERWIN CODY, LIBERTYVILLE, ILLINOIS

CONTENTS:

Using Words So as To Make People Do Things.
How to Begin a Business Letter.
How to Close a Business Letter.
The Body of the Letter.
Applying for a Position.
Sending Money by Mail.
Ordering Goods.
"Hurry-up" Letters.
How Money is Collected.
Letters to Ladies.
Professional Letters.
How to Acquire an Easy Style in Letter Writing.
Two Kinds of Letters—Buying and Selling.
When to Write a Long Letter and When to Write a Short Letter.
Answering Inquiries.
Talking in a Letter—Colloquialisms and Slang.
Complaint Letters.
Condensation—Writing Advertisements.
Advertising and Follow-up Letters.
Display in Letter Writing.
Salesmanship in Letters and Advertisements.
Customs and Regulations of the Post Office.
Social and Official Forms; the Rules of Grammar, with Common Errors; the Rules of Punctuation for Business Office Use.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Need Envelopes?

"Write Hogan"

—MAKERS OF—
EVERYTHING IN ENVELOPES

Hogan Envelope Company, Inc.
319-331 West Ohio Street, Chicago

A GOOD SHORTHAND REPORTER

is the only kind you can afford to employ. I am well prepared to handle all kinds of law and general reporting.

FRED H. GURTLE
SHORTHAND REPORTER

Phone Randolph 3038 810-811 Reaper Block, CHICAGO

3000 GUMMED LABELS $1.00
POSTPAID
SIZE, 1X2 INCHES PRINTED TO ORDER

Other styles & sizes for every purpose.
Send for free catalog—you'll find just what you need. Our high quality and low prices will surprise you.

FENTON LABEL CO.
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Salesmen Wanted

WE WANT a few live wire salesmen to handle New Patented Advertising Novelty just out. Practical, useful article for the home and appropriate for advertising any line of business. Liberal commissions. Can be handled as side line, pocket sample. State line you are now selling, also territory covered.

Sallee Advertising Company
Courier Building ... Evansville, Indiana

WANTED! Agents to take subscriptions to The Backbone Monthly—"A magazine for and about people who are doing things worth while"—a magazine so different, both editorially and typographically. Show a sample copy and there's a sale on the spot. Agents are making big money with The Backbone Monthly. Come on in! Sample copies, terms and blanks sent on request.
The Backbone Society, 144 Fox St., Aurora, Illinois

Ask For Book You Want

Place check in the square below indicating number of book desired; write name and address on lines below and forward, with 10 cents postage attached, and the book is yours—without further expense or obligation, of course.

- 1—THE ART OF FINANCIERING
[Showing how business men may raise capital for business projects]
- 2—FINANCIAL HAND BOOK
[For promoters, fiscal agents and brokers]
- 3—BUSINESS BUILDING BY CORRESPONDENCE
[For the man who uses circular letters]
- 4—THE SELLING FORCE AND THE SELLING FARCE
[Showing why the great majority of selling plans do not pay]
- 5—THE GREAT LAW OF AVERAGE
[A new principle discovered by a business expert, bringing CERTAINTY to business affairs]
- 6—HOW $250 MAY RAISE $200,000
[For the man with a real opportunity]

If more than one book is desired add 10 cents additional for each extra book. Money refunded if not perfectly satisfactory. Each book conveys a MESSAGE. Each tells something NEW and VALUABLE.

The Business Development Co. of America

|   |   |   |   |   |   |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1 | 2 | 3 | 4 | 5 | 6 |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|

November B-P

Founded 1901
119 NASSAU STREET
NEW YORK

Read Below What Practical Business Men Say of These Books

"Booklets sent are fine and ideas O. K."—L. E. BAILEY, San Jose, Cal.
"Certainly 'Eye-Openers.'"—E. C. ELWOOD, Bridgeport, Conn.

"One of the best investments I have made for a long time."
—LE GRANDE DUTCHER, Editor of "Profitable Publicity."
"Consider brochures of real value to me and worth many more times the price asked."—L. C. KELLOGG, Seattle, Wash.

"After carefully reading, I want to state that, if I could have had the information contained in 'How $250 Can Raise $200,000' I would have been saved several hundred dollars, much valuable time and been spared much humiliation. The idea is right. I paid hard cash and harder experience in proving it."—E. D. CRIBBS, Highland Park, Ill.

"'How $250 May Raise $200,000' is the best article I ever remember seeing emanate from your establishment and 'HITS THE NAIL SQUARELY ON THE HEAD.' I have succeeded at last in promoting my mine, but could have saved about three years of the time out of the four it has taken, if the proper course had been pursued from the first, as laid down. The course finally pursued followed closely along lines laid down now by you, save differing in details. The method was very much the same.

"I think the very logical and convincing argument set forth in 'How $250 May Raise $200,000' would wake up a mummy one thousand years old, for EVERY WORD IS ABSOLUTELY TRUE."

Very truly yours,
MARK E. DAVIS, Oakland, Cal.

"I was very much interested in 'How $250 May Raise $200,000,' for the reason that it appears to hit the situation exactly. I have read nearly all your issues for the past two years, and much of your printed literature, but never saw anything that covers the situation so completely as does this article."—J. T. RYAN, American Tire Armor Co., 816 Pacific Building, San Francisco, Cal.

"The Business Development Company of America is the publisher of five little books which are the most unique and interesting publications in their way that The American Banker has ever had the pleasure of receiving *** they contain a vast amount of information that will be of value to bankers, promoters and business men who are interested in building up their business.

"These books sell for ten cents a copy and are worth $10 a copy. We advise our readers to send for them." Editorial extract from The American Banker, March 5, 1910.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

There is No Royal Road to Wealth—But—Some Roads are Easier Than Others

I have helped thousands of men to succeed—and my definition of acquiring success is: "To make more money, in a more congenial occupation." If you will read this page, you will learn how to find

The way from wage-earning to business management

and how you can make that way upward in the business world your own.

I have succeeded—others have succeeded with me—this is Success's invitation to you.

Disappointed ambition is the curse—fulfilled ambition the glory—of any man's life

The average man who succeeds in this world is the man who realizes he was not born to set the world on fire—but aims at a goal within his reach and keeps on with courage, persistence, and intelligently directed purpose until he gathers the sweet fruits of his labors.

Henry Clay, Daniel Webster and James G. Blaine died from disappointment of their thwarted ambitions to attain the Presidency. They aimed probably not too high, but with all their statesmanship they lacked the knowledge of how to achieve their purpose.

And how many men have died from disappointed commercial ambition simply because they did not know how to succeed is beyond the count of any earthly record.

But the number of successful, life-enjoying business men is growing every day. In the past, men have pursued and acquired academic knowledge—this is the day when men seek and acquire business knowledge through avenues such as I offer you. Will you profit by my experience?

I, W. A. Shryer, was a grown man earning $15 a week when I learned an easier way to make $15,000 a year

I found that many honest people neglect to pay their bills—but that they will pay them if their obligations are presented in a dignified, business-like, human-nature way.

That way is so easy that I can make it clear and easy for you—for any man with ambition

Merchants have their hands so full with the problems of buying and selling merchandise that they have no time to look after delinquent accounts.

This Coupon the First Step—Take It Now

W. A. SHRYER, President,
American Collection Service, 399 State St., Detroit, Mich.

Please send me full information, illustrated with photos, about how you and other men have succeeded in the Commercial Agency Business, starting without capital.

Name.....

Address.....

.....

.....

.....

The men who, for various reasons, do not pay their bills, are just like any other class of men—a class of many types. And the knowledge of how to approach and handle each of these types is the specialized training that makes a successful, commercial agency manager.

You do not need capital to establish yourself in this business. You can begin in your spare time, just as I began.

The field is so full of business waiting to be handled that your earnings will supply you with all the capital you need for expansion. Every ambitious man who wants to establish himself in his own successful business should write to me at once. Mail the coupon.

W. A. SHRYER, President
American Collection Service, 399 State St., Detroit, Mich.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

$1 Secures this Great Reference Book

An entirely new, up-to-date, down-to-the-minute Reference Book, for bookkeepers, cashiers, accountants and business men.

This magnificent volume weighs nearly six pounds; contains over 500 pages, 200,000 words and 700 illustrations of forms and tables; beautifully printed on fine paper; handsomely and strongly bound; produced and presented to the business world at a cost which brings it within the reach of all; easiest for reference, plainest for acquiring information, and most economical when compared with all other publications of like nature.

It is yours on payment of only $1.00

down and the balance in monthly installments of 50 cents or $1.00 as you prefer.

Monthly installment price, $4.00 per copy; introductory special cash price (less 10 per cent) only $3.60.

In either case the expressage is prepaid to your address in the United States and Canada.

E. H. Beach, Publisher, Detroit, Mich.

Send 25 cents for 12 months subscription to

Beach's Magazine of Business

• A handsome monthly magazine for business men, bookkeepers, accountants, cashiers, credit men, stenographers, advertising managers, etc. The man "behind the desk" must have it. Splendid business stories. Your money back if you do not like it.

E. H. Beach, Publisher, 69 West Fort St., Detroit, Mich.

The International Business Correspondence Course

Special Instruction for Home Study in

Higher Accounting and Manufacturing Costs

For those who desire to qualify for Higher Positions and Higher Salaries as Chief Accountants, Cost Accountants, Auditors, etc.

The Course Comprises

The International Business Encyclopedia (described above); six lessons on Higher Accounting; six lessons on Factory Cost Accounting; twelve sets of Exercises to be worked out; twelve sets of Standard Answers, and the personal attention of the Board of Examiners.

THE COST

Special Terms Until October 1, 1910

This comprehensive, complete and fully effective Business Correspondence Course is offered at the temporary and very low introductory price of $10 cash, or $12 payable in easy installments of $2 down or $2 per month for five months. On and after October 1, 1910, the price will be $20 cash, or $24 on the installment plan.

E. H. BEACH, Publisher :: Detroit, Michigan

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

YOUR SUMMER HOME

SHORE ACRES SUBDIVISION, LAKE EARA

OF COURSE you want to own a summer home. There is something in you that calls for woods, meadows, cool waters, and broad, comfortable porches, when summer comes and brick walls and paving stones shimmer and quiver with the heat. You need rest and relaxation.

You may have to be in the city on business during the day. But you are refreshed and renewed by the evenings and the week-ends at your summer home.

And it makes you glad to know that wife and babies are away from the glare, the blare, and the dust, getting strong and rosy at your summer home.

No, this is not a millionaire's dream. That summer home is within your reach. And, if your business is in Chicago, it is only an hour's run from that city—you can come out every night. If further away, you can come Friday or Saturday and stay until Monday.

For your summer home, I have just opened a new sub-division on the shores of Lake Eara—the most beautiful of all the famous lakes of Northern Illinois. It is only thirty-five miles from Chicago—three railways run from it into the city.

There are a limited number of lots, all at reasonable prices—first come, first served. When you buy a lot, you buy fishing, swimming, and boating privileges on Lake Eara. There is no lake property so near Chicago at anything like the price.

My primary object in opening this sub-division is to finance the first building of Sheldon Commercial University.

I want these summer homes, as far as possible to be owned by Sheldon Graduates or those in sympathy with A R E A philosophy.

*Write me today, saying you are interested
and I will tell you all about it*

A. F. SHELDON
LIBERTYVILLE, ILLINOIS

SHELDON'S LAKE SHORE DRIVE, LAKE EARA

ORGANIZATION

Brief Synopsis
Part One

ADMINISTRATIVE and industrial organization; place of business engineer; plant arrangement; factory and office plans. Purchasing and stores department; catalog filing; requisitions; stores records. Advertising and sales organization; periodical, street car and outdoor advertising; mail order branch; salesmanship; follow-up systems. Credit organization; financial statements; credit information; collection letters; collection systems.

is the secret of successful business management; the executive of today gets results by combining organization and modern methods. The methods used by the managers of America's greatest enterprises are described in

Business Management

The principles of organization, and how to apply them in large or small concerns; the functions of all departments, and how to conduct them to secure results; how to make use of every modern plan and system, is told in these volumes. Every practical plan that will reduce costs, increase efficiency, and give a firmer grasp of business is described and illustrated by examples taken from actual practice.

Brief Synopsis
Part Two

BILLING and order recording; condensed and unit billing; blanket invoices; department store billing. Shipping department; rates and routes; filling orders; export shipping; claims; retail deliveries. Correspondence and filing; form paragraphs; stenographic division; filing systems; indexing. Business statistics; sales costs; expense distribution; administrative costs; mailing cost; mailing room methods and machinery; checking the postage account.

---

Price, Delivered to You, $2.00
Per Volume, $4.00 for the Set

---

Taylor Book Store, Rockefeller, Illinois

Speed Up Your Sales

You, Mr. Sales Manager!

Do you want to put something into the hands of each one of your salesmen that will speed up his sales to record pace?

You, Mr. Salesman!

Do you want to get hold of something that will put you in the running for the top-notch prizes?

Here is the thing.

Mr. Albert E. Lyons, vice president of the Allen-Higgins Wall Paper Company, Worcester, Massachusetts, issued a series of letters to his salesmen last season. They helped to speed up sales in a way that made everyone concerned open his eyes. These letters were along Sheldon lines. Mr. Sheldon has seen and approved them—given them his hearty endorsement.

But the great point is that they actually did speed up sales.

Most important to you is the fact that you can get those letters to speed up your sales. They are now issued by us under the title

Speed Talks

This book isn't big—contains just thirty letters—but a few words written on the back of an envelope once gave a man an idea that helped him to speed up his sales one hundred per cent.

*That's the kind of ideas you'll find in this book.
It's yours for a dollar, postpaid.*

Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Illinois

Stiffen Up Your Backbone!

The Backbone Monthly

"A Serum Against Softening of the Moral Spine"

It will help you develop more power, teach you how to control your forces and stiffen up your backbone. You will find its pages brimful of helpful, inspiring, scientific and man-building advice. Tom Dreier edits it! Typographically it's a gem! Men who usually criticise have only good things to say about it. One year, one dollar; one copy, ten cents—and it's worth more!

Special Offer! If you will send us one dollar and the coupon below, we'll send you The Backbone Monthly for one year, and as an appreciation we will mail you a copy of the "Backbone" booklet (a bouncer for the blues) without charge. Mail the coupon today!

-----SEND ME YOUR BACKBONE!-----

THE BACKBONE SOCIETY, Aurora, Illinois: Here's a dollar; send me The Backbone Monthly for one year and mail me a copy of the "Backbone" Booklet.

Name .....

Address .....

B.P.-11-10

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

A Business Asset

The ability to speak and write English correctly is a business asset of no means importance. Yet how rare it is! You, Mr. Salesman or Mr. Business Man need this ability and it can easily be acquired. There is a fascinating way to

Polish Up Your English

It is by reading "Correct English—How to Use It," a monthly magazine for cultured people, devoted to the use of correct English. It will pay you to get in touch with this unique magazine, as it is the only one of its kind. Read carefully this

Partial List of Contents—Shall and Will; Should and Would; How to Use Them; Correct English in the Home; Correct English in the School; What to Say and What Not to Say; Course in Grammar; Letter Writing and Punctuation; Business English for the Business Man; Compound Words; How to Write Them; Studies in English Literature.

The subscription price is only $1.00 a year, but if you prefer to see a copy before subscribing—

Send Only 10 Cents

for a copy of the current issue. You will never regret it. So if you are interested in your own welfare, do this now before you turn another page. But better still, use the Coupon TO-DAY.

Correct English Publishing Company ... 212 Monroe Street, Chicago, Illinois

CUT OFF HERE

CORRECT ENGLISH PUBLISHING COMPANY, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

Name.....

Local Address.....

Postoffice..... State.....

B. P.

A Rapid, Medium-Priced
Duplicating Machine
Simple, durable, rapid, clean, perfect work. Portable, inexpensive, practical, compact, noiseless.

THE VERY LATEST THING IN DUPLICATORS

"CANTYPE" SPRING-FRAME DUPLICATOR

1000 Perfect Reproductions per Hour of Hand-writing, Typewriting, Music or Drawing

Circulars can be taken direct from the duplicator, and laid one copy on top of another without off-setting or blurring. No other duplicator possesses this advantage. Circulars and samples of work on application. The only makers in America of all descriptions of ribbons, clean carbon papers, duplicators, stencil papers, inks, etc. Agents wanted in all unoccupied territory.

CHAS. E. ARCHIBALD, PRESIDENT

Pen-Carbon Manifold Co., New Brunswick, N. J.

Originators and only manufacturers of Non-flake carbon paper for typewriter, pen, pencil and stylus

Cheaper to Buy

Cheaper to Run

DIAMONDS WATCHES

Christmas Presents

ON CREDIT

Write for Catalog

Make Your Christmas Selections Now before the rush is on. Send for our handsome Christmas Catalog, filled with beautiful choice Novelties for Christmas presents. Select any article you would like to own or present to a loved one; it will be sent on approval to your home, place of business or express office, without any obligation whatever on your part. If satisfactory in every way, pay one-fifth down and keep it, balance in eight equal monthly amounts. If not satisfactory, return it. We pay all charges and take all risks. Every honest person's credit is good with us. Diamonds increase in value 15 to 20% each year. A Diamond is an ideal gift; it lasts forever, and every day reminds the wearer of your regard and good judgment. Our prices are 10 to 15% lower than those of the ordinary cash retail jeweler. Great bargains in ladies' and men's solid gold and gold-filled Watches for Christmas gifts. We give better values and easier terms than any house in America. Write for free copy of our new, handsomely illustrated booklet, "Historic Diamonds."

Specially Priced
Christmas
Bargains

No. 1221—Ladies' Loftis "Perfection" Ring. Fine brilliant white Diamond.....

$50

No. 102—Men's Round Belcher Ring. Fine brilliant white Diamond.....

$38

$10 Down, $5 a Month.

$7.60 Down, $3.80 a Month.

LOFTIS
BROS & CO. EST'D 1868

THE OLD RELIABLE ORIGINAL DIAMOND AND WATCH CREDIT HOUSE

Dept. M 811 92 to 98 STATE STREET, CHICAGO, ILL.
Branch Stores: Pittsburg, Pa.—St. Louis, Mo.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

YOU can't escape responsibility by ignoring the matter of educating your children. You don't want to. You think too much of them—besides you owe them an education. If you have one yourself you know why; if you haven't you know why a good deal better—we value most things we haven't got: health, education.

You can render no greater service to your children, yourself, or the world than to see to it that the world is made better by your having lived. You can't render a better service than by sending into the world educated men and women—your boys and girls.

We are teaching over nineteen, nearly twenty, thousand pupils: old men and women, men and women, young men and women and children; all by correspondence.

Over two hundred courses. You may want to brush up on some subject; mark it; we'll send full particulars, also bulletin of the most important educational movement of the day. But going back to your children: give us an idea of what they are most interested in; we'll suggest studies that under our masters will enable them to realize their ambition; our faculty is known all over the world. We pay tuition.

Catalogue free upon receipt of marked coupon. Now!

The Peoples University
P. O. Box 1539
University City, St. Louis, Mo.

THE PEOPLES UNIVERSITY,

P. O. Box 1539,

University City, St. Louis, Mo.

Please send me, without obligation on my part, full information about how I can take up the study of the Course I have marked below.

|                     |                    |
|---------------------|--------------------|
| Music               | Photography        |
| Art                 | Stenography        |
| Journalism          | Typewriting        |
| Short Story Writing | Bookkeeping        |
| Teacher's Courses   | Penmanship         |
| Kindergarten        | General Commercial |
| Domestic Science    | Agriculture        |
| Civil Service       | Horticulture       |
| Preparation         | Veterinary Science |
| Dressmaking         | Floriculture       |
| Elementary Subjects | Poultry Culture    |
| Auto Engineering    | Bee Keeping        |

Name .....

Street and No.....

City .....State.....

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

"Worth $1,000"

Prosperity Through Thought Force

BRUCE MACLELLAND

READ IT and see how new thought transforms life from drudgery and poverty to joy and opulence. The tale is a simple one, the methods are easily understood and followed.

ELLA WHEELER WILCOX devoted nearly a page in the New York American to "Prosperity Through Thought Force." "Every word is true," she said. "Every word has been proven true by hundreds of people living today."

Mrs. Frank Beach, of Fort Collins, Col., writes: "I have ordered MacLelland's 'Prosperity Through Thought Force' for my husband for Christmas. He says it has already been worth $1,000 to him. He has read it through three times and reads at least one paragraph from it each day."

PARTIAL SYNOPSIS

How the "Idea" was Born—From Debt to Modest Fortune in Less Than Three Years—The Kind of Men Who Succeed—Why the Others Fail—Where the Mental Forces Come In—The Condition of the Mind Attracts All Things—How Mind Attracts Success—The Law of Vibration and How It Works—Personality—Auto-Suggestion—How to Use It—How to Do Things Without Faith—When the Author Blacked Boots—Thirty Years Lost by Talking—The One Thing that Can Hinder You—Mind and Body—Passions—Aura—Subconscious Mind the Magnet—Will, Affection, Emotion, Divisions of Love—When Others Avoid or Mistreat You—To Make the Right Kind of Friends—Attraction, What It Does and How to Use It—Etc., Etc.

Here are two sample comments showing what readers think of this book:

"I have a copy of 'Prosperity Through Thought Force.' It is the best and most practical instruction on the subject that I have read—and I have read many."—OLIVER BOWERS, Birmingham, Alabama.

"I have just received and read 'Prosperity Through Thought Force,' by Bruce MacLelland, and I think so highly of it that I enclose $1.00 for another copy to lend. It is so plainly and naturally expressed that I believe it will help anyone who reads it to embrace and practice that higher life."—EMMA E. CARR, Lawrence, Massachusetts.

"Prosperity Through Thought Force" is a beautiful volume, 16 pages, printed on antique laid paper, artistic initial letters for chapter heads, handsome title page, half-tone of the author, all bound in finest silk cloth in a new shade of mauve.

ELLA WHEELER WILCOX will introduce you to new thought by her little booklet, "What I Know About New Thought." We will include this FREE in our special offer to Business Philosophers.

OUR SPECIAL OFFER (New Subscribers Only)

The Nautilus Magazine, Twelve Months in Advance

A Copy of "What I Know About New Thought"

A Copy of "Prosperity Through Thought Force"

$1

ALL FOR $1

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

I Want to Succeed!

I Want to Succeed!

I Want to Succeed!

The Cries are Everywhere. Here is a Solution That Has Solved it for Hundreds

BRUCE MACLELLAND really lived the philosophy of the book. He climbed from a $100 a month position to a business of his own, earning a modest fortune—all in three years' time. Then he decided to let others know how he used thought force in business and A THRILLING, powerful, practical success book is the result. No pet theories—no advice excepting as the entire book is sound reason of a man who has done and tells you how to do the same. After you read it, you will see how health, wealth and happiness can be made of troubles—and you will want your best friends to

THE NAUTILUS

Is the leading magazine of the new thought and mental healing movement. Thousands of its readers have been helped by it to health, prosperity, and happier condition of mind. The editorials by Elizabeth Towne are said to have the largest following of any woman's writings in America. The Nautilus is not a story book though it contains splendid stories—all designed to help you help yourself.

Ella Wheeler Wilcox, Edwin Markham, Florence Morse Kingsley, Emma Bell Miles, Edgar L. Larkin, Sinclair Lewis, Thomas Dreier, Wallace D. Wattles and many others are contributors.

"As a Grain of Mustard Seed," a great serial by Wallace D. Wattles is just beginning—a problem story of real life, unique in plot, wit and wisdom.

The November Nautilus is the special Dramatic Number. Contains articles by some of the most famous dramatists and actors in America, with many new portraits. George C. Tyler, managing director for Liebler & Co., tells why he produces new thought plays and how they affect the actors.

Among special new thought articles in same number are: "Habit of Faith and Courage," Adelaide Keen; "Teaching Without Friction," "Constructive Living," "Your Selection," by Fred G. Kaessman; and several practical editorials. New poems by Ella Wheeler Wilcox and others.

Get it at the news stand and see how new thought is regenerating every art and trade. Or better still, take advantage of this offer and begin new thought ways by doing it NOW!

ELIZABETH TOWNE, Holyoke, Mass., Dept. 91.

Enclosed is One Dollar. Please enter my subscription for The Nautilus for one year and send me as a premium a copy of "Prosperity Through Thought Force," and a copy of "What I Know About New Thought."

Name .....

Address .....

Town .....

$100 in Gold Given Away

A GENUINE bona fide offer. Read our proposition. Are you a smart speller? We give $100 in gold and other prizes named below to those able to make the largest list of words from the words The Rountree Publishing Company. You can make at least twenty, we believe, and if your list is the largest you will get the greatest prize. In case of a tie, prizes will be divided between highest contestants. Here are the rules to follow: Use only words in the English language. Words alike, but with different meanings can be used but once. Use any dictionary. Pronouns, nouns, verbs, adverbs, suffixes, adjectives, proper nouns, allowed. Anything that is a legitimate word will be allowed. This is the way: Heart, temple, rain, only. Use these words and arrange alphabetically. The following is a list of the prizes;

$25.00 for the largest list of words as above. $20.00 set of Encyclopedia, second largest list. $15.00 third largest list. $12.00 set of dishes, fourth largest list. $10.00 Mission Lamp, fifth largest list. $10.00 cash, sixth largest list. $5.00 cash, seventh largest list. $2.00 each to the next twenty-two highest. Subscriptions to the Dixie Home one year to the next hundred highest.

We want you to know The Dixie Home, which is one of the brightest and best illustrated magazines in the world, and it is for this reason that we offer these premiums. We make no extra charge for the privilege of entering this word-building contest. To enter the contest it is necessary for you to send us fifty cents or subscription to the Dixie Home for one year, with your list of words. List should be sent at once. The lucky names will be published later. This is a great offer to those who take an interest in such contests.

— Address —

“Contest Editor,” Dixie Home, Dept. 13, Birmingham, Alabama

WHEN IN DETROIT STOP AT HOTEL TULLER

New and Absolutely
Fireproof

Cor. Adams Ave.
and Park St.

In the center of the Theatre, Shopping
and Business
District.

Has large Convention Hall.

Has grand Roof
Garden Cafe.

Music from 6 P. M.
to 12:30 A. M.

Every Room has Private Bath

EUROPEAN PLAN

RATES: $1.50 PER DAY AND UP

L. W. TULLER - - - Proprietor

SAY—“I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER”

THE ALAMO

Colorado Springs' New Fire-Proof Hotel

*Strictly First-Class—American
and European Plan*

RATES:

American Plan—$2.50 to $4.00
per day and upwards.

European Plan—$1.00 per day
and upwards.

150 Rooms—Fifty Elegant Suites
with private baths.

Golf and other Outdoor Sports
accessible to guests.

Colorado Springs, Colorado

Ginger Talks

235 PAGES—15 FULL PAGE CARTOONS

Sales of Two Millions a Month

The Course in Salesmanship that Built Them for the National Cash Register Company

YOURS FOR TWO DOLLARS

THINK of a course in practical salesmanship, written straight out of the heart of the greatest selling organization in the world, by a Director of that organization; a course that does not merely describe the selling system of this colossal concern—but IS THAT ACTUAL SYSTEM ITSELF—the word for word Ginger Talks of that world famous company to its 1,000 salesmen—the verbatim coaching, the exact specific instruction, the very selling pointers and arguments and inspiration and enthusiasm that built up, through those 1,000 red-blooded salesmen, a business of over two million dollars a month in monthly sales.

The Pabst Co. bought it for its 1800 Salesmen.

The Quaker Oats Company invested $450 in it.

1682 other giant concerns have taken it for their entire sales forces, many taking from 100 to 1000 Each.

Ask us to send you a list six feet long of these concerns which employ nearly 50,000 salesmen

GINGER TALKS are a complete text-book of instruction and pointers on the art of selling goods. They simplify the whole of practical salesmanship; make clear with wonderful illustrations and exact explanations how to make approaches, how to secure attention, how to create desire, how to stimulate to immediate action and walk out with the order. They tell the salesman how to turn enmity into friendship, cold indifference into eager interest, casual inquiries into actual buyers, actual buyers into permanent customers. They touch on a thousand salesmen's difficulties and perplexities and show a way out of each one.

GINGER TALKS is the only business book ever written that is as brilliant and fascinating in style and has the same human interest as George Ade's "Fables in Slang," Billy Baxter's "Letters," or Mr. Dooley's famous conversations with his friend Hennessy. The sentences are crowded with epigrams, sharpened with penetrating wit, lighted up with humor, and made fairly alive with the tones of a masterful personality. It is this wonderful combination of solid instruction and brilliant expression—"beef-steak nutriment and champagne style" that has brought Ginger Talks their tremendous sales.

SEND YOUR GINGER

HELDON UNIVERSITY PRESS, Libertyville, Illinois.

I am enclosing Two Dollars. Send me a copy of Holman's "Ginger Talks."

Name.....

Address..... State.....

You can enclose $3.50 and receive a copy of Ginger Talks and The Business Philosopher for one year

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

A Desirable Christmas Gift

Depend on this convenient, useful, gentleman's memo book to keep your dates, figures, names, memos, etc., in better, neater style.

Bennett Everlasting Memorandum Book

—leather cover, 3-4 x 8 inches, pocket for cards removable pads—the most convenient. Price complete with your name stamped in gold on the cover and four inside pads, only . . . . . $1.00

Send no money Simply send us your name and we will forward the book with your name printed. If satisfied, send us our $1.00. If not, return the book. Send today.

W. W. BENNETT CO.
Box 146, East End Pittsburgh, Penn.

ONE DOLLAR BRINGS YOU

"The Rational Life"

By WILL J. ERWOOD

☛ The latest word on: Love—Marriage—Divorce; The Sex Question; Social Evils; The Rational Life; The Conquest of Self, etc. It is as fascinating as a romance. It is live thought on live issues.

It is written for you . EVERYMAN!
And for you . . . EVERYWOMAN!

☛ And you too, mother and father, it has ideals for you! Send for it! Read it together! It will help to make "Home, Sweet Home!"
☛ Finely bound, cloth and gold, about 200 pages; just from the press. Postpaid, only One Dollar.

Address: WILL J. ERWOOD
Dept. B. 717 East 22nd Street, Baltimore, Md.

It Pays to Buy Your Goods From a Reliable House

Read What our Customer says in Regard to Our Carbon Paper

"We have found the Carbon Paper which we have secured from you people to be the most satisfactory of any carbon that we have secured from any other firms, and we have bought Carbon from at least four other dealers since we got the last from you.

"We need some Carbon now and we enclose herewith check for $2.00 which we believe is the price we paid you for one hundred sheets heretofore. On an old box which we have in the office which we secured from you is printed; "100 Sheets Durable Typewriter Paper, $2.00 a Box."

How is That for a Boost?

Don't you want to try a box of this good grade carbon? If so, send $2.00 along to the

National Office Supply Company
ZION CITY, ILLINOIS

"The Square Deal House" who will promptly fill your order.

We carry two kinds; "Favorite," the high-grade, light weight carbon for manifolding, $3.00 a box. Also, our "Durable" carbon at $2.00 a box per hundred sheets.

Agents wanted to carry our up-to-date line of office supplies
ALL GOODS GUARANTEED. SEND FOR CATALOG

Embossed Business Stationery

Printed from Steel Dies
Send for Samples

Engraved Cards.

We engrave a one-line plate and furnish 100 engraved cards, postpaid. Engraved in script, $1.25; block, $1.50; solid Roman, old English or French script, $1.75; shaded old English or block, $2.00; shaded Roman or French script, $2.25. Cash to be sent with order. Best stock used. Monogram stationery. Wedding and business announcements.

The American Embossing Co.
192-69 SENECA STREET, BUFFALO, N. Y.

$3,000 to $10,000 Per Year For You

I can make you prosperous. If you want to earn more money—if you want to establish yourself in an independent business requiring no capital—send me your name and address on coupon below (or a postal will do) and I will mail you, free, our Big 62-Page Book, fully explaining just how you can fit yourself to earn big money in the

Real Estate, Brokerage and Insurance Business. Our thoroughly tested successful system not only equips you fully on every point of Real Estate, Brokerage and Insurance, we also give you, free, a valuable course in Commercial Law. Our Free Book is of great interest to anyone, but is of vital importance to Clerks, Book Keepers, Salesmen, Agents, Solicitors and others who are ambitious to be in a good paying business of their own.

International Realty Corp., 449 Manhattan Bldg., Chicago
Successors to The Cross Co. and H. W. Cross & Co.

This Book Shows You How to Succeed in Real Estate, Brokerage and Insurance

Send no money, but merely your name and address on a postal or on the Coupon below.

NAME _____
ADDRESS _____

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

PRACTICAL BUSINESS BOOKS!

Examine the List—Select Those That Will
Help You—Mail Your Order Today

Authorized American Edition of DICKSEE'S AUDITING

Revised and Enlarged
By Robert H. Montgomery, C. P. A.

The acknowledged authority in both England and America on all subjects connected with auditing. The present edition retains all the valuable matter of the first edition, revised and brought up to date, and in addition over 200 pages of entirely new matter. The subject treatment is (1) Auditing—Up to the Trial Balance; (2) Methods of Account; (3) Special Considerations in Different Classes of Audit; (4) Auditing—From Trial Balance to Balance Sheet; (5) Forms of Account and Balance Sheets; (6) What Are Profits? (7) The Attitude of the Auditor; (8) The Liabilities of Auditors; (9) Investigations; (10) Interest; (11) Professional Ethics; (12) C. P. A. Examination Questions. Contains 100 pages of model forms of Balance Sheets, Income and Profit and Loss Accounts, etc., etc. 6 x 9. 586 pages. 1909. Durable cloth, gold stamped. $5.00 delivered.

CORPORATE FINANCE and ACCOUNTING

By H. C. Bentley, C. P. A.

Every corporation treasurer and accountant should possess this book. It is a complete working manual covering the daily duties of these officials. In six parts, as follows: (1) The corporation treasurer, his legal status, the requirements of his office, his duties, powers and liabilities, his relation to corporate affairs in general, his bonding; (2) An extended exposition of the methods and forms for practical corporate accounting, describing the various forms of books and entries; (3) Corporate finances, including funds in general, bank deposits, checks and dividends; (4) Negotiable instruments, their nature and requisites, their general and special liabilities, their collection; (5) Corporate securities; (6) 44 model legal forms for signatures, checks, receipts, resolutions and certifications. 6 x 9. Buckram. 500 pp. $4.00 delivered.

A Manual of CORPORATE MANAGEMENT

By Thos. Conynghon of the N. Y. Bar

No corporation official can really afford to be without this book. It can be found immediately a clear, accurate, non-technical answer to any question concerning the legal side of corporate management. Tells the purposes, scope, and uses of the Charter and By-Laws; the rights, duties, powers and liabilities of Officers, Directors, and Stockholders under all circumstances; explains fully the issuance, sale, record and transfer of stock; tells how to conduct meetings; how to keep all books of record; and discusses such important matters as Committees, Dividends, Consolidations, Re-organization, etc. A safe guide in any state. Contains also over 200 model legal forms, covering practically every matter in corporation work requiring a form. Third Edition. 1909. 6 x 9. Buckram binding. $3.50 delivered.

CONDITIONAL SALES

By F. B. Haring of the Buffalo Bar

No concern which makes credit sales should be without this book. It states clearly the requirements for a valid contract of conditional sale in every state of the Union, whereby title to goods sold is retained in the vendor until payment has been made. This information is arranged under uniform headings giving Legal Status of Contracts, how to execute them, acknowledgement or proof required, recording or filing necessary, recording fee, renewals, discharge, Landlord's lien, criminal liability of vendee, action for money judgment, claim on fixtures, when vendor or vendee loses, etc. Approved forms of contracts, acknowledgements, etc. Used as a guide by hundreds of the largest concerns in the country. "Send us another copy," say Lyon & Healy, Chicago. 6 x 9. Buckram. 1909. $5.00 delivered.

A Manual of CORPORATE ORGANIZATION

By Thos. Conynghon of the N. Y. Bar

Explains clearly and in detail every step necessary for the organization and incorporation of a new company or the reorganization of an old one. Describes ends sought by incorporation: stock subscription lists and contracts; tells where to incorporate and the expense; detailed explanation of capitalization and the stock system and the status of stockholders; describes the nature and functions of the Charter and By-laws; tells how to conduct meetings; how to elect officers and directors, and defines their duties, powers and liabilities; full information for the protection of minority interests, protection of an inventor, underwriting, promoters, etc., etc. Accurate, authoritative, up-to-date, and entirely free from legal technicalities. Second Ed. 1908. 6 x 9. Buckram. $3.00 delivered.

FINANCING an ENTERPRISE

By Francis Cooper

A practical two-volume work telling how to secure capital and successfully promote a business enterprise of any kind. Vol. I describes conditions necessary for successful financing; tells how to investigate, protect, and capitalize an enterprise, discusses experimental work and model making. Vol. II tells best methods for securing money, privately, or publicly, by advertising; how to write a prospectus. Important chapters on stocks, bonds, incorporation, underwriting, etc. Written from 15 years' promoting experience. Only reliable work on the subject. Third edition. 1909. 543 pp. Buckram. Both vols. $4.00 delivered. Either vol. singly $2.00 delivered.

Complete Descriptive Circular of Any Book on Request

THE RONALD PRESS COMPANY

Publishers of Business Books, and of
THE BUSINESS WORLD, a magazine of Practical Business

Rooms 14-20
229 Broadway, New York

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Increase Your A•R•E•A

The following books are recommended by The Sheldon School for home reading and can be purchased from The Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Illinois.

|                                                                            |         |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------|
| Art of Writing and Speaking the English Language; 4 Vols.....              | $ 2.00 |
| As a Man Thinketh. Paper, 15 cents; cloth, 50 cents.....                   | 2.50    |
| A. B. Z. of Our Own Nutrition.....                                         | 1.00    |
| American Commonwealth .....                                                | 1.75    |
| Art of Living Long.....                                                    | 1.50    |
| Art of Living in Good Health.....                                          | 1.35    |
| Art of Science of Advertising.....                                         | 2.00    |
| Art of Thinking.....                                                       | 1.00    |
| Adam Bede .....                                                            | 1.00    |
| As a Matter of Course.....                                                 | 1.00    |
| Auto Suggestion .....                                                      | 1.00    |
| Backbone, Ribbon-tied, Art Binding, 50 cents; Limp Leather, [de luxe]..... | 1.00    |
| Boy Wanted .....                                                           | 1.25    |
| Back in Harness.....                                                       | .50     |
| Brain Power Manual.....                                                    | 2.00    |
| Brain and Personality.....                                                 | 1.30    |
| Browning's Poems .....                                                     | .60     |
| Bryant's Poems .....                                                       | .75     |
| Business Law .....                                                         | 1.00    |
| Business Power.....                                                        |         |
| Business Short Cuts.....                                                   | 1.00    |
| Caxton Brochures .....                                                     | .14     |
| A Certain Rich Man.....                                                    | 1.50    |
| Character .....                                                            | 1.00    |
| Character Reader Vaughns.....                                              | 1.00    |
| Character Reader Symes.....                                                | .50     |
| The Clerk's Book.....                                                      | .25     |
| Story of Creation.....                                                     | 1.25    |
| Primer of Logic.....                                                       | .50     |
| Common Sense of the Exact Sciences.....                                    | 1.50    |
| Corporate Management .....                                                 | 3.00    |
| Compendium of All Card Systems.....                                        | 3.00    |
| Corporate Organization .....                                               | 3.00    |
| Correspondence Course .....                                                | 15.00   |
| Cosmic Consciousness.....                                                  | 4.00    |
| Creative Imagination .....                                                 | 1.75    |
| Credit and its Uses.....                                                   | 1.50    |
| The Crisis.....                                                            | 1.50    |
| David Copperfield.....                                                     | 1.00    |
| David Harum .....                                                          | 1.50    |
| Darrow's Farmington.....                                                   | 1.50    |
| Dictionary of English Synonyms.....                                        | 2.00    |
| Deserted Village .....                                                     | .50     |
| Dictionary of Philosophy and Psychology.....                               | 16.00   |
| Dictionary of Philosophy.....                                              | 10.00   |
| Diseases of the Will.....                                                  | .75     |
| The Doors of Life.....                                                     | 1.00    |
| The Dore Lectures.....                                                     |         |
| Duty .....                                                                 | 1.00    |

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

PRACTICAL BUSINESS BOOKS!

Examine the List—Select Those That Will
Help You—Mail Your Order Today

Authorized American Edition of DICKSEE'S AUDITING

Revised and Enlarged
By Robert H. Montgomery, C. P. A.

The acknowledged authority in both England and America on all subjects connected with auditing. The present edition retains all the valuable matter of the first edition, revised and brought up to date, and in addition over 200 pages of entirely new matter. The subject treatment is (1) Auditing—Up to the Trial Balance; (2) Methods of Account; (3) Special Considerations in Different Classes of Audit; (4) Auditing—From Trial Balance to Balance Sheet; (5) Forms of Account and Balance Sheets; (6) What Are Profits? (7) The Attitude of the Auditor; (8) The Liabilities of Auditors; (9) Investigations; (10) Interest; (11) Professional Ethics; (12) C. P. A. Examination Questions. Contains 100 pages of model forms of Balance Sheets, Income and Profit and Loss Accounts, etc., etc. 6 x 9, 586 pages. 1909. Durable cloth, gold stamped. $5.00 delivered.

CORPORATE FINANCE and ACCOUNTING

By H. C. Bentley, C. P. A.

Every corporation treasurer and accountant should possess this book. It is a complete working manual covering the daily duties of these officials. In six parts, as follows: (1) The corporation treasurer, his legal status, the requirements of his office, his duties, powers and liabilities, his relation to corporate affairs in general, his bonding; (2) An extended exposition of the methods and forms for practical corporate accounting, describing the various forms of books and entries; (3) Corporate finances, including funds in general, bank deposits, checks and dividends; (4) Negotiable instruments, their nature and requisites, their general and special liabilities, their collection; (5) Corporate securities; (6) 44 model legal forms for signatures, checks, receipts, resolutions and certifications. 6 x 9. Buckram. 500 pp. $4.00 delivered.

A Manual of CORPORATE MANAGEMENT

By Thos. Conyngham of the N. Y. Bar

No corporation official can really afford to be without this book. It can be found immediately a clear, accurate, non-technical answer to any question concerning the legal side of corporate management. Tells the purposes, scope, and uses of the Charter and By-Laws; the rights, duties, powers and liabilities of Officers, Directors, and Stockholders under all circumstances; explains fully the issuance, sale, record and transfer of stock; tells how to conduct meetings; how to keep all books of record; and discusses such important matters as Committees, Dividends, Consolidations, Re-organization, etc. A safe guide in any state. Contains also over 200 model legal forms, covering practically every matter in corporation work requiring a form. Third Edition. 1909. 6 x 9. Buckram binding. $3.50 delivered.

CONDITIONAL SALES

By F. B. Haring of the Buffalo Bar

No concern which makes credit sales should be without this book. It states clearly the requirements for a valid contract of conditional sale in every state of the Union, whereby title to goods sold is retained in the vendor until payment has been made. This information is arranged under uniform headings giving Legal Status of Contracts, how to execute them, acknowledgement or proof required, recording or filing necessary, recording fee, renewals, discharge, Landlord's lien, criminal liability of vendee, action for money judgment, claim on fixtures, when vendor or vendee loses, etc. Approved forms of contracts, acknowledgements, etc. Used as a guide by hundreds of the largest concerns in the country. "Send us another copy," say Lyon & Healy, Chicago. 6 x 9. Buckram. 1909. $5.00 delivered.

A Manual of CORPORATE ORGANIZATION

By Thos. Conyngham of the N. Y. Bar

Explains clearly and in detail every step necessary for the organization and incorporation of a new company or the reorganization of an old one. Describes ends sought by incorporation: stock subscription lists and contracts; tells where to incorporate and the expense; detailed explanation of capitalization and the stock system and the status of stockholders; describes the nature and functions of the Charter and By-laws; tells how to conduct meetings; how to elect officers and directors, and defines their duties, powers and liabilities; full information for the protection of minority interests, protection of an inventor, underwriting, promoters, etc., etc. Accurate, authoritative, up-to-date, and entirely free from legal technicalities. Second Ed. 1908. 6 x 9. Buckram. $3.00 delivered.

FINANCING an ENTERPRISE

By Francis Cooper

A practical two-volume work telling how to secure capital and successfully promote a business enterprise of any kind. Vol. I describes conditions necessary for successful financing; tells how to investigate, protect, and capitalize an enterprise, discusses experimental work and model making. Vol. II tells best methods for securing money, privately, or publicly, by advertising; how to write a prospectus. Important chapters on stocks, bonds, incorporation, underwriting, etc. Written from 15 years' promoting experience. Only reliable work on the subject. Third edition. 1909. 543 pp. Buckram. Both vols. $4.00 delivered. Either vol. singly $2.00 delivered.

Complete Descriptive Circular of Any Book on Request

THE RONALD PRESS COMPANY

Publishers of Business Books, and of
THE BUSINESS WORLD, a magazine of Practical Business

Rooms 14-20
229 Broadway, New York

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Increase Your A+R+E+A

The following books are recommended by The Sheldon School for home reading and can be purchased from The Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Illinois.

|                                                                            |         |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------|
| Art of Writing and Speaking the English Language; 4 Vols.....              | $ 2.00 |
| As a Man Thinketh. Paper, 15 cents; cloth, 50 cents.....                   | 2.50    |
| A. B. Z. of Our Own Nutrition.....                                         | 1.00    |
| American Commonwealth .....                                                | 1.75    |
| Art of Living Long.....                                                    | 1.50    |
| Art of Living in Good Health.....                                          | 1.35    |
| Art of Science of Advertising.....                                         | 2.00    |
| Art of Thinking.....                                                       | 1.00    |
| Adam Bede .....                                                            | 1.00    |
| As a Matter of Course.....                                                 | 1.00    |
| Auto Suggestion .....                                                      | 1.00    |
| Backbone, Ribbon-tied, Art Binding, 50 cents; Limp Leather, [de luxe]..... | 1.00    |
| Boy Wanted .....                                                           | 1.25    |
| Back in Harness.....                                                       | .50     |
| Brain Power Manual.....                                                    | 2.00    |
| Brain and Personality.....                                                 | 1.30    |
| Browning's Poems .....                                                     | .60     |
| Bryant's Poems .....                                                       | .75     |
| Business Law .....                                                         | 1.00    |
| Business Power.....                                                        |         |
| Business Short Cuts.....                                                   | 1.00    |
| Caxton Brochures .....                                                     | .14     |
| A Certain Rich Man.....                                                    | 1.50    |
| Character .....                                                            | 1.00    |
| Character Reader Vaughns.....                                              | 1.00    |
| Character Reader Symes.....                                                | .50     |
| The Clerk's Book.....                                                      | .25     |
| Story of Creation.....                                                     | 1.25    |
| Primer of Logic.....                                                       | .50     |
| Common Sense of the Exact Sciences.....                                    | 1.50    |
| Corporate Management .....                                                 | 3.00    |
| Compendium of All Card Systems.....                                        | 3.00    |
| Corporate Organization .....                                               | 3.00    |
| Correspondence Course .....                                                | 15.00   |
| Cosmic Consciousness.....                                                  | 4.00    |
| Creative Imagination .....                                                 | 1.75    |
| Credit and its Uses.....                                                   | 1.50    |
| The Crisis.....                                                            | 1.50    |
| David Copperfield.....                                                     | 1.00    |
| David Harum .....                                                          | 1.50    |
| Darrow's Farmington.....                                                   | 1.50    |
| Dictionary of English Synonyms.....                                        | 2.00    |
| Deserted Village.....                                                      | .50     |
| Dictionary of Philosophy and Psychology.....                               | 16.00   |
| Dictionary of Philosophy.....                                              | 10.00   |
| Diseases of the Will.....                                                  | .75     |
| The Doors of Life.....                                                     | 1.00    |
| The Dore Lectures.....                                                     |         |
| Duty .....                                                                 | 1.00    |

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

|                                                                         |      |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------|------|
| Elementary Lessons in Electricity and Magnetism.....                    | 1.40 |
| Education of the Will.....                                              | 1.50 |
| Elegy in a Country Churchyard.....                                      | .75  |
| Empire of Business.....                                                 | 3.00 |
| Emerson's Poems.....                                                    | .60  |
| Essay on the Creative Imagination.....                                  | 1.75 |
| Essentials of Elocution.....                                            | 1.25 |
| Everyman Magazine.....                                                  | 1.00 |
| Everyman a King.....                                                    | 1.00 |
| Evolution of General Ideas.....                                         | 1.25 |
| Evolution of the Soul.....                                              | 1.50 |
| Fiction.....                                                            | 1.50 |
| Financial Advertising.....                                              | 5.00 |
| Financing an Enterprise.....                                            | 4.00 |
| First Lessons in Finance.....                                           | 1.25 |
| Food and Dietetics.....                                                 | 3.00 |
| Form Paragraph Letter Writer.....                                       | 3.00 |
| Franklin's Biography.....                                               | 1.50 |
| Freedom of Life.....                                                    | 1.00 |
| Funds and Their Uses.....                                               | 1.25 |
| Ginger Talks.....                                                       | 2.00 |
| Good English Form Book.....                                             | 1.00 |
| God's Good Man.....                                                     | 1.50 |
| Grant.....                                                              | .75  |
| Hamlet.....                                                             | .25  |
| Hand Book of Oratory.....                                               | 3.50 |
| Happiness as Found in Forethought.....                                  | 1.00 |
| Harmonics of Evolution.....                                             | 2.00 |
| He Can, Who Thinks He Can.....                                          | 1.00 |
| Help Essays.....                                                        | .40  |
| History and Power of Mind.....                                          | 2.00 |
| History of Sculpture.....                                               | 1.50 |
| History of Architecture.....                                            | 2.00 |
| History of Modern Banks.....                                            | 4.00 |
| History of Paintings.....                                               | 1.50 |
| History of United States.....                                           | 1.00 |
| Homer's Illiad.....                                                     | 1.00 |
| Homer's Odyssey.....                                                    | 1.00 |
| House of Seven Gables.....                                              | 1.00 |
| How to Advertise a Retail Store.....                                    | 3.50 |
| How to Become Quick at Figures.....                                     | 1.00 |
| How to Develop Power and Personality.....                               | 1.25 |
| How to do Business as Business is Done in Great Commercial Centers..... | 1.00 |
| How to do Business by Letter.....                                       | 1.00 |
| How to Get Strong.....                                                  | 1.00 |
| How to Grow Success.....                                                | .50  |
| How They Succeeded.....                                                 | 1.50 |
| Huckleberry Finn.....                                                   | 1.75 |
| Human Culture.....                                                      | 1.20 |
| Human Nature Explained.....                                             | 1.00 |
| Humanism.....                                                           | 2.75 |
| Influence of Mind.....                                                  | .75  |
| Inspired Millionaires.....                                              | 1.25 |
| An Introductory Logic.....                                              | 1.10 |
| In Tune With the Infinite.....                                          | 1.25 |
| Jiu Jitsu.....                                                          | 1.00 |
| John Martin's Clerks.....                                               | .25  |
| Julius Caesar.....                                                      | .20  |
| Lady of the Lake.....                                                   | 2.00 |
| Law of Mental Medicine.....                                             | 1.00 |
| Law of Psychic Phenomena.....                                           | 1.50 |
| Law of Suggestion.....                                                  | .75  |

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

|                                                                          |        |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------|
| The Leopard's Spots.....                                                 | .75    |
| Treasures of Truth, Art Boards, 75 cents; [de luxe].....                 | 1.00   |
| Les Miserables.....                                                      | 1.00   |
| Letters From a Baseball Fan to His Son, Art Binding.....                 | .50    |
| Letters of a Self Made Merchant to His Son.....                          |        |
| Abraham Lincoln .....                                                    | .75    |
| Lincoln and Other Poems.....                                             | 1.00   |
| Lippincott's Reader's Reference.....                                     | $9.00 |
| Longfellow's Poems.....                                                  | 1.00   |
| The Making of the Great West.....                                        | 1.50   |
| Making of a Man.....                                                     | 1.25   |
| Making of a Merchant.....                                                | 1.50   |
| Making the Man Who Can.....                                              | .50    |
| Man Limitless.....                                                       | 1.25   |
| Manufacturing Costs.....                                                 | 2.00   |
| Man With the Hoe and Other Poems.....                                    | 1.00   |
| Marble Faun.....                                                         | 1.50   |
| Measure of Man.....                                                      | 1.20   |
| Memory Culture.....                                                      | 1.00   |
| Merchant of Venice.....                                                  | .20    |
| Mind's Attainment.....                                                   | 2.00   |
| Mind Power and Privileges.....                                           | 1.50   |
| Mind Training and Concentration.....                                     | 2.00   |
| Modern Advertising.....                                                  | 1.62   |
| Modern Bank.....                                                         | 1.50   |
| Modern Corporation.....                                                  | 2.00   |
| My Lady Beautiful.....                                                   | 1.10   |
| Mental Addition Simplified.....                                          | .50    |
| My Little Book of Prayer.....                                            | .50    |
| New Glutton and Epicure.....                                             | 1.00   |
| New Man and the 20th Century Problem.....                                | .25    |
| New Menticulture.....                                                    | 1.00   |
| Next Step in Evolution.....                                              | .50    |
| Ol' Doc Lint and Other Poema, Art Cloth, $1.00; Leather, [de luxe]..... | 2.00   |
| Optimism .....                                                           | .75    |
| Organic Evolution.....                                                   | 2.00   |
| Othello .....                                                            | .56    |
| Other Wise Men.....                                                      | .80    |
| Outline of Cosmic Philosophy.....                                        | 8.00   |
| Our Invisible Supply.....                                                | 2.00   |
| Partnership Relations.....                                               | 2.00   |
| Perfect Health.....                                                      | 1.00   |
| Paths to Powers.....                                                     | 1.00   |
| Physiology of the Senses.....                                            | 1.50   |
| Plutarchs Lives.....                                                     | 1.50   |
| Politics for Young Americans.....                                        | .75    |
| Power of Success.....                                                    | 10.00  |
| Power Thru Repose.....                                                   | 1.00   |
| Power of Will.....                                                       | 3.18   |
| Practical Journalism.....                                                | 1.25   |
| Principles of the Mail Order Business.....                               | 1.00   |
| The Promoters.....                                                       | .75    |
| Psychological Principals of Education.....                               | 1.75   |
| Prosperity Thru Thot Force.....                                          | 1.00   |
| Psychology of Attention.....                                             | .75    |
| Psychology of Advertising.....                                           | 2.00   |
| Psychic Treatment.....                                                   | 3.00   |
| Psychology .....                                                         | 1.60   |

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

|                                            |      |
|--------------------------------------------|------|
| Psychology of the Emotions.....            | 1.50 |
| Psychological Principals of Education..... | 1.75 |
| Psychology of Public Speaking.....         | 1.25 |
| Psychology of Suggestion.....              | 1.75 |
| Pushing Your Business.....                 | 1.00 |
| Riley's Poems .....                        |      |
| Romeo and Juliet.....                      | .56  |
| Rules of Order.....                        | .75  |
| Right and Wrong Thinking.....              | 1.50 |
| Ropp's Commercial Calculator .....         | 1.00 |
| Sales Plans .....                          | 2.50 |
| Sales Promotion.....                       | 1.00 |
| Scarlet Letter .....                       | 1.00 |
| Science of Organization .....              | 3.00 |
| Six Hundred Talking Points; 2 Vols.....    | 4.00 |
| Scientific Living.....                     |      |
| Scott's Poems .....                        | 1.75 |
| Self Culture.....                          | 1.00 |
| Self Help.....                             | 1.00 |
| Soul of Man .....                          | 1.50 |
| The Steam Engine.....                      | 3.75 |
| The Story of Creation.....                 | 1.25 |
| The Story of Electricity.....              | .35  |
| Story of a Grain of Wheat.....             | 1.00 |
| Story of The Mind.....                     | .35  |
| Story of a Piece of Coal.....              | .35  |
| Success in Letter Writing.....             | 1.00 |
| 100,000 Synonyms and Antonyms.....         | 1.00 |
| Talks by the Old Storekeeper.....          | .50  |
| Talks on Writing English.....              | 1.50 |
| Talks on Writing English.....              | 1.30 |
| The Great Work.....                        | 2.00 |
| Great Psychological Crime.....             | 2.00 |
| The Tempest.....                           | .56  |
| Thot Force.....                            | 1.00 |
| Thought Vibration .....                    | 1.00 |
| Thoughts on Business.....                  | 1.25 |
| Thusnelda .....                            | .75  |
| Tennyson's Poems.....                      | .60  |
| That Last Waif.....                        | 1.00 |
| Theory of Advertising .....                | 2.00 |
| The Theory of Business Enterprise.....     | 1.50 |
| Transaction of Business.....               | 1.00 |
| 20th Century Dictionary.....               |      |
| Uncooked Foods.....                        | 1.00 |
| Unwritten Meanings of Words.....           | 2.00 |
| Washington, George .....                   | .75  |
| Whittier Poems .....                       | 1.50 |
| Works and Days.....                        | 1.25 |
| Wood Study .....                           | .50  |
| Words, Their Use and Abuse.....            | 2.00 |
| Wordsworth's Poems .....                   | 1.75 |
| Worth While Series.....                    | .35  |
| The Young Man's Affairs.....               | 1.00 |
| The Young Man and the World.....           | 1.62 |

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

If These Men Know it, Don't ? You Want to Know it Too ..... ?

PROF. FLOURNOY, of the University of Geneva, Switzerland, says of it: "We have nothing so well done in French."

PROF. RICHET, of Paris, France—"I have read it with the keenest interest."

PROF. MAX DESOIR, of Berlin, Germany—"I was especially pleased with its sound, original ideas."

PROF. SCHILLER, of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, England—"I was particularly pleased with this book."

DR. VAN EEDEN, Amsterdam, Holland—"The sort of a book I considered absolutely necessary for the enlightenment of the public on this important subject."

PROF. BARRETT, of the Royal College of Sciences for Ireland—"I trust this work will really have the wide circulation it deserves."

SIR WILLIAM CROOKES, F. R. S., of London—"This book should be read with the utmost interest and care."

DR. I. K. FUNK, of Funk and Wagnalls, New York—"A strong book on a most vital subject."

MORTON C. PRINCE, M. D., of Boston—"I am sure it is destined to do a great deal of good."

HON. LYMAN J. GAGE, banker, ex-secretary of the U. S. treasury—"It has made good its purpose, which cannot be said of all books."

PROF. EIMER GATES, of Washington, D. C.—"It is the best simple statement of the subject extant."

REV. SAMUEL FALLOWS, D. D., LL. D., Presiding Bishop Episcopal Church, Chicago—"Practical, reliable, and has rendered a great service to the world."

REV. NEWELL DWIGHT HILLIS, D. D., Brooklyn, N. Y.—"Fills a real want. All persons will find it most suggestive and helpful."

REV. H. W. THOMAS, D. D., Ph. D., Chicago—"It reaches the heights of a singular power over its readers. There is certainly coming, and very near, a new birth of life."

ELBERT HUBBARD, East Aurora, N. Y.—"It shows a sure insight into the heart of things that is bound to make the world better."

What Are They Talking About?

About a New Book by Dr. Stanley
LeFevre Krebs entitled

"The Law of Suggestion"

If you wish we can get a copy for you, cloth-bound, post-paid,
for 75 cents. (Stamps, check or money-order.)

Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Illinois

WHEN a man rises to universal consciousness, he sees that, being a part of one great whole, he cannot injure others without injuring himself, and,
indeed, that he cannot injure himself without injuring others.—Sheldon

NOV 18 1910

DECEMBER, 1910

Gen. Lib.

PRICE 20 CENTS

The BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

ARTHUR·FREDERICK·SHELDON
EDITOR

SHELDON·UNIVERSITY·PRESS
LIBERTYVILLE·ILLINOIS

33 $\frac{1}{3}$ Per Cent Discount

IN ORDER to move an enormous quantity of the paper bound books of James Allen's writings we are offering the above discounts on all orders for ten or more copies. This discount will hold good only on orders received by us before December 10, 1910. Rush orders to us at once. We will make shipment on any date specified by you.

The Four Great Books of Power

Make most excellent Christmas Gifts and we will forward them to different addresses if you wish.

As a Man Thinketh

BY JAMES ALLEN

Sold by some to be one of the most powerful books on Self-Building and Thought-Mastery ever published. Note the contents: Thought and Character. Effect of Thought on Circumstances. Effect of Thought on Health and the Body. Thought and Purpose. The Thought Factor and Achievement. Visions and Ideals. Serenity.

We say it reverently, this little book is worthy of Emerson. It is a prose poem, yet it is for the constant, every-day use of men and women who toil with head and hands, and love with hearts, in the midst of stress and burden-bearing. Here the author makes beautifully clear the power of thought, and throws a light on the way to its right application. Of it he says, in his foreword: "This little volume (the result of meditation and experience) . . . is suggestive rather than explanatory, its object being to stimulate men and women to the discovery that

"They themselves are makers of themselves by virtue of the thoughts which they choose and encourage."

A noble and Godlike character is not a thing of favor or chance, but is the natural result of continued effort in right thinking."

—James Allen.

Morning and Evening Thoughts

BY JAMES ALLEN

Being some of the choice meditations of James Allen, lovingly gathered from his writings and compiled by Lilly L. Allen and others.

Of these thoughts, the compiler says:

"Knowing, as I do, the writer as no one else knows him; seeing him as I have, for many years under all circumstances—in hours of work and leisure, in the days of joy and sorrow, in the sunshine and in the cloud—I know that these writings are not the words of an idle brain, nor are they gathered from other writings, nor picked up here and there, but they are the deep experiences of his heart, and were first lived and then written."

There are several choice selections, both prose and poetry, for each day of the month. A book to be carried next the heart. A book that wins the heart. This book should be a companion to every one wishing to develop his earning powers.

"The Universe is gift with goodness and strength, and it protects the good and strong." James Allen.

Out From the Heart A Sequel to As a Man Thinketh

BY JAMES ALLEN

"Make pure thy heart, and thou wilt make thy life Rich, sweet, and beautiful, unmarred by strife; Guard well thy mind, and, noble, strong, and free Nothing shall harm, disturb, or conquer thee; For all thy foes are in thy heart and mind, There also thy salvation thou wilt find."

Thus writes the author on the title page of this simple and heart-searching little book. These words breathe the optimistic tone of the pages that follow. And through the truths presented, thousands have received the inspiration to the first steps in enlightenment and freedom. The author has not only given the inspiration, but shown the way. The directions on the formation of habit are invaluable.

You may search, but you will not find better books to give your children, your pupils, your business associates, and those who, in subordinate positions, are co-operating with you to make your business a success, than "As a Man Thinketh," and its sequel, "Out From the Heart."

Through the Gate of Good or, Christ and Conduct

BY JAMES ALLEN

"This book is an interpretation of the mission and teaching of Jesus in the light of self-perfection by noble moral conduct, based upon the truth that spiritual enlightenment and the practice of virtue are identical. An illuminating commentary on present-day trends of thought, vital and valuable. In it Mr. Allen deals with The Gate and the Way, The Law and the Prophets, The Yoke and the Burden, The Word and the Door, The Vine and the Branches, and Salvation this Day—here and now. A companionable book.

"The essential difference between a wise man and a fool is that the wise man controls his thinking, the fool is controlled by it."—James Allen.

"That Jesus subordinated his own will to the will of the Father, it is inspiring to know, but it is not sufficient; it is necessary that you, too, should likewise subordinate your will to that of the over-ruling Good. The grace and beauty and goodness that were in Jesus can be of no value to you unless they are also in you, and they can never be in you unless you practice them, for, apart from doing, the qualities which constitute Goodness do not, so far as you are concerned, exist."—James Allen, in "Through the Gate of Good."

Regular Price Fifteen Cents per Copy

Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Illinois

ARTHUR F. SHELDON
EDITOR-IN-CHIEF

CONTENTS

ARTHUR W. NEWCOMB
MANAGING EDITOR

SHELDON'S BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER AND SALESMANSHIP

DECEMBER, 1910

|                                                                 |                     |
|-----------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------|
| EARA .....                                                      | Frontispiece |
| EDITORIAL .....                                                 | 699                 |
| By A. F. Sheldon                                         |                     |
| SHE NEVER CAME BACK—WOULD YOU?—SOME TRUE STORIES .....          | 705                 |
| By Russel Wilmot                                         |                     |
| RUMINATIONS .....                                               | 708                 |
| By Stephen B. French                                     |                     |
| THE LAW OF COLOR APPLIED TO HUMAN CHARACTER.....                | 709                 |
| By Dr. Katherine M. H. Blackford                         |                     |
| DO IT NOW—CLEAR UP YOUR "UNFINISHED BUSINESS" TODAY .....       | 715                 |
| By George W. Wilke                                       |                     |
| THE QUESTIONS OF SOCRATIC.....                                  | 717                 |
| By Arthur W. Newcomb                                     |                     |
| WHAT ONE SALESMAN THINKS OF THE MAIL ORDER BUSINESS .....       | 722                 |
| By O. J. Vogt                                            |                     |
| PATRICK DELANY—THE MAN WHO GAVE US THE ELECTRIC MAIL .....      | 723                 |
| By James E. Clark                                        |                     |
| DOING THE WORK THAT YOU LIKE—HOW TO PREPARE FOR IT .....        | 727                 |
| By Leonard W. Smith                                      |                     |
| FOOLS AND THEIR MONEY—A FINANCIAL JOKE ON THE INVESTORS .....   | 729                 |
| By Thomas Dreier                                         |                     |
| ENERGY—THE DOMINANT KEYNOTE IN LIFE'S SUCCESS SYMPHONY .....    | 735                 |
| By Bertha A. Loeb                                        |                     |
| SOME RANDOM COMMENTS ON SALESMANSHIP AND ADVERTISING .....      | 737                 |
| By George H. Eberhard                                    |                     |
| MAN'S BULWARKS—COURAGE, PERSISTENCY AND DETERMINATION .....     | 740                 |
| By T. B. Hutton                                          |                     |
| SOME PERTINENT REMARKS TO THE SEEKERS FOR SUCCESS IN LIFE ..... | 743                 |
| By W. H. Tennyson                                        |                     |
| OUR BUSINESS BOYS AND WHAT WE DO WRONGLY TO THEM.. ..           | 747                 |
| By Joel Blanc                                            |                     |
| WHO IS TO BLAME FOR THE CRIMES OF ALIENS IN AMERICA?....        | 749                 |
| By Griffith J. Griffith                                  |                     |
| LEAVES FROM MY ORDER BOOK.....                                  | 751                 |
| By Morton Mayne                                          |                     |
| VALUE OF AN IDEA—MANY ARE WASTED—HOW ABOUT YOURS? .....         | 754                 |
| By Milton Bejach                                         |                     |
| OLD ORDER CHANGETH—IMPROVETH—IN THE BUSINESS WORLD .....        | 755                 |
| By W. H. Tennyson                                        |                     |
| THE PHILOSOPHER AMONG HIS BOOKS.....                            | 757                 |

Two dollars a year will bring the magazine to anyone in the United States or its possessions, $2.25 in Canada, and $2.50 in foreign countries. Requests for "change of address" must reach this office before the tenth of the month in order to insure the proper mailing of the current issue of the magazine. In sending in the new address please give your previous location.

Published by the Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Illinois

Entered as Second-Class Matter, December 15, 1908, at the Post Office at Libertyville, Illinois, under Act of March 3, 1879. Copyrighted by Sheldon University Press.

Learn to Size Up Men

DR. KATHERINE M. H. BLACKFORD

research and experiments, and then to formulate the whole into a sane, logical, simple, and practical science. After painstaking application, checking and rechecking, covering many years and travel to all parts of the country, she found that the new science always works out—that it is reliable. She has taught it to thousands of the keenest business men of many cities, particularly New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, Seattle, St. Paul, and San Francisco. They are using it in their business today with consistent success.

Through all these years, Dr. Blackford committed very little of her science to writing, her work being done entirely by lectures and private instruction. Within the last year, she has written two lessons on the science in the Course in the Science of Business Building, taught by The Sheldon School. With the exception of these, scarcely a word from her pen has appeared in print. Thousands all over the country have called for something authoritative from her, but she has not been ready. NOW, AT LAST, has succeeded in making arrangements with her for a series on the subject, to run for an entire year, beginning in the issue for NOVEMBER, 1910.

THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

In this series, Dr. Blackford will tell about the birth of the new science, and of the laws and principles upon which Human Nature Study is founded.

Dr. Blackford is the Discoverer of

- The Law of Color,
- The Law of Form,
- The Law of Proportion, *
- The Law of Temperamental Combinations,
- The Law of Texture,
- The Law of Climatic Adaptability,
- The Law of Change of Temperament,
- The Law of Human Chemicals,
- The Application of Scientific Character Analysis to Education,
- The Application of Scientific Character Analysis to the Choice of a Career,
- The Application of Scientific Character Analysis to Salesmanship and Business.

These conclusions are based upon recorded data of twelve thousand subjects personally examined by Dr. Blackford, supplemented by observation of more than thirty thousand.

You can easily see that this is a most important series of articles for business and professional men—for men in every walk of life—the greatest that has been offered to the public for years. The formulation of the science of Character Analysis is the most important event in the business world since the formulation of the science of Salesmanship.

Remember, the series began in the November number. Get your subscription in early. Be sure to get the whole series. Two dollars a year; twenty cents a copy.

The Business Philosopher, Libertyville, Illinois

SHELDON says that your success in life is in proportion to your obedience to four injunctions:

- Know yourself;
- Know your fellow men;
- Know your business;
- Apply your knowledge.

How to know yourself and how to know others are the two big problems. Take one hundred of the greatest successes you know—they are men who solved these two problems. They had to learn by hard knocks and expensive experience.

But today, Science has come to your rescue. It makes human character—your character and that of the other fellow—an open book.

Learn the Science of Character Analysis—then you can read yourself and others as easily as you now read the signs on the store fronts. The color, the form, the proportions, the features, the shape of the head, the texture of the hair and skin, the handshake, the posture, the voice, the walk of any man are the letters that spell to you, when a trained observer, the secrets of his character. The whole sentence is read at a glance.

Phrenology, physiognomy, anthropology, biology, physiology, ethnology, psychology, and the study of temperaments have been steps on the way. But by themselves they are a jargon, so far as any clear voice as to character reading is concerned—at best only the bases for more or less accurate guesses. It remained for

Dr. Katherine M. H. Blackford

to take these separate sciences, discover their general laws and their relations to one another, to add to them the record of her own extended

Dr. Blackford Teaches How You Can

- Know your own powers and weaknesses,
- Develop the one and overcome the other,
- Read others at a glance,
- Approach the different types,
- Close with the different types,
- Adapt Education to needs,
- Know the trustworthy and the untrustworthy,
- Choose the right man for the right place,
- Choose the right partners and associates,
- Combine the different men in your organization.

30 Editions Since Publication

It is Only Once in a Decade, not Oftener, that a Really Great Book is Written—this is One

We want you to read Jules Payot's "EDUCATION OF THE WILL," because it is a great book. No matter what your present position in life may be, this book will help you to greater achievement—greater success.

Q If after reading "The Education of the Will" you tell us that you have not been benefited, have not been inspired to higher, nobler thoughts, have not been clearly directed to a better standard of life, send the book back to us and we will refund the purchase price paid by you.

The author, one of the foremost educators of France, proves that character is not wholly a matter of birth or heredity, but that through the education of the will, character can be formed and developed to the highest degree.

All that is necessary is that one possesses the desire for mental superiority.

No matter how richly endowed you may be mentally you can only go as far as your will will carry you.

If you follow the suggestions in this book you can secure mastery of your will, and that means not only spiritual but worldly supremacy, because your will is the force that drives and directs your faculties; the higher its development, the more profitably you may capitalize your talents.

While the author's thesis is based upon the soundest laws of psychology, the book is written in plain, frank language, unclouded by abstruse scientific terms, and it is easily understood by the ordinary reader.

Every father and mother should insist that their children, from seventeen years of age upward, read this book not only once but several times.

CAUTION—Be sure that it is Payot's book that you buy as there is another book with the same title, but which has no relation to this.

THE EDUCATION OF THE WILL, by Jules Payot, Litt, D, Ph. D., translated from the French by Smith Ely Jelliffe, M. D., Professor Clinical Psychiatry, Fordham University, New York, 12mo, cloth, 450 pages, $1.50; post-paid, $1.60.

Sheldon University Press, Area P. O., Rockefeller, Ill.

Seventeen Cents a Day Buys an Oliver Typewriter

This amazing offer—the New Model Oliver Typewriter No. 5 at 17 cents a day—is open to everybody, everywhere.

It's our new and immensely popular plan of selling Oliver Typewriters, on little easy payments. The abandonment of longhand in favor of clean, legible, beautiful typewriting is the next great step in human progress.

Already—in all lines of business and in all professions—the use of pen-and-ink is largely restricted to the writing of signatures.

Business Colleges and High Schools, watchful of the trend of public sentiment, are training a vast army of young people in the use of Oliver Typewriters.

The prompt and generous response of the Oliver Typewriter Company to the world-wide demand for universal typewriting, gives tremendous impetus to the movement.

The Oliver, with the largest sale of any typewriter in existence, was the logical machine to take the initiative in bringing about the universal use of typewriters. It always leads.

Save Your Pennies & Own an Oliver

This "17-Cents-a-Day" selling plan makes the Oliver as easy to own as to rent. It places the machine within easy reach of every home—every individual. A man's "cigar money"—a woman's "pin-money"—will buy it.

Clerks on small salaries can now afford to own Olivers. By utilizing spare moments for practice they may fit themselves for more important positions.

School boys and school girls can buy Olivers by saving their pennies.

You can buy an Oliver on this plan at the regular catalog price—$100. A small first payment brings the machine. Then you save 17 cents a day and pay monthly.

And the possession of an Oliver Typewriter enables you to earn money to finish paying for the machine.

Mechanical Advantages

The Oliver is the most highly perfected typewriter on the market—hence its 100 per cent efficiency.

Among its scores of conveniences are:

- the Balance Shift
- the Ruling Device
- the Double Release
- the Locomotive Base
- the Automatic Spacer
- the Automatic Tabulator
- the Disappearing Indicator
- the Adjustable Paper Fingers
- the Scientific Condensed Keyboard

Service Possibilities

The Oliver Typewriter turns out more work—of better quality and greater variety—than any other writing machine. Simplicity, strength, ease of operation and visibility are the corner stones of its towering supremacy in

- Correspondence
- Card Index Work
- Tabulated Reports
- Follow-up Systems
- Manifolding Service
- Addressing Envelopes
- Working on Ruled Forms
- Cutting Mimeograph Stencils

Can You Spend 17 Cents a Day to Better Advantage than in the Purchase of this Wonderful Machine

Write for Special Easy Payment Proposition or See the Nearest Oliver Agent

The Oliver Typewriter Co., The Oliver Typewriter Building Chicago, Illinois

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Ring the Bell Every Time

WHAT is it worth to you to be able to ring the bell every time you strike for a customer's order? What is it worth to you to be able, when he puts forth an objection, to knock that objection sky high with the irresistible force of a selling argument that has been tried and proven by the best salesmen of the best concerns in the world—concerns whose names are household words by reason of the enormous sales these very selling arguments have brought them?

What is it Worth to You:

—To know in advance the objections your prospect will make and the best answer to each that has ever yet been discovered.

—To have a number of answers (in some cases as many as twenty to thirty) to each objection—all irresistible—600 irresistible selling arguments?

—To know that every one of these arguments has been evolved by years of hard experience—improved and made stronger by constant successful use?

—To know that many of these arguments cost thousands of dollars in experience before they were discovered and perfected—and that many of them have sold millions of dollars worth of goods?

Every Page Coinable Into Money

A chemical formula written on the back of an envelope may be worth a fortune; a few figures giving the combination to a safe may unlock a door with millions behind it. Every page of this book contains a selling formula that you can coin into ready money. Every one of these 600 irresistible arguments opens a door that will lead you to more sales and more commissions. You could well pay, if you had to, a green-back for every page of this book; but the cost to you is slight.

Sign This Coupon —Can you afford to pay one-half cent for an argument that has sold thousands of dollars worth of goods—an argument whose discovery cost hundreds or even thousands of dollars in time and experience and actual money of star salesmen and great concerns.

—An argument that will surely close sales for you—that may clear you a hundred dollars in commissions the first day you use it, and hundreds or even thousands of dollars as you use it over and over again, throughout the entire year and for years to come.

Can you afford to pay one-half cent for what is worth anywhere from $10.00 to $1,000.00 in actual money-making power to you?

Then Sign This Coupon and Mail Today

THE SHELDON UNIVERSITY PRESS, Libertyville, Illinois

Enclosed please find $4.00 for your Two Big Volumes of Six Hundred Talking Points and Selling Arguments.

Name.....

Address, etc.....

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Twenty Reasons Why You Should be Planning to Attend the Sheldon Summer School

First—You will need a vacation next summer. Every man finds it to his advantage to get away from business cares for a little while at least once a year and relax, recreate, let the cool winds blow the cobwebs out of his brain, and the healing touch of Mother Nature soothe the weariness and ache out of his body.

Second—There is no more beautiful place to spend a vacation than on the shores of Lake Eara, amidst the woods and ravines of Sheldonhurst estate. Here is quiet, if you want it, shade, coolness, beauty, and plenty of opportunity for all kinds of outdoor life and exercise.

Third—You need to have a good time on your vacation—the kind of time that will make you laugh, loosen up your diaphragm, rub the worry-wrinkles all out of your forehead, and let down all nervous tension, chase all anxious or gloomy thoughts out of your system, and make you a big, rollicking, care-free, irresponsible boy again for awhile. Then the effect will stick, too, and you will feel younger all the rest of the year. And you can have just that kind of a time at Sheldonhurst. They do every year, because the time is right, the place is right, and the people that gather are just that kind of congenial, lively, clean, good fellows and their wives, daughters, and sisters.

Fourth—You need to get into touch with new ideas and new ideals. You must either grow or decay. And the only way to grow is by nourishment and use. At the Sheldon Summer School, you will be in touch with more energetic, thoughtful, and progressive business builders than you will find together in any one place. And you will find them at a time when they have the time and the inclination to swap ideas with you—to give you the benefit of their experience, observation, and study. Add to that the inspiration of mixing with that kind of men and women—the very atmosphere of success—and you have an ideal vacation.

Fifth—You will be greatly profited by the lectures and classes in the science of business. Business is a profession, the practice of a science. And you, as a business man, want to know as much as possible about that science, and about the very latest developments of it. The business world acknowledges Sheldon as its leading scientist today.

Sixth—You will receive at the Sheldon Summer School personal instruction in the greatest of all arts—the art of developing your own power of personality—your ability, your reliability, your endurance, and your action.

Seventh—You will profit at every turn of your life from what you will learn about the Science of Character Analysis—the science that enables you to size up instantly your fellow man, tells you how to handle them to their advantage and yours, and tells you also how to know yourself.

Eighth—You will take with you from Sheldonhurst the big advantage of personal instruction in salesmanship, advertising, buying, finance, and other departments of business technique, each given you by men who have proved their powers in these things.

Ninth—You will get instruction, entertainment, inspiration, and power from the special lectures by men and women of national reputation. The program for 1911 will be better than that for previous years.

Tenth—You will get enjoyment and development out of your participation in the music, the singing, the open-air theatricals, the evening camp-fires, and the games and sports.

Eleventh—You will build up reserve power by the splendid appetite that you will bring to the good table prepared for you in the big dining tent three times a day.

Twelfth—You will get good, clean fun and plenty of rich, red blood and springy muscle from rowing, canoeing, sailing, swimming, and horseback riding.

Thirteenth—You will have your artistic nature nourished and developed by your visits to Ravinia Park, with its great orchestra concerts.

Fourteenth—You will have an opportunity to study modern business methods as they are employed in the greatest commercial city on earth, Chicago, only thirty-five miles away.

Fifteenth—You can be sure that you will get all these things because the Summer School has already held two most successful sessions—one during the summer of 1909, and the other last summer—1910. Many of those who attended the first also were at the second. The attendance at the second was more than twice as large as that at the first. And everyone went away saying that he had had the greatest time of his life and would surely be here again next summer.

Sixteenth—All this, including board, instruction, tent-room, boats, dances, and entertainment is yours for a very small sum. Write to us and we will give you all the particulars. The vacation at Sheldonhurst is an economical one.

Seventeenth—You can take home to your friends, business acquaintances, and employes the lessons you learn at the Sheldon Summer School, thus spreading the knowledge of man building and business building. It will benefit others—and you.

Eighteenth—With more knowledge, more strongly and positively developed qualities, a stronger physique and a clearer brain, a fresh grip on affairs, many new ideas, a full charge of inspiration and enthusiasm, and renewed courage, what great business you will do in the months following the Summer School!

Nineteenth—Doing more and better business, making better and bigger profits, getting more pleasure out of your business, life will be a happier event for you.

Twentieth—Having been once to the Sheldon Summer School, you will find that you want to go again and yet again—that you have formed a life habit—and you will want to get as many as possible of your friends to come with you.

In many cities, parties are already making plans to attend the Sheldon Summer School for 1911, which will open Monday, July 3, and close July 15.

Are You in on the Party Forming in Your City?

The Sheldon Summer School

LIBERTYVILLE, ILLINOIS

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Eara

Dull and unlovely lay the woodland side,
Slow, sluggish streams crept through the quiet place,
The fair trees had no mirror for their pride,
And sighing shook their rustling draperies.

The thoughtful master heard the landscape's sigh.
That it gain meaning, beauty, have its will,
He ordered that the slow streams wand'ring by
Be gathered to the hollow 'neath the hill.

Ordered—so done. A central charm at last.
The scene gains vigor, beauty. Joyfully,
E'er many moons had sped into the past,
Lay fair Lake Eara dimpling at the sky.

Oh, perfect glades, by Eara made so sweet,
Since to your bowers her silver mirror came,
You're like some human life made full, complete,
By the four letters of Lake Eara's name.

—By Elizabeth Webb Gaynor

The Business Philosopher

A. F. SHELDON, EDITOR

VOLUME VI

DECEMBER, 1910

NUMBER 12

By the Fireplace

Where We Talk Things Over

CAN you take a mental journey? This is our last talk for the year. I wish that you could each of you imagine yourselves actually by this big stone fireplace tonight, so that we might talk over some things of importance intimately and informally.

Just suppose that you are deep in an easy chair, watching the fire-pictures among the logs and the wierd shadows dancing on the walls. Do you get the spicy fragrance of the crackling hickory? See the flames and sparks roaring up the chimney? Feel comfortable and happy?

All right, then. Now we can talk.

When the year begins to draw to a close, we naturally look backward—and forward. It is a time for reports, balance sheets, and figures on the year's business. It is also a time for some personal reports, balance sheets, and figures.

Now, I know it is so trite that nobody really pays very much attention to it any more, but I think it would be a good thing for all of us to take a good, earnest, scrutinizing look at the path we have been making on the sands of time these last twelve months. Can you remember where you stood a year ago? Does the path-way from there to where you stand tonight run up-hill or down? Has it been a rose-bordered, sunlit path, or has it run through dark valleys and over steep and rough places? How does it look to you now? If it seemed chill and rugged as you came along, does it seem sun-kissed and pleasant, now that you have made the journey? You know some people have a way of forgetting all the hard and unpleasant things they have passed through and remembering only the good times and happy days. It makes them happier all the time. A good habit to cultivate.

Now you can each of you answer all these questions for yourselves. But I will hazard the prediction that the great majority will find that the year 1910 has been, on the whole, a good year—a year of progress in personal development, a year of increasing power to serve, a year of increasing profits from your business. And so our talk tonight should be a happy one.

But I will hazard another prediction. The great majority of you will feel dissatisfied with the progress you have made, the profits that have come your way. Looking back on what has been thought, felt, said, and done, you will see many places where you might well have done differently and better. You will see many positives that you might have developed to a higher degree—many negatives that you might have overcome.

These thoughts and feelings come to all of us who are alive and awake. And when they come, it is time to stop looking backward and look forward.

No matter how poorly satisfied you may be with yourself and your work in 1910, there is to be an entirely new set of books opened for 1911. Surely the precious hours of 1910 have gone, never to return. They have carried their opportunities with them. But, cheer up. There are better days, more precious hours, and greater opportunities coming in 1911 than any you missed in 1910. But you will have to keep alive and be awake every minute or they will slip away like those you mourn in the year that is passing. You know all about how that is. I do not need to tell you. It's in all the copy books. And you are going to grow and improve and serve better and profit more next year than you have this. Isn't that so?

Well, then, that's all settled. You are happy—though not fully satisfied—when you look over the record of the year that will soon belong to the buried past. You are happy—and full of purposeful energy—when you think of the year that will soon dawn, and all that it will bring to you of personal and commercial progress.

So I can be very confident and cheerful when I take this occasion to wish you all a very Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year. That's eminently respectable, conventional, expected, and usual. Everybody says such things at this time. But I mean it, whether everybody else does or not—although I think that most of them do. Besides, I want to talk to you a little tonight about happiness.

Happiness is in the air tonight because it is the Christmas season. This is at least one season of the year when everyone is supposed to be happy—and almost everyone is. It is the Christmas spirit.

---

AS STUDENTS of the success problem, we ought to be deeply interested in this thing of happiness.

You and I may develop all of our positive qualities to a marked degree. We may serve well and profit much. We may have health, we may live long, we may have plenty of money. We may have the honor and respect of all our relatives, friends, neighbors, and acquaintances. And yet, unless we are happy, life will be a hollow mockery for us.

Success! The world, looking on, may say that we are successful. But, without happiness, success is as ashes and gall in our mouths.

And so, after all, the rock-bottom question in this life is the question of happiness.

---

NOW I BELIEVE that it is the business—the prime business—of everybody born into this beautiful old world to be happy. That is what we are here for. It is for that we study, toil, strive, fight, pray, plan, push, struggle, and aspire.

We seek happiness in a million ways.

Some try to buy it with money. Some try to lure it with pleasure. Some try to drink it with other liquids.

Some seek happiness in possessions. Others hope to find it in renunciations and sacrifices.

Here are people looking for happiness in beauty and refinement. There are others who seem to look for it in ugliness and sensuality.

You know people who hunt for happiness in the midst of lights, music, dancing, and the crowds. You know others who look for it in the quiet and calm of home and fireside.

Some men go hunting for their happiness in jungles and in the high mountains. Others search out the grassy slopes and shady lanes, they love the quiet waters and hope to find their happiness beside them.

For some people, happiness is in achievement, in the doing of exploits. For others, it seems to be in inaction, in dozing the drowsy hours away.

I might go on indefinitely. There are almost as many ways of looking for this most desirable thing in the world as there are people on the hunt.

The wonder is that so many find it.

Yes, notwithstanding all the ignorance, lawlessness, poverty, disease, and crime in the world, I am inclined to think that there are more people who find happiness than there are who miss it.

Now do not misunderstand me. I am not saying that most people find perfect happiness. There is no such thing as perfection in anything human. All things are relative—comparative. We may approximate truth, beauty, goodness, and happiness, but so long as we are merely human folks, we never attain them perfectly.

So, what I mean to say is that most folks are relatively happy. Even the blind beggar, sitting by the road in the sun, hums and whistles a little to himself, although he may not have a shirt on his back or the price of a decent meal in his tin cup.

Here is the puzzling thing about happiness, however:

We struggle and toil for health, wealth, position, fame, power, pleasure, possessions, achievement, knowledge, skill, life-mates, families—a thousand things. And yet we know before we begin that none of these things can give happiness. Else were all those who have them happy, and all who have them not miserable. And the very contrary is often the case.

See the contradiction: The man who has "everything to make him happy," as we sometimes say, is utterly wretched. And the man folks sometimes think "has nothing to live for" is one of the happiest men alive.

Where is the key to the riddle?

Are we facing a sphinx that will never give an answer to our question?

Well, a great many people have attempted to answer the question. And their answers have been illuminating and interesting, even if they haven't done much toward helping you and me and Henry over there to solve the problem of our individual happiness.

I have read some fine theories about it—mostly written by people who were violently unhappy themselves.

And then there have been those who have found happiness themselves, but have failed in trying to show other people the way to the Enchanted Garden.

And so I approach the subject with some little misgiving. It is something of a task to try to solve for other people the biggest problem of existence—that which includes and overshadows all others.

The best that I can do will be to tell you how it looks to me—from my point of view. And the best that I can hope is that what I shall have to say may be a help to some of you in tracing out the riddle for yourselves. Because happiness, after all, is an individual problem. The very things that seem to make me happy might be the very things that would seem to make you miserable. I say “seem,” because I think that external circumstances have very little effect upon happiness—they only seem to have.

---

Now, LOOK back upon the happiest day of your life. Can you remember such a day? If not, recall any unusually happy day.

What were the conditions? What was it that made you so happy? Write it down. We are going to be very scientific now.

Now, recall, one after the other, as many other happy days as you can. What was it made you happy on these days? Write the causes down.

Now, what is the result? Almost as many causes of happiness as there are happy days, are there not?

Very well. Then your happiness is not the result of any one circumstance or kind of circumstance.

Now, the next thing is to analyze all these causes, and see whether there are any elements of similarity running through all of them. If we can find one or more such elements, we shall have made at least the first step toward the solution of our problem. We can say that these elements were, hypothetically, the bases of your happiness.

Now, I do not know what you have written down, but I will undertake to say that you will not be likely to trace any similarity among all the causes—one that will be present in every case—unless you take the one thing of an absorbing preoccupation in someone or something outside of yourself.

Grab by the arm the first unhappy wretch you meet in the street. Steer him off into a quiet place and get him to tell you his troubles—to unburden his bitterness upon you.

What's the trouble with him?

Nothing except that he is pitying himself—wholly absorbed in himself and his “troubles.”

He knows he has a stomach, poor fellow. He is conscious of his poverty or his loneliness. He is dwelling upon the wearisomeness of his task. He broods over the “slights” and “insults” that come to him from those he thinks ought to love and pity him. He is jealous because someone else has privileges and enjoys favors that he thinks belong to him. He is envious because his possessions are not as great as those of his neighbor. He is sour, bitter, ugly, mean, and utterly miserable because he hates someone who is not pleasing to him.

His whole universe revolves around his own miserable self—and he is conscious of the fact every gloomy minute.

Now go after him. Stir him up. Draw his attention to something outside of himself. Get him interested in it. If you can, keep at him until he becomes absorbed in it. Then see the flush on his cheek, the light in his eye, and the smile, at last, on his sallow lips.

He has lost his morbid self-consciousness. For the moment, he is happy.

---

I HAVE heard the story of a great emperor. He came to the throne when his empire was burdened with famine, smoldering in discontent and insurrection, and threatened by powerful foes on her borders.

The public treasuries were empty.

In every royal palace there was dust and decay.

On the streets of his capital city, as he rode to his coronation, he was hissed by his own people.

But he had courage, foresight, energy, firmness, wisdom, and a great love for his subjects.

For years the monarch toiled like a slave. He cemented the unity of the nation. He instituted reforms that brought back prosperity and lifted the heavy burdens of taxation. He administered well his resources, so that the public treasuries were replenished. The royal palaces were repaired and refurnished. His armies were brought up to a splendid fighting power, and he led them to glorious victories over hostile peoples.

At last, the empire was the most powerful, the most united, the most prosperous, and the happiest in the world.

Back from his victories came the great ruler and conqueror.

In the streets of his capital city, there was music and dancing. Banners and flags, streamers and bunting flashed their gay colors in the sunshine.

The monarch rode to his principal palace over streets fairly carpeted with flowers. Everywhere the people stood cheering and blessing him, the happy tears raining down their faces. Beside him, dimpling with pleasure and pride in her lord, rode his beautiful queen.

The king returned the greetings of his people with a smile upon his lips, but his eyes were sad. And when, at last, he entered the great throne room, his face was gloomy, his step slow, his head dropped upon his breast.

"Your majesty is troubled," exclaimed the prime minister. "How can it be? What more could any man ask to make him perfectly happy? You are now the greatest king of all times. Your empire extends to the very borders of the known world. Riches untold pour into your treasuries. Never was ruler more beloved by his people. Here is your queen, the most beautiful in all the world, and the most lovely in character. You have her love and her presence with you. What more, your majesty, what more could the heart of man desire?"

The king did not lift his head. His face grew even sadder as he answered:

"Permanency."

---

YES, WE want our happiest moods to stay. We shake our impotent fists at the clock on those days when we are on the mountain-tops of our joys.

Christmas, with its spirit of joy and happiness, is followed by the dull, leaden winter days of January and February.

Now what is the answer for you and for me?

Just a little logic here, please.

Since happiness is found in a whole-hearted absorption in someone or something outside of ourselves; and since permanency is the great word in happiness, it follows that our happiness will be most complete and last longest when we are directing all our thought and feeling outward upon some object of permanent character.

Your experience tells you, too, that there is very little happiness in the contemplation of what has been accomplished—the joy is in the accomplishment.

So that there may be permanency, then, the object of your absorbing interest ought to be such that you will be ever approaching the goal of your desire, but never quite reaching it—always the thrill of achievement—always the urge of victories still to be won.

I think it follows, too, that the greater and finer the thing you have set your heart upon, the higher and larger will be your degree of happiness. Doesn't that seem reasonable?

And now, let me ask you, what larger, finer, more permanent object of your love could you have than the great, needy, struggling universe of life?

This, I believe is the true Christmas spirit.

And it seems to me that it should bring you permanent happiness.

But you can't become deeply interested in the life around you without wanting to help—to serve.

And, when you have a great desire to serve, you will find developing with it a great desire to increase your power to serve.

That means education, self-development, man building, and business building. For business, you see, is human service.

You are on the upward way.

Again I wish you a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year.

THE invisible makes the nation.
The nation is not made great,
it is not made rich, it is not made at all, by mines and forests and prairies and water powers.
Great men make a nation great, and the qualities that make men great are invisible.

LYMAN ABBOTT

And She Never Came Back—Would You?

Some True Stories : by Russel Wilmot

THE woman had been commissioned by a relative in the country to purchase a dark red tailored suit of specified size and style.

It was obvious to the first clerk to whom she applied that she would look like a fright in such garments, besides the size called for would be too small for her. So suppressing a smile of condescending superiority, he promptly informed her that she didn't want anything of that kind, but would look much better in some of the swell, new brown fall suits that had just come in.

The woman flushed painfully and replied mildly that she would like to see such a red suit as she had described. And when the smart clerk unwillingly and with an air of patient resignation began to pull out some exceedingly dowdy, old-style suits, ignoring the added request that the customer be shown one like those displayed in the window, she thanked him briefly, walked out and never came back. Would you?

Superficial Judgment

It was a stormy day and in this case the woman wore a partly worn suit. The garments, however, showed anyone with half an eye, that they had been entitled to respect when in their palmier days.

It was an excellent time, she thought, to loiter about the shops and select some of the fittings for her new kitchen and bathroom. She had a long list and a fat pocket-book ready.

The first big store visited carried everything in stock she wanted and she thought to purchase practically everything here. But an important young saleswoman came forward, eyed her critically a moment and then in response to her inquiry replied with an illy suppressed yawn, "I suppose you want something cheap. Step this way Ma'am."

"Ma'am" didn't step that way, she turned on her heel and rang for the elevator. Reaching the street floor, she made a bee-line for the store of a rival concern where she was received with fine courtesy by the attendants. She never went back to that department of the other store, either. Would you?

An Indignant Passenger

In a far western city there was keen, very keen competition for the spring transportation of travelers going East. The woman happened to be the first in one of the big resort apartment houses to prepare to return home.

Every other woman in the place was interested in what road she would take, the scenery she would pass, and the comforts offered by the particular roads accessible. They were especially interested because they were soon to flit eastward themselves.

The agent of whom the woman finally bought was exceedingly affable and followed up his prospect with praiseworthy salesmanship. But once he had secured the sale, he turned his attention to the next in line without further concern regarding the promises he had made. In consequence, so carelessly was the ticket made out and so idiotically was it routed that it gave the woman no end of trouble, sent her a round-about way, necessitated three unnecessary changes in a single night and withal made her so indignant that she wired the coterie back in the apartment house, "Do not get ticket of —, nor come by ——— ———. All sorts of delays and inconveniences."

All these people had friends and acquaintances whom they influenced and the agent wondered why his business suddenly dropped off amazingly in that quarter. Reservations already made were cancelled and further sales were difficult to make. The word had gone out that his promises and claims were not to be believed. People felt a vague apprehension regarding his motives, in short, they felt he was not to be trusted. One could scarcely blame them. Could you?

Aggravating Delays

The goods were promised, faithfully promised at a certain hour. They could not be prepared properly for the meal for which they were purchased if they came later, but they failed to appear, until they were one hour—almost two hours late, then they were hastily dumped into a lower entry and left without notifying the housekeeper that they were there.

A hungry pussy out for a leisurely stroll, found a meal thoroughly to her liking in the plump young turkey and the tender steak.

It was the last straw on top of a whole stack of similar annoyances. The woman refused to trade there any more. The market man himself—although he didn't improve his system a mite as a result—said he did not blame her at all. Could you?

A Traveling Representative

A traveling salesman for a well-known firm which advertises extensively took an order for a handsome rug. Every specification was plainly made as to color, width of border, etc.

After much delay a letter announced that the specifications could not be filled out without an additional charge of ten dollars. The woman refused to pay it, knowing what such goods were worth. Neither was she backward in telling her neighbors who were meditating like purchases, that the firm in question had tried to take advantage of her, going straight back on their agreement as made by their representative. She argued that if they sent out representatives who did not know what they were at liberty to do they should stand by the agreements made in good faith by and with their patrons. Her neighbors sent their orders elsewhere. Wouldn't you?

A Medical Disappointment

They had moved to a new town—the woman and her family—when sickness came. A physician was called. He left his own medicines. They were administered with faithful regularity without obtaining much appreciable benefit.

The woman was a bit fussy. She was convinced that the diagnosis was correct and the medicine prescribed should do the work. So she quietly ascertained where the practitioner obtained his supplies. She found what she had feared to be the case, that they were purchased from a medical supply house, known for the cheapness of its goods rather than the quality of its stock.

She quietly changed physicians. Wouldn't you?

Lack of Progressiveness

The woman wanted some goods carried in stock by a local dealer, but he had kept the fact so severely to himself that she never suspected his secret. He didn't believe in printer's ink. It cost money!

The woman was no mind reader, although ordinarily bright, and so she sent away to a mail order house and paid more than the home dealer would have been glad to sell her for.

The man grumbled loudly when he found out that his nearest neighbor was buying the goods he was selling and sending seven hundred miles for them at that. He had been told and told by business friends and his trade magazines of the short-sightedness of his policy, but he insists that he has all he can do to pay his bills as it is.

You cannot blame the people who trade elsewhere. Can you?

The Grudging Recognition

The woman was a bit sensitive. Most women are. And when she noticed with what apparent and grudging effort a certain lawyer acknowledged her presence in his office or on the street, she became uncomfortable. When she went to his office, he would pass and repass her a number of times without vouchsafing her a single look of recognition. Naturally she inferred that he thought her case too paltry to bother with and so she transferred her business elsewhere.

The man really didn't mean a thing, except to impress upon his clerks and clients the importance of his presence and his extreme busyness. He lost a trifling case to be sure, but there soon arose one of considerable magnitude in the family of the woman and he lost that, too.

In the course of a few years the other lawyer was able to trace over sixty clients who had come to him as the result of business he had conducted for the woman and her family. The first man had been equally heavy mentally, but the second one had fortunately added to that the faculty for a kindly courtesy. People came to him as to a lawyer and a friend.

I couldn't wonder at it, either. Could you?

The woman was not a crank, neither was she of the Dresden China type that expects to be humored and pampered. She was simply an educated woman with an analytical mind and much too busy herself with affairs of importance to bother with firms or people indulging in unbusiness-like methods. She claimed, and not illogically, that her own system demanded that she make the most of her time and efforts and that she could not afford to waste either on people who had no approved, up-to-the-minute system of their own.

And even the most indifferent individual could scarcely blame her for the stand either. Could you?

Let's All be Happy

By MILTON BEJACH

WE CANNOT all be happy all the time, but in order to be successful, to round out a complete career, business, social and physical, we must be happy the greater part of the time.

The unhappy man is seldom successful in a business way. Fifty years ago it was the fashion for lady novelists to picture their heroes as men "who had seen a great sorrow," and, according to the lady novelists their heroes were much sought after socially. But the fashion in heroes has changed and today the popular book hero is the happy, optimistic character. A man cannot be physically right unless he is happy.

Since happiness is a condition precedent to success in most avenues we must find the way to be happy. There is no hard and fast rule for finding it. Perhaps the best way to find happiness is by reflection. Things can always be worse than they are, you know. And, most of the troubles we have, never happen. They are only in our minds.

Somewhere, Heinrich Heine writes that in the fifteenth century there were whistled and sung throughout all Germany, songs of sweetest melody and tenderness and which far surpassed anything musical that had been born in the German realm. These ballads were sung by the women and children, who seemed bewitched into happiness by them.

They were written, Heine says, by a young priest, a living corpse, wandering to and fro, muffled from head to foot and carrying in his hand a bell—the Lazarus bell—to warn everyone of his approach. The priest was afflicted with leprosy, the most terrible scourge the world has known. And yet, he was happy, else he could not have written the songs that made others happy. He was happy, glad that he was alive at all.

You've heard that Charles Lamb came of a family attainted with insanity. For thirty years he supported an insane mother and sister by the humblest kind of clerical work. In all those years he felt the pinch of poverty and the absence of everything he wanted. For friends he had the poor of London, those whom someone has called "the ragged regiment."

Yet, in spite of his afflictions, Lamb wrote the sweetest, rarest humor. Have you read the essays of Elia? No man could have written them unless somewhere in his soul he was sure that the worst was only half as bad as it seemed, unless, in other words, he was happy.

Now you and I can turn happiness into dollars and cents, to say nothing of being more successful socially and physically.

No one will willingly buy goods from a "grouch." A pessimist may be a success as a credit man, but he will not be a good salesman. A man with the affliction of unhappiness cannot write an advertisement that will stir buyers into action. He cannot write a selling letter that will bring money. Because a part of his unhappiness, his grouch, will creep into his effort, whether that be verbal or written.

You can drive the body into a corner from which it cannot escape, but you cannot bottle up the human mind. And here lies the secret of happiness:

"As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he!"

Ruminations

- ¶ There is a North Star for us all to follow—look for it.
- ¶ Just be yourself—I mean your Real Self.
- ¶ Whether we will or no we are the “Survival of the Fittest”
—Keep alive!
- ¶ Learn to get at the facts wheresoever you may find them; they will “bob out at unexpected moments from unexpected sources.”
- ¶ Activity is the Center-Board of life.
- ¶ Some people mistake limitation of sense for Common Sense.
- ¶ Fear to be false to yourself, nothing else.
- ¶ Regret not that you cannot go back in life—but thank God you can go ahead.
- ¶ What you think, sir, is no criterion for me—I may think what you think—then we agree, but only what I think, sir, is criterion for me.
- ¶ People are prone to mistake weaknesses within for obstacles without.
- ¶ What’s the Use of Being, unless you’re Being of Use?
- ¶ Don’t attempt to prove to me that Two and Two are Four because Brown said so—much less that Two and Two are Five, because Brown said so.
- ¶ Keep your courage hot—no matter what gets cold.

—Stephen B. French

The Law of Color Applied to Human Character : by Dr. Katherine M. H. Blackford

FROM comparatively trivial occurrences matters of great moment sometimes evolve.

The dropping of an apple to the earth started the mental processes that resulted in the discovery of the law of gravitation, and the stiffening fibres of the hempen cord of his kite revealed to Benjamin Franklin that he held the lightning in his grasp.

What the perception of the laws of gravitation and electricity has already done for mankind is incalculable. What it will yet accomplish is beyond the power of the most vivid imagination to prophesy.

How the Search for the Law of Color Began

The perception of the law of coloring in its application to human character was due, at least in some degree, to a very commonplace experience.

Some years ago I had a girl friend who was near my own age. We played together, were classmates, seatmates, and when her parents moved to another part of the country she often returned to visit me.

She was an extreme type of blonde. Her hair was almost white except for a glint of gold when the sun shone upon it. Her eyes were as blue as the ocean when it reflects the azure of the sky. Her skin was white, showing the delicate tracery of blood-vessels underneath. The tinting of her cheeks and lips made one think of the bloom of peaches, the coloring of sea-shells or the blush of an unfolding rosebud.

She was dimpled, too. The graceful curves of her features, their delicate coloring, her radiance in expression—surely here was a creature whose beauty anyone might covet.

I admired her fervently for these were qualities which nature had withheld from me, for it is innate that we should desire that which we do not possess. It is a trick of Mother Nature to impel us ever onward and upward.

Association with her aroused an insatiable desire to know why we were so different in preferences and habits. We were seldom agreed on anything. When one advanced an idea the other invariably saw it from a different angle. I was naturally interested in folks and she was my greatest problem. So from every bit of available literature that treated of humankind I sought the reason for our differences. Of all the many attractive things about her, her beautiful coloring interested me most.

Science Silent on Human Coloring

Later I took up the study of medicine and surgery, believing that in it might be found a solution for all problems of character. It was a bitter disappointment to find that physicians are quite as often ignorant of human nature as others—and frequently less disposed to learn.

Having been interested in phrenology since childhood I once more took up the study in all its ramifications and sought instruction from almost everyone in the country who seemed to have anything worth while to offer. Still the coveted knowledge was not forthcoming. But the search for it was building better than I knew.

Finally a man was found who admitted that he was an authority upon the subject. There seemed to be some hope of gaining from him the pearl of great price so diligently sought.

He seemed to appreciate the differences in character, disposition and natural inclinations of types better than anyone I had found, but he could not answer the why that invariably came to my lips. He had a theory, but to accept it meant the overthrow of the law of gravitation and the destruction of the very foundation upon which all science rests. So his teaching was rejected.

The Beginning of the End of the Search

Once again the study of physics, electricity and chemistry was taken up.

I had a firm conviction that the laws that govern the planets in their courses and cause the phenomena of heat, light, and sound were also operative in human nature.

Now there was real progress.

In the science of evolution there is a demonstrated and accepted law that "the fit advance and the unfit decline, advancement depending upon adaptability and decline upon inadaptability to environment."

This called to mind the fact that my blonde friend could not endure the bright sunlight. When she was obliged to go out in it she wore a veil and carried a sunshade. I did neither. I saw no necessity for it beyond that of vanity, which she possessed in strong degree. But it slowly dawned upon me that there must be some scientific reason for our difference in adaptability to sunlight.

The first real understanding of it came while studying the coloring of animals.

Nature gives to animals their coloring for protection. Or, to state the fact correctly from a scientific point of view, the law of natural selection of the best fitted to survive favors the longevity and consequent predominance of animals which are concealed from attack and assisted in hunting their prey by resemblance to their background.

On the yellow plains are found the tawny animals.

Forest animals are often mottled like the shadows cast by the leaves.

The tiger is striped; like the lights and shades cast by the tall grass in which he has his habitation.

The deer is so nearly the color of the autumn leaves and tree trunks that he often escapes all eyes but those of the trained hunter.

Looking down into a pool of clear water one can scarcely discern any life at first, but careful observation will reveal numerous living creatures.

The chameleon is very fortunate in this respect, having the power of reflex change of color by which it increases its resemblance to background.

The Laws of Natural Selection

So the law of natural selection of the fittest to survive gives to animals their coloring.

There is another function of coloring in birds and animals to which naturalists call attention—that of sexual selection. In many species of birds and animals the males are brilliantly colored, evidently for the purpose of attracting the female. In the human species the order seems to be reversed, since it is usually the female who bedecks herself in gay colors.

We must, however, look farther than protection from enemies or sexual selection, for the cause of coloring in man, since he, through intelligence, can protect himself from enemies by other methods than concealment. And while the natural tendency of blondes is to marry brunettes, where both types exist, sexual selection is based upon other principles of equal importance.

We are beginning to learn that everything has a purpose; that back of every effect there is a cause, and that there is nothing in existence that may not be useful.

Even the surgeons, who in recent years have been obsessed by a mania for mutilating the human body, are slowly beginning to realize that nature supports no useless organs. Even the appendix has a mission of usefulness and its removal as a preventive measure is far from justifiable.

Laws of Nature and Laws of Human Nature the Same

The result of several years of investigation proved to my entire satisfaction that to understand human nature it is but necessary to understand and apply the principles governing nature. It follows that coloring in human beings is for a purpose. Let us see if we can discern a universal law applicable to both nature and human nature that may help us to solve this interesting problem.

Science has demonstrated that heat is a mode of motion; that light is a mode of motion; that sound is a mode of motion. Color, therefore, being an attribute of light, is also a mode of motion.

All molecules of matter, except at absolute zero temperature, are in constant motion, or vibration, at some rate of velocity. High rate of vibration destroys the cohesiveness and stability of a substance, by driving the molecules far apart, thus bringing about rapid change and disintegration. A low rate of vibration causes the molecules to cohere, conduces to stability of substance and retards change.

Different shades of color represent different rates of vibration. At the upper end of the color spectrum is ultra-violet. At the lower end of the color spectrum is infra-red. All shades of color lie between. Above ultra-violet the rapidity of vibration is so great and the wave lengths so short that the human eye cannot sense them. As we go down the scale the wave lengths grow longer and the vibrations per second less frequent. Below infra-red all is darkness to the human eye.

Black is classed as being below infra-red, since it is the result of absorption of all the light waves. White is classed at the upper end of the spectrum, since it represents the reflection of all the light waves of whatever length of frequency.

The Human Color Spectrum — The Law of Color

Applying the principle of color vibration to human beings we can form a human color spectrum and find the analogy almost perfect. At the upper end of the human color spectrum is white (Albino), at the lower end is black (Negro). All races of mankind, so far as color is concerned, lie between these two extremes.

It is not usually observed that we have all the primary colors in the human being. Black is found in hair, eyes, skin and beard; red in hair and mucous membranes; yellow in skin, hair and eyes; orange and green less frequent, but sometimes found in the eyes; blue and violet in the eyes; white in skin, hair and teeth.

The Law of Color applied to the human being is: The higher the rate of vibratory activity of the molecules of the body the lighter the color; the lower the rate of vibratory activity of the molecules of the body the darker the color.

The exact shade of coloring is produced by the deposit of pigment granules in the hair, skin and eyes. Abundant pigmentation accompanies a low rate of vibration. Scant pigmentation accompanies a high rate of vibration.

The Natural Habitat of the Different Color Types

This pigmentation of the skin, hair and eyes, also subserves other purposes besides that of indicating the degree of molecular activity of the body.

When abundant it gives protection from excessive light waves and increases the power of the body to absorb and radiate heat waves. So, in tropical climates we find abundant pigmentation while in the more northern countries less pigmentation is found.

Major Chas. E. Woodruff, A. M., M. D., Surgeon, U. S. Army, says that the pigmentation of the skin is abundant in direct proportion to the intensity of the light of the country to which a man's ancestors have proved their adjustment by centuries of survival in health and vigor.

The natural climatic environment of the blonde is northern latitudes. His skin, hair and eyes being but little pigmented, he is less protected from the actinic rays of the sun which readily penetrate his skin. Inasmuch as these rays are very destructive to protoplasmic cells, he suffers terribly from sunburn. Climates where there is not too much light are more congenial to him.

Then, too, his high rate of vibratory activity generates a sufficient amount of heat in his body. This he conserves better than the brunette, hence he is not so dependent for comfort upon the heat absorbed from his environment. He therefore enjoys, and is by nature better fitted for residence in a cold, dark climate.

Conversely, the natural climatic environment of the brunette is the South. His skin, hair and eyes are richly pigmented. He is protected from the more destructive actinic rays and can therefore be in the sunshine with impunity. His rate of molecular vibration being relatively low, he is largely dependent for comfort upon the heat he absorbs from his environment. Dark skin being absorbent he finds a hot, light climate congenial to his type.

The natural antipathy of the negro for cold and his love of warmth are facts that everyone has observed. He is by nature well fitted for residence in tropical climates. His nostrils being short and wide permit of breathing large volumes of air. The air in hot climates being rarefied it requires a large volume to oxygenate the blood. In a cold climate where the air is condensed, he is at a great disadvantage, because breathing large volumes of cold air lowers his bodily temperature so rapidly that he has great difficulty in keeping warm.

Had the negro been introduced into the northern part of the United States instead of the southern, our history as a nation would have been different, for he could not have readily become acclimated, and would therefore have proved an unprofitable investment.

The albino represents the highest rate of vibration in human beings. His skin, hair and eyes are wholly devoid of pigment granules and he therefore has no protection from the sun's rays. In bright light he is blind, or nearly so, cannot endure extremes of temperature, is limited in his ability to adjust himself to changes of environment, is short lived, and is regarded as the most unstable human compound known.

Opinions of the Investigators About Human Coloring

It is interesting to note the opinion of various writers regarding these two types. Doctor Woodruff contends that the first men were undoubtedly of the dark type and that the blonde is degenerate and rapidly becoming extinct. He brings much evidence to support his contention.

Another writer is equally emphatic in his statements that the pure white blonde is a special creation, but little lower than the angels and that all the dark races are so colored by their sins. Having readers of both types this is a subject upon which I hesitate to comment, but it would be a matter of more than passing interest to know to which types these two writers belong.

Let us consider some of the practical uses of the Law of Color in its relation to human character.

It enables one to select one's climate according to one's needs. My blonde friend could not endure the direct rays of the summer sun because she was not protected by natural endowment to stand the excessive light. To have compelled her to go out unprotected would have made her extremely uncomfortable. A brunette often suffers from light-hunger and is never happier than when in the sunshine.

In all their habits of life the two types are opposites.

In a family, ignorance of this law often brings about great inharmony, for all too often we try to fit other individuals to our own mould instead of permitting them the latitude necessary for their comfort and growth. Between opposite types the result is often disaster.

Habits of the Two Types

In their habits of work we find the two types getting results by different methods. The blonde works rapidly and intensely for a time, but he tires of one thing rather easily. His tendency is to work spasmodically. Indeed his tendency is to go to extremes in all things.

The brunette works more slowly, but sustains his efforts longer and works more continuously.

This knowledge may be utilized to advantage in employing people. The fair type oftentimes are the more brilliant workers but not the most dependable ones. The dark type is less brilliant, working into a situation more slowly, but he wears better.

Not long ago an employer complained bitterly of the many changes made in his working force. In looking them over I observed that there was not a distinct brunette in his employ.

In social matters these two types are also opposite in their preferences. The blonde loves variety, approbation, display, positions of distinction and honor, the lights, the music, and the excitement of the crowd. As a rule he has many acquaintances but few close friends. He is usually found in lines of endeavor that gratify these natural inclinations.

Havelock Ellis observed that a high index of fairness prevails among men of restless and ambitious natures and calls attention to the fact that the men who recruit the aristocracy tend to the blonde type. It is true that more often we find the blonde in positions requiring a great deal of publicity. The pulpit, the stage, salesmanship, speculative enterprises, advertising and kindred lines naturally attract him.

The brunette is more adhesive, less changeable, more steadfast and less approbative. He feels responsibility rather heavily, is less speculative, more systematic and methodical and more conservative. His inclinations are more along the line of family association and he gathers about him many intimate friends. He naturally inclines to productive lines of work. He is often found manufacturing, conserving and producing.

In their religious preferences these two types are opposites. The strictly orthodox religious sects have a preponderance of the brunette type, while the more liberal and progressive denominations have a larger representation of the blonde type.

The reader will readily see the application here. The blonde being of a hopeful, volatile, optimistic nature is inclined to be speculative. The brunette, being inclined to seriousness, steadfastness and conservatism, does not favor speculation and in his religion, as elsewhere, prefers to take no chances.

The Scientific Reason for the Differences Between Blondes and Brunettes

The differences of disposition of the two types are easily accounted for when one understands the form of force which dominates each.

The blonde is vibrating at a high rate of speed, consequently he generates and expends his energies in a vigorous manner. He is necessarily active, changeable, restless, impatient, diffusive, loving variety, stimulating scenes and companions. He is expansive and radiant, emotional, optimistic, hopeful, speculative and benevolent. All his activities will be characterized by ardor and enthusiasm and he will think, act, work, love, eat, sleep, play, worship, become angry, ill, insane, criminal, or healthy, sane and an ornament to society in the manner characteristic of his radiant, driving, dynamic force.

The tissues of the brunette type are vibrating at a slower rate, consequently he generates and expresses the life forces more slowly. He is cohesive and drawing in his nature, gathering his forces closely about him; is absorbent and adhesive in his friendship, concentrated and receptive. He literally does not live as fast as the blonde. He is conservative, quiet, loving and grateful. He is less optimistic but usually more dependable; less demonstrative but more constant; less speculative and more conservative. Thus we might contrast the two types ad infinitum.

A little study and observation upon the part of the reader will convince him that these two types will manifest their particular form of force and degree of that force in every phase of their character. The knowledge applied will enable him to deal with each in a more intelligent manner.

This is the second article on the Science of Character Analysis by Dr. Blackford. The third, which will treat of "The Law of Form," will appear in the January number.—Editor's note.

The Spark of Inspiration

By C. FIRST JOHNSON

THERE is latent power in every man—often more than he himself dreams he possesses; but the great question is how to arouse this hidden power.

I want men to learn what kind of thoughts count; to think them, act them, until they become a part of their being, forming the directing force in their success.

Man should ask for nothing more than strength and light and guidance until with all his might he has done his part.

How many of us know when we have done our part? My friends, you must work and dig and sweat 'till you find a way to get done what you have to do—put brains into every action. Brains that go to the bottom of things, brains that are always looking for better things, brains that never give up a problem till they find a way to solve it.

In mechanics today the electric dynamo stands as the highest development of mechanical power. Among the workers the highest is the human dynamo, the man whose brain is charged with dynamic force; whose heart is on fire with enthusiasm and push; who leads the strenuous life and likes it; who is always dissatisfied, always fighting for bigger and better results; who sets his goal-post far out in the field of endeavor, and refuses to quit until he reaches it; who is always on the alert for newer and better ideas to help him in his work.

Success is the same in all cases, therefore the cause of success must be the same in all cases, and the cause of success is in the individual who succeeds. It is work with brain in it; it is work continuously; it is the application of the cause effectively that produces success. Apply the cause.

It is only the doers, that is the speakers of words and the doers of deeds, who are entitled to succeed. Any man who will persistently, consistently and effectively apply these principles will succeed anywhere, under any environment, and in any line of work or profession. He who so works climbs rapidly the hill of success.

Let me entreat you, whatever you are doing, to strive to render constructive service; strive to add something each day to your stock of success and place yourself in a position where the world will realize the merit which you offer, and you will be richly rewarded.

Motto: Applying the spark of inspiration, I am unfolding into success.

Work—Right Hand of Genius

By C. F. JOHNSON

THERE is a chance today for every man, woman, and child to win success in life, notwithstanding the kind of labor being performed by them, if they can put their faith in hard work and stick-to-it-iveness rather than in luck.

It is true, thought is a creative power, but the failure to connect thought with personal action is the rock upon which many thinkers have shipwrecked.

Work is the right hand of genius—and the worker who brings power instead of weakness to his task is the true miracle worker.

Your thought makes all things work to bring you what you want; but your personal activity must be such that you can justly claim and receive what you want when it reaches you.

By thought you can cause the gold in the hearts of the mountains to be impelled toward you; but it will not mine itself, refine itself, coin itself into double eagles, and come rolling to you seeking its way into your pocket. You must work and give every man more in use value than he gives you in cash value if you would lift yourself from your present environment to one more congenial and yielding greater profits.

By thought, the thing you want is brought to you; by action you receive it.

You must Work! Work!! Work!!! for what you want.

No man does great things without overcoming great opposition. No man has climbed from the lowly station in life to the top and found himself assisted by fate at every turn of the road. It was a matter of putting brain stuff into his efforts.

Any man who has done big things will tell you that the road to success was not asphalt covered and straight, but it was covered with jagged rocks and behind its curves the enemy was discovered hidden.

The progress of the world depends upon your filling your place where you are—depends upon your rendering the service that serves each day.

Dear reader, every day must be a successful day or a day of failure; and it is the successful days that produce your success.

It is really not the amount of work you do, but the doing what you do better than anyone else has done it that brings your service in demand.

Do all that you can in a perfect manner every day, but do it without haste, worry, or fear.

Go as fast as you can, but never hurry.

What you can do, you ought to do. What you ought to do, you can do. What you can and ought to do, by the grace of God you must do.

---

My rule for success is untiring application, loyalty to one's employer, which is loyalty to oneself, doing the best you can in every task that faces you; practicability, initiative and industry.—James J. Hill.

Do it Now—Clear Up Your “Unfinished Business” Today : by George W. Wilkie

ANOTHER chestnut, you will say, another moss covered one, old as the hills. Perhaps when Noah was first told to build the ark, he was cautioned to “do it now.” It took him a long time to build it, but remember it was a big job. He got right at it and he didn’t finish a day too soon either.

If you would take hold of that task, that unpleasant one, that one you think perhaps you will be able to handle better tomorrow or after you come back, or the first clear day, if you will take hold of it and “do it now,” you will find the doing easier than if you let it get cold.

A Business Morgue

Perhaps you have a basket on your desk bearing an ornate label, “Unfinished Business.” Most every one has. In many cases this label might be changed to read, “Morgue.”

Perhaps you have an elaborate system of pigeon holes more or less neatly filled with memoranda that you desire to keep. It is a safe bet that you do keep them. If a law could be passed prohibiting the building of desk pigeon holes, it is more than likely that the total volume of business would show a very substantial increase the first year.

When you receive your basket full of mail in the morning, you select those easiest to handle first and get them under way, dictate the answer, or do what may be required, then you come to a complaint, a letter claiming shortage or breakage, a call down that requires a tactful answer. You pick this one up, read it over carefully and lay it on top of your “Unfinished Business.” You lay it on a slab in your little morgue, forgetting for the moment, that several other cadavers may be under it, each on its little slab.

You don’t “do it now.”

Once in a while, when you feel in the humor, or when you have time, you go through your morgue, select those that appear easiest, “of the many evils you choose the least.” You call your assistant, tell him to “Look this thing up and let me have the details.”

He may be patterned after his chief and lay it on his morgue to get a little colder, or he may follow it out, depending on his condition of mind. He brings you his report, you dictate your letter explaining the matter, using your choicest words and all the tact at your command, but by the time this letter reaches the other party, his temperature, having mounted higher and higher while awaiting your reply, is almost at the ignition point.

What the “Thief of Time” Steals

Finally your failure to “do it now” is discovered. If you are a piker or a clam you may plead some extenuating circumstance—too busy, went to see the other department head but he was out, tried to find out, could get no satisfaction and then it slipped your mind. You may try any one of these stereotyped excuses.

Perhaps you may be a manly man, admit freely that you made an error and not try to explain. The latter is, of course, preferable, but remember, the result so far as the customer is concerned, so far as your structure of confidence is concerned, so far as your personal loss of self-satisfaction and of personal prestige is concerned, is the same.

If you are fair to yourself, you will admit that if you had followed out the precept of that time stained, fly specked motto on your wall, “Do it Now,” you would have had no more actual labor to perform than you had finally—perhaps much less. You would perhaps have reached the same conclusion as to the merits of the complaint, but you would have reached it sooner. You would have had a cleaned up desk the first night and every night rather than a business death chamber.

Why didn’t you do it? Be honest now, wasn’t it simply a habit of procrastination?

The old copy books proclaim that “Procrastination is the thief of time.”

The modern school of business would call it more, it is a foul murderer of business opportunities.

What do you hope to gain by putting it off till tomorrow? You certainly know tomorrow will bring its own crop.

Do you think you will be in a better condition to handle it on Tuesday than you are on Monday? Not at all, you will be less equipped because the spectre of this unfinished business, the ghost of these half-buried matters will haunt you, will drive away that sense of satisfaction that comes to everyone when he feels his duty is well done.

There are few men who read this that cannot recall instances where their failure to "do it now" has worked actual harm of some kind.

When "The Thief of Time" Killed

Some time ago, in leaving an elevator at the top floor of a building, the car dropped suddenly a few inches. No damage resulted, other than a scare, but the danger of repetition seemed to warrant my calling the owner's attention to the occurrence.

I did so, and his assistant spoke up saying, "That car did the same thing with me a few days ago, but I attributed it to a fault of the operator."

The owner thanked me, and said he should have it attended to at once, but he didn't "do it now"—and a short time afterwards he and his business occupied the top of the column in the morning papers, with an account of a fatal accident.

It doesn't cost any more in time, money or attention to apply this show-worn but never out of date rule to the average details of the day's work than it does to put it off—frequently time, money and attention are saved.

When Dewey sailed into Manila Bay, that May morning, when he saw the moment to strike had arrived, suppose when he issued that world important order, "You may fire when ready, Gridley," that Gridley had failed to "do it now." Wouldn't such procrastination have had its effect on world politics?

Suppose there are ten working hours in the day, and one has a task requiring six of those hours to complete. Is it wise to wait till the fourth hour has elapsed before beginning?

On Time Better Than Overtime

I have known men who were commended for their interested allegiance to their work, for their stick-to-it-iveness in remaining after hours to complete their day's work.

No doubt such a spirit is highly commendable, but perhaps if those very men were to apply the five-thirty p. m. energy at seven-thirty in the morning, there would be no necessity for such after-hours work.

Perhaps the spirit of "do it now" can be overdone—can be carried to excess—but it is safe to say that the habit of "waiting a while" can be more harmful in the majority of cases.

Unless you have an inherent desire for order and system it may be hard to inculcate the "do it now" habit in its fullest measure.

Clear off Your Desk Every Day

The machinist who does the most work, the quickest work and the best work is he who has a place for every tool, and who actually uses that place. Were he to allow litter, unfinished parts, last week's bunch of waste, or the broken tools of yesterday to accumulate about his bench or lathe—could he be expected to lead the shop in high class output? Hardly.

Your desk is your bench—your lathe—and the habit of thoroughly clearing it each day—preparatory to tomorrow's mass of details will help you to "do it now" in a wonderful way. It is a good thing to have a scrap pile, a place for the flotsam and jetsam of business, but no wise man will waste time in pawing it over and over. He established this very scrap pile in order that he might have a place for the useless. He will do well to go one step further and destroy the scrap pile.

"Do it now" means the turning of unused energy into dollars, it means appointments always kept, it means trains always caught, it means opportunities always embraced, it means peace of mind in knowing the duty was performed, the work was completed.

Think it over and "do it now."

Pejor's Emancipation

PEJOR was in the dumps again. As soon as he came into the office, I turned on the lights. I hadn't realized before how short the days were getting and how early it got dark.

Wiggins had, with solemn joy, suspended a wreath of holly in the office window a few days before. The festive foliage seemed to hurt poor Pejor's eyes.

"What approbative sentimentalist hung up that pagan emblem? Jiggering Joseph! As if it weren't bad enough to have this Christmas pestilence at home and in the staggering stores! Wiggins, I'll bet you did that. It's just like your juvenile seriousness."

"Don't, Pejor, don't," sobbed Wiggins. "Christmas is a sacred anniversary. I refuse to hear you speak of it as a pestilence."

Pejor's Chains Chafe Him

"I have no objection to Christmas as a sacred anniversary, as you call it. It is the heathenish revels and their tawdry trappings, the slobbering hypocrisy of the 'gift' obsession that give me the final-come-and-get-us."

"But, Pejor," struggled Wiggins, "it is right that Christmas should be a time of joy. And when people are happy, they like to feast and make merry—they like to give presents to one another."

"Well, Christmas is not a time of joy to me, I can tell you. It takes me all the rest of the winter to recover from the shriveled atrophy of the pocket-book it gives me."

"How does it happen to reduce your resources, Pejor? I thought you were a rebel against the holiday and its customs."

"Oh, yes, I'm a rebel, all right. But I have to pay up just the same. First, there are the paranoia-producing presents. Jiggering Joseph! The pit of my stomach feels like a mine-shaft in February every time some ooze-faced blub smiles at me on the street. Cur-r-r-se him! He's plotting to give me a copy of 'A Bucket of Goo for Every Day.' And I shall be a leperous pariah if I do not send him some equally expensive infliction wrapped in pink tissue and tied with a tinsel cord. Then, there are the Scadborrows. They have been seeing us and going us one better every year since we were married. This year, nothing less than a private yacht or a beef-steak will keep us in the game. They will probably give my wife a diamond tiara that it will take several thousand a year to dress up to. She can't afford to wear it, and she can't afford not to—when the Scadborrows are around. Nice little fix we'll be in!"

"But if you spend so much for Christmas presents, you must get a great many. So you play about even."

"Seriously, Wiggins, you ought to be examined for your sanity. Didn't you ever get one of these precious presents? And if you did, was it ever, by any miracle, a thing that you would have bought for yourself if you had a roll big enough to choke a blast furnace? You jade me. I've got an attic full of the junk, each present ready to be rushed out on exhibition if we think the irresponsible that gave it is likely to show up at the house."

"But the presents are not the only outgoing money chutes. Think of the dinners, teas, and other tortures of conventional peonage. We live on boiled potatoes and soup-bones at our house until about the first of March to make up for the turkey and tea biscuits we have fed to the rabble."

Why the Money Was Spent

"Like to spend all that money, Pejor?" was the innocent way that Socratic came out of his reverie.

"Like to spend it! Oh yes, of course. I feed my billy-goat on hundred-dollar bills to keep them from littering up the garden. Any other profound secrets of mine you'd like to drag out into the garish light?"

"Why do you spend your money, then? It's yours, isn't it? You earn it, don't you?"

"I spend it because I am a social being, Socratic, if you must know, and prefer even artificial handshakes to real cold shoulders."

"Then you don't give these presents and get up these social functions because you take any pleasure in giving and in hospitality?"

"Some of the presents I get a great deal of pleasure out of, to be sure. Those to my wife and babies, those to a few kids down near the Bay that are in my wife's mission Sunday school class, and the present, every year to my old mother. And I have a few special friends that I like to have at my house. They come in whenever they feel like it, and we never make any fuss over them. But the other presents and the society doings! Br-r-r-r!"

"Think the others like to spend their money on presents and functions?"

"No, I don't think so. In fact, I guess they do it with just as bad a grace as I do."

"Then why do they do it?"

"So I won't turn up my patrician nose at 'em, of course."

"Would you?"

"Why, no. I'd fall on their necks and pour warm tears of gratitude upon their apparel."

A Society of Mutual Bores

"Then wouldn't they do the same lachrymose shower for you if you were to restrain your mad impulse to feed them and send them gifts?"

"Jiggering Joseph! I'll bet nine out of ten of 'em would. Well, what is in your encyclopedia anent that? Here we have been painstakingly boring and impoverishing one another for years—so that we might keep one another's esteem! There, Wiggins. What more do you want, to prove that this Christmas business is nine-tenths hopeless lunacy? But how are we to escape from the asylum? One man can't get out alone."

"What you want is sanity by common consent, is it?"

"Sure—the jail delivery has got to be unanimous."

Presents for Profit

"Couldn't you make a compromise, then?"

"Compromise? How?"

"Well, how would it do for you to buy each of your 'friends' something that they really needed and would profit by possessing, and let them do the same for you?"

"Fine idea, Socratic! Just send around a list of the articles to one after another and have each check off the particular commodity he would buy and set down, in the blank for the purpose made and provided, the name of the thing he wants in exchange. Then we could exchange due-bills on Antonelli's Cafe, and thus get out of the spike-tail dinners at the house. After that we should probably begin to tell people just what we thought of them instead of telling society white lies. Oh, I guess the Socratic millennium is at hand."

"Are you entertained? Suppose you were to start the thing by getting each one of your friends an inexpensive present that you knew would be worth several times its cost to him in actual profits?"

"And what would that be?"

"Well—just as an instance—how much was that book on salesmanship Fussberg gave you last Christmas worth to you?"

"Just five hundred dollars in actual profits up to now. And it will be worth twice that much to me next year. Don't say another word. I'm on. Joy, but that's a great scheme. The more I think of it the better I like it. Why, I have often thought of different books I should like to give my various friends. Books that would do wonders for them. Why, I can send a personal letter with each book that will get the man to read it. Great!"

Two weeks later, Pejor came in again. I turned out the light. Somehow we didn't seem to need it.

"Here's the balance on the note, Socratic. And all saved up buying books at a dollar and a half a throw instead of pink and gilt junk at five dollars. Besides that, I haven't been able to keep still about it, so a lot of the boys are taking it up. We begin this year, each of us, building up a business and technical library of our own—made up of Christmas presents from one another. And there's more to it. A big bunch of us up there on the Heights have organized a club to study these books. After this, we will feed our minds for profit instead of our stomachs for loss."

Flushton Learns Some Economics

FLUSTON, blonde Apollo that he was, seemed to like the wet. He was forever swimming and boating in the Bay. And when it rained, it was almost impossible for him to stay in his store. You were likely to meet him out on the golf links, soaking wet but perfectly happy.

So I was not surprised when he swished and gurgled into the office one afternoon, in the midst of a torrent of a December downpour. The thing that did surprise me was that he was not ecstatic.

"Flushton! Tell us quick!" gasped Fussberg, jumping up and running to feel of his pulse. "Have you anything contagious?"

"Why? What's the matter with you, you comical skit? I'm not sick."

"But you're wet and still not happy! That's against the eternal principles of the universe."

"Oh, cut out the merriment. There's nothing to laugh at. I'm well, and I'm happy enough, I guess. But, see here, Socratic, haven't I always been a good friend of yours?"

Socratic smiled, nodded, and waited.

"Always turned business your way whenever I could, haven't I?"

Still Socratic smiled and nodded in silence.

"Never butted into your game with any pink-beribboned notions of reform, did I?"

Still smiling, still silent, Socratic shook his head.

Flushton's Complaint

"Well then, I demand to know why you went out of your placid way to start Pejor off on this high-brow 'cultchaw' business of influencing people to buy books at Christmas time instead of the regular line of holiday goods. Don't you know that I've got ten thousand sweat-stained dollars' worth of gew-gaws and gimcracks on hand for Pejor and his precious friends to buy for one another this Christmas? And if they are not sold, I am just that many dollars out, besides all the advertising, extra clerk hire, and decorations—about fifteen thousand dollars in all."

"That bankrupt you?" Socratic wanted to know, solicitously.

"Oh, no. I suppose I could weather the gale, all right. But keeping out of bankruptcy court is not my object in perspiring around that store of mine fourteen hours a day."

"You're in business to stay, then?"

"Sure, I'm no quitter. I've been too long getting things to where there is some show of making a dollar or two to drop it now."

"What interests you more than your holiday profits is the profit balance for the whole year, isn't it?"

"Do I look like a myope?"

"And what interests you more than the balance for this year and next, is the average of the profits for the next twenty years?"

"You have guessed it."

"Who is it brings the money into your store?"

"Now, I can see that I am going to learn something. This famous catechism has begun again. Well, I've always found it worth a lot of money to me, so I'll answer like a good scholar. Please sir, it's my customers."

"Well done, little man. And now can you tell us what influence the prosperity of your customers has on your profits?"

Speak right up, now, so that all the class can hear."

Where the Profits Originate

"Why, the more money the buyers have, the more and the better goods they will buy, of course."

"And where does the money your customers have come from?"

"Why, it's their profits on their business, using the word in its broadest sense."

"Fine! You are rapidly becoming an economist. Then you would like to see every one of your customers and prospective customers make a profit on every cent of money and every moment of time they invest, wouldn't you?"

"Why yes, I suppose so. I had never thought that it was any of my business, though, what they did with their time and money. But I guess it is, all right. What's the answer?"

"Think there is very much profit to your customers in gew-gaws and gimcracks and the time they spend on them?"

"You win! I could see it coming. And, of course, if they will only study those books Pejor is so wildly excited about, they will profit, because they will be better business men, better professional men, better workers, better salesmen. Oh, it's easy when you know how, isn't it? Come on out to the club. I'll give you a stroke a hole and beat you."

And Socratic, who is something of a web-foot himself, went out with Flushton into the weather.

The Market Value of "Future Talk"

SOCRATIC, can you recommend a good correspondent?" inquired Barnes, manager of the Nutrient Confectionery Company.

"Certainly. Do you want one?"

"Do I want one? Don't ask fool questions. Name the man."

"Didn't you just let Keenwell go?"

"Let him go? Let him go? Man, do you think I am crazy? There is absolutely the best correspondent that ever dictated a letter. He was hired away from me by the Ososweet people, hogs chew them!"

"Why did you let them do it? Couldn't you pay as much as they for such a man as Keenwell?"

"Sure I could—would have been glad to—offered the fool more than they did if he would stay with me. But it was no use."

"Offered him more? Weren't you paying him more?"

"Why no. He seemed to be working along all right on what he was getting, and I supposed he was perfectly satisfied."

"But you were paying him all he was worth, weren't you?"

"Why no. Why should I pay a man a hundred and fifty dollars a week if I can get him to work for me for sixty?"

"But how on earth did you ever get a fellow with Keenwell's ability and experience to work for sixty dollars a week?"

"Well, I told him that there was a great future for him in the concern—that we might make a partner of him if he would begin low and make good."

"And added, of course, that he need only do sixty-dollar work until he got a hundred-dollar salary?"

"Why no, of course not. He got his extra forty dollars in prospects for the future."

"What are the Ososweet people paying him?"

"A hundred and twenty-five dollars a week."

A Common Way of Cheating

"How about his future prospects there?"

"Oh, I suppose they are fully as good as they were in our office. I begin to see a light, Socratic. But why wouldn't he stay with me when I offered him a hundred and thirty?"

"Would you buy from a man who had short-weighted and short-changed you, even if he offered to give you a square deal after you caught him at it?"

"What do you mean, sir?" roared Barnes.

"Didn't you take, by your own confession, one hundred and thirty dollars' worth of work from Keenwell every week, and fill up the scale with 'future talk' instead of money—to the tune of seventy dollars?"

"Well, that is a pretty severe way to put it, Socratic, but I guess you are right. But whom do you recommend to take Keenwell's place?"

"What would you be willing to pay Breton, now with the Penobon people, if I could get him for you?"

"How much would it take to get him away from there?"

"Nothing at all. He is going to leave anyhow. They have been shortweighting him. But how much is he worth to you?"

"Do you suppose he would start in at seventy-five a week?"

"Plus 'future talk'?"

"I see—I see. The old habit is mighty hard to break. Well, I'll tell you. Breton is, in some respects, a better man than Keenwell. He knows the manufacturing end of the business better. And I guess he is just about as good on office salesmanship. I'll sign a three-year contract with him at seventy-five hundred a year. I simply can't afford these costly jars caused by my good people being hired away from me."

"Breton will be at your office bright and early tomorrow morning, ready to sign that contract. I talked the whole thing over with him two or three days ago."

"Well, he will be cheap at even that price. I've learned a mighty valuable lesson. Men like Keenwell and Breton are too tragically scarce and hard to get to try to do any economizing on their salaries."

"Do you like to have a good twelve-dollar-a-week shipping clerk hired away from you for fifteen?"

"By Goshen Indiana, no! Why the same principle applies all down the line, doesn't it?"

"Well, you can't keep on buying good service for 'future talk.' Its market value is too low."

A Tribute to Advertising

By T. J. McLAUGHLIN

Man, despite all his follies and errors, being led by a higher hand, reaches some happy goal at last.—Goethe.

IN CRITICISM there should be a serious purpose. If we denounce anything it must be in the interest of something better. If we ask humanity to give up a faith or stop worshipping, it is because we feel that mankind would be better off for so doing.

This is the spirit that prompts me to write these few thoughts upon advertising—a subject that is of vital importance to everyone in the land.

It has been said that "a drop of ink will make millions think." If that be true, advertising within the next decade will be the means of raising the nation's standard by improving the type of manhood to a point that now appears to us as a wild dream.

The whole tendency of civilization is away from supernaturalism. All the progress that science has made has been at the expense of superstition. The thought that is rising in the world today is opposed to everything but the truth. The power of this thought is making the world march on and on.

Thinkers instead of dreamers are to the fore.

Some seed thoughts that are being planted today by our advertising experts will in ten years hence mature and offer a bountiful harvest.

I dare say then that the merchant who has the pine doors in front of his store grained, so as to imitate oak, will be advertising his character. Such a merchant will be stamped as an imposter by the public.

And the merchant who at season's end will advertise "closing out regardless of cost" will be placed in charge of the sheriff.

Yes, and the churches will advertise then as vigorously as the "dives" do at this day. In this manner they will offset the glamour of the "red-light."

These conditions will materialize simply because the teacher-investigator type of advertising man is at work upon the human mind. This is the "high hand" that is pointing to the way.

In education alone do we see the light of hope that is yet to illumine all the continents of human existence. There is no doubt about it—it pays to advertise.

What One Traveling Salesman Thinks of the Mail Order Business : by O. J. Vogl

A GOOD many commercial men, merchants, and newspapers are exciting themselves uselessly about the mail order business. They continually use the hammer on the big catalogue houses.

I know of a certain commercial traveler in this section, who is never through denouncing either one or the other houses in that business, and who spends a good deal of his time talking about this subject on trains, in stores, hotels, and at conventions.

Far be it from me to criticise other travelers, or even to defend the mail order business.

I am a commercial traveler, and make my money by selling goods to the trade. My house would not sell a mail order house, or even a department store, who cut the price from the retailers one cent. However, I believe in a certain amount of fairness for our sake and that of our neighbors.

The Power of Publicity

Mail order houses are a tremendous financial success, and they are in business to stay. This fact we must admit.

When P. T. Barnum started in business as the biggest humbug on earth, other show people called him a fraud, a faker, a grafter, dishonest, and what-not? P. T. said, "Let them talk, just so they talk about P. T. Barnum."

Every knock is a boost, and P. T. collected a dollar apiece from everyone who wished to find out who was right, Barnum, or the knockers.

When they passed out from the show the onlookers asked, "Is it a humbug?" and the wiseacres only smiled a cynic smile and gave the right eyelash a roll. Nobody could resist the temptation and more dollars passed into P. T. Barnum's box office.

P. T. Barnum might have been all the knockers called him, but his name is still identified with the biggest show on earth, and he died, honored and respected, a wealthy man. Founders of mail order houses are going to do the same. The men who are going to die of gall-stones are the knockers. We may have to pass the hat to give them a decent burial.

Too Prosperous to Care

I call on many merchants and storekeepers during the year, and this is what I find: The merchant is too busy to talk about the mail order business, and the storekeeper does nothing else.

The successful business men of America have too many opportunities to let any concern hundreds of miles away give them the jim-jams. They leave that to the little fellows.

The live wire plans his own campaigns, has his own ideas to execute, and being a business general knows that by keeping his mouth shut about a competitor, who can only talk by mail, he stands a much better show with the prospective buyer than through the use of any denouncing argument. He talks goods, quality, and sale, and the little fellow on the corner with cobwebs all over the shelves, and sand in the sugar, cusses "those rich mail order grafters."

The commercial traveler who talks mail order houses instead of goods is wasting valuable lung power on a fruitless subject.

Mail order houses are here to stay, and so are merchants and commercial travelers. This country is big enough for all.

The man who will be eventually out of business, is the storekeeper with a catalogue nightmare, and the commercial traveler with a hammer in his sample case. All others will be too busy filling orders.

The parcel post is coming, and so are more interurbans, air ships, and postal savings banks. The men who grow with the times are benefited by the change, those with the yellow streak will live in fear and die in despair.

Open the door of opportunity for your boys with a steady, patient, persistent campaign of advertising—and then as you begin to slide down the other side of the hill, watch the results of your investment.

—Cosmopolitan.

Patrick B. Delany—the Man Who Gave Us the Electric Mail : by James E. Clark

EVERY salesman ought to be familiar with the life of Patrick B. Delany. It contains unparalleled illustrations of the value of three great principles without which no man can be a successful salesman: Persistence, the law of non-resistance, and "selling it right."

Mr. Delany persisted in his determination to solve a problem until it yielded—persisted after even the great Edison had turned his energies in other directions.

Mr. Delany vainly tried for years to solve a problem in electricity by trying to combat and overcome the "static," or accumulative electricity on a telegraph wire. He failed until he practiced the law of "non-resistance," when instead of trying to eliminate this electricity he made it his ally. Then he succeeded, just as have many salesmen who have turned apparent defeat into victory by strategy.

But most important of all, is the manner in which Mr. Delany has sold the product of his years of toil. When one has made a great discovery and can prove its value, the market is easy.

Mr. Delany was not content with merely an easy market or a good sale. He wanted to sell in a manner that would confer the maximum degree of benefit on the people. His purpose is giving the country an electric mail.

The Man Delany

But a word of Delany personally: His success was no accident, not the gift of inspiration nor the taking advantage of one opportunity. He thought out, and fought out, and worked out everything.

Mr. Delany came from Kings County, Ireland, at nine years of age. At sixteen he was not only a good telegraph operator, having regular employment in Hartford, Conn., but he was already doing out-of-the-ordinary things. He was the wonder of the veteran telegraphers because he was able to take messages twenty or thirty words "behind the wire," able to remember the message after it had been ticked off and write it down leisurely.

In 1871 Mr. Delany became associated with Mr. Edison in experiments in a system of rapid telegraphy for which a line was constructed between New York and Washington. Afterwards he sold a patent on "Delany's relay" and a patent on an anti-induction cable. Each of these inventions brought him a fortune, enabling him to continue his experiments and studies in his own way and without the delay or embarrassment that has sometimes attended the work of other men of achievement.

Every Seeming Disadvantage can be Turned Into a Real Advantage

Against the attainment of a high speed in telegraphy there had always been the static charge of electricity in the wire to contend with. This accumulating of electricity when great speed was attempted seemed for years to be an insuperable barrier in the way of the progress desired.

PATRICK B. DELANY

At one time three strong and keen young men worked on this problem, confident that if they could solve it, they would reap great benefits. One of these men later devoted himself to experiments in other directions that have made him world famous. That was Edison. Another of the trio later founded an electrical manufacturing company known throughout the world. That was Johnson, first president of the General Electric Company.

The third of the men—Delany—never relinquished the idea of a better telegraphy. He kept up his experiments until one day he found that by making a helper of the hitherto hostile static charge of the wire he could accomplish what he had set out to do—the perfection of an electrical machine that would enable him to send telegrams at a speed sufficient to make the work of the speediest operator like the snail's pace.

Resorting to the law of non-resistance gave Mr. Delany a victory over the will of the wire, as the same expedient has given salesmen mastery of otherwise hopeless clients. After that discovery came the perfection of Mr. Delany's automatic system of rapid telegraphy, whereby from 1,000 to 8,000 words a minute may be sent over a single wire!

A Broad View of Salesmanship

Mr. Delany's system completed, the thing next in order was to sell it. In view of the prestige that his previous inventions had given him (*), the ordinary sale of so useful a discovery as the system of machine telegraphy would have been a simple matter.

But Mr. Delany was not content to merely sell. He wanted to sell right. This is the essence of genuine salesmanship. In consequence, offers from capitalists were never availing.

He decided that the whole people, not a few moneyed men, should have the benefit of his invention, to the end that telegraphy as a whole should be advanced from its present restricted position and become the servant and the ally of all the people both for business and social communication, just as is the mail.

There is no good reason, he argued, why telegraphy, which is so freely used in all foreign countries, should not be even more freely used here, where there are so many demands for speed and dispatch.

More pieces of postal matter are mailed in the United States in proportion to the population than in any other country. There are seventy a year per capita in France, eighty-six in Great Britain and one hundred and thirty-five in the United States.

But in the use of telegrams, the United States, the birthplace of telegraphy, is far behind other countries.

The number of messages per capita which we send is one and twenty-five hundredths, while Great Britain sends two and twenty-seven hundredths, and far off New Zealand sends five and five hundredths.

Mr. Delany determined to give the people of this country not only the same telegraphic aid that those of foreign countries enjoy but to go beyond that which Morse had once dreamed and later despaired of doing.

And this leads to one of the most curious of historical facts. Samuel Smiles in his classic volume, "Self-Help," published in 1857 wrote:

"Though the invention of the working steam engine—the king of machines—belongs comparatively speaking to our own epoch, the idea of it was born many centuries ago. Like other contrivances and discoveries it was effected step by step—one man transmitting the result of his labors, at the time apparently useless, to his successors, who took it up and carried it forward another stage—the sentinels of the great idea answering each other across the heads of many generations. The idea promulgated by Hero of Alexandria was never altogether lost, but like the grain of wheat hid in the hand of the Egyptian mummy, it sprouted and grew vigorously when brought into the full light of modern science."

The Sentinels of a Great Idea

Now, observe the calling of three great sentinels across the heads of the generations:

* Mr. Delany's Synchronous Multiplex System of Telegraphy, which he sold to the British Government for $150,000, and his Anti-Induction Cable on which was founded the Standard Underground Cable Company of Pittsburgh, probably the largest cable manufacturers in the world, were two of his most important contributions to telegraphic science before his invention of the Telepost system.

Between the time that Franklin drew down electricity from the clouds and the day that Morse opened his first telegraph office, ninety-two years elapsed.

In other words, it was "over the heads of three generations" that Franklin called to Morse.

Sixty-four years after the first Morse office came the first Telepost office, or in other words it was over the heads of another two generations that the great work was carried on and finally lifted to a higher plane of perfection.

Those dates cannot fail to suggest to the thoughtful the profound importance of the Delany discovery and his manner of presenting it to the public.

It seemed to Morse, when he had perfected the telegraph, that the logical way to put it into use was as a department of the post office service.

He thought that the handling of many letters by the slow methods of physical transmission by stage, rail and boat would be superseded, in part at least, by governmental adoption of an improved means of transmission of intelligence by wire.

That the old slow way could not survive when a quicker way was available seemed a natural conclusion.

But the government refused the opportunity to make telegraphy an adjunct of the postal system (though nearly all foreign countries have since done so) and Morse's ambition, the crude idea of an "electric mail," bore no fruit.

The Inspiration of the Electric Mail

When Mr. Delany had perfected his system of automatic telegraphy he at once saw that the number of messages he could send over one wire was so large that if all the present telegraph business of the country were transmitted by his machines most of the wires would nevertheless be idle the greater part of the time.

Then came the inspiration of the electric mail, an original conception with Mr. Delany. This is where Delany, the third "sentinel" working along original lines, brings into realization a seeming impossibility—an electric mail at prices which not only permit but insure its unrestricted use by the whole people.

It is evident that with a telegraph system established, using the Delany automatic rapid machines, messages may be sent at such very low rates that everybody is glad to avail himself of the opportunity to expedite his business by the aid of telegraphy.

The salesman who is separated by several states from his house will not have to await upon the slow mails, the expensive hand telegraph or more expensive telephone. The Delany system will take his message at a price that makes him step lively in sending it off, and will transmit it in a manner that insures its getting to the destination just as he wrote it. For the new telegraphy, being a machine, can not draw conclusions of its own like the hand operator. Messages are therefore sent just as they are written, punctuation marks and all.

The messages are first transcribed on a tape by a typewriter and are then fed into the sending machine by the operator, and are received on a tape at destination. There is absolutely no chance for error after the message has been written on the sending strip.

The Plan of the Electric Mail

The operating plan of the Telepost Company (which was organized to give the public the use of the Delany system) divides telegraph business into two major classes: Messages sent by wire and delivered by messenger; and messages sent by wire and delivered by mail. A different rate per word is charged for the different services.

When the transcontinental trunkline is completed, a fifty-word telegram can be left at the Boston office for transmission to San Francisco. If the telegram is to be delivered by special messenger, the cost will be fifty cents. If it is to be delivered by mail carrier the cost will be twenty-five cents.

A letter now requiring five days from Boston to San Francisco could by Telepost be delivered in much less than five hours. The Telepost system, in addition to its regular telegram service, supplements the mail service, making possible the sending of a letter between any two points in this country within a few hours.

The Electric Mail Owned by the People

To a man who could for years stick to the pursuit of the idea that gave him the invention, the formation of a company to exploit this service would be an easy matter, although there is the formidable telegraph trust always ready to gobble up competitors or make them submit with grace to being taken in as Jonah was. To avoid this subversion of purpose, to make sure that this altruistic ideal should not be demolished, Mr. Delany departed from the beaten path.

The Telepost Company which now controls the Delany system has been founded as a public service corporation owned by the whole people. The amount of its stock in a series which any one person may hold is limited to one hundred shares, and as these shares are of small denomination it will be impossible for any person to obtain a controlling interest because care has been taken to apportion impartially the shares among the states—so widely distributed that no trust can ever gather them up.

As a further safeguard there has been created a guardian committee like the Roman Tribune of old, which has the power to forbid any action seeking to bring about a merger, sale, transfer, amalgamation or combination with any other telegraph company. This institution is known as a Board of Voting Trustees and is composed of public spirited men—men of such high character as to preclude the possibility of their ever being “handled.” They are Hon. Henry W. Blair of Manchester, N. H., formerly U. S. Senator; Gen. A. R. Buffington, of Madison, N. J.; Hon. Charles J. Faulkner, Jurist and former U. S. Senator; Rev. Dr. Charles H. Parkhurst, of New York City, the author of many works looking to the betterment of social conditions; H. Lee Sellers, of Lexington, Virginia, President of the Telepost Company; Mr. F. W. Shumaker, of New York City, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Sterling Debenture Corporation; Rear-Admiral Charles D. Sigbee, of Washington, D. C.; Mr. George Wiard, of Batavia, N. Y., President of the Wiard Plow Company. The veto of any one of these men can prevent any action affecting the independence of the company.

It was less than two years ago that the Mayor of Boston sent a telegram to the Mayor of Portland on the occasion of the opening of Mr. Delany's first line. Since then great strides have been made in extending the system. A number of cities and towns in New England enjoy the benefits of the electric mail. In the middle west the system includes Chicago, Indianapolis, St. Louis, Sedalia, Terre Haute, Kansas City, Louisville, Omaha. Other cities and towns are being rapidly added to the list and presently the whole country will be able to use the electric mail.

When Morse, the inventor of telegraphy, first sought to give his invention to the world he was ridiculed and reviled by many. That he had scant encouragement is apparent from the governmental rejection of his offer to sell at a ridiculously low price. But times have changed since then and in contrast to his early struggles we find people everywhere waiting to welcome the new telegraphy, not alone because of its merits, but principally because the inventor in putting it into use was deeply moved by a cardinal principle of true salesmanship—“selling it right.”

Did He Mean It?

SALESMANSHIP was the topic of conversation at a dinner table the other day. Among the diners were two life insurance solicitors.

An instructor in salesmanship remarked to a student of the science that one of the hardest points to make some types of men understand was that salesmanship is persuasion. Instead of using persuasion the aggressive man usually tries to “club” the other fellow into his way of thinking.

Presently the conversation drifted to competition and the fact was brought out that healthy competition is desirable for it helps to educate the public mind.

Instantly Mr. Aggressive Insurance man, speaking of a competitor said: “That man is not only dirty in competition—he is a liar.” Then with a boastful chuckle he continued, “But I fixed him up in R—. I lapsed every policy he wrote except one and I'll get that when the next premium is due. I just used his own weapons on him.”—K. M. H. B.

Doing the Work that You Like—How to Prepare for it : by Leonard W. Smith

THE other day I read: "It is better to pound an anvil and make a good horseshoe than to pound a pulpit and make a poor sermon." And it is. Yet ordinary observation shows that a very large part, if not the largest part, of all the world's workers are square pegs in round holes, men who are pounding pulpits instead of anvils.

I think that the reason is simple—very few of us are doing the work we'd like to do. Chance cast our lots into certain lines of work and we stick to these uncongenial lines largely through force of habit.

Yet no man ever makes a success of work that he does not like, no man does as well as he might so long as he is working at one thing and wishing that he was busy in another line. To my mind there is no advice that is safer to follow than this: If your work is not to your liking quit it right now and take up the work that you want to do. No apparent sacrifice that may be involved in the change is half so important as is your future happiness and efficiency.

The Way Out for Round Pegs in Square Holes

Have you ever noticed how remarkably successful are the men and women who have taken courses in correspondence schools? If you have, you may have attributed this success to the excellence of the training that the schools give—but that isn't the reason. The reason that graduates of correspondence schools get ahead is the fact that in almost every case these men and women have picked out the kind of work that they want to do and have deliberately fitted themselves for that work.

The great work that is done by schools like that of Scranton is not the work of helping men and women to education, but rather the work of helping square pegs to get out of round holes.

I have before me as I write one of the weekly reports of the International Correspondence School. It says that during the week ending April 7, this year, fifty-three people were graduated by the school.

Out of the fifty-three, eleven were twenty or younger, twenty-six, or practically half of all, were between twenty and thirty, eleven were between thirty and forty, and four between forty and fifty. The average age was twenty-seven years.

But even more significant is the fact that out of the fifty-three graduates at least twenty completed courses which were radically different from the lines of work in which the students were engaged. The others took courses which enabled them to rise higher in without leaving their present field.

As illustrations of the first class of students I mention a farmer studying book-keeping, a weaver studying illustrating, a section hand studying cotton spinning, a telegraph operator studying surveying and mapping.

Here then are twenty men all of whom have been at work for several years, fitting themselves to change their occupation, to do the work that they want to do.

Great is the Correspondence School

And because the correspondence school offers not only the means by which a man may leave the uncongenial task and enter upon the work that he likes, and because it offers this change with a minimum of sacrifice, I say that the correspondence school is almost the most useful institution in this country. It is doing more to promote industrial and human efficiency than can possibly be calculated. As a promoter of individual prosperity and happiness I think it heads all other institutions that I know of.

The average boy leaving school to go to work, takes the first job that offers. The younger the boy the less able he is to decide what work he would like to do. And yet the younger the boy the more likely it is that he is obliged to go to work to help poor parents, and the less likely he can afford to give up an uncongenial job.

Thus ignorance and necessity conspire to force the boy into work that he doesn't like, and to keep him at it. Before many years have passed ambition is dead, work becomes habit, and life becomes a dull gray, uninspiring prospect. The boy and the man lose, and society loses.

I have said before that almost all labor is painful. Even the task which one chooses for oneself is rarely a joy forever. But doing the work that you want to do is infinitely more pleasurable than doing the other kind. And it is more profitable.

Labor is paid for in proportion to its results. The man who does the most work and the best work gets the most wages. There is no man living who will not do more and better work if he picks his own task than if he is obliged to labor in an uncongenial field.

So any means that enables men and women to change from work they don't like to work that they do, not only lightens labor and promotes individual happiness and success, but it promotes individual prosperity and national efficiency.

Do the work that you want to do and you will be happy. If you are not doing the work that you'd like to be doing, change. It may mean sacrifice, it may mean study and hard work, and beginning all over again, but all the sacrifice and study and work will be well repaid.

Short-Sighted Employers

I think that here I may be permitted to suggest that in every shop there are boys and men who would like to change to some other department and who would become better workmen by so doing. But most employers are averse to such changes.

If a man is a good shipping clerk it seems folly to allow him to transfer to the main office because it seems like losing a good shipping clerk and gaining a poor book-keeper. But if the shipping clerk is an earnest, intelligent fellow and can give reasons for wanting to change, it is my opinion that an employer stands in his own light when he refuses him the opportunity. For he spoils a good shipping clerk nine times out of ten, and gains nothing by the refusal. Any man with brains enough to be an employe worth having, will resent the obstacle that has been placed in his way.

Give the boys a chance. A wise man fits men in where they will find work to their liking—only a fool employer fires a boy because he would rather work in the machine shop than run errands or because he would rather feed a press than learn to set type.

Think it over.

To stand a little way
Above the crowd,
To fell the blinding spray
From torrent cloud
Full in the face,
To strive, to love, to lead,
To blaze the trail,
To serve by word and deed—
And then to fail,
Is no disgrace.

—Glen Buck

Fools and Their Money—A Financial Joke on the Investors : by Thomas Dreier

GUMSHOE & BLUDGEON operated a manufacturing plant of unpretentious size in an unpretentious corner of a business block in an unpretentious city in Ohio. They started out with the intention of slowly building up a local business that would do a bit more than pay their living expenses. After the living income from the local trade was assured, their plan was to manufacture a special article for which, they felt assured, there was a national market.

The building up of the local business went on according to schedule. Gumshoe was an expert machinist and folks knew that when he was entrusted with a job it would be well done. Bludgeon was the business partner. His abilities were directed toward the eminently respectable end of keeping the books and looking after soliciting of new business during dull periods in the office. Neither partner could pose as an intellectual genius and get away with it. They were both common, ordinary, enthusiastic, persistent, well-intentioned, ambitious young business men.

The work done by the firm speedily won for them a local reputation that made their competitors wince. They did work such as had never been done in that city before. There was a certain quality about it that was unmistakably winning. No one would think of intrusting delicate work to other machinists when Gumshoe could be secured to attend to it. All this was fine for the business. Trade was getting brisk. More machines and more helpers had to be added. Before six months had slipped by Cæsar-like ambitions began tumbling over one another in Gumshoe's head. He saw himself at the head of a concern that would be favorably known all over the country. The limelight struttings of his imaginary self appealed to his vanity. He pushed his hat a little farther to the rear of his head, puffed more vigorously at his pipe, and in the smoke saw himself pointed out as a plute by the envious proletariat.

"We've got to have more capital in this business," he flung at Bludgeon one day, elevating his feet to the top of the desk that served both of them.

Bludgeon stared. Then he pulled out a drawer, opened a cigar box, took out a cigar, lit it, puffed a few spasmodic puffs, placed his feet beside those of his partner on the desk, settled back in his chair, crossed his fingers behind his head, looked expectantly at his companion and waited.

"Yes, sir," continued Gumshoe, who had waited patiently for his co-worker to settle himself comfortably, knowing that what was to be said would be listened to with greater attention, "we've got to round up some more capital in this business."

"Why?" queried Bludgeon. "I thought we were doing pretty well."

"That shows what an antique you are in modern business building," said Gumshoe, removing his feet to the floor with a bang. "Now, listen to me," he continued, after interrupting himself long enough to pack his pipe and light it. "This business is all right. We are making a small living as it is. We are doing much better than we imagined we would when we began. Our force is three times as big as it was when we started. We have more business than we can take care of with present equipment. If we build slowly we shall eventually make a good living."

"Isn't that all we want?" asked Bludgeon.

"It isn't all I want," and Gumshoe cast what he intended as a withering look at his partner, whose ambitions were those of a child according to his manner of thinking.

"I can see that we have possibilities in this invention of ours that ought to make us millionaires. I want more than a comfortable living. I want to ride in my own touring car, and I want to have the comforts that I can get only by annexing a big pile of money soon. I might get it by working at this business and developing it slowly, but I don't want the early years of my life to slip by without enjoying it. I want money right now."

"How can we get it?" asked the slower Bludgeon, showing his interest by placing his feet on the floor, forgetting to flick off the ashes of his cigar that fell on his vest.

"I've thought about that. The effects of the late financial unpleasantness having in a measure been forgotten, confidence has been restored to a large extent. Already the middle-class people are taking their savings out of their socks and ginger-jars and are looking about for places for investment.

"If you have been reading the magazines of late, and have not neglected your education to the extent of failing to read the advertising pages, you must have noticed the number of offers of stock that have been dangled before the investing public. That these companies continue to advertise month after month is proof that those advertisements are producing results. People are investing and——"

"Do you mean to say that we might get money in that way?" ejaculated Bludgeon, his mouth dropping open and showing his large, yellow teeth.

"That, my infant, is just what I mean," answered Gumshoe, smiling benevolently, like the president of a country school board after receiving the correct answer to a question asked of a child.

"But how?" persisted Bludgeon.

"We shall incorporate this business for $250,000——"

"But it isn't worth $250,000!" ejaculated Bludgeon, whose father had been a New England minister, and who therefore had been trained to give value for value.

"Of course, I do not want to pose as the financial expert of this firm," answered Gumshoe, "but if I may be permitted to offer you the crumbs of knowledge I possess without being afflicted with your interruptions, I should esteem it a great favor.

"It is true that this business couldn't be sold for $250,000, but if we sell it to a corporation which we shall form ourselves, we need not be too modest in placing a value upon the good will."

"Do you mean——"

"Exactly. I mean that the law is very generous in permitting us to estimate our present and prospective good will at a high price. Of course, we shall not be able to sell it for enough to control the company if all the stock were sold at once. But supposing we take as much stock as we can under the law, and then sell to the public only so much as will leave the control in our hands.

"It is a very simple matter to keep control of a company if the thing is rightly handled from the start. Of course, we are not particularly interested in the stockholders. We want to be sure that our own nests are feathered. All we want is to get from the public the money we need to manufacture and market this specialty of ours.

"We know the business thoroughly. We know the value of our specialty. We feel sure that with proper advertising it will be sold successfully at a big profit. But we need capital. I believe that we can get this capital by means of a well-printed prospectus, some good follow-up letters and a bit of well-designed advertising in the magazines. The fact that we use the standard magazines will give dignity to our proposition."

"But," asked Bludgeon, "how are we to control it if it does grow big?"

"Oh, that's the simplest part of it. To market the specialty is our real task. To control the company is the work of a child. Listen to me. We take as much stock as the law will allow us. That gives us a big advantage at the start. We take this stock in exchange for this partnership business of ours, our equipment, stock, fixtures and good will. This last is of especial value. Then we sell to the public less than is required to give the public control. Of course, you know a wise and benignant government sees to it that the owner of the majority always controls a corporation.

"Controlling the corporation, as we will, there is no reason why we should not vote ourselves any salaries that our great brains and precious talents deserve. Of course, I may be mistaken, but it strikes me that we shall not be compelled to change any of our stockholders into plutocrats by paying them big dividends. To save them from the sufferings which always attend the acquisition of great wealth suddenly, we'll take the money that might be spent in dividends and use it for salaries or to make investments in new equipment. With the money that we do not need for our own necessities and luxuries we'll buy treasury stock, which will add to our strength. And if at any time we are forced to sell treasury stock in order to secure cash for an emergency, and have no money with which to purchase an equal amount of stock for ourselves, we can give our personal notes for any amount of stock we desire. Of course, our notes will be acceptable to the officers, since we shall be the officers."

They Incorporate

Having arranged all these matters beforehand, Gumshoe & Bludgeon set about incorporating their business. For a consideration an attorney attends to everything. He prepares the papers of application, sends them to the secretary of state, guides the new corporation between the legal rocks in the commercial channel, prepares the minutes of various preliminary meetings without requiring the attendance of the incorporators, and acts the part of the corporation's wet nurse with the ease and manner of one who had performed similar duties before.

In the meantime Gumshoe has been sitting up nights preparing a prospectus. His first move was to write to all companies advertising stock for sale. He paid special attention to the work of getting information from other companies in his own line. Seated at his desk, he had before him the offerings of half a dozen big firms. The only difference between those companies and the one he was about to father was that they were blessed with real assets. Gumshoe intended to write a prospectus that would combine lies and truth so skillfully that only a personal investigation of the books would serve to untangle them.

After reading the various booklets, letters and folders, Gumshoe filled his pipe, pulled a pad of paper toward him, sharpened his pencil, and began to take notes. After gathering the kind of material from these sources, he wrote. He first sketched the early history of his company. He dwelt upon the early hardships and struggles of the founders, of their perseverance under difficulties, of their iron courage and indomitable determination to succeed, of the long hours of work and the sleepless nights spent in planning, of the doubt of friends and of the faith of the founders, of the apparent failure of the company and of the sudden turn toward success, of the growth of the business to a point where dividends could have been paid were the dollars not reinvested in equipment, of the inability of the owners to handle the business on hand with the present equipment and capital, and finally, of the altruistic determination of the owners to share their wealth with those wise folks who would not neglect to nab Opportunity by the forelock.

Sandwiched in between all this were stories about other companies that had achieved wonderful success. It was told that one Bill Jones, a poor, untutored laborer, who had saved a paltry hundred dollars and had invested it in the Umpty-Ump Company in its early days, had seen his holdings increase in value until he was able to send his daughters to a fashionable finishing school and his sons to Harvard. Of Sam Smith, a modest grocer in Timbuctoo or Kalamazoo, it was related how he had, after much persuasion on the part of a salesman for the Blankety-Blank Company, invested $500 in stock and in less than ten years sold his holdings for half a million.

With remarkable self-restraint, Gumshoe held his vivid imagination in check and eventually produced a prospectus that was a model in every respect for the purpose for which it was intended. It was printed by a printer who knew how to combine inks and paper skillfully. There was nothing ornate about it. It was chaste. One would almost think it the offering of some conservative banking firm of established reputation. There was about it a certain atmosphere of solidity—an atmosphere that compelled one to believe in the promises and statements it contained. It was an exquisite piece of work from both literary and mechanical standpoints. In fact, the only thing that could be criticized was its failure to tell the truth.

To begin with, there appeared an elegantly doctored picture of the building which offered the firm a home. Although the original building showed many signs of various other businesses, the engraver who made the cut managed to eliminate them. In reality the company occupied but a small corner of the structure, but by means of a big sign stretched across the entire front the prospective stock purchaser was made to believe that the Gumshoe & Bludgeon Company occupied everything in sight. Statements about the financial condition of the company were made which even a careless analysis of the books would show to be untrue. Boasts were made about the demand for the specialty that had but a faint foundation of truth. Lies, truths, half-truths, perverted truths, all kinds and varieties of truths and lies were skillfully blended. The effect was one that almost any promoter without the burden of a conscience would have been proud to call his own.

The effect upon the public was almost instantaneous. Having won the confidence of hundreds of persons by the excellence of work done for them in the past, these people accepted as true all that was told them by the prospectus. Their confidence had been given the concern before and they were somewhat justified in believing that they would be given a square deal. They sent in their checks and the treasurer was made happy as a child with a new toy. He was given the opportunity to handle more money than he had handled at any one time previously. Gumshoe was elated. He seemed to be on the road to affluence. With his hat tilted still farther to the rear of his head, he paraded the streets of his home town like a peacock on parade. As a strutter he graded one hundred per cent. With him everything seemed lovely and the goose honked high.

Prosperity

More circulars and letters were rushed out. More money and checks came in. Success seemed assured. Gumshoe never doubted. His vivid imagination showed him hiding about in an aeroplane that would startle the sober natives of his native city. He began to poke out his chest. Instead of attending to business, he began to take trips to places where he might gratify his desire to strut. As a result of his absence the local business fell off. Jobs were not delivered. Requested estimates were not furnished. The money came in so easy that, like gamblers, the players led him on their efforts. The local organization began to weaken. Some of the wise workers, seeing the drift of things, knowing that Gumshoe had lost his head and was running amuck, began to leave. The quality of the work fell off. Gumshoe rushed hither and thither, but the business had slipped away from his fingers. It was headed down hill.

To make matters worse, the news leaked out, as news of that kind always will, that the company had sold stock under false pretenses. Stockholders, forgetting that their duty, like that of children, was to remain unseen and unheard, began to ask impertinent questions. Very gentlemanly and very evasive answers were made. But the stockholders, forgetting their manners, became insistent. Less gentlemanly answers were sent. One of these reached a peppery old gentleman who hadn't learned not to allow his angry passions to rise. With blood in his eye, he bought a ticket that showed his destination to be the Ohio city. With blood still in his eye, he asked the policeman the way to the Gumshoe & Bludgeon building. The policeman didn't know. Neither did the street car conductor. Finally he found his way to a newspaper office and was given the right directions.

At length he saw a building that looked like the one the prospectus showed. But where was the big sign? And what meant all those smaller signs on the various windows? The elevator boy took the visitor to the very top floor and told him to walk down the full length of a dirty, ill-lighted corridor. At the end he saw a sign on the greasy glass door that told him his journey was about at an end. He stepped in.

Instead of the palatial offices which he had been led to expect to find, instead of scores of busy workers and clicking typewriters, instead of fine furniture and expensive art hangings, he saw before him a dirty, unswept, poorly furnished room; one scared looking stenographer; a big table covered with cigar ashes and a pile of papers that resembled a magpie collection; four chairs, one without a bottom and one held together with wire; a rug that was once gaudy in color now showed nothing of its former magnificence, being streaked with cigar ashes that had been ground into it by heavy heels. A dusty umbrella stood in one corner. A safe that had once done duty for a druggist, and that still bore the druggist's name, stood backed against a door. Its door was open, showing the disorderly array of books and boxes within. Bludgeon, a heavy cigar between his lips, arose and showed his yellow teeth in a smile. The blood still showed in the visitor's eyes.

But the peppery man had a sense of humor. Looking around at the desolate, dilapidated room, its scared stenographer, the yellow-toothed Bludgeon, the dusty umbrella, there came to him a thought of the prospectus. The picture painted there and the actual reality were too far apart to mate. Realizing that nothing could be gained by taking counsel of his temper, the peppery man laughed. The pitiful reality contrasted with the vision that must have existed in Gumshoe's mind when he wrote the prospectus was too much for the visitor's sense of humor. So he advanced toward Bludgeon with eyes that beamed with good nature.

Mr. Pepper Pays a Visit

"My name is Pepper," he said, "from Columbus. I bought a couple of shares of stock in your concern and thought I'd drop in for a little visit. I am sorry I haven't time to avail myself of your invitation to all your stockholders to look at your books. I'll just walk around with you, if you don't mind, and then catch the next train out."

At his mention of his inability to look at the books Bludgeon looked relieved. He joyfully escorted Pepper around the shop, stopping to introduce him to grinning workers as "one of our stockholders." Pepper saw how small the institution was. He smiled as he remembered that it had been compared with some of the biggest in its line in the land. The meagre equipment, the smallness of the machines, the untidiness and dirtiness of the place, the pitiful makeshifts indicative of poverty, the insignificant mental size of Bludgeon—all so painfully contrasted with what he had been told by the prospectus that Pepper was forced to struggle between mirth and anger.

"I certainly was an 'easy mark,'" he said to himself, "to have invested even a few dollars in this concern without having investigated. Of course, I excuse myself because my confidence was won by the excellent quality of the work this shop has done in small things. But I should have known that the place wasn't what it was advertised to be. I should have discovered the Ethiopian in the coal-bin. If I had used my usual good sense I should have taken pains to learn something of the personalities of the men behind, for I certainly am old enough to know that the men behind, their strength or weakness, means success or failure."

All this flashed through his mind in a moment. All the time he was apparently listening to Bludgeon's prattle, all of which was but a rehash of the arguments advanced in the prospectus. There was in Bludgeon's manner a certain innocent pride—a pride of one who had hypnotized himself into believing the lies Gumshoe had written. Pepper, wise in reading men, recognized the innate honesty and simplicity of the parrotic Bludgeon. He saw that the man had no intention of defrauding folks, but that he had been convinced by the stronger personality of Gumshoe of the justice of the Jesuitical doctrine which proclaims that the end justifies the means. That Bludgeon believed that the company would succeed, he did not doubt. Bludgeon, in his ignorant innocence, was blinded by the glittering lies his partner had perpetrated.

"I'll let the poor fool enjoy himself in his ostrich-like security," said Pepper to himself. "It would be a shame to rob him of his present pleasure, since his pain will start soon. He is just about as innocent of the true state of affairs as I was when I bought my stock." Then to Bludgeon he turned with, "Well, Mr. Bludgeon, I'll have to move along. I want to thank you for an amusing morning. Why not drop down and 'have one' on me?"

Bludgeon mournfully refused the invitation, having read somewhere that stockholders are sometimes suspicious of officers who indulge in intoxicants. The burdens of his position as an officer of an institution in the public eye were beginning to bear down heavily upon his weak shoulders.

Pepper's visit was the beginning of the end. Although he felt that he deserved to lose what he had invested because of his failure to investigate, he certainly did not intend that others should foolishly make further investments if he could prevent it. He felt that it was his duty as a business man to prevent crooks from muddying the waters of confidence out of which honest folk must drink. But he did not intend to take the Gumshoe & Bludgeon matter too seriously. It came to him that laughter would be more effective than invective or legal action.

Therefore, he began telling of the joke played upon him and others by two bright boys in the Ohio city. Many of his friends had invested when he did. He took special delight in inviting them to a dinner. When they were properly ballasted with food and drink, he told them of his journey and his discoveries. Some were inclined to "do things" to the promoters, but the majority agreed with Pepper that they had better charge their investment up to educational and experience expense and make that investment pay profits which were expected from Gumshoe & Bludgeon.

These men could afford to lose what they had invested. But there were clerks in stores, stenographers, salesmen on small salaries, small merchants and others who had purchased stock. To these Pepper wrote a letter telling of the joke he felt had been played upon him and his friends, of his discoveries in the Ohio city, of the smallness of the concern, of the debts under which it was being borne down, and, last, of the futility of attempting to take legal action to recover what had been invested. He advised them to pocket their loss and "go and sin no more." He suggested to them, as he had suggested to his own friends, that they might yet make the investment in experience yield them big dividends. The majority took his advice. Some, however, were not so forgiving. Harsh letters went from them to Gumshoe & Bludgeon. Gumshoe tried to placate them with honeyed letters. But the laughter and the public speaking of those that had been duped by his lies had stopped the sale of stock and the end was in sight.

For months Gumshoe & Bludgeon had been paying running expenses, salaries and pleasure trip costs out of money received from stock. Bludgeon had stated early in the campaign that if a sufficient amount of stock was not sold—enough to insure the success of the national campaign intended to launch the specialty—the money would be returned to the stockholders. But the demand for money for running expenses, the dropping off of the local income, the desire to gratify Gumshoe's desire to strut and pose, all these had broken down the original determination and the stock money was thrown into the business. Expenses had increased, local business had fallen off to almost nothing, stock sales stopped, and creditors began demanding money. Gumshoe, like a cat on a hot brick, rushed hither and thither, but the days spent in wining and dining and loafing had incapacitated him for work. His vision was warped. Bludgeon, unused to the emergency he faced, was like a child. Then the creditors stepped in.

The books were found in woeful condition. Bludgeon had tried to keep them in shape for the sight of stockholders. As a result they, like the prospectus, were a mass of truth and lies. But an expert accountant brought order out of chaos, the plant was sold for less than was required to pay the debts, and Gumshoe & Bludgeon were left with the wreck of their dream. They had bartered a local business, built on the solid foundation of satisfactory service, for a prospective national business, built on a foundation of misrepresentation and lies.

Gumshoe secured employment at a bench in a rival machine shop. Bludgeon was employed behind the counter of a local cigar store.

Pepper, when he heard of the end, thinking of them and of the stockholders they had duped, merely said, "Fools and their money——"

"It is very good for strength to know that someone needs you to be strong."—Mrs. Browning.

"Most of the sins of youth spring from inability to use rightly the leisure hour."—F. A. Atkins.

Energy—The Dominant Keynote in Life's Success Symphony : by Bertha A. Loeb

THE mad rush of great cities like New York or Chicago, and the whirlpool of eddying life in bustling centers of industry, often startle one.

The people hurrying hither and thither like leaves before a gale; the cars clanging by; the automobiles honking unmelodiously their hoarse notes of warning; the elevated trains flying by overhead—all these impressions of swift, hurried, breathless life excite one into wonderment over it all.

What does all this mad race, this deafening noise mean? Is this the essence of life that all should seem a chaos and confusion?

To the man who lives a quiet, peaceful, placid life in a village, or small town, where Nature speaks to him in the eloquent song of bird or language of the trees and the babbling stream, meandering in idleness the live-long day, life seems often as free from the clouds of worry as the blue skies of a long, sunny summer's day.

To the calm dweller in rural districts, the city man who hardly takes time to breathe, to eat, to love, or to live, the man in the whirligig of business life in a great city seems often suffering from a form of lunacy, the victims of which mania are to be pitied and consoled with rather than held responsible as rational beings.

The Wondering Dweller in Arcadia

Says the dweller in the small town in cynical criticism of the urbanite's bustling activity, "What fools these mortals be.

"They are a money-mad lot scrambling after the glittering coin, chasing after material possessions, day in and day out, year in and year out, as if money and materials alone were life.

"The only cure for their madness is the allotted six feet of earth at the end of their wild gallop over the obstacles that confront them."

But the city hustler, the man who wants to arrive somewhere, answers, "Life is service and he profits most who serves best."

To keep alive in the industrial whirlpool of life one must work.

To do one's work in life, energy and vigilance are needed all along the line.

The man who nods and falls asleep, who is not actively engaged in eyeing his resources—such a man arrives nowhere.

This world with its starry domes, its trees and budding blossoms, was made for the enjoyment of man, God's highest creature in the flesh.

But life was not given to man as a plaything to be used at his own pleasure and to be frittered away in idle ease.

A Hustler—But a Failure

One must earn the right to enjoy the sublime peace of the evening sky, by the toil of the day, by the honest effort at achievement.

The city man, whose business life of push and jostle and hurry has atrophied his love of nature, who, on account of figuring up the dollars year after year has no time to enjoy the vast silent spaces and the majestic forests of this great old earth of ours—that man is a failure. Be he worth millions he is still a beggar, for he possesses nothing worth while.

He is not master of his wealth. He is but a slave of his possessions.

He is not a human soul with divine attributes. He is a distended pocketbook full of bank-notes.

This failure of a man is the city man who rushes madly to his own undoing.

But there is another type of city man whose energy is sane, the man with a purpose to be a doer in this world, the man who lives and helps others to live.

This sane, strenuous man with push you can see by the myriads in great cities. He forges his way ahead, converting legitimate desires into powers by the use of this inborn energy.

He puts on his thinking cap. He conceives a certain ambition, he invents means to encompass his ends, he studies the situation, then he slaves and forges his way ahead so that he may conquer by mere force of will power and energy.

This is a specimen of manhood—the kind that helps civilization forward instead of retarding it, for this specimen of a man has the great asset—energy—the keynote to success in life.

Magic Words

By Charles R. Trowbridge

"Good morning!"

"Good night!"

"Good bye!"

"Good luck!"

"Thank you!"

Magic words, these.

Full of power, possibilities!

Do you use them, Mr. Business Man, in all the meaning of their creation?

Clearly, heartily, enthusiastically, firmly, courteously, smilingly?

In going after business, in closing up business?

There are so many occasions where they can be applied; so many occasions where they have made customers out of prospects, friends out of strangers.

It costs but a smile (which is always worth carrying) an open, honest, sincere manner of expression (which no man can afford to be without).

Put sunshine, gladness into your "Good mornings," your "Hello theres," your "Good nights."

Let your "Good byes," your "Good lucks," come with a merry ring and your "Thank yous" fairly bubbling over with appreciation.

Order of Mind

By ELIZABETH WEBB GAYNOR

AMONG the contrasting species of human beings around us in life, we note the difference between those unfortunates who are always hurrying, always worrying, always complaining about the numberless tasks before them, and those other people, who, quietly conscious of power, go on their useful ways, doing the day's work, the week's work, the year's work with almost elemental calm. It is superfluous to add to the description that the latter kind of person accomplishes five times the amount of work done by the former, with one-fifth the wear and tear on his own nerves and the nerves of others.

What is it ails the hurry-worry class? Not perversity, not stupidity. The state of hurrying and worrying is a habit engendered in a disorderly mind.

There was once a college professor who said to a class of freshmen: "You may think that you have a great deal to do, but you need not suffer confusion from this. You will never be at a loss what to do next, if you will follow this simple plan. At the beginning of each day, review that day's tasks in your mind. When you have these marshalled before you, divide them into three classes—the Must-be-dones, the Ought-to-be-dones, and the Want-to-be-done. Then turn your first and best attention to the first class. When those are finished, you will find the second class ready for you, and the third class can have the time that is left. Just a little generalship at the dawn of each day, and the duties of that day fall quickly into ranks of order.

This same plan applied to a man's life as a whole, begets in that life the calm and consistency of ordered action. One may say to himself, as follows:

First, I must keep in league with the forces of Good, otherwise even in life's high places I should walk in darkness.

Second, I ought to make my life a successful life. To that end was I given powers of body, mind and spirit.

Lastly, I want enjoyment of life's happiness in some of its many forms.

Only some such ordered philosophy can produce a constant mind, a consistent life, a life of great accomplishment, free from petty worries and unrest. Such was the life of the great Goethe, who was statesman, administrator, scientist, inventor, novelist, dramatist, and poet, whose motto was "Without haste, without rest."

May we all have such lives of calm in the midst of action that we may pursue our useful ways "Ohne Hast, ohne Rast."

Some Random Comments on Salesmanship and Advertising : by George H. Eberhard

IN THE work of a salesman and the preparing of advertising it is generally found that the knowledge which is of real value is that acquired from actual experience and observation.

The knowledge acquired from books and schools is necessary. But only when supplemented by actual experience can such knowledge be intelligently utilized. Nevertheless, they who have such work to do cannot study too much or analyze too thoroughly.

In both salesmanship and advertising one must, above all things, study people and their activities. In both professions it is essential to have at one's command a diversified fund of general information.

The attempt to reduce salesmanship and advertising to a science has been a big step in the right direction—a greater step forward than most of the students or workers can realize. The advertising man should study salesmanship, for advertising is but another form of salesmanship. The study of the science of advertising, its laws and their operation will help the salesman.

Both the salesman and the advertising man should understand business in its detail as well as the broad principles involved. The tendency to specialize too highly is a great weakness among salesmen and advertising men today.

Attraction and Repulsion

Now, I have no intention of discussing the principles involved or the development of either salesmanship or advertising in a systematic manner. I intend to make some random comment, showing how closely advertising and salesmanship are related and add some general thoughts on the subject.

For instance, some colors please—others repel—in advertising. Neat clothes and a clean and fresh appearance please while loud and careless dress and manners repel, in salesmanship.

Good typography and art help an advertisement to secure the best result by compelling attention. Good clothes and a well-balanced appearance help the salesman secure attention and influence the customer to decide favorably.

No man's mind can be neutral. It's always for or against what is presented to it. In reading an advertisement or listening to a salesman the prospective customer is on the defensive. Many experiences in the past have proved that all goods are not right or necessary to him even though they are advertised or presented by a salesman.

There is, as you know, the motor principle involved in all suggestions on the mind of the man receiving the printed or spoken word. If you can start the motor in your direction, you get results. The well-balanced advertisement or spoken sales talk can start the motor before judgment can interfere.

That is why, as individuals, we buy a lot of fool things, or things we do not need. Our mental motor was started and we acted before our judgment reversed it.

This suggests the fact that a man's home tells you how his mind operates, his disposition, position and viewpoint. If his home is full of a miscellaneous assortment of things that he doesn't really need, he bought because of clever advertising or selling on someone's part, it shows that he or his family is a good consumer.

This type of man to the advertising man and the salesman is usually the "ideal." This is an error. The "ideal customer" should be the one who sticks and repeats as a result of buying after his judgment decides in favor of the purchase and then through receiving satisfaction from the goods purchased.

The Business Ideal

In both advertising and selling it is well said that every institution should have an ideal that it is working toward and then the product, its management, its salesmen and its advertising, should, at all times present the institution at its best.

This ideal should be based on giving full value, good service, and building everything at its best, neglecting no detail. This brings the whole institution into full sympathy with the conclusion laid down in business philosophy—that you must work in accord with the Law of Harmony and the Law of Mutual Benefit to succeed.

If everything creates the right impression, from the merit of the product to the conduct and appearance of the business, it means a lasting, favorable impression on the customer's mind and builds a permanent trade.

Inspiring confidence is vital in advertising and salesmanship. Every individual and every ad must ring true. It is always worth repeating that honesty is the basis of confidence and it is only by having an honest purpose behind the written or spoken word that confidence in this policy can be maintained.

Every advertising campaign, every selling campaign, must be conducted on the theory that it takes time to accomplish big results. It pays to build slowly and carefully, so as to avoid lost motion through hurrying or doing things in a slack manner with the idea that it means action. In reality it creates difficulty.

The laws of sale are the same in both advertising and salesmanship. The written and spoken words in selling must be so arranged that they will, first, logically secure the attention of the prospective customer; second, create an interest in what you have to sell; third, to inspire a desire on the part of the customer to possess, and, fourth, to bring about action.

Advertisements and salesmen are judged by their surroundings or associations as well as by appearance. An advertisement in a reliable medium is more valuable and liable to cause a sale than one in an unreliable medium. A salesman with a responsible firm is likewise at an advantage and is assumed by the prospective customer to be honest. An honest salesman representing a firm of unreliable reputation will soon find he is considered to be unreliable by the trade on account of being associated with an unreliable firm.

A clean, healthy appearing salesman has the same effect on the mind as a clean impression of an advertisement on good finished paper has to the eye.

The Philosophy of Life

By CHARLES H. MICHAEL

AN ANONYMOUS writer has said: "Did it ever occur to you that a man's life is full of crosses and temptations? He comes into the world without his consent and goes out of it against his will, and the trip between is exceedingly rocky.

"The rule of contraries is one of the features of the trip.

"When he is little, the big girls kiss him; when he is big, the little girls kiss him.

"If he is poor, he is a bad manager; if he is rich, he is dishonest.

"If he needs credit, he can't get it; if he is prosperous, everyone wants to do him a favor.

"If he is in politics, it is for graft; if he is out of politics, he is no good to his country.

"If he doesn't give to charity, he is a stingy cuss; if he does, it is for show.

"If he is actively religious, he is a hypocrite; if he takes no interest in religion, he is a hardened sinner.

"If he gives affection, he is a soft specimen; if he cares for no one, he is cold-blooded.

"If he dies young, there was a great future before him; if he lives to an old age, he missed his calling."

"If you save money, you're a grouch;
If you spend it, you're a loafer;
If you get it, you're a grafter;
If you can't get it, you're a bum—
So what the Hell's the use."

But look at the thing this way:

Did it ever occur to you that a man's life is the crowning wonder of creation? He counts for what is in him, not by what is on him.

In babyhood he's a messenger of peace, a living jewel, dropped, like rain, from heaven, and he is kissed by old and young.

In manhood he is greater than the systems of worlds; there is more mystery in the union of soul and body than in the creation of the universe, and his creative genius is kissed by old and young.

If he is honest, he is rich; if he is not honest, he has fallen; he is no more a man.

If he loves his country, he is an honest politician; if he does not love his country, he ceases to be a man.

If he is broad-minded, he is endowed with religion; if he is not broad-minded, his religion is in doubt.

If he saves his money, he is prudent; if he does not save his money, he's a slave.

If he gets money, he is judged by the way he acquired it; if he does not get money, he is lazy.

If he is a man, he succeeds in everything; so be a man.

If he surmounts obstacles, he grows strong in manhood; if he does not encounter obstacles, he is a weakling.

Adversity strengthens manhood; perversity shatters the soul of man. Adversity developed a Lincoln; perversity corrupted Rome.

If you want to be a weakling, be a drone; if you don't want to be a weakling, be a man.

If you are wise and prudent, I congratulate you; if not, I pity you. So be a man.

"Hit From Where Your Hand is"

By E. N. FERDEN

GOOD advice sometimes comes from queer sources. For instance, you'd scarcely think of molding your business philosophy around the utterance of Mr. Robert Fitzsimmons.

Yet the scarlet-haired ex-chieftain of the fistic ring swung a pivot blow on a mighty fact when he delivered these crisp words of caution—

"Hit from where your hand is."

There's a lot in that—a bigger, broader truth no doubt than "Bob" had in mind.

"Hit from where your hand is."

Don't keep forever stopping to get in position.

Don't fritter away precious moments with endless preparation—mentally marshalling your forces, and then rearranging their marching order over and over again.

Don't play brain chess with "ifs" and "ands" and "buts" as knights and pawns.

Don't dream away your opportunity—time.

The world is not suffering from a dearth of ideas half as much as it suffers from a lack of somebody to put those ideas into direct execution.

Franklin might have theorized and speculated regarding electricity for a lifetime without accomplishing anything.

But he did things. He went out with his kite and bottle and brought the real lightning down from the sky to prove his theories.

Suppose the now famous Wright brothers had confined their aerial navigation to paper, and simply demonstrated by logarithms and other forms of calculation, a way to overcome gravitation and keep afloat in midair.

They'd have been set down with the rest of the dreamers.

But they didn't. They took their clothes-horse-looking machines up in the air, and punctured the clouds with them.

They made good.

It's the same in business.

Many a really brilliant man evolves a plan that is full of money-making possibilities—an original plan that will command interest on account of its novelty, and support on account of its feasibility. But while he is turning this plan over and over in his mind, another chap comes along with a similar idea—maybe not half so clever—and no more practicable.

But he is a doer and not a dreamer. He wins success.

"He hits from where his hand is," and the blow tells.

Then Mr. Procrastinator, from amid his air castles, cries out, "A fool for luck."

But it's not luck.

It's going straight through with what you set out to accomplish.

It's a great thing to be prepared for what you intend to do.

It's a greater thing to do it.

Man's Bulwarks—Courage, Persistency and Determination : by T. B. Hutton

From an Address Before the Agency Association of the Equitable Life Insurance Company of Iowa, at Chicago, Illinois, August, 17, 1910

IN MY wanderings around the haunts of my territory, a week ago, I stopped over Sunday at our Iowa summer resort to listen to what the wild waves might say, and thus get an inspiration to write this paper.

An hour before train time, after the frugal midday meal I sat upon the beach of Okoboji, and with one ear taking in the music of the hotel orchestra and the other turned toward the noisy waves of the turbulent lake, I dreamed a dream.

The past rose before me in picture form, the present stood mockingly at my side, while the future beckoned me forward with courage, persistency and determination.

I believe the first requisite of success in salesmanship is to have the common courage of starting out to do the thing attempted. And as the waves of the lake persist in beating upon the shore and thus wear away its banks and smooth even the hard, rough rocks, so we by our persistency may wear away all objections in the prospect's mind and thus smooth the sharp corners of his stubborn nature, preparing him for the inevitable.

The Insurance Turnout

Although we have the courage of a bold invader, however, and the persistency of the lightning rod solicitor, if we have not the final and most important requisite in the shape of determination, we cannot close our man. But with courage sufficient to enter the inner sanctum of the man's most guarded thought, the persistency to make one's abode there with gentle pressure and tactful methods, and the determination which knows no failure, one may gradually round up the hardest prospect.

The subject in hand is a most important subject for the insurance man, but a peculiar one to handle from the fact that it borders largely upon the state of mind of the agent rather than the prospect.

We might compare an agent and his prospect with a horse and buggy; but it is important to know which is the horse and which the buggy. While it is well to have the shafts fit, the seat comfortable and the axles oiled so that the wheels may turn with ease, if the horse is not well fed, and groomed, and shod, and its harness in perfect accord with the kind of carriage, the rig will not run very smoothly and the whole combination may be a sorry sight to behold.

The horse is the agent, the carriage is the prospect. The carriage won't go the way it should unless the horse is in prime condition. So the insurance salesman must first be mentally right.

The Right Mental Attitude

I mean by this, not one who possesses that massive intellect sufficient to overpower his adversary, not he who lugs a useless learning with language too copious for his prospect's diminutive apprehension, nor one with the psychological bump which hypnotizes and carries his man to the dotted line with pen in hand; but merely an agent with a healthy mind who carries with him always the right mental attitude. Please note these three words.

Right mental attitude are the strongest words in the vocabulary of an insurance solicitor. For without the inspiration and optimism that come from this state of mind the man is practically dead.

I feel absolutely sure of this, for I have gone over it and around it and through it, and have concluded that the man who cannot get himself into this right mental attitude is lost to the insurance world.

It is through being in the right mental attitude that we are able to gather from within ourselves the courage that helps us on and keeps us going, that causes us to continue in the good work with a never failing persistency, and gives us determination to win in every attempt we may undertake.

We may fail many times, 'tis true; but when we screw courage to the sticking point, we're not so apt to.

If we should fail—what then? Go merrily on the chase. Instead of crying over spilt milk, go milk another cow.

In the meantime store in your mind only the victories you have won, so there may be no room to remember and cherish the dismal failures.

The trite statement of "Nothing succeeds like success," is really good; but the phrase, "Dwelling upon our failures make us fail the more," is a gentle reminder and a hint sufficient to the wise.

If an insurance salesman doesn't look out he makes himself a real thermometer, as changeable as those that hang out doors in the Iowa winter weather. But if he keeps the right mental attitude the ups and downs of his daily life will not appeal to him nor have any effect whatever upon his efficiency.

A Lesson in Courage

Of course we have all gone through the trials of the insurance agent; but having just completed my infancy in this noble career of caring for the widows, I may have some of them yet fresh upon my memory. I mean the trials not the widows. Yet I presume that even those who have graduated into a comfortable renewal income still have their trials. So the continued attainment of these three great bulwarks which my subject suggests may be of value to us all.

I believe we lose many applications through lack of courage.

We think of some man we would approach but put it off because we fear to say the word.

I learned a lesson along this line a few months ago, when after a year's acquaintance with a young man I finally mentioned the subject to him and was told that he had taken out a policy for five thousand dollars just a month before.

When I stated that I would have liked to have shown him my proposition he said, "Well, you've been in here a number of times and never said anything to me about insurance, and this other man came along, it looked good and I took it."

The lesson cost me sixty dollars.

So we need courage all the time to tackle anyone we may meet; be he high or low, rich or poor, Swede, German or Irish, let him have a policy with the Equitable Life of Iowa, the Star of the West.

A card with the following statement in blazing letters is now posted in my office, "Courage, cultivate it—you need it in your business." I came across it some time ago and I thought it fit to a "T." So I stuck it over the 'phone to remind me of the applications I fail to receive by wire.

"Motion is Life"—Buster Brown

Again, we lose a number of applications by not being persistent enough. However, this may be overdone and must be applied in homeopathic doses.

I have often observed in the middle of an interview at a time when I felt ready to quit, some mere remark of the prospect or a new suggestion of my own would lead along new paths which later terminated with an application. And I presume many times I have lost by leaving the prospect too soon, or not going back to him often enough.

Persistency also means to keep at it. After one of Buster Brown's experiences, he sums it up in a resolution as follows, which insurance men might take to themselves: "Resolved, that motion is life; directly a thing stops going and growing, it begins to get feeble and rotten. The mountain stream that splashes and rushes along among the rocks stays pure as crystal. But the pond, lying motionless, grows putrid and poisonous. When a man or an institution becomes fat and rich and satisfied, the decay begins; spiritual, moral and physical."

So keep going, keep seeing people, more people all the time.

Determination the Winner

It goes without saying that the man who calls upon a prospect with no determination to close him then and there, fails before he sees him.

How much more insurance do we write when we are thoroughly imbued with the spirit of accomplishing things and nailing every man we interview with a fixity of purpose.

And how little do we write when we go about our business with a feeling of "Excuse me, sir," and lacking the inspiration and enthusiasm that surmounts all difficulties.

Emerson says, "He only is a well made man who has a good determination."

"The man without a purpose is like a ship without a rudder, it simply lies in the trough of the sea, beaten and tossed."

So an insurance man must have a purpose, a life purpose, a scheme for the month, a plan for the week, an action for the day.

Courage—thy name spells Columbus, Washington, Lincoln and is seen in all dauntless careers.

Persistence—thy name spells Morse, Edison, Field, and McCormick, and is written upon the banners of all successful men.

Determination—thy name spells Theodore Roosevelt and is written wherever that bull dog tenacity crops out in the lives of those who see a light, determine to reach the goal and are in action all the time.

But the possession of the combination of these three qualities intertwined into one grand bouquet spells Results in life insurance work; and is seen in him who plods along from day to day, with a courageous heart, and increasing energy, and a determined spirit, which carries him upward and prepares the way for a comfortable income and a knowledge that he has saved many a woman and child from the hardships of life.

Good Advertising is Good Sense

By JEROME P. FLEISHMAN

IN WRITING an advertisement, a whole lot depends on how you begin. You've got to get the reader's attention before you can hope to arouse his interest.

But, too, a whole lot depends on where you stop. Lots of advertising "makes its point," as the saying goes, and then sets about making the same point over and over again. The reader has to wade through a repetition of the same idea—has to wrestle with a long-drawn-out statement of something that can be said ten times better and twenty times more forcibly in fewer words.

I saw, the other day, in a New York newspaper, an advertisement of a firm of tailors. The ad was a full column deep and was set in pretty small type. It started with an essay on the Ethics of Advertising. Then it broke into a detailed history of how that particular firm started in business, where it started in business, what its business was, and so on, ad in-fine-type-um.

You couldn't find any real "human interest" in that copy with a search warrant. I did not read all of the ad. Unfortunately, there are only twenty-four hours in a day, and time is worth its weight in radium around a newspaper office.

Down along close to the bottom of the ad I saw a paragraph which mentioned the price at which a suit of clothes could be had at that tailor shop. That was the only redeeming feature of the advertisement.

When Sam Jones or Bill Smith or Harry Brown needs a new suit of clothes, what in thunder does he care about the Ethics of Advertising? Do you suppose he gives a rap about the dry business autobiography of some tailor? Do you? I don't.

What Sam Jones or any other prospective buyer of clothes wants to know is what Mr. Tailor is going to offer him in the way of materials, at what price, and how well equipped he is to turn out a good-fitting suit that will hold its shape and give satisfactory wear.

That is what Sam Jones wants to know. That is what you or I want to know when we are about to buy clothes. History is interesting—in libraries and around the fireside on cold winter evenings—but the newspaper reader goes to the advertiser who tells him facts that he wants to know—and tells those facts in the clearest, briefest way possible.

Good advertising is good sense. That is all.

Some Pertinent Remarks to the Seekers for Success in Life : by W. H. Tennyson

WHAT is success? Is there such a thing as a success that defies defeat, that defies pain, that defies even poverty?

Is Bliss Carman right when he states that "making use of the advantages at hand"—no matter how meager, no matter how lowly—"to the very utmost in every moment and place, is the secret of the seemingly magic process of success"?

Yes, he is right. Success is not measured wholly by material attainments. Unless advance in circumstances, in power and in riches, is accompanied pace for pace by an advance in intelligence and in feeling there is no success; that is, there is no true success.

The commercialism of the age has defined success as "the attainment or the state of attainment of high place and rich rewards." But is success really that, and that only?

"To the Seekers of Success," is the title of a paper by W. J. Ghent, in the issue of "The Independent" for September First.

"Never was the counsel to win success so loud voiced and so insistent as now," says Mr. Ghent. "Never was there such a multitude of counselors . . . And what is it that the exhorters mean by success?"

The answer is the definition quoted above, followed by the statement, "This is an age of material achievements and the meaning of the word necessarily takes on the form and pressure of the age."

The Great Army of the "Failures"

With all this multitude of counselors, of advisers and apostles of the success-religion, nevertheless (to quote again) "you may have noted that the greater number of the followers seemed to have halted this side of the earthly paradise. Effort there has been—aspiration and striving, the keeping of faith, the rigid observance of revealed precepts." Still great material success has not been attained. "All the heroic effort of these aspiring beings has been expended on a vain quest."

Why is this? Is Dr. Orison S. Marden wrong when he states that "all our limitations are in our own minds," that "if you want success, abundance, you must think success, you must think abundance"? It would seem so.

Again quoting Mr. Ghent:

"Let us take a single industry—that of the interstate railroads. Of the 1,458,244 employes in the United States (1908), how many can hope ever to be numbered among the 5,767 general officers?"

You are an employe, we shall say; and in mere numbers you have about one chance in 252 of reaching your goal . . . If all of you became the executive equals of the 5,767 general officers, there would still be places for only 1 in 252 of you . . . There are other factors to consider. In many of the branches of the railroad service the qualities needed for efficiency are not the qualities needed in 'higher' places. You might be an expert tracklayer, a brave and skillful locomotive engineer. Your expertness in these lines fits you rather for continuance in your present work than for translation to other spheres, and you will find your special excellence a bar to advancement . . . Then, too, you may have ethical scruples against taking advantage of men and occasions, and in critical times the observance of these scruples will block your advancement. . . .

"There is another thing the oracles neglect to tell you. In the vast and complex scheme of things, the 'lower' places are just as necessary as the 'higher' places. The 1,452,477 railroad men other than general officers are not employed through philanthropy. They are employed because, upon a hard, unsentimental, cash basis, it takes that many men to do the work . . .

"No matter how many men, according to the oracles, have scaled the walls of the earthly paradise, the common work has still to be done, and there is ever an eager army pleading for a chance to do it. How can it be done if all listen to the oracles of success?"

"No, the pursuit of material success solves nothing in this world worth solving. It is a cult that deceives and demoralizes and ruins, which blinds men to their actual situation in life. . . .

"By striving for individual material gain, you but wreck your own and others' opportunities. . . .

"Success, then, in its ordinary meaning, in the meaning of the oracles, is not victory, either over the world or over yourself. It is the sacrifice of what is best in man for a trumpery prize. . . .

"The rage of pursuit inevitably means the hardening of the the social feelings, the extinguishment of the spirit of brotherhood, the clouding and darkening of the social vision by which a people live and become great."

The True Essentials of Success

Parallel the foregoing with the following words from Mr. Carman's splendid book, "The Making of Personality":

"Every day 'to earn a little and to spend a little less,' as Stevenson says, is good, proverbial philosophy, and if it be paralleled"—mark you!—"in matters of the mind and heart, becomes an invaluable word of wisdom. To grow a little more reasonable and a little more kindly day by day is an essential part of the truest prosperity. . . .

"The lack of an ideal of symmetrical culture is to blame for such imperfect maturity as we find for example in persons who exhibit an overinsistent instinct for self-preservation, protecting and furthering their own animal indulgence"—striving ever for individual material gain—"regardless of cost to others."

All this is not new teaching. As a matter of fact, it is very, very old teaching. It is in part the teaching of the THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER.

There should be something more in a man's daily life than a mere hustle for dollars—that is, for material success. The motive power of a man's life should be the thought of service, not the thought of material success.

Success for the Salesman

For the salesman "in the field" or "on the road" there is another side to this whole question.

Each true salesman is one of a compact body of men who are all working for very nearly the same objects. First, they are laboring to help themselves and their families; second, they are laboring to benefit their fellow citizens; third, they are laboring to build up some institution that stands as an exponent of twentieth century enterprise.

They are laboring first, to help themselves and their families. This is because the law of the universe demands that if a man would eat he must work, or be a parasite. The true man, in obedience to the dictates of his instinct, goes forth into the world to earn a living for his loved ones, for himself and for his family. They are laboring, second, to benefit their fellow citizens. This is because they have learned, through observation and the experience of the ages, that to do otherwise "means the hardening of the social feelings, the extinguishment of the spirit of brotherhood, the clouding and darkening of the social vision by which a people live and become great."

They are laboring, third, to build up some institution, because in its hope of success is completely bound up their own hope of success in all that goes to make a man. Co-operation, mutuality of interest and loyalty demand service to this end.

There is still one more point in this connection for the salesman. Material gain for him, if he makes service his motive power, should not mean the sacrifice of any "ethical scruples against taking advantage of men and occasions." The profit he makes is the pay he receives for the service he can render, and there is no limit to that profit just as there is no limit to his power for service, except in himself—in the limit of his ability, reliability, endurance and action.

For the salesman working on a commission basis who constantly aims to grow in intellectual power by study and by observation, who aims to grow in physical power that his endurance may be greater, who aims to grow in heart power—in reliability, in sincerity, in the practice of square deal methods, and who vivifies these qualities by action, who works; it is possible to make more money and higher honor even than the officers of the company for whom he works.

In order to gain this material success, however, the direct object in life must be something else. Have an ideal before you, and let that ideal be the idea of social service. Work for the work's sake.

Let Henry Van Dyke's verses be your prayer:

"Let me but do my work from day to day,
In field or forest, at the desk or loom,
In roaring market place, or tranquil room;
Let me but find it in my heart to say,
When vagrant wishes beckon me astray:
'This is my work; my blessing, not my doom,
Of all who live, I am the one by whom
This work can best be done, in the right way.'"

The Real Test of Fitness

Work for the work's sake, and it may be that riches and power will come to you. Seek your own success in the success of all.

"In the strife for worldly success" (again quoting Mr. Ghent), "you waste energies which would enrich the world. You rob yourself and all men. However poor in nature you may be, you can yet contribute to the real success of mankind. There is everything to do.

"What though the event men call defeat forever recurs to you? . . . There is no humiliation in the thing called defeat, so only that the goal striven for is the common good. The humiliation is rather in the misuse of our fellows for our own material gain, in the obstructing and halting of the onward march of mankind.

"Though the oracles rave, and their followers imagine a vain thing, be it yours to emulate rather than to compete, to help rather than to harm, to struggle for rather than against mankind, to forego the lure of what men of the modern jungle call success and to seek the success of one in the success of all."

Mere money making is not the test of fitness. If it were, then there are hundreds of men today—millionaires—whose names will occur to you without thought, who are greater than Mohammed, who are greater than Confucius, who are greater than Christ, the founder of Christianity, who are greater than Lincoln, and greater than all the other seers in whose phrases and faiths the world has lived for two thousand years.

"Let others frame their creeds; mine is to work;
To do my best, however far it fall
Below the keener craft of stronger hands;
To be myself, full-hearted, free and true
To what my own soul sees, below, above;
To think my own thoughts straight out from the heart;
To feel and be and never stop to ask:
'Do all men so? Is this the world's highway?'"

Confidence and Hell

By FORD E. SHAW

IN THE affairs of life, the mental and physical activity of man is limited. Our imagination, the torch of tomorrow, flashes here and there on that great undone, demanding the united brains, years and ceaseless efforts of many men.

It is therefore necessary that, in matters beyond individual grasp, men partly assign to others the work at hand.

Were he not so limited, in other words were he infinite, the thought and the materialization of the thought were one.

Thus many gods are called upon to work as one.

But Olympus is barren now!

We are the gods of today.

When one of our gods has dreamed a great dream, he sits in council with others and they proceed to the deed.

Every man who enjoys confidence is eligible to this confederation of the gods.

He is in possession of a jewel that unlike the stones of the earth is not an ornament only, but an index and an inspiration.

We have lost the Garden of Eden but we still possess the confidence of man.

Only he who has lost this credential and been driven into the wilderness by the silent, yet thundering scorn of man, knows the sorrow of the first departure.

We may be in possession of the most favorable antecedents and yet hesitate to trust.

We supplement our knowledge with faith and faith is anchored in that indefinable something, that peculiar complexus of the whole, called personality.

And herein is the secret of broken-hearted man who despairs in the hour he has thrown his badge of manhood to the swine.

To be trusted under bond is one thing; to be trusted because you are a man is another.

A certain cashier defaulted.

The shortage was discovered but the circumstances surrounding it were such that his guilt could not be immediately established.

He was examined and cross-examined before the board of directors.

He maintained his innocence.

Then the venerable president, taking him by the hand, walked into his private office, and closed the door.

When it opened, they called for an officer of the law.

The pathos of that scene between man and man is unutterable.

The confidence of one was broken by the self-insulting confession of the other:

"My God! My God! It's only a little. I'll make it right."

What a damnable lie!

The question is not how little you have taken but how very, very much you have given in exchange.

Because you are a god, all the siren songs of inner sophistry cannot close your lids to the writing on the wall—Yesterday I was; today I am not!

Bah! Mere sentiment! Men have gone to prison with smiles attending.

Hold!

To prison. Mean you the prison of cells and bars?

Enclose his body in all the metal of creation, yet will he tread among men, unseen, but seeing.

In the stillness of the night the eyes of loved ones and former friends, like the monster Argus, blink and stare, blink and stare but never close.

No one need interfere.

The ball and chain, symbol of abiding disgrace, is forging.

And by his own hands.

Silently he comes into the council of men, receives the judgment and but for the rattling of chain, as silently departs.

Perhaps a goddess holds his hand—a wife or mother, who laughs hysterically in an effort to drown the clanking behind.

But he will go, go limpingly into the wilderness.

And the gods will pity his utter wretchedness.

The man who breaks confidence, hates himself.

And hatred of self is Hell.

Success

THAT thing which most men call success is the result of sacrifice. Prodigality and the needless gratification of pleasurable desires weaken the will and render the making of success impossible. Men who win have been wedded to their avocation and have never given the latter grounds for divorce.

The successful man in a legitimate calling is a great man, so give him credit; it is his just due. He has fought a good fight, shown strength of will and strength of mind and has practised rigid rules of self-abnegation. The successful man builds not only for himself, but for others as well.

To censure a successful man without cause is to confess one's own weakness and failure.—F. R. Nathan, in the Jewelers' Circular Weekly.

The Great Old World

The cynics mock her,
The red storms rock her,
The earthquakes shock her,
But on she rolls!
Downcast, elated—
For ruin slated
She still goes freighted
With human souls!

The great seas thunder
And rend asunder—
The white stars wonder,
As time grows gray;
But reaping, sowing,
Her way she's going
To meet unknowing—
A Judgment Day.

But—joy go with her!
Nor slip his tether
When stormy weather
Makes grief and moan!
Tragedy—jest world—
Lost-unto-rest world,
Still—still the best world
We ever have known.

Our Business Boys and What We Sometimes Do Wrongly to Them : by Joel Blanc

EVERY business man must rejoice in the effort being made to uplift boys who have been born in the slime, and reared in the midst of moral depravity and intellectual gloom.

But what of the countless thousands of boys of the great middle class; the class from which you and I came; the class from which the vast majority of the business men of the future must come?

How are we using those who come to us from grammar and high schools? They may not need our "uplift," as the word is popularly used; but are we upholding them as their interests and ours demand that they should be upheld?

Pathetic indeed are the words: "I never had a chance." But what a shame to some one, are the words: "My chance was taken away from me."

Let us not forget that in our towns and cities are hundreds of thousands of boys who are receiving good home training; living in atmospheres of virile purity, and who, almost from the cradle, are imbued with the desire to become successful business men. In their home and school lives they are taught a noble definition of success. These refined, clear-minded, well-garbed boys carry high ideals of business honor into their commercial careers. They believe that the business ideals given to them by worthy parents and honest teachers are right.

Now, it is neither my desire nor purpose to indulge in a tirade against business obliquity. I am one of those who believe that the moral force in the business world is stronger than it ever has been; that the ethical awakening in the commercial world proves that men have grown better, instead of worse. I am firm in my faith in my country and its people, and among those people there are none who inspire my patriotic pride as do its business men.

However, this is an age in which we realize more fully than ever before, that ere one can be taught to do, he must be taught to think. And it is my hope that the readers of these lines may find within and between them, something to inspire them to higher action through higher thought.

A Good Man Who "Didn't Think"

A few weeks ago I was in the office of a business man who had advertised for a boy, and at the time of my call he was examining applicants. In his advertisement he had used the following words: "A bright, well-dressed boy of fifteen. A good chance to learn the business."

From among the applicants was selected a well-bred, self-possessed and correctly dressed youth who bore every indication of having been reared amidst refined surroundings, where want had never entered.

As the boy stood beside his new employer's desk, the following was, in effect, his first instruction: "Put these folders in your pocket and go around to the leading hotels. When none of the hotel people see you, drop the folders on chairs, writing tables and wherever the country merchants will be likely to see them. You must be mighty careful, because it is against the hotel rules to leave advertising matter in them. Just sort of sneak in and wander around as if you were a guest. Your clothes and manner will help you along."

With the actual use of the word, that boy was told to be a sneak.

Was this employer exceptional? Unfortunately, he was not! Despite these instructions to the new boy, he is a man whom I greatly admire. His spotless private and social life is paralleled in his business life as straightly as that of any man I know. He was utterly unconscious of the deep significance of his words. When the possible black depths of his instructions came to him through the words of another, he looked horrified; but he only said, "I didn't think!"

The stormy seas of life are encumbered by human derelicts, made such by men who "didn't think!"

In this case the man who hired the boy did not think of the real boy, the soul, "the God within." He had hired the boy's clothes and manners to use as instruments against his competitors, as he would hire advertising space in a paper. All who in any way obstructed his path of progress were, to him, competitors. Thus viewed, the hotels were considered as his competitors, and their rules, in so far as they interfered, were merely the weapons of competitors, to be thrust aside with competitive weapons of his own, and the boy was merely a competitive weapon.

That he was instructing the boy to be a sneak, to act a lie, would never have dawned upon him, had he not been shown. Had the instructions remained unchanged and should the boy have sneaked and lied against, instead of for his employer, that employer would have unhesitatingly condemned the boy, utterly unconscious that his own feet were in the mire.

A Valuable Asset Lost

A youthful friend of mine resigned his first position. It was with a small, but well established, wholesale house. In explaining his action, he said: "Nobody but the porter and I got there before eight. They made me get there at seven. For an hour I had to sweep and dust, and the porter even made me mop the floor. He cursed me around; he laughed when I soiled my clothes, and there was not a morning that he did not insult me. After the others came and I got at my office work, things were all right; but I never associated with toughs in school and I will not in business."

The employer of this boy is one of those self-made men who never tire of telling people what hard jobs they had in making themselves. He is so unjust to himself as apparently to believe that he would never have amounted to anything if he had not been an overworked, underfed and unschooled boy. Much as he might deny it, that man probably believes that the only way to teach a boy properly to care for mail, is to make him mop floors under the lash of a hoddlum store porter. He probably honestly believed that he was doing the boy a real service. He does not know that, great as has been his own progress, he has not kept pace with world change.

That boy had had sufficient home and school training to enable him to take up the simpler technical duties of the business on the day he entered it. He came with the birth, breeding, manners and intelligence of a gentleman. For all but one hour of each business day he was expected to use those attributes and acquired talents for the benefit of his employer. But by attempting to degrade the boy for one hour each day, the man lost one who might have become a most valuable asset to him.

Keep Abreast of the Times

The foregoing are two of but many incidents that I could relate. Do they not indicate that it would be better for the business world if men of standing would go less far afield for uplift movements and inaugurate an uphold propaganda within their own commercial sphere?

Let us for a while forget all about Daniel Boone, Abe Lincoln and the other shot-gun and axe artists whom we hold up to our boys as great models for financiers, architects, engineers and so on. Those great ones are dead, and it is a great good thing that the customs of the times in which they lived died with them.

Let us, for a while at least, forget what a lot of infant prodigies we were. Let us remember that we do not want our own boys to endure the hardships upon which we consider that the salvation of other boys depends.

Let us remember that we have no right to do unto other men's boys in our business what we would not let those other men do to our boys in their business. Let us try a little practical application of that "Do unto" rule that we so like to talk about.

This is not the age of ox-carts; but of automobiles; not the age of home-spun and cow-hide boots; but the age of tailor-made clothes and patent-leather.

Does the boy who has always been well dressed deserve any less help than the boy who has worn a charity uniform?

To whom will the Golden Gates open most wide: The man who has brought salvation to boys who needed it or the man who has kept other boys from needing it? Pretty near even, is it not? If it ever ceases to be even, it will mean that we have ourselves gotten most decidedly out of balance.

Who is to Blame for the Crimes of Aliens in America? : by Griffith J. Griffith

IN COMMON doubtless with many others I have received a letter from the "Metropolitan Magazine" calling my attention to an article in its June issue entitled, "The Alien Peril." It deals with the increase of crime and attributes it to immigration. As the matter is of great national interest and is certain to be much discussed in connection with contemplated legislation I can think of no branch of the prison question more timely for consideration in THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER.

The Proportion of Alien Criminals

The main facts on which the author of the article referred to, Mr. A. B. Lewiston, bases his plea for restrictive and most drastic legislation are that twenty-five per cent of those in New York State prisons are aliens, Italy contributing more than a third of the total of 1,091. As against this is to be noted the fact that, according to his own figures, forty-three per cent are natives of the state, twenty per cent natives of other states, and twelve per cent natives of foreign countries but naturalized.

Taking the country as a whole he shows that, according to the 1908 report of the United States Commissioner of Immigration, out of 149,897 in prison 15,323 were aliens, the proportions in the various sections into which the country is divided being as follows: North Atlantic division, twenty per cent; South Atlantic, two per cent; North Central, eight per cent; South Central, two and one-half per cent; and Western, sixteen per cent. These figures when analyzed seem to me exceptionally eloquent, but I doubt whether the conclusion to which they point is that which Mr. Lewiston fancies. Let us see.

Gen. Theodore Bingham, late Police Commissioner in New York City, is quoted as writing that "eighty-five per cent of the population of New York is either foreign born or of foreign parentage; nearly half the residents of the five boroughs do not speak the English language." And he goes on to say that this enormous foreign population has brought its feuds with it, has introduced the white-slave traffic, whereby the streets are over-run with foreign prostitutes, while foreign anarchists advocate arson and murder.

Let us grant that the statement is passably correct. What I desire to call attention to is the fact that, if eighty-five per cent of the population of New York are foreigners the twenty-five per cent of aliens in that State's jails is a smaller proportion than we should have expected. On the other hand consider that forty-three per cent of New York's prisoners are admittedly natives of the state, and ask yourself which way these figures cut.

Furthermore, it will be noticed that the smallest proportion of alien prisoners is in the South Atlantic division, which claims only two per cent of the total of 15,323; since immigration does not gravitate largely toward the Southern States. Yet it is precisely these Southern States that lead all others in crimes of violence—lynching of course included—five southern cities heading the list in percentage of homicides, and Chicago and New York City, the two great centers of foreign-born population, ranking considerably below even the western cities of San Francisco and Los Angeles.

In Defence of the Aliens

I am constrained to the opinion that if Mr. Lewiston had examined this evidence, all carefully collated in "Crime and Criminals," he would have hesitated to make the tables he supplies the basis of his argument.

And I call his attention to the fact that the same book quotes Judge Lindsey—surely a most competent authority—as saying: "I am not one of those who lay much stress upon immigration as a cause of crime in this country, either adult or juvenile. My own investigations of police records (and I have investigated those of nearly all large cities) have rather startled me by showing how few of our juvenile criminals are of foreign parentage."

Moreover, I wish to say that, in my judgment, there is much guess-work in the broad statements of officials that aliens fill our jails and walk our streets as prostitutes; and that, in particular, the latter is not true, for it is only when women have acquired some knowledge of our language and customs, and have learned our dress fashions, that they become worth purchasing by those who conduct the white slave traffic. That detestable business is run by men and women familiar with this market, and not by newly-landed, ignorant foreigners; nor are the latter regarded by it as suitable merchandise.

Mr. Lewiston makes a remark, however, which seems to me to carry us to the heart of the difficulty when he says that "South America offers more to a prospective immigrant than we can offer, and as a result we are now called upon to pass upon the lowest quality of immigrants. How is it, I ask, that this wealthy and powerful nation today holds out such poor inducements, and is not the root of crime by immigrants to be found mainly in the fact that we ourselves do not give the immigrant half a chance?"

Some Causes of Alien Crime

Consider the kind of world this alien finds himself in when he lands at Ellis Island—with little or no money, knowing nothing of our language, a stranger to our customs!

He finds himself face to face with expensive cities, cold commercialism and political corruption.

Bearing these things in mind I am perpetually reminded of an old, old saying that "it must needs be that offenses come, but woe unto him by whom they come."

Moreover, I ask whether we should not do well to consider the beam in our own eye before becoming too severe on what may be only a mote in that of the luckless immigrant.

We tax ourselves at present for the support of an extensive corps of immigrant inspectors armed by special laws—much criticized in Europe as harsh and illiberal—with autocratic powers. But Mr. Lewiston would go much farther and favors legislation that "will make it possible to deport any alien criminal convicted of serious crime and imprisoned in this country within five years after landing, and will also make it possible to deport at any time, no matter how long he has been in this country, any alien shown to have been a criminal in his own country." The second clause in that sentence seems to be likely to lead to frightful injustice and to be indefensible as allowing no room for penitence. Moreover he advocates the placing of a government inspector on every ship bringing immigrants to this country, whose business it shall be to "spot the undesirable." In short, he has sublime faith in the impeccability of officials, for he commits himself to the declaration that "the authorities can be trusted to use proper discretion in this wholesale house-cleaning, although the chance of their doing anyone an injustice will be very small."

I saw him smile; stricken, alone,
He met the jeering horde, the moan
Of hate, the sullen curse; yet while
They looked for tears, I saw him smile!

A Tale of Two Cities

I SPENT a few days, not long ago, at a little town that is not called Irish Gap. Never have I seen so poor a gem in so rich a setting.

All around was the purple glory of incomparable hills—hills whose sides shook with the fatness of orchards, cornfields, pastures, and gardens—hills whose heads were crowned with kingly forests of great oaks, elms, beeches, and maples.

Winding languorously in an out among the stately hills were the fertile valleys, with their lazy streams and air of opulence.

Over it all was poured the smoky golden wine of autumn sunlight, making a picture of loveliness that I shall never forget.

Add to all this mineral resources, an unusually pleasant and healthful climate, and the fact that the place is a railway terminus, and you have an ideal location for a city.

But the town as it is!

I should have preferred camping out in the hills to living in it.

An Untidy Town

The houses were large enough, most of them, but unlovely. They needed paint. They needed repairs. From what I saw of the inside of a few of them, they needed brooms, scrubbing brushes, Old Dutch Cleanser, and elbow grease.

The lawns—or rather the front yards—needed hair-cuts, shaves, and shampoos. The back yards, most of them, needed floods and fires. The fences needed annihilation. The sidewalks, most of them, might have been perfect if they had been there at all.

I had some driving to do. Here and there I found the roads in fair condition—mostly the main turnpikes, kept in repair by the county. But in the town, it was only by their location between parallel lines of straggling fence that anyone would have known that they were roads at all. Certainly there was no evidence that any kind of tool except wind and water had ever touched their jagged surfaces.

I was puzzled.

The air of the place did not seem to be that of poverty.

And it surely was not one of grinding toil that took all the beauty out of life and its environs. On the contrary, I never saw people more cheerfully taking life easy—frowzy but comfortable—than the people of the little town that is not called Irish Gap. The fact is, I haven't yet figured out to my own satisfaction what was the matter with those folks.

This I do know, however—they would have been more comfortable, more prosperous, better citizens, better husbands and wives, better fathers and mothers, and would have lived larger and happier lives if they had worked a little harder to make their homes and their town at least approach the natural beauty and cleanliness of their glorious environment.

Spotless Town

Let me tell you how I know it.

Whenever I get an opportunity, I visit another little town, in another part of the country, but also set about with tree-crowned, amethyst hills. Not so beautiful, perhaps, as the hills that surround the place that is not called Irish Gap, but rather sightly scenery, for all that. This little place might have been named 'Manchester, if it hadn't been given another nice little appellation.

Now, the climate at Manchester is not so kind as that at Irish Gap, and there are a few more poor people there. Also, everybody works—most of them work hard.

But you ought to see their little city. It is a real jewel. Every house is neat, clean, well-kept, and tasteful—even the little cottages of the poor. The lawns are live velvet, there are flowers everywhere—when the climate will permit—and the streets are lined on both sides with magnificent old trees that mingle their high branches over the roadway.

Cement sidewalks run everywhere, the streets are nearly all paved. Electric light, gas, water, sewers, and other improvements make the town a delightful one to live in.

The people have built and support an excellent college, where their children have been trained and sent out to take their places in the great world of work. Some of them are in the high places, too.

In the town itself, too, the people are doing things worth while. There is a healthy activity in literary, artistic, social, and religious circles. Commercially, the town is growing and prospering. Its poor are constantly becoming well-to-do—its well-to-do wealthy. There is a wide awake commercial club that is keenly interested in everything that will help the town in any way. New industries are encouraged to locate there—and they come. Inducements are held out to immigrants and others to make their homes there. I know some people with mansions on the boulevard who came to Manchester a few years ago with nothing but the clothing they stood in—and pretty shabby clothing at that.

The roads that lead into the town are looked after with scientific methods. Manchester business men realize that a large part of their wealth flows to them from the farms around them. So they have made it as easy as possible for the farmer to get into Manchester.

Altogether, Manchester is a happy, healthy, prosperous, comfortable, inspiring, and beautiful place to go. If I could, I should like to live there. Perhaps I may, some day, when I am able to retire from the road.

Irish Gap could be as good a town as Manchester—if the people only would make it so.

As a beginning, each one could at least clean up his own house and tidy up his own grounds. That wouldn't cost anything but a little effort. And if they were to start there, I think the rest would follow.

By the way, what kind of town do you live in?

Paying for Favorable Attention

SHELDON says that the first step in every sale is favorable attention. And, in the few short and happy years that I have spent on the road I have found that he is right. And, likewise I have found that it is a man's work to get your prospective customers, very many of them, to take that precious first step.

Let a salesman know his goods well enough to know that they are worth all he asks for them—and more; let him know his prospect well enough to know that he will make a sure profit by purchasing the goods, and the sale is practically made when that first step has been made.

This is the principle behind all general publicity advertising. The advertiser believes so fully in his goods that he is willing to spend millions simply for the purpose of getting people to take that first step—favorable attention.

This, also, is the principle behind special sales—sales in which certain leaders are sold below cost. The merchant is willing to lose a little on some articles in order to get favorable attention to the other goods in his store.

Here, too, is where premiums, gifts, calendars, and souvenirs come in. They are merely coin in which the merchant or the publisher pays the public for its favorable attention to his proposition.

A Digression—Here's to the House to House Canvasser

I met a salesman doing house-to-house canvassing the other day, who had a keen eye to the necessity for getting his busy prospects to take that coveted first step.

This live wire was selling aluminum cooking utensils to housewives. He told me a little about the value, cleanliness, sanitary excellence, and durability of his goods. He sold me, all right. I don't own or rent a kitchen, and have no more use for cooking utensils than a Zulu has for snowshoes, but I came mighty near ordering a set, just because this salesman made them look so good to me. So I feel that he is rendering every customer he sells a high service.

Now, if any of you have ever tried that branch of salesmanship known as "ringing door bells," you know that about nine-tenths of the battle consists in getting favorable attention.

I have been there. I know what it is to have doors slammed in my face, dogs set on me, big pieces of cold, acid tongue handed to me, torrid fumes of feminine fury flung in my eyes, and all the other little amusements that help to keep the "agent" from perishing with ennui.

And Here's to "The Lady of the House"

And yet, I sympathize with the pestered and harrassed housewife, too.

I've seen 'em trying to do their work with a squawking baby on one hip and a couple more clinging to their skirts and squirming under their feet.

I've found 'em up to their red elbows in soap-suds, their faces steamed and par-boiled, and their ears and noses strained to catch the sound of the potatoes boiling over or the scent of the roast scorching in the oven.

I've knocked at the back door just in time to interrupt a stormy session with hubby, or when Tommy was getting his.

I've had to go around and try to tell my story when I knew to a certainty that every woman in my territory had been asked, that very morning, to buy a dress-making system, a bottle of furniture polish, a story of the Civil War, a patent mop handle, a sure cure for warts, corns, freckles, moles, sunburn, ringworm, tetter, and salt rheum, a vacuum cleaner, a combination potato peeler, can opener, tack-hammer, jack-knife, gimlet, screw driver, and stove-lifter, a box of toilet soap, a subscription to a woman's magazine, a chance on a crazy quilt at a raffle, and a skirt hanger.

I've faced the music when I knew that some smooth talker had been around, only a week before, and swindled half the women in town.

Let me tell you that "the lady of the house" who is always gentle and courteous to the "agents" who call at her front and back doors is, in very truth, a lady every inch of her, and a true gentlewoman from the very core of her, right out to that brave and beautiful smile. God bless her, I'd fight my weight in wild cats for her!

And don't forget the agent. The man who rings door bells with a courageous, cheerful heart, and keeps it up seven or eight hours a day, month after month, is of the stuff that heroes are made. My hat is off to him, dad burn his old hide! He's a brick!

The Salesman Turned Buyer

But I must get back to my story. This canvasser for aluminum pots and pans, you know.

Well, his idea was to walk up to the screen door and offer to purchase a few minutes' of the valuable time of the forbidding woman on the other side.

How's that for an opener?

He doesn't want to sell anything. Nothing of the kind. He is out buying things this morning. You see that puts a totally different face on the thing.

The commercial instinct is strong in everybody. Just offer to buy what a person has to sell and see how quickly you will get not only favorable attention but interest, desire, and action. And that was the way my friend the canvasser found it.

For a little aluminum utensil that would sell at about twenty-five cents retail, but which cost him something less than that, he could get the favorable attention of almost every woman he called on. And his sales ran from five to fifty dollars every time he took an order, which was frequently, because, as I have already told you, he had a good line—one that would pay people well to buy—and he could make them believe as he did about it if they would only take the time to listen to him.

It's the same old story. You have to give to get. "There is that scattereth abroad and increaseth yet more; there is that withholdeth more than is meet, and it tendeth to poverty."

Ah! when shall men's good
Be each man's rule, and universal Peace
Lie like a shaft of light across the land,
And like a lane of beams athwart the sea,
Thro' all the circle of the golden year?

—Tennyson.

The Value of an Idea—Many are Wasted—How About Yours? : by Milton Bejach

EVERYBODY admits that we are the most wasteful people on earth. We earn more per capita than any other people on earth and we are in position to spend more. Where other peoples live on rice and black bread we dine on chicken and pie. There's no complaint on that score, however. So long as we make use of what comes to us no one can criticize us.

A day or two ago a highly educated gentleman of German extraction started a train of thought with me as to our wastefulness of things that cannot be seen, felt or handled. And these are the most valuable and costly things in the world. They are the things that have made the earth what it is. They are the things that men have suffered for, worked for all their lives and died for. These things are ideas.

Abroad, I am told, ideas are pretty scarce articles. The average individual has no time to entertain them, his attention is centered almost wholly on his job. And that job is hung onto as if it were his immortal soul. The average man finds it some trouble to get a job and having gotten one he sees to it that he keeps it. That's the reason ideas are scarce, the average man's thoughts get no farther afield than his workbench or the task immediately before him.

It is different with us. We feel that America offers us jobs in hundreds of places. If we don't like what we have we feel that we can easily get another. We think of other things than the job immediately before us. That's why we have more ideas per brain convolution than any other people.

What becomes of the ideas? Every day we hear something good. Not necessarily a plan for the rescue of the fallen, the civilization of the African pigmies, or the evangelization of the whole world in this generation.

It is safe to say that one good idea occurs to each of us every day. We have selling inspirations. Somebody has said that "these are like growing pains, in the right sort of salesmen." A half dozen times a week some good schemes to land prospects occur to us. With most of us these ideas get no farther than the inside of our heads.

Ideas are like the gold concealed in quartz. Gold quartz is valuable, but only as gold quartz. The thing inside, the glistening yellow metal is what is wanted and to get it out takes time and trouble. So with ideas. They are valuable in the rough, but before they become superlatively valuable they must be polished, turned and squeezed dry. An idea without action behind it is about as valuable as a diamond buried in the center of a mountain.

Elbert Hubbard, whom some of us admire and some of us do not, knows the value of ideas. When a good thought occurs to him he puts it down in black and white and the next time he sits down to his typewriter, if he uses one, out comes that idea and it is then incorporated in his story.

Dave Gibson, the Hoosier storyteller, pursues the same plan and goes farther. I've seen him around the office of "The Cleveland Leader" hunting through the proof sheets for ideas, texts for business sermons.

There's a managing editor of a big newspaper who does no managing in the sense that a managing editor is supposed to manage. He is paid for ideas. He can suggest more "stunts" at the nightly conference than any man in the newspaper business. He spends his time in gathering ideas and then passing them along.

Let's get action on these intangible, valuable things. Let's put them to work. When will you put yours to work?

---

Every good and perfect thing is loved into life.—Hubbard.

---

The time for a man to retire from active business depends on conditions. Some men are young at seventy; others are old at fifty; the method of living, the occupation, habits, success or failures, all have their influences.—James J. Hill.

The Old Order Changeth—Improveth—in the Business World : by W. H. Tennyson

A HALF a century before the birth of Christ, the Roman writer, Virgil, made the statement, "Tempora mutantur, et nos mutamur in illis." The synonymous English expression would be, "Times are changed, and we are changed with the times."

During the last two thousand years, each generation has witnessed tremendous changes. There have been eras of enlightenment, there have been eras of darkest crime.

Few things are today even as they were one hundred years ago. The times do change, and the changes on the whole are for better. Just glance through your history for a few minutes, noting the movement of the world during the century beginning back in 1810.

"The Good Old Days" Outdone

Do you ever wish for the "good old days?" Don't! The days that you have merit all your praise. Don't be blind to their blessings. Instead, thank God that you are a Twentieth Century man.

What did you find in your history? That in 1810 there was no telephone, there was no telegraph, there were no ocean liners, there were no steam railroads worthy the name, there was no automobile, there were no electric cars, there were no electric lights. Again, there was slavery throughout a large part of the Union, the institution of life insurance was unknown, the great West was unsettled by the white man. I might go on and enumerate and enumerate, but what's the use? We all know that the nineteenth century was the greatest in the history of mankind from the standpoint of invention.

There is, however, another side to the discussion, upon which your history hardly touches. What is that? It is this:

In 1810 and for some time thereafter, there were no trademarks; there was seldom a mark of identification on goods; few men were willing to take the responsibility for any sale.

The booth, the bazaar, the fair, were, with the auction, the accepted markets of the world.

"Let the buyer beware," was the universal slogan.

Cumulative selling was unknown. Mark that well—cumulative selling was unknown. The recognized system was to "make" just as much as possible—to give as little as possible and to get as much as the buyer could be induced to pay.

The philosophy behind the golden rule, men would have told you, was not applicable to business. When abuses were discovered, this was the general excuse, which, strange to say, for a long time sufficed: "Business is business, you know."

In later years, however, the leaders in the commercial and financial world began to question the validity of this excuse for abuses. They began to realize that business was or might be something more than a system for "doing" the other fellow.

In short, men began to comprehend that business was strictly the foundation stone for civilized life. The evolution from the old idea to the new was slow, and many of the men who believed in the new doctrine were afraid to put it to a practical test.

A Fearless Pioneer

There were men, however, who didn't understand the feeling of fear, men who had ideals, men who believed implicitly that the golden rule was applicable to business.

I shall mention one of these men, a man of whom you should know. He lives in Bloomfield, New Jersey (a suburb of Newark), and recently celebrated his eighty-seventh birthday anniversary. His name is Amzi Dodd. Ever hear of him?

Mr. Dodd was a lawyer by profession and a mathematician by inclination. He believed that if a life insurance company offered the best contract yet evolved, from the policy-holders' standpoint, if it charged a conservative rate for that contract, if it demonstrated beyond any possible doubt that it was to the buyer's advantage to insure under such a policy with such a company, nothing could check the successful progress of that institution. You see, Mr. Dodd was a believer in the philosophy of service.

Well, Mr. Dodd and the men associated with him put their idealism into practice, and The Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Company, of Newark, is the result. They built better than they dreamed. Other institutions might be mentioned, but this illustrates my point.

Cumulative Selling

Today, the individual or the corporation must stand ready to assume the responsibility for every sale. The public demands it, as witnessed by the recent federal and state investigations by legislative committees. It is not enough that the salesman of the Twentieth Century shall be a man of Ability, a man of Endurance, and that he be Active. Truly, he must have these three qualities, but in addition he must be a man of Reliability.

I said above that cumulative selling was unknown a hundred years ago. It is however known today. In fact, this is an era of cumulative selling. The successful salesman in any line aims to build up a clientele. In order to do this, the purchaser's confidence and good will must be sought, must be acquired. The one and only way in which to gain and to hold the good will of the buyer is to sell him absolutely flawless goods on their own merits. In other words, the salesman must make every sale from the side of the prospect rather than from his own side—demonstrating to the buyer how the proposition will benefit him.

Yes, the times have changed, and we must change with the times.

No man can stand still. He either advances or he slips back.

The man who sells anything on the principle of "caveat emptor" is slipping backwards. The salesman of the present, the great Twentieth Century present, and the salesman of the future, he who in his work today builds for tomorrow, are men of Reliability above us all, men who make service to the end of mutual benefit their motive power.

I once heard this distinction made between the agent of the old school and the salesman of the modern school: "The former was a business getter; the latter is a business builder." There you have it.

Keep the End in View

By MILTON BEJACH

Assistant Advertising Manager in the McCashey Bulletin

IT WILL avail thee naught to say, "I have much time and many years before me ere I must cash in; therefore will I not bestir myself too mightily."

All this is folly. The mortal born of woman who would succeed must everlastingly and eternally "keep his mind on the race," in the words of that seer of the advertising department who telleth the story of "Gee Whiz" and other religious tales.

If thy feet itch for greener fields and pastures new—rub the soles of them tenderly that the itch may cease and they may keep on in the path in which they are set. And if they itch too much for the greener fields and the new pastures, if thy heart is not in thy work, get thee hence, for saith the sales manager, "I wouldn't give a tinker's cussword for a man who has not his heart wrapped up in his trunk and sample case."

It is written that the most foolish of men never changes his mind, yet true it is that his blood brother is he who changes his mind too often. Therefore be warned against too many changes, lest in thy old age thy feet shall ever itch and thou can't not be satisfied with any situation.

And in thy work, let it be with thy whole heart, else not at all, for no man since Adam, wrought much without having his whole heart in his work.

And refuse not the kindly smile and pleasant word to him who is down in the mouth and needeth it, for thou knowest not when thou shalt require the slap on the back and the comforting words, "Buck up old man, the worst is yet to come."

The PHILOSOPHER AMONG HIS BOOKS

Perhaps the excellence of aphorism consists not so much in the expression of some rare, abstruse sentiment as in the expression of some obvious or useful truth in a few words. We frequently fall into error and folly, not because the true principles of action are not known, but because for a time they are not remembered; and he may therefore be justly numbered among the benefactors of mankind, who contracts the great rules of life into short sentences, that may be easily impressed on the memory, and taught by frequent recollection to recur habitually to the mind.
—Dr. Johnson.

PRIVILEGE AND DEMOCRACY IN AMERICA—By Frederick C. Howe, Ph. D. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. Net, $1.50.

I wish that every earnest student of business science and business philosophy, every sincere worker for the development of the individual to mastership and the race to wisdom, every true reformer in science, religion, politics, education, sociology, philanthropy, and business would read this great book. And then I wish each one would lend it to some indifferent friend with an understanding that he too would give it a careful reading.

Now, before I go any further, let me say that my recommendation of Dr. Howe's book is here made on the one ground that it contains a cool, sane, careful discussion of problems that vitally affect your success in business—and mine. Whatever private and personal interest I may have in the book from the standpoint of politics, sociology, and philanthropy are not concerned in this review.

I will be frank with you. This book is written in the interests of single tax and government ownership of railroads. In strongly recommending to you its study I am taking no sides on either of these questions. You have the right to decide for yourself, uninfluenced by my opinion. But you have also—what is more important—the duty to decide for yourself, enlightened by all the information available on the subject.

The questions and problems that Dr. Howe discusses in this volume are, beyond controversy, the most important ones that confront the business man of today. So fundamental are they to success in business, so interwoven are they with every phase of commerce, industry, and life itself, that you and I cannot escape considering them. You and I must either consider them now and act quickly upon our decisions, or we shall be obliged to consider them by their operation in our businesses and our lives after it is perhaps too late to take any action.

Dr. Howe begins with the discussion of land monopoly. He sets forth the undoubted fact that the land in America is being concentrated in fewer and fewer hands; that it is constantly rising in value on account of the natural increase in population and immigration; that rents are constantly rising and the tenant class constantly growing larger in proportion to the population; that the rise in rents increases the cost of living without increasing the income of the people; that competition for the land among tenants is fast making rents so high that those who till the soil can get only the barest of livings from it, all the rest going to the landlord; that the withholding of agricultural, timber, mineral, and suburban property from active production for speculative purposes and to maintain monopolistic prices limits natural production, denies labor its right to employment, and thereby increases the number of the unemployed and reduces wages; that all indirect taxes fall most heavily upon the consumer—the one least able to pay them—; and that the resulting poverty is a cause of illiteracy, crime, limited buying power, disease, intemperance, and degeneracy.

The abolishment of all taxes except that on land values, Dr. Howe claims, would reduce rents, strangle monopoly, open up all the hoarded resources of the nation to development, increase the production and equalize the distribution of wealth; put all unemployed labor to work, raise wages, and reduce the price of all commodities, thereby raising the standards of living; and the total wealth of the nation be vastly increased.

All this, he points out, would be accomplished without any change in the organization of society or the machinery of government.

The national ownership of railroads and other great public utilities, Dr. Howe claims is in accordance with the doctrine that the people own the highways, by natural right, and that systems that are, in the very nature of the case monopolies should not be entrusted, with all their power for good or ill, to private hands.

That the land is the source of all wealth is known to every thinking man, woman, and child. That the unrestricted ownership of it by private individuals is capable of the greatest and worst of abuses is history and common sense. The question is, what are we going to do about it?

The public lands of America have practically all passed into private ownership. There is no more free land. That rents will rise and continue to rise with the increase of population is in accordance with the law of supply and demand. They can never recede unless the population decreases. Hence the high cost of living will go higher and not lower. Wages will not increase with the advance in other prices because the presence of a large body of unemployed will keep them down by the working of the law of supply and demand. The result is the rising of the tide of poverty higher and higher, engulfing first the unskilled, then the skilled, then the trades and professions, then the small capitalists, then all beneath the ascendant, land-owning class.

Try to imagine what America will be when her population reaches two hundred million if these tendencies are not checked. That condition is just ahead of us.

That is the big problem of today. And it is strictly a business problem, because it has to do with the production and distribution of wealth.

This book offers a solution, carefully thought out and clearly explained.

It is well worth your most serious consideration.

CHINA AND THE FAR EAST—LECTURES DELIVERED DURING THE SECOND DECENNIAL CELEBRATION OF CLARK UNIVERSITY—Edited by George H. Blakeslee, Thomas D. Crowell & Company, New York. 8vo, cloth, $2.00 net. Postage, 20 cents.

This invaluable study of the Far East is not the product of one man's pen, but is a symposium representing a score of authorities, both Oriental and Occidental. It is the result of a course of lectures delivered before Clark University, and dealing in the main with China, although Korea and Japan are necessarily involved in the discussion. On behalf of Korea we have three authoritative articles—first, "The Awakening," by Hon. Horace L. Allen, former U. S. Minister; second, "The Japanese Administration," by Prof. George T. Ladd, of Yale; and third, "Religious Conditions," by Rev. E. F. Hall. Dr. Kan-Ichi Asakawa describes "Japan's Relation to China," and two other pertinent chapters on Japan appear.

Three-fourths of the volume, however, are devoted to China, showing that nation's "Position in World Politics," "Trade Relations," "Monetary Conditions," "Army," "Opium Problem," "Learning," "Missions," etc., etc., each being written by some professor or official best qualified to speak upon his especial phase. The result is a volume of especial timeliness and importance, giving as it does a group of expert opinions, separately expressed, but forming as a whole a remarkable consensus upon this "kingdom of mysteries." America, in common with the rest of the world, needs to know as much as possible about the condition of affairs in the Far East, since this portion of the globe is destined to play an important part in international politics. Students and readers generally will welcome this mature contribution.

THE SCIENCE OF BEING WELL—By Wallace D. Wattles. Elizabeth Towne, Holyoke, Massachusetts. $1.00.

"Of the making of books" about health "there is no end." It is a mighty good sign. It shows that there must be a great many people interested enough in keeping well to pay out real money for these works. And that is well. Formerly, people thought little or nothing about keeping their bodies in a healthy condition, preferring to rely upon the doctors to cure them when they became sick. Even granting that the doctors could cure them in all cases—which no doctor would claim—the habit was wasteful and painful. It involved more or less frequent periods of illness and loss of productive power, and the expense of doctor's bills and medicines. It is now becoming recognized as good business policy that an ounce of prevention is worth a ton of cure. Hence the interest in books like this one of Mr. Wattles.

Mr. Wattles' book is a combination of the New Thought and Fletcherism. I have tried both methods for keeping well and found them good. This is not saying that I accept all of the New Thought doctrines, or that I am fully in accord with the methods of Fletcherism. I simply recognize the fact that there is much of truth in both, and appropriate and use such of it as I find by experiment to be beneficial to me. I have also found help in other systems of thought and hygiene. There is no system of keeping in health or of cure that has not proved beneficial to many people. Your business is, without too much fussing, to find the one or the ones that will be best for you. For most people, this book of Mr. Wattles' would doubtless prove to be as good as any—for many people better than most.

The book is written in simple, clear language, and in an easy, charming style. There is nothing technical about it. The methods outlined are natural, simple, and cost nothing.

While there are some extreme positions taken from which you and I might dissent, there is plenty of good common sense in the book so that it would not pay to distress ourselves over the things in which we disagree with the author.

Opportunity

They do me wrong who say I come no more

When once I knock and fail to find you in;

For every day I stand outside your door

And bid you wake and rise to fight and win.

—Walter Malone.

Our Christmas Present to You

Ten Per Cent Discount on all Books

ARE you looking for just the right Christmas present for someone? Perhaps you are an employer, looking for presents that will express your appreciation of their loyal services to your employes, and at that same time, provide them with something that will be of more than temporary value.

¶ There is no more appropriate present, under any and all circumstances, than a good book.

¶ Most of you who read this advertisement have learned from past experience that we are able to serve you well with books that will live and grow in value as time passes—our man building and business building books.

¶ As a rule, our prices are fixed. Our books are standard, and worth all we ask for them. But our Christmas present to you this year will be a ten per cent discount on all books listed on the last three advertising pages of this magazine and in our catalog—provided the order reaches us not later than the tenth of December.

---

Order Early—There is Always a Big Rush
in Our Book Department in December

---

Sheldon University Press
LIBERTYVILLE, ILLINOIS

-/2

FORMER PRICE

MARK

MARK TWAIN is undoubtedly the most representative of American writers. He is an American, blood and bone, heart and head. Not only is he the world's greatest humorist; he is a wonderfully versatile writer—the entertaining story-teller, the historian of periods and the intimate chronicler of local conditions, the historical novelist, the philosopher of life, the keen observer, the brilliant essayist. He has those qualities that are typically American — “Huckleberry Finn’s” genial tolerance united to the high ideals of his “Joan of Arc”—and he is uncompromisingly honest, with a hatred of pretence, affectation, and sham.

AUTHOR'S EDI

SPECIAL FEATURES

Mark Twain himself has written a preface to the edition. Brander Matthews has written the biographical criticism of Mark Twain and his work which prefaces the first volume. There are portraits of the author from photographs and paintings taken at periods when the different books were in process of writing. This edition includes his later collected writings, such as “Christian Science,” “A Dog’s Tale,” “Eve’s Diary,” etc.

MARK

TWAIN—1/2

It has been Mark Twain's ambition to have his books in every American home, and he has made a great personal sacrifice, which brings about this remarkable situation—for the first time in the history of publishing, copyrighted books are sold at the price of non-copyrighted books.

FORMER PRICE

TITLES OF THE 25 VOLUMES

THE INNOCENTS ABROAD. (Vol. I)
THE INNOCENTS ABROAD. (Vol. II)
A TRAMP ABROAD. (Vol. I)
A TRAMP ABROAD. (Vol. II)
FOLLOWING THE EQUATOR. (Vol. I)
FOLLOWING THE EQUATOR. (Vol. II)
ROUGHING IT. (Vol. I)
ROUGHING IT. (Vol. II)
LIFE ON THE MISSISSIPPI
THE GILDED AGE. (Vol. I)
THE GILDED AGE. (Vol. II)
THE ADVENTURES OF TOM SAWYER
HUCKLEBERRY FINN
PUDD'NHEAD WILSON
THE PRINCE AND THE PAUPER
A CONNECTICUT YANKEE IN KING
ARTHUR'S COURT
JOAN OF ARC. (Vol. I)
JOAN OF ARC. (Vol. II)
SKETCHES NEW AND OLD
TOM SAWYER ABROAD, ETC.
AMERICAN CLAIMANT, ETC.
LITERARY ESSAYS
THE MAN THAT CORRUPTED
HADLEYBURG
THE $30,000 BEQUEST
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE

NATIONAL TION

THE ARTISTS AND ILLUSTRATIONS

There are many illustrations—half-tone reproductions on plate paper of the work of such artists as

J. G. Brown      W. T. Smedley      E. W. Kemble
A. B. Frost      T. de Thulstrup      C. Allan Gilbert
Peter Newell      B. W. Clinedinst      F. B. Oppen
F. V. Du Mond      Frank J. Merrill      Dan Beard
F. Luis Mora      Frederick Dielman
C. D. Weldon      Etc.      Etc.      Etc.

BINDING AND OTHER DETAILS

The binding is a beautiful dark-red vellum book cloth, with blue title labels stamped in gold. The books are printed on white antique wove paper, especially made for this edition. The size of each volume is 5x7½ inches.

S. H. 12-10

HARPER & BROTHERS
Franklin Square
New York City

Please send me for examination, carriage free, a set of MARK TWAIN'S WORKS, Author's National Edition, twenty-five volumes, cloth binding. It is understood that I may retain the set for five days, and at the expiration of that time, if I do not care for the books, I will return them at your expense. If I keep the books, I will remit $2.00 a month until the full price, $25.00, has been paid.

Signature .....

Send books to.....

TWAIN

Henry Dickson

America's foremost authority on Memory Training and Principal of the Dickson School of Memory.

About Remembering By Elbert Hubbard

For some long time I have been promising myself to write up my good friend, Mr. Henry Dickson, of Chicago, and I have not forgotten. Mr. Dickson is teaching a Science or System, whichever you choose to call it, which I believe is of more importance than the entire curriculum of your modern college.

Mr. Dickson teaches memory. Good memory is necessary to all achievements.

I know a man who is fifty-five years old. He is a student. He is a graduate of three colleges, and he carries more letters after his name than I care to mention. But this man is neither bright, witty, clever, interesting, learned nor profound. He's a dunce.

And the reason is that he CAN NOT REMEMBER. Without his notes and his reference literature, he is helpless.

This man openly confesses that he cannot memorize a date or a line of poetry, and retain it for twenty-four hours. His mind is a sieve through which sinks to nowhere the stuff he pours in at the top. Education is only what you remember. The lessons that you study into the night and babble about the next day in class are rot, unless you retain them and assimilate them by the slower process of memory. You cannot gulp and discharge your facts and hope they will do you any good. Memory only makes them valuable.

Every little while in business I come across a man who has a memory, a TRAINED MEMORY, and he is a joy to my soul. He can tell you when, where, why, how much, what for, in what year, and what the paper said the next morning.

Like this man is another, the general manager of a great corporation in a Western City. He never misses a face. If he sees you once, that's enough. The next time he'll call you by name, inquire about the folks at home and ask if you have recovered from that touch of rheumatism.

He told me how he did it. He told me that he studied memory-training with Professor Dickson of Chicago. Also, he said a lot of nice things about Professor Dickson, that I hesitate to write down here lest my good friend Dickson object.

This Dickson System of Memory-Training, as I understand it, and I do understand it, is very simple. If you want to enlarge your arm to increase the power and strength of your muscle, you exercise it. The same with your mind. You must put your brain through a few easy exercises regularly to discover its capacity. You will be surprised, when you go about it the right way, to know how quickly it responds to you. To the man or woman whose memory plays you tricks, I especially recommend that you write to Professor Dickson to send you his literature. It will cost you nothing, and if his credentials and recommendations and the facts he sets forth, do not convince you, you are not to be convinced—that's all. You do not know when you will be called to stand on your feet and tell what you know: then and there a trained memory would help you.

You've sympathized with the little girl who stuttered her "piece." But you've wept for the strong man who stammered and sucked air and gurgled ice-water and forgot, and sat down in the kindly silence. In the child it was embarrassment, but in the adult it was a bad memory. Professor Dickson's System can give you a BETTER MEMORY because it is based upon right principles. Write and ask Professor Dickson to tell you how he trains the memory.

Fill out coupon or postal and mail Today. It means success

Prof. Henry Dickson, 938 Auditorium Bldg., Chicago
Send me your free book "HOW TO REMEMBER"

Name

Street

City  State

GET TOGETHER PAGE

In this page our subscribers will have the free use of a four line space for one insertion. In this space they may advertise themselves for sale or may advertise for the services of some one else. Others—not subscribers to THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER—will be obliged to pay 25 cents per line for classified ads. In sending in your ads you should figure seven words to the line so that there will be no trouble over the insertion.

MEN AND WOMEN OF EDUCATION. POSITION affords opportunity to travel extensively for necessary educational help. Good income. Permanent position. Address F. E. Compton & Co., Dept. F., 191 Market St., Chicago, Illinois.

WANTED—ENERGETIC, HONEST, TEMPERATE specialty salesman. Two to ten thousand per year. No salary hunting order takers need apply. References and bond necessary. Call or write at once, Commercial Register Company, Buffalo, N. Y.

SALESMEN WANTED—LARGE MANUFACTURING company desire four experienced salesmen, age not exceeding thirty-five; salary, twenty dollars per week and expenses. Booster, care Sheldon University Press.

AGENTS MAKE BIG MONEY SELLING OUR new gold letters for office windows, store fronts, and glass signs. Anyone can put them on. Write today for free sample and full particulars. Metallic Sign Letter Co., 431 N. Clark St., Chicago.

LOCAL REPRESENTATIVE WANTED—SPLENDID income assured right man to act as our representative after learning our business thoroughly by mail. Former experience unnecessary. All we require is honesty, ability, ambition and willingness to learn a lucrative business. No soliciting or traveling. This is an exceptional opportunity for a man in your section to get into a big-paying business without capital and become independent for life. Write at once for full particulars. Address E. R. Marden, Pres. The Nat'l Co-op. Real Estate Co., Suite 494 Marden Bldg., Washington, D. C.

W. F. GEE, LAWYER AND DEALER IN DELTA real estate, large and small tracts, Lambert, Mississippi.

START AN EASY AND LUCRATIVE BUSINESS. We teach you how to establish a successful collection business and refer business to you. No capital required. Little competition. Rare opportunities. Write for Free Pointers today. American Collection Service, 165 State St., Detroit, Mich.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Effective Speaking

By Arthur Edward Phillips, Author of "Natural Drills in Expression," etc., Director, Department of Public Speaking, the Theological Seminary of the Evangelical Luther Church at Chicago; Principal, Phillips School
of Oratory, Chicago.

Adopted by Representative Schools and Universities Throughout the Nation.

IN THIS work is found the first presentation of the true principles of effectiveness in speech. It is a distinct departure from anything yet published on the subject. There is no book now in your library that can fill the place of "Effective Speaking."

This book presents the essentials of effectiveness in all departments of speaking—business, social and public. It trains the judgment in the use of the great principles that govern power and success in speech, and offers a logical way to develop skill as an extemporaneous speaker.

Further, this book presents a complete set of exercises covering every important point discussed; also, a complete set of questions. It gives over one hundred examples from master speakers illustrative of the principles developed.

If you wish to increase your power as an entertaining speaker, read pages 63 to 78; if you wish to increase your power as a convincing speaker, read pages 42 to 47; if you wish to increase your power as an impressive speaker, read pages 39 to 42; if you wish to increase your power as a persuasive speaker, read pages 48 to 62; if you wish to increase your power of memory, read pages 211 to 213; if you wish to increase your power to speak extemporaneously, read pages 88 to 171; if you wish to improve your style, read pages 181 to 201.

If you sincerely seek power in speaking you cannot afford to be without this book. It is a need.

Some of the Institutions Using "Effective Speaking:"

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO
UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA
MICHIGAN STATE NORMAL
UNIVERSITY OF MINNESOTA
UNIVERSITY OF IOWA
MISSOURI STATE NORMAL
UNIVERSITY OF OKLAHOMA
UPPER IOWA UNIVERSITY
UNIVERSITY OF UTAH
UNIVERSITY OF GEORGIA
IOWA STATE NORMAL
NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY
ADRIAN COLLEGE
SYRACUSE UNIVERSITY

CORNELL UNIVERSITY
UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS
BELOIT COLLEGE
CORNELL COLLEGE
BAKER UNIVERSITY
OKLAHOMA STATE NORMAL
DRAKE UNIVERSITY
UNIVERSITY OF DENVER
GEORGIA STATE NORMAL
SOUTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY
INDIANA STATE NORMAL
TOLEDO UNIVERSITY
OTTERBEIN UNIVERSITY
NORTHWESTERN COLLEGE

LELAND STANFORD UNIVERSITY
UNIVERSITY OF GEORGIA
KNOX COLLEGE
DRURY COLLEGE
LAWRENCE UNIVERSITY
BUCKNELL UNIVERSITY
WASHINGTON AND JEFFERSON UNIVERSITY
OLIVET COLLEGE
YANKTON COLLEGE
AUGUSTINA COLLEGE
UNIVERSITY OF CHATTANOOGA
ALBION COLLEGE
UNIVERSITY OF NORTH DAKOTA
UNIVERSITY OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Price $1.50, Delivered

The Taylor Book Store, Rockefeller, Illinois

Normal Men Making Good

GRADUATES of the Sheldon Business Normal, Class of 1910, have now been in the field for six weeks.

Fully four-fifths of the entire class are representing The Sheldon School, several of them are general agents, in full charge of important territories, organizing the work, training their assistants, and managing their own business.

Others are district managers, and still others are assistant agents.

And these men are making good. Although they have been on the field but a short time—scarcely long enough to get their business well organized, they are already seeing tangible results—making money.

And why not?

These men spent the summer in attendance upon the classes and lectures of The Sheldon Business Normal.

Here they spent weeks in learning how to develop their physical, intellectual, moral, and volitional qualities for success—success in any line of work. And not only that, but they were all working together, with their instructors, in the development of these success qualities.

These weeks were also spent in a careful study of the Science of Character Analysis, under the direction and instruction of Dr. Katherine M. H. Blackford, the formulator of the science, and recognized as the leading expert in its application. The students not only learned the principles and laws of the science, but they had almost daily drill in applying them.

During this course they learned every phase of the proposition they were to represent—became thoroughly grounded not only in the goods they were to sell, but in all the conditions and operations of their sale and the services rendered as part of the contract.

Under the direction of Arthur Frederick Sheldon, the formulator of the Science of Salesmanship and the Science of Business Building, and one of the most successful salesmen, sales managers, and proprietors in the country, they spent weeks in learning how to make sales—the fundamental principles of the construction and delivery of effective selling talks. Not only that, but they learned the selling talks on the goods they were to sell and spent a great deal of time in actual practice under the personal supervision of Mr. Sheldon himself.

They also had personal instruction in the principles and methods of successful sales management, under the direction of a practical sales manager of wide experience and marked success.

In addition to this, they had physical culture, a pleasant social life, plenty of training in public speaking and the handling of classes, out-door games and sports, lectures by specialists on various business topics, and other advantages.

Those who did not take up work for The Sheldon School are realizing the value of their training in the conduct of their own businesses.

Come now, can you imagine a man taking a summer's training of that kind and not being healthier, abler, more reliable, capable of greater action—in a word more efficient and more successful as a result?

Nor could he. The record of the class of 1910 for these six weeks shows it.

This makes the problem a personal one with you.

Are you satisfied with your position and your pay?

Do you feel that you are in a rut, and that it is going to be a heavy pull to get out of it?

Are you looking around for a change in your work that will be to your advantage?

Do you feel that a summer's training such as these men in the class of 1910 received would benefit you in the conduct of your own business—the training and instruction of your own sales force?

If any of these things are true in your case, you owe it to yourself to investigate what the Sheldon Business Normal has done for others and can do for you.

The next session will be held at Libertyville, Illinois, beginning Monday, July 3, 1911, and will run for ten weeks.

The course will include:

First—Personal study and class instruction in:

(a) The Science of Business Building, which is the fourth edition of the Science of Successful Salesmanship;

(b) The Science of Service.

Second—An extensive series of personal lectures by Mr. Sheldon, assisted by specialists, in Salesmanship and Business Economics.

Third—A course of lectures on Character Analysis, or the reading of Human Nature.

Fourth—Frequent drills in the Art of Salesmanship and Sales Management.

This course of study leads to the appointment of those students who desire to take up our work, and who shall be selected as being worthy and qualified, to immediate positions in connection with the work of the Sheldon Schools.

The gross earnings of those who prove successful in these positions will not be less than $3,000 a year. Experience shows that earnings of $10,000 can be realized by men thus trained and employed.

You who are now well placed in a congenial line can get here the training you need to ginger up and build up the work of your sales department.

The class is also open to employers who find the training of competent sales managers a problem.

You find here quick, sure, sane, tried, plain, direct, and scientific training for efficiency in sales management.

Now is the time for you to begin to get data on this most unusual opportunity. Time is short. You can begin planning now to come.

Write to us right away, and we will answer, giving full particulars.

The Sheldon Business Normal School

THE SHELTON BUSINESS NORMAL SCHOOL,
Libertyville, Illinois

.....1910

Will you please forward full particulars regarding your session for the summer of 1911, as advertised in THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER for December.

Name .....

Local Address.....

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

STEVENS

NEW VISIBLE LOADING REPEATING RIFLE NO. 70

The most accurate .22 Caliber
Repeating Rifle made.

Two models, one made for .22 short, the other for .22 long rifle cartridges.

Handles 15—.22 short cartridges, which are always in sight while being fed into chamber. For the .22 long rifle, 12 cartridges.

Weight 4½ pounds.

Extra strong double extractors.

THE STEVENS No. 70 REPEATER is absolutely guaranteed and gives universal satisfaction.

Fitted with bead front and sporting rear sights.

List Price $8.00

Send us thirty cents
in stamps for our latest complete Firearm
Catalog and Dan
Beard's intensely interesting and instructive one hundred page book, entitled "Guns and Gunning."

Hardware and Sporting Goods
Dealers everywhere carry
Stevens Shotguns, Rifles, Pistols in stock. If you cannot obtain, we will ship direct, express prepaid, upon receipt of catalog price.

J. STEVENS ARMS &
TOOL CO.

P. O. Box 5002

CHICOPEE FALLS, MASS.

Simplicity, Convenience Light Action Fine Work & Durability

are the distinguishing features of the

ROYAL Standard Typewriter

Price,
$65

ROYAL TYPEWRITER CO.

Royal Typewriter Building, New York
21 Monroe Street, Chicago, Illinois

Wanted—Men Who Can Earn $5,000 a Year

WANT about twenty-five live men, previous experience unnecessary, who are willing to spend two weeks' time to prepare themselves to earn from $5,000 a year up, as general agents for Sheldon University Press. I have personally demonstrated at a man can easily earn at the rate of $10,000 at this work. And I am willing to vote two weeks' of my time to the personal instruction of twenty-five men in the way do it. This class will be open to the twenty-five selected out of the list of applicants, e of all tuition, on Monday, January 2, 1911, and will close Saturday evening, Janu-ry 14, 1911. It will be held in the Administration Building of The Sheldon School ar Libertyville, Illinois. Mail me this coupon today for further particulars.

R. A. F. SHELDON, Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Illinois:

Please send me full particulars about general agency for Sheldon University Press.

ime .....

ldress .....

ty and State .....

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

“Ask Sheldon”

There's a way to find out why business is bad, a way to analyze why expenses keep growing, why some men don't make good where others do.

Modern business is a matter of fixed laws—the day of chance is passing.

And a working knowledge of these laws is the boiled-down, tabloid secret of business success. Many men high up in business, are working under these laws CONSCIOUSLY or UNCONSCIOUSLY.

They acquire the knowledge by “going thru the fire” which most men cannot endure.

Hundreds of others are making good by studying the working of these laws and analyzing the methods of successful men who have blazed the trail before them.

Sheldon Has Classified These Laws

The Sheldon Course in Salesmanship and Business Building will put every man in closer touch with the universal laws of business.

Whether you are a miner clerk with keen ambition to move up into something bigger and better, or a business man trying to analyze the laws which govern your particular business, consider what Sheldon can do for you.

advertising, the selling, the auditing, the corresponding, the financing—in fact the “anything” of your business.

And here is an opportunity to make The Sheldon School “prove up” these claims without cost to you—simply mail the coupon and read The Sheldon Book, which we will send you free. Make the request NOW!

The Sheldon School
1112 Republic Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

The Sheldon School, 1112 Republic Bldg., Chicago

Please send me FREE copy of THE SHELTON BOOK and full information regarding Sheldon Methods.

Name _____

Street _____

City _____

State _____

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Sherwin Cody's Latest Book

How to Do Business by Letter

and Training Course in Business English Composition

The most successful book on letter-writing ever published, now in its 47th thousand, eleventh edition, though but recently published.

Contains over 125 model letters of all kinds, including a number of the more successful pulling letters used by prominent houses.

Also the Rules of Grammar complete, with all common errors; the Rules of Punctuation, Words Often Misused, Rules and Regulations of the Postoffice (correct to 1910), etc.

Price, postpaid, $1.00. See table of contents.

Sherwin Cody's Form Paragraph Letter-Writer

An indexed and gummed blankbook, full letter size, loose leaf, in which to paste form paragraphs to be used in answering all kinds of correspondence.

By this system an $8-a-week girl can write better letters than a $25-a-week correspondent, because she simply copies into her book the best paragraphs in the regularly dictated letters of the head of the business, and all letters are in his language, perfect in every detail of punctuation, grammar, etc., and may be signed by his name though he never sees the letter himself. This is a wonderful means of raising the quality of correspondence, as well as saving much time and expense. 80 gummed pages, 20 index pages, 100 pages in all; price, postpaid, $3; subject to approval and return at my expense.

Sherwin Cody's Compendium of All Card Systems

An instruction book on loose-leaf and card systems (the only book ever published clearly stating the simple fundamental principles of these systems), accompanying a neat box of 500 cards, size 3 x 5 inches, printed from specially engraved wax plates in the best style, representing 18 complete systems all ready for use, including forms for mailing lists, advertising, salesmen's report and route cards, perpetual inventory forms, cost systems, school forms, and loose-leaf and card ledgers of all kinds, for wholesale, retail, mail-order, instalment, and specialty businesses. Electrotypes of plates sold and directions given for printing systems at one-third the usual price. Price, complete, $3.00.

How to Make Advertising Pay

How to Write Letters that Pull

Office Salesmanship & Business Psychology

I have made a detailed personal study of forty-six leading lines of business: Manufacturing, wholesale, retail, mail-order, and specialty, and have taught presidents, secretaries and advertising managers how to make a success of their publicity—I know what will win in forty-six different businesses, yours among the number, and this information I give in my complete course, together with all the books and special features described above, with scores of others—everything I have for only $30, including twenty personal lessons. Write for complete catalogue.

SHERWIN CODY, LIBERTYVILLE, ILLINOIS

CONTENTS:

Using Words So as To Make People Do Things.

How to Begin a Business Letter.

How to Close a Business Letter.

The Body of the Letter.

Applying for a Position.

Sending Money by Mail.

Ordering Goods.

"Hurry-up" Letters.

How Money is Collected.

Letters to Ladies.

Professional Letters.

How to Acquire an Easy Style in Letter Writing.

Two Kinds of Letters—Buying and Selling.

When to Write a Long Letter and When to Write a Short Letter.

Answering Inquiries.

Talking in a Letter—Colloquialisms and Slang.

Complaint Letters.

Condensation—Writing Advertisements.

Advertising and Follow-up Letters.

Display in Letter Writing.

Salesmanship in Letters and Advertisements.

Customs and Regulations of the Post Office.

Social and Official Forms; the Rules of Grammar, with Common Errors; the Rules of Punctuation for Business Office Use.

Need Envelopes?

"Write Hogan"

MAKERS OF

EVERYTHING IN ENVELOPES

Hogan Envelope Company, Inc.

319-331 West Ohio Street, Chicago

A GOOD SHORTHAND REPORTER

is the only kind you can afford to employ. I am well prepared to handle all kinds of law and general reporting.

FRED H. GURTLE

SHORTHAND REPORTER

Phone Randolph 3038 810-811 Reaper Block, CHICAGO

3000 GUMMED LABELS $1.00
POSTPAID
SIZE, 1X2 INCHES PRINTED TO ORDER

Other styles & sizes for every purpose.
Send for free catalog—you'll find just what you need. Our high quality and low prices will surprise you.

FENTON LABEL CO.
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Make Your Brain Earn

$3,000 A Year

YOU are just as smart as other men now in the Real Estate business who are making $3,000 to $10,000 a year. You don't need capital. We teach you the Real Estate and Loan Business and then appoint you as our special representative in your territory and work with you. We want a representative in every community. Get started on the road to success today. Send for our Free Booklet, "How We Teach You the Real Estate Business." Write to Instruction Dept.

MORDEN LAND & LOAN COMPANY,
262 Palace Building, Minneapolis, Minnesota.

WANTED! Agents to take subscriptions to The Backbone Monthly—"A magazine for and about people who are doing things worth while"—a magazine so different, both editorially and typographically. Show a sample copy and there's a sale on the spot. Agents are making big money with The Backbone Monthly. Come on in! Sample copies, terms and blanks sent on request.
The Backbone Society, 144 Fox St., Aurora, Illinois

Ask For Book You Want

Place check in the square below indicating number of book desired; write name and address on lines below and forward, with 10 cents postage attached, and the book is yours—without further expense or obligation, of course.

- 1—THE ART OF FINANCIERING
[Showing how business men may raise capital for business projects]
- 2—FINANCIAL HAND BOOK
[For promoters, fiscal agents and brokers]
- 3—BUSINESS BUILDING BY CORRESPONDENCE
[For the man who uses circular letters]
- 4—THE SELLING FORCE AND THE SELLING FARCE
[Showing why the great majority of selling plans do not pay]
- 5—THE GREAT LAW OF AVERAGE
[A new principle discovered by a business expert, bringing CERTAINTY to business affairs]
- 6—HOW $250 MAY RAISE $200,000
[For the man with a real opportunity]

If more than one book is desired add 10 cents additional for each extra book. Money refunded if not perfectly satisfactory. Each book conveys a MESSAGE. Each tells something NEW and VALUABLE.

The Business Development Co. of America

|   |   |   |   |   |   |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1 | 2 | 3 | 4 | 5 | 6 |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|

Founded 1901
119 NASSAU STREET
NEW YORK

December B-P

Read Below What Practical Business Men Say of These Books

"Booklets sent are fine and ideas O. K."—L. E. BAILEY, San Jose, Cal.

"Certainly 'Eye-Openers.'"—E. C. ELWOOD, Bridgeport, Conn.

"One of the best investments I have made for a long time."—LE GRANDE DUTCHER, Editor of "Profitable Publicity."

"Consider brochures of real value to me and worth many more times the price asked."—L. C. KELLOGG, Seattle, Wash.

"After carefully reading, I want to state that, if I could have had the information contained in 'How $250 Can Raise $200,000' I would have been saved several hundred dollars, much valuable time and been spared much humiliation. The idea is right. I paid hard cash and harder experience in proving it."—E. D. CRIBBS, Highland Park, Ill.

"How $250 May Raise $200,000' is the best article I ever remember seeing emanate from your establishment and 'HITS THE NAIL SQUARELY ON THE HEAD.' I have succeeded at last in promoting my mine, but could have saved about three years of the time out of the four it has taken, if the proper course had been pursued from the first, as laid down. The course finally pursued followed closely along lines laid down now by you, save differing in details. The method was very much the same.

"I think the very logical and convincing argument set forth in 'How $250 May Raise $200,000' would wake up a mummy one thousand years old, for EVERY WORD IS ABSOLUTELY TRUE."

Very truly yours,

MARK E. DAVIS, Oakland, Cal.

"I was very much interested in 'How $250 May Raise $200,000,' for the reason that it appears to hit the situation exactly. I have read nearly all your issues for the past two years, and much of your printed literature, but never saw anything that covers the situation so completely as does this article."—J. T. RYAN, American Tire Armor Co., 816 Pacific Building, San Francisco, Cal.

"The Business Development Company of America is the publisher of five little books which are the most unique and interesting publications in their way that The American Banker has ever had the pleasure of receiving. . . they contain a vast amount of information that will be of value to bankers, promoters and business men who are interested in building up their business.

"These books sell for ten cents a copy and are worth $10 a copy. We advise our readers to send for them." Editorial extract from The American Banker, March 5, 1910.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

There is No Royal Road to Wealth—But—Some Roads are Easier Than Others

I have helped thousands of men to succeed—and my definition of acquiring success is: "To make more money, in a more congenial occupation." If you will read this page, you will learn how to find and how you can make that way upward in the business world your own.

The way from wage-earning to business management

I have succeeded—others have succeeded with me—this is Success's invitation to you.

Disappointed ambition is the curse—fulfilled ambition the glory—of any man's life

The average man who succeeds in this world is the man who realizes he was not born to set the world on fire—but aims at a goal within his reach and keeps on with courage, persistence, and intelligently directed purpose until he gathers the sweet fruits of his labors.

Henry Clay, Daniel Webster and James G. Blaine died from disappointment of their thwarted ambitions to attain the Presidency. They aimed probably not too high, but with all their statesmanship they lacked the knowledge of how to achieve their purpose.

And how many men have died from disappointed commercial ambition simply because they did not know how to succeed is beyond the count of any earthly record.

But the number of successful, life-enjoying business men is growing every day. In the past, men have pursued and acquired academic knowledge—this is the day when men seek and acquire business knowledge through avenues such as I offer you. Will you profit by my experience?

I, W. A. Shryer, was a grown man earning $15 a week when I learned an easier way to make $15,000 a year

I found that many honest people neglect to pay their bills—but that they will pay them if their obligations are presented in a dignified, business-like, human-nature way.

That way is so easy that I can make it clear and easy for you—for any man with ambition

Merchants have their hands so full with the problems of buying and selling merchandise that they have no time to look after delinquent accounts.

This Coupon the First Step—Take It Now

W. A. SHRYER, President,

American Collection Service, 399 State St., Detroit, Mich.

Please send me full information, illustrated with photos, about how you and other men have succeeded in the Commercial Agency Business, starting without capital.

Name.....
Address.....

The men who, for various reasons, do not pay their bills, are just like any other class of men—a class of many types. And the knowledge of how to approach and handle each of these types is the specialized training that makes a successful, commercial agency manager.

You do not need capital to establish yourself in this business. You can begin in your spare time, just as I began.

The field is so full of business waiting to be handled that your earnings will supply you with all the capital you need for expansion. Every ambitious man who wants to establish himself in his own successful business should write to me at once. Mail the coupon.

W. A. SHRYER, President

American Collection Service, 399 State St., Detroit, Mich.

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

$1 Secures this Great Reference Book

An entirely new, up-to-date, down-to-the-minute Reference Book, for bookkeepers, cashiers, accountants and business men.

This magnificent volume weighs nearly six pounds; contains over 500 pages, 200,000 words and 700 illustrations of forms and tables; beautifully printed on fine paper; handsomely and strongly bound; produced and presented to the business world at a cost which brings it within the reach of all; easiest for reference, plainest for acquiring information, and most economical when compared with all other publications of like nature.

It is yours on payment of only $1.00

down and the balance in monthly installments of 50 cents or $1.00 as you prefer.

Monthly installment price, $4.00 per copy; introductory special cash price (less 10 per cent) only $3.60.

In either case the expressage is prepaid to your address in the United States and Canada.

E. H. Beach, Publisher, Detroit, Mich.

Send 25 cents for 12 months subscription to

Beach's Magazine of Business

A handsome monthly magazine for business men, bookkeepers, accountants, cashiers, credit men, stenographers, advertising managers, etc. The man "behind the desk" must have it. Splendid business stories. Your money back if you do not like it.

E. H. Beach, Publisher, 69 West Fort St., Detroit, Mich.

The International Business Correspondence Course

Special Instruction for Home Study in

Higher Accounting and Manufacturing Costs

For those who desire to qualify for Higher Positions and Higher Salaries as Chief Accountants, Cost Accountants, Auditors, etc.

The Course Comprises

The International Business Encyclopedia (described above); six lessons on Higher Accounting; six lessons on Factory Cost Accounting; twelve sets of Exercises to be worked out; twelve sets of Standard Answers, and the personal attention of the Board of Examiners.

THE COST

Special Terms Until October 1, 1910

This comprehensive, complete and fully effective Business Correspondence Course is offered at the temporary and very low introductory price of $10 cash, or $12 payable in easy installments of $2 down or $2 per month for five months. On and after October 1, 1910, the price will be $20 cash, or $24 on the installment plan.

E. H. BEACH, Publisher :: Detroit, Michigan

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

---

---

YOUR SUMMER HOME

SHORE ACRES SUBDIVISION, LAKE EARA

OF COURSE you want to own a summer home. There is something in you that calls for woods, meadows, cool waters, and broad, comfortable porches, when summer comes and brick walls and paving stones shimmer and quiver with the heat. You need rest and relaxation.

You may have to be in the city on business during the day. But you are refreshed and renewed by the evenings and the week-ends at your summer home.

And it makes you glad to know that wife and babies are away from the glare, the blare, and the dust, getting strong and rosy at your summer home.

No, this is not a millionaire's dream. That summer home is within your reach. And, if your business is in Chicago, it is only an hour's run from that city—you can come out every night. If further away, you can come Friday or Saturday and stay until Monday.

For your summer home, I have just opened a new sub-division on the shores of Lake Eara—the most beautiful of all the famous lakes of Northern Illinois. It is only thirty-five miles from Chicago—three railways run from it into the city.

There are a limited number of lots, all at reasonable prices—first come, first served. When you buy a lot, you buy fishing, swimming, and boating privileges on Lake Eara. There is no lake property so near Chicago at anything like the price.

My primary object in opening this sub-division is to finance the first building of Sheldon Commercial University.

I want these summer homes, as far as possible to be owned by Sheldon Graduates or those in sympathy with A R E A philosophy.

*Write me today, saying you are interested
and I will tell you all about it*

A. F. SHELDON

LIBERTYVILLE, ILLINOIS

SHELDON'S LAKE SHORE DRIVE, LAKE EARA

ORGANIZATION

Brief Synopsis
Part One

ADMINISTRATIVE and industrial organization; place of business engineer; plant arrangement; factory and office plans. Purchasing and stores department; catalog filing; requisitions; stores records. Advertising and sales organization; periodical, street car and outdoor advertising; mail order branch; salesmanship; follow-up systems. Credit organization; financial statements; credit information; collection letters; collection systems.

is the secret of successful business management; the executive of today gets results by combining organization and modern methods. The methods used by the managers of America's greatest enterprises are described in

Business Management

The principles of organization, and how to apply them

in large or small concerns; the functions of all departments, and how to conduct them to secure results; how to make use of every modern plan and system, is told in these volumes. Every practical plan that will reduce costs, increase efficiency, and give a firmer grasp of business is described and illustrated by examples taken from actual practice.

Brief Synopsis
Part Two

BILLING and order recording; condensed and unit billing; blanket invoices; department store billing. Shipping department; rates and routes; filling orders; export shipping; claims; retail deliveries. Correspondence and filing; form paragraphs; stenographic division; filing systems; indexing. Business statistics; sales costs; expense distribution; administrative costs; mailing cost; mailing room methods and machinery; checking the postage account.

---

Price, Delivered to You, $2.00
Per Volume, $4.00 for the Set

---

Taylor Book Store, Rockefeller, Illinois

Speed Up Your Sales

You, Mr. Sales Manager!

Do you want to put something into the hands of each one of your salesmen that will speed up his sales to record pace?

You, Mr. Salesman!

Do you want to get hold of something that will put you in the running for the top-notch prizes?

Here is the thing.

Mr. Albert E. Lyons, vice president of the Allen-Higgins Wall Paper Company, Worcester, Massachusetts, issued a series of letters to his salesmen last season. They helped to speed up sales in a way that made everyone concerned open his eyes. These letters were along Sheldon lines. Mr. Sheldon has seen and approved them—given them his hearty endorsement.

But the great point is that they actually did speed up sales.

Most important to you is the fact that you can get those letters to speed up your sales. They are now issued by us under the title

Speed Talks

This book isn't big—contains just thirty letters—but a few words written on the back of an envelope once gave a man an idea that helped him to speed up his sales one hundred per cent.

*That's the kind of ideas you'll find in this book.
It's yours for a dollar, postpaid.*

Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Illinois

A Real Christmas Gift!

The Backbone Monthly

THE magazine de luxe—for and about folks who are doing things worth while.

Edited by Tom Dreier. Nothing else would make a better gift for your friends. Nothing else would be appreciated half so much. For one year it's one dollar; for one copy it's one dime.

Special Christmas Offer—Send us one dollar and we will send to you, or to anyone else you say, The Backbone Monthly for one whole year, and as an appreciation, we will include a copy of the "Backbone Booklet"—a bouncer for the blues—without charge. The magazine can be sent to one address and the book to another, if you so desire, and we will forward notice that you are sending the book or magazine as a gift. You cannot find better gifts. Mail this coupon today! You may forget it later.

The Backbone Society
145 FOX STREET • AURORA, ILLINOIS

Here's a dollar; send The Backbone Monthly and "Backbone Booklet" as follows:

Send Magazine to _____

_____

Send Booklet to _____

_____

Name _____

Address _____

_____

S.P.—12-10

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Introductory Trial Offer

One Typewriter Ribbon Free

☞ Cut out this advertisement and send to us with $1.50, and we will send you postpaid, one box of 100 sheets "R. R." Carbon Paper, size 8 x 13, any color, and one "Silkeen" Typewriter Ribbon for any machine, single color, two or three color combination. ☞ "R. R." Carbon Paper sells at $1.50 per box, and "Silkeen" Ribbons at 75 cents each, $7.00 per dozen. The above introductory trial offer will be held open for a limited time only, and not more than one order sent to one individual or firm. ☞ "R. R." Carbon Papers and "Silkeen" Ribbons give universal satisfaction, and are guaranteed to give better and cleaner results and last longer than any other make.

CHAS. E. ARCHBALD, PRESIDENT

PEN-CARBON MANIFOLD CO.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.

Originators and Only Manufacturers of Non-Flake Carbon Paper for Typewriter, Pen, Pencil and Stylus

A Business Asset

The ability to speak and write English correctly is a business asset of no means importance. Yet how rare it is! You, Mr. Salesman or Mr. Business Man need this ability and it can easily be acquired. There is a fascinating way to

Polish Up Your English

It is by reading "Correct English—How to Use It," a monthly magazine for cultured people, devoted to the use of correct English. It will pay you to get in touch with this unique magazine, as it is the only one of its kind. Read carefully this

Partial List of Contents—Shall and Will; Should and Would; How to Use Them; Correct English in the Home; Correct English in the School; What to Say and What Not to Say; Course in Grammar; Letter Writing and Punctuation; Business English for the Business Man; Compound Words; How to Write Them; Studies in English Literature

The subscription price is only $1.00 a year, but if you prefer to see a copy before subscribing—

Send Only 10 Cents

for a copy of the current issue. You will never regret it. So if you are interested in your own welfare, do this now before you turn another page. But better still, use the Coupon TO-DAY.

Correct English Publishing Company ... 212 Monroe Street, Chicago, Illinois

----- CUT OFF HERE -----

CORRECT ENGLISH PUBLISHING COMPANY, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

Name.....

Local Address.....

Postoffice..... State.....

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Salesmen Positions Now Open—

D ID you ever stop to consider that it requires special training, experience and proper methods scientifically applied, to find the best positions, for exactly the same reason that special study is necessary to accomplish the best results in any other line.

¶ Of course, a capable man can always keep himself employed but he cannot possibly have all the facilities necessary to learn of every opportunity to better his income. You may even know all the firms in your line. They may know of you. But that is useless if you lack the knowledge of when their changes or increases in force are likely to be made. Besides, your present position must be jeopardized by too strenuous efforts on your own part to keep in touch with other opportunities.

¶ Let us do the work for you. Twenty thousand employers use our service to secure capable men for Sales, Executive, Technical and Clerical positions paying $600 to $10,000 per annum. Hundreds of the finest opportunities are referred to us daily.

¶ Write our nearest office today for booklet, "Salaried Positions," which explains our entire system and facilities. Mention briefly your qualifications.

---

Business Service Company

1214 Commonwealth Building .. Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

805 Singer Bldg.....New York      818 Chemical Bldg.....St. Louis

508 Park Bldg.....Pittsburgh      305 Loan & Trust Bldg., Minneapolis

1016 Hartford Bldg.....Chicago      Foreign Correspondents

"Worth $1,000"

Prosperity Through Thought Force

BRUCE MACLELLAND

I Want to Succeed!

I Want to Succeed!

I Want to Succeed!

The Cries are Everywhere. Here is a Solution That Has Solved it for Hundreds

BRUCE MACLELLAND really lived the philosophy of the book. He climbed from a $100 a month position to a business of his own, earning a modest fortune—all in three years' time. Then he decided to let others know how he used thought force in business and A THRILLING, powerful, practical success book is the result. No pet theories—no advice excepting as the entire book is sound reason of a man who has done and tells you how to do the same. After you read it, you will see how health, wealth and happiness can be made of troubles—and you will want your best friends to READ IT and see how new thought transforms life from drudgery and poverty to joy and opulence. The tale is a simple one, the methods are easily understood and followed.

ELLA WHEELER WILCOX devoted nearly a page in the New York American to "Prosperity Through Thought Force." "Every word is true," she said. "Every word has been proven true by hundreds of people living today."

Mrs. Frank Beach, of Fort Collins, Col., writes: "I have ordered MacLelland's 'Prosperity Through Thought Force' for my husband for Christmas. He says it has already been worth $1,000 to him. He has read it through three times and reads at least one paragraph from it each day."

PARTIAL SYNOPSIS

How the "Idea" was Born—From Debt to Modest Fortune in Less Than Three Years—The Kind of Men Who Succeed—Why the Others Fail—Where the Mental Forces Come In—The Condition of the Mind Attracts All Things—How Mind Attracts Success—The Law of Vibration and How It Works—Personality—Auto-Suggestion—How to Use It—How to Do Things Without Faith—When the Author Blacked Boots—Thirty Years Lost by Talking—The One Thing that Can Hinder You—Mind and Body—Passions—Aura—Subconscious Mind the Magnet—Will, Affection, Emotion, Divisions of Love—When Others Avoid or Mistreat You—To Make the Right Kind of Friends—Attraction, What It Does and How to Use It—Etc., Etc.

Here are two sample comments showing what readers think of this book:

"I have a copy of 'Prosperity Through Thought Force.' It is the best and most practical instruction on the subject that I have read—and I have read many."—OLIVER BOWERS, Birmingham, Alabama.

"I have just received and read 'Prosperity Through Thought Force,' by Bruce MacLelland, and I think so highly of it that I enclose $1.00 for another copy to lend. It is so plainly and naturally expressed that I believe it will help anyone who reads it to embrace and practice that higher life."—EMMA E. CARR, Lawrence, Massachusetts.

"Prosperity Through Thought Force" is a beautiful volume, 16 pages, printed on antique laid paper, artistic initial letters for chapter heads, handsome title page, half-tone of the author, all bound in finest silk cloth in a new shade of mauve.

ELLA WHEELER WILCOX will introduce you to new thought by her little booklet, "What I Know About New Thought." We will include this FREE in our special offer to Business Philosophers.

OUR SPECIAL OFFER (New Subscribers Only)

The Nautilus Magazine, Twelve Months in Advance
A Copy of "What I Know About New Thought"
A Copy of "Prosperity Through Thought Force"

$1

ALL FOR $1

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

THE NAUTILUS

Is the leading magazine of the new thought and mental healing movement. Thousands of its readers have been helped by it to health, prosperity, and happier condition of mind. The editorials by Elizabeth Towne are said to have the largest following of any woman's writings in America. The Nautilus is not a story book though it contains splendid stories—all designed to help you help yourself.

Ella Wheeler Wilcox, Edwin Markham, Florence Morse Kingsley, Emma Bell Miles, Edgar L. Larkin, Sinclair Lewis, Thomas Dreier, Wallace D. Wattles and many others are contributors.

"As a Grain of Mustard Seed," a great serial by Wallace D. Wattles is just beginning—a problem story of real life, unique in plot, wit and wisdom.

The November Nautilus is the special Dramatic Number. Contains articles by some of the most famous dramatists and actors in America, with many new portraits. George C. Tyler, managing director for Liebler & Co., tells why he produces new thought plays and how they affect the actors.

Among special new thought articles in same number are: "Habit of Faith and Courage," Adelaide Keen; "Teaching Without Friction," "Constructive Living," "Your Selection," by Fred G. Kaessman; and several practical editorials. New poems by Ella Wheeler Wilcox and others.

Get it at the news stand and see how new thought is regenerating every art and trade. Or better still, take advantage of this offer and begin new thought ways by doing it NOW!

ELIZABETH TOWNE, Holyoke, Mass., Dept. 108.
Enclosed is One Dollar. Please enter my subscription for The Nautilus for one year and send me as a premium a copy of "Prosperity Through Thought Force," and a copy of "What I Know About New Thought."

Name .....
Address .....
Town .....

Wanted Just a Few More Real Men

MEN who believe in, and love, progress—men who are not slaves to precedent and prejudice—fellows full of grit and determination—strictly Twentieth Century—earnest—enthusiastic workers—are scarce.

MEN with hearts—and souls—and feeling for their fellowmen—men who will pitch in and help overthrow a great wrong—and wipe a blot from civilization—these are the kind of men we want.

YOU see we have a mighty mission to perform. There are a lot of bright, shining stars in our ranks now—but we still need—just a few more.

YOU could not even dream of a business or proposition as great and as glorious as this one—grand and noble in every sense of the word—brand-new and wholly non-competitive—it is, in addition, a most fascinating and lucrative field.

NOT only the lifelong gratitude of their fellow beings but—$50 Weekly to $21,500 in 22 Months is the well-deserved reward our managers are earning. There are men who are soon going to break this record—are you one?

ONE of our fellows—who, by the way, is not yet 30 years old and has been with us only a little over a year—has cleared over $12,000 since Jan. 1st. Entirely out of the profits of this business he has bought a home and an automobile—and yet his progress is merely typical of many more.

I TELL you a proposition has got to have real—genuine—merit—of a high order behind it to make such success possible.

THE man simply does not live who is too big for this work. An opportunity like this comes but once in a lifetime. Naturally—it will not be open long.

DO you want to be among the lucky ones? Do you want to reap your share of the golden harvest? Can this great cause count on you? If so—don't waste a minute—but say the word—today.

THE OXYGENATOR CO.

Over 200 Branches in America alone.

108-110 Pearl Street, BUFFALO, N. Y., U. S. A.

CALL at our nearest office and get acquainted—or, better, come and see us here—we will show you some of the amazing things we are doing in this country,—and an export department second to none in America—having a staff of native Spanish, Portuguese, German, French and Italian Attaches.

WHEN IN DETROIT STOP AT HOTEL TULLER

New and Absolutely
Fireproof

Cor. Adams Ave.
and Park St.

In the center of the Theatre, Shopping
and Business
District.

Has large Convention Hall.

Has grand Roof
Garden Cafe.

Music from 6 P. M.
to 12:30 A. M.

Every Room has Private Bath

EUROPEAN PLAN

RATES: $1.50 PER DAY AND UP

L. W. TULLER - - Proprietor

$2,000 to $3,000 a Year in Vacuum Cleaning Business

A STEADY, sure, permanent income of from $2,000 to $3,000 a year is easily and quickly established in cities from 5,000 up, with the Aero Vacuum Cleaning Power Wagon. Running expenses are small and profits remarkably big. Safer, more profitable than any other line of staple investment. Makes money from the day wagon arrives. $1,000 starts you. The Aero Power Wagons are standard—established by years of test. The only apparatus of enough power to do effective commercial cleaning. Send for wagon catalog.

Largest builders in the world of Built-into-the-house Vacuum Cleaning Systems. Send for "Stationary Plant" catalog, stating kind and size of building.

American Air Cleaning Company
268 Sycamore Street, Milwaukee, Wisconsin

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Ginger Talks

235 PAGES—15 FULL PAGE CARTOONS

Sales of Two Millions a Month

The Course in Salesmanship that Built Them for the National Cash Register Company

YOURS FOR TWO DOLLARS

THINK of a course in practical salesmanship, written straight out of the heart of the greatest selling organization in the world, by a Director of that organization; a course that does not merely describe the selling system of this colossal concern—but IS THAT ACTUAL SYSTEM ITSELF—the word for word Ginger Talks of that world famous company to its 1,000 salesmen—the verbatim coaching, the exact specific instruction, the very selling pointers and arguments and inspiration and enthusiasm that built up, through those 1,000 red-blooded salesmen, a business of over two million dollars a month in monthly sales.

The Pabst Co. bought it for its 1800 Salesmen.

The Quaker Oats Company invested $450 in it.

1682 other giant concerns have taken it for their entire sales forces, many taking from 100 to 1000 Each.

Ask us to send you a list six feet long of these concerns which employ nearly 50,000 salesmen

GINGER TALKS are a complete text-book of instruction and pointers on the art of selling goods. They simplify the whole of practical salesmanship; make clear with wonderful illustrations and exact explanations how to make approaches, how to secure attention, how to create desire, how to stimulate to immediate action and walk out with the order. They tell the salesman how to turn enmity into friendship, cold indifference into eager interest, casual inquiries into actual buyers, actual buyers into permanent customers. They touch on a thousand salesmen's difficulties and perplexities and show a way out of each one.

GINGER TALKS is the only business book ever written that is as brilliant and fascinating in style and has the same human interest as George Ade's "Fables in Slang," Billy Baxter's "Letters," or Mr. Dooley's famous conversations with his friend Hennessy. The sentences are crowded with epigrams, sharpened with penetrating wit, lighted up with humor, and made fairly alive with the tones of a masterful personality. It is this wonderful combination of solid instruction and brilliant expression—"beef-steak nutriment and champagne style" that has brought Ginger Talks their tremendous sales.

SEND YOUR GINGER

SHELDON UNIVERSITY PRESS, Libertyville, Illinois.

I am enclosing Two Dollars. Send me a copy of Holman's "Ginger Talks."

Name.....

Address..... State.....

You can enclose $3.50 and receive a copy of Ginger Talks and The Business Philosopher for one year

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

A Desirable Christmas Gift

Depend on this convenient, useful, gentleman's memo book to keep your dates, figures, names, memos, etc., in better, neater style.

Bennett Everlasting Memorandum Book

—leather cover, 3.4 x 8 inches, pocket for cards removable pads—the most convenient. Price complete with your name stamped in gold on the cover and four inside pads, only. . . . $1.00

Send no money Simply send us your name and we will forward the book with your name printed. If satisfied, send us our $1.00. If not, return the book. Send today.

W. W. BENNETT CO.
Box 146, East End Pittsburgh, Penn.

EASY—VOLUMES

These Binders
Sell Themselves

$5

No free catalogs. We can't incur any additional expense in selling these volumes—the price is too low. Once this binder finds its way to your desk you will use no other. Your friends will also want them.

The Size of this outfit is 11x11x1½—containing 200 leaves, 10½x10½, 400 pages of fine quality ledger paper, ruled and printed; with an alphabetical index, letters embossed in gold on extension leather tags, reinforced with linen to extra strong index paper. Bound in a manner that if you should use it hard enough to wear away the leather, you will still have a good and strong canvas binding which will not wear out for a lifetime. No posts or knobs to mar your desk. It can be adjusted to hold from 100 to 1000 leaves or more.

Send five dollars ($5.00) at our risk, mention this ad. and we will send this complete Standard Ledger outfit (equal to $15 or $18 outfits) immediately. If you are not more than satisfied send it back and we will refund your money.

F. N. Volkert & Co., 87 Fifth Ave., Chicago

ONE DOLLAR BRINGS YOU

"The Rational Life"

By WILL J. ERWOOD

☛ The latest word on: Love—Marriage—Divorce; The Sex Question; Social Evils; The Rational Life; The Conquest of Self, etc. It is as fascinating as a romance. It is live thought on live issues.

It is written for you . EVERYMAN!
And for you . . . EVERYWOMAN!

☛ And you too, mother and father, it has ideals for you! Send for it! Read it together! It will help to make "Home, Sweet Home!"

☛ Finely bound, cloth and gold, about 200 pages; just from the press. Postpaid, only One Dollar.

Address: WILL J. ERWOOD
Dept. B. 717 East 22nd Street, Baltimore, Md.

It Pays to Buy Your Goods From a Reliable House

Read What our Customer says
in Regard to Our Carbon Paper

"We have found the Carbon Paper which we have secured from you people to be the most satisfactory of any carbon that we have secured from any other firms, and we have bought Carbon from at least four other dealers since we got the last from you.

"We need some Carbon now and we enclose herewith check for $2.00 which we believe is the price we paid you for one hundred sheets heretofore. On an old box which we have in the office which we secured from you is printed; "100 Sheets Durable Typewriter Paper, $2.00 a Box."

How is That for a Boost?

Don't you want to try a box of this good grade carbon? If so, send $2.00 along to the

National Office Supply Company
ZION CITY, ILLINOIS

"The Square Deal House" who will promptly fill your order.

We carry two kinds; "Favorite," the high-grade, light weight carbon for manifolding, $3.00 a box. Also, our "Durable" carbon at $2.00 a box per hundred sheets.

Agents wanted to carry our up-to-date line of office supplies
ALL GOODS GUARANTEED. SEND FOR CATALOG

Embossed Business Stationery

Printed from Steel Dies
Send for Samples

*Engraved
Cards*

We engrave a one-line plate and furnish 100 engraved cards, postpaid. Engraved in script, $1.25; block, $1.50; solid Roman, old English or French script, $1.75; shaded old English or block, $2.00; shaded Roman or French script, $2.25. Cash to be sent with order. Best stock used. Monogram stationery. Wedding and business announcements.

The American Embossing Co.
192-69 SENECA STREET, BUFFALO, N. Y.

PRACTICAL BUSINESS BOOKS!

Examine the List—Select Those That Will
Help You—Mail Your Order Today

Authorized American Edition of DICKSEE'S AUDITING

Revised and Enlarged
By Robert H. Montgomery, C. P. A.

The acknowledged authority in both England and America on all subjects connected with auditing. The present edition retains all the valuable matter of the first edition, revised and brought up to date, and in addition over 200 pages of entirely new matter. The subject treatment is (1) Auditing—Up to the Trial Balance; (2) Methods of Account; (3) Special Considerations in Different Classes of Audit; (4) Auditing—From Trial Balance to Balance Sheet; (5) Forms of Account and Balance Sheets; (6) What Are Profits? (7) The Attitude of the Auditor; (8) The Liabilities of Auditors; (9) Investigations; (10) Interest; (11) Professional Ethics; (12) C. P. A. Examination Questions. Contains 100 pages of model forms of Balance Sheets, Income and Profit and Loss Accounts, etc., etc. 6 x 9, 586 pages. 1909. Durable cloth, gold stamped. $5.00 delivered.

CORPORATE FINANCE and ACCOUNTING

By H. C. Bentley, C. P. A.

Every corporation treasurer and accountant should possess this book. It is a complete working manual covering the daily duties of these officials. In six parts, as follows: (1) The corporation treasurer, his legal status, the requirements of his office, his duties, powers and liabilities, his relation to corporate affairs in general, his bonding; (2) An extended exposition of the methods and forms for practical corporate accounting, describing the various forms of books and entries; (3) Corporate finances, including funds in general, bank deposits, checks and dividends; (4) Negotiable instruments, their nature and requisites, their general and special liabilities, their collection; (5) Corporate securities; (6) 44 model legal forms for signatures, checks, receipts, resolutions and certifications. 6 x 9. Buckram. 500 pp. $4.00 delivered.

A Manual of CORPORATE MANAGEMENT

By Thos. Conynghon of the N. Y. Bar

No corporation official can really afford to be without this book. It can be found immediately a clear, accurate, non-technical answer to any question concerning the legal side of corporate management. Tells the purposes, scope, and uses of the Charter and By-Laws: the rights, duties, powers and liabilities of Officers, Directors, and Stockholders under all circumstances; explains fully the issuance, sale, record and transfer of stock; tells how to conduct meetings; how to keep all books of record; and discusses such important matters as Committees, Dividends, Consolidations, Re-organization, etc. A safe guide in any state. Contains also over 200 model legal forms, covering practically every matter in corporation work requiring a form. Third Edition. 1909. 6 x 9. Buckram binding. $3.50 delivered.

CONDITIONAL SALES

By F. B. Haring of the Buffalo Bar

No concern which makes credit sales should be without this book. It states clearly the requirements for a valid contract of conditional sale in every state of the Union, whereby title to goods sold is retained in the vendor until payment has been made. This information is arranged under uniform headings giving Legal Status of Contracts, how to execute them, acknowledgment or proof required, recording or filing necessary, recording fee, renewals, discharge, Landlord's lien, criminal liability of vendee, action for money judgment, claim on fixtures, when vendor or vendee loses, etc. Approved forms of contracts, acknowledgements, etc. Used as a guide by hundreds of the largest concerns in the country. "Send us another copy," say Lyon & Healy, Chicago. 6 x 9. Buckram. 1909. $5.00 delivered.

A Manual of CORPORATE ORGANIZATION

By Thos. Conynghon of the N. Y. Bar

Explains clearly and in detail every step necessary for the organization and incorporation of a new company or the reorganization of an old one. Describes ends sought by incorporation: stock subscription lists and contracts; tells where to incorporate and the expense; detailed explanation of capitalization and the stock system and the status of stockholders; describes the nature and functions of the Charter and By-laws; tells how to conduct meetings; how to elect officers and directors, and defines their duties, powers and liabilities; full information for the protection of minority interests, protection of an inventor, underwriting, promoters, etc., etc. Accurate, authoritative, up-to-date, and entirely free from legal technicalities. Second Ed. 1908. 6 x 9. Buckram. $3.00 delivered.

FINANCING an ENTERPRISE

By Francis Cooper

A practical two-volume work telling how to secure capital and successfully promote a business enterprise of any kind. Vol. I describes conditions necessary for successful financing; tells how to investigate, protect, and capitalize an enterprise, discusses experimental work and model making. Vol. II tells best methods for securing money, privately, or publicly, by advertising; how to write a prospectus. Important chapters on stocks, bonds, incorporation, underwriting, etc. Written from 15 years' promoting experience. Only reliable work on the subject. Third edition. 1909. 543 pp. Buckram. Both vols. $4.00 delivered. Either vol. singly $2.00 delivered.

Complete Descriptive Circular of Any Book on Request

THE RONALD PRESS COMPANY

Publishers of Business Books, and of
THE BUSINESS WORLD, a magazine of Practical Business

Rooms 14-20
229 Broadway, New York

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

Increase Your A•R•E•A

The following books are recommended by The Sheldon School for home reading and can be purchased from The Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Illinois.

|                                                                            |         |
|----------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------|
| Art of Writing and Speaking the English Language; 4 Vols.....              | $ 2.00 |
| As a Man Thinketh. Paper, 15 cents; cloth, 50 cents.....                   | 2.50    |
| A. B. Z. of Our Own Nutrition.....                                         | 1.00    |
| American Commonwealth.....                                                 | 1.75    |
| Art of Living Long.....                                                    | 1.50    |
| Art of Living in Good Health.....                                          | 1.35    |
| Art of Science of Advertising.....                                         | 2.00    |
| Art of Thinking.....                                                       | 1.00    |
| Adam Bede.....                                                             | 1.00    |
| As a Matter of Course.....                                                 | 1.00    |
| Auto Suggestion.....                                                       | 1.00    |
| Backbone, Ribbon-tied, Art Binding, 50 cents; Limp Leather, [de luxe]..... | 1.00    |
| Boy Wanted.....                                                            | 1.25    |
| Back in Harness.....                                                       | .50     |
| Brain Power Manual.....                                                    | 2.00    |
| Brain and Personality.....                                                 | 1.30    |
| Browning's Poems.....                                                      | .60     |
| Bryant's Poems.....                                                        | .75     |
| Business Law.....                                                          | 1.00    |
| Business Power.....                                                        |         |
| Business Short Cuts.....                                                   | 1.00    |
| Caxton Brochures.....                                                      | .14     |
| A Certain Rich Man.....                                                    | 1.50    |
| Character.....                                                             | 1.09    |
| Character Reader Vaughts.....                                              | 1.00    |
| Character Reader Symes.....                                                | .50     |
| The Clerk's Book.....                                                      | .25     |
| Common Sense of the Exact Sciences.....                                    | 1.50    |
| Corporate Management.....                                                  | 3.00    |
| Compendium of All Card Systems.....                                        | 3.00    |
| Corporate Organization.....                                                | 3.00    |
| Correspondence Course.....                                                 | 15.00   |
| Cosmic Consciousness.....                                                  | 4.00    |
| Creative Imagination.....                                                  | 1.75    |
| Credit and its Uses.....                                                   | 1.50    |
| The Crisis.....                                                            | 1.50    |
| David Copperfield.....                                                     | 1.00    |
| David Harum.....                                                           | 1.50    |
| Darrow's Farmington.....                                                   | 1.50    |
| Deserted Village.....                                                      | .50     |
| Dictionary of English Synonyms.....                                        | 2.00    |
| Dictionary of Philosophy and Psychology.....                               | 16.00   |
| Dictionary of Philosophy.....                                              | 10.00   |
| Diseases of the Will.....                                                  | .75     |
| The Doors of Life.....                                                     | 1.00    |
| The Dore Lectures.....                                                     |         |
| Duty.....                                                                  | 1.00    |
| Elementary Lessons in Electricity and Magnetism.....                       | 1.40    |
| Education of the Will.....                                                 | 1.50    |

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

|                                                                         |      |
|-------------------------------------------------------------------------|------|
| Elegy in a Country Churchyard.....                                      | .75  |
| Empire of Business.....                                                 | 3.00 |
| Emerson's Poems.....                                                    | .60  |
| Essay on the Creative Imagination.....                                  | 1.75 |
| Essentials of Elocution.....                                            | 1.25 |
| Everyman Magazine.....                                                  | 1.00 |
| Everyman a King.....                                                    | 1.00 |
| Evolution of General Ideas.....                                         | 1.25 |
| Evolution of the Soul.....                                              | 1.50 |
| Fiction .....                                                           | 1.50 |
| Financial Advertising.....                                              | 5.00 |
| Financing an Enterprise.....                                            | 4.00 |
| First Lessons in Finance.....                                           | 1.25 |
| Food and Dietetics.....                                                 | 3.00 |
| Form Paragraph Letter Writer.....                                       | 3.00 |
| Franklin's Biography.....                                               | 1.50 |
| Freedom of Life.....                                                    | 1.00 |
| Funds and Their Uses.....                                               | 1.25 |
| Ginger Talks.....                                                       | 2.00 |
| Good English Form Book.....                                             | 1.00 |
| God's Good Man.....                                                     | 1.50 |
| Grant .....                                                             | .75  |
| Hamlet .....                                                            | .25  |
| Hand Book of Oratory.....                                               | 3.50 |
| Happiness as Found in Forethought.....                                  | 1.00 |
| Harmonics of Evolution.....                                             | 2.00 |
| He Can, Who Thinks He Can.....                                          | 1.00 |
| Help Essays .....                                                       | .40  |
| History and Power of Mind.....                                          | 2.00 |
| History of Sculpture.....                                               | 1.50 |
| History of Architecture.....                                            | 2.00 |
| History of Modern Banks.....                                            | 4.00 |
| History of Paintings.....                                               | 1.50 |
| History of United States.....                                           | 1.00 |
| Homer's Illiad .....                                                    | 1.00 |
| Homer's Odyssey.....                                                    | 1.00 |
| House of Seven Gables.....                                              | 1.00 |
| How to Advertise a Retail Store.....                                    | 3.50 |
| How to Become Quick at Figures.....                                     | 1.00 |
| How to Develop Power and Personality.....                               | 1.25 |
| How to do Business as Business is Done in Great Commercial Centers..... | 1.00 |
| How to do Business by Letter.....                                       | 1.00 |
| How to Get Strong.....                                                  | 1.00 |
| How to Grow Success.....                                                | .50  |
| How They Succeeded.....                                                 | 1.50 |
| Huckleberry Finn .....                                                  | 1.75 |
| Human Culture.....                                                      | 1.20 |
| Human Nature Explained.....                                             | 1.00 |
| Humanism .....                                                          | 2.75 |
| Influence of Mind.....                                                  | .75  |
| Inspired Millionaires.....                                              | 1.25 |
| An Introductory Logic.....                                              | 1.10 |
| In Tune With the Infinite.....                                          | 1.25 |
| Jiu Jitsu.....                                                          | 1.00 |
| John Martin's Clerks.....                                               | .25  |
| Julius Cæsar.....                                                       | .20  |
| Lady of the Lake.....                                                   | 2.00 |
| Law of Mental Medicine.....                                             | 1.00 |
| Law of Psychic Phenomena.....                                           | 1.50 |
| Law of Suggestion.....                                                  | .75  |
| The Leopard's Spots.....                                                | .75  |
| Les Misérables.....                                                     | 1.00 |

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

|                                                                          |       |
|--------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------|
| Letters From a Baseball Fan to His Son, Art Binding.....                 | .50   |
| Letters of a Self Made Merchant to His Son.....                          |       |
| Abraham Lincoln.....                                                     | .75   |
| Lincoln and Other Poems.....                                             | 1.00  |
| Lippincott's Reader's Reference.....                                     | 39.00 |
| Longfellow's Poems.....                                                  | 1.00  |
| The Making of the Great West.....                                        | 1.50  |
| Making of a Man.....                                                     | 1.25  |
| Making of a Merchant.....                                                | 1.50  |
| Making the Man Who Can.....                                              | .50   |
| Man Limitless.....                                                       | 1.25  |
| Manufacturing Costs.....                                                 | 2.00  |
| Man With the Hoe and Other Poems.....                                    | 1.00  |
| Marble Faun.....                                                         | 1.50  |
| Measure of Man.....                                                      | 1.20  |
| Memory Culture.....                                                      | 1.00  |
| Merchant of Venice.....                                                  | .20   |
| Mind's Attainment.....                                                   | 2.00  |
| Mind Power and Privileges.....                                           | 1.50  |
| Mind Training and Concentration.....                                     | 2.00  |
| Modern Advertising.....                                                  | 1.62  |
| Modern Bank.....                                                         | 1.50  |
| Modern Corporation.....                                                  | 2.00  |
| My Lady Beautiful.....                                                   | 1.10  |
| Mental Addition Simplified.....                                          | .50   |
| My Little Book of Prayer.....                                            | .50   |
| New Glutton and Epicure.....                                             | 1.00  |
| New Man and the 20th Century Problem.....                                | .25   |
| New Menticulture.....                                                    | 1.00  |
| Next Step in Evolution.....                                              | .50   |
| Ol' Doc Lint and Other Poems, Art Cloth, $1.00; Leather, [de luxe]..... | 2.00  |
| Optimism.....                                                            | .75   |
| Organic Evolution.....                                                   | 2.00  |
| Othello.....                                                             | .56   |
| Other Wise Men.....                                                      | .80   |
| Outline of Cosmic Philosophy.....                                        | 8.00  |
| Our Invisible Supply.....                                                | 2.00  |
| Partnership Relations.....                                               | 2.00  |
| Perfect Health.....                                                      | 1.00  |
| Paths to Powers.....                                                     | 1.00  |
| Physiology of the Senses.....                                            | 1.50  |
| Plutarch's Lives.....                                                    | 1.50  |
| Politics for Young Americans.....                                        | .75   |
| Power of Success.....                                                    | 10.00 |
| Power Thru Repose.....                                                   | 1.00  |
| Power of Will.....                                                       | 3.18  |
| Practical Journalism.....                                                | 1.25  |
| Primer of Logic.....                                                     | .50   |
| Principles of the Mail Order Business.....                               | 1.00  |
| The Promoters.....                                                       | .75   |
| Psychological Principals of Education.....                               | 1.75  |
| Prosperity Thru Thot Force.....                                          | 1.00  |
| Psychology of Attention.....                                             | .75   |
| Psychology of Advertising.....                                           | 2.00  |
| Psychic Treatment.....                                                   | 3.00  |
| Psychology.....                                                          | 1.60  |
| Psychology of the Emotions.....                                          | 1.50  |
| Psychological Principles of Education.....                               | 1.75  |

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER

|                                                          |      |
|----------------------------------------------------------|------|
| Psychology of Public Speaking.....                       | 1.25 |
| Psychology of Suggestion.....                            | 1.75 |
| Great Psychological Crime.....                           | 2.00 |
| Pushing Your Business.....                               | 1.00 |
| Riley's Poems.....                                       |      |
| Romeo and Juliet.....                                    | .56  |
| Rules of Order.....                                      | .75  |
| Right and Wrong Thinking.....                            | 1.50 |
| Ropp's Commercial Calculator.....                        | 1.00 |
| Sales Plans.....                                         | 2.50 |
| Sales Promotion.....                                     | 1.00 |
| Scarlet Letter.....                                      | 1.00 |
| Science of Organization.....                             | 3.00 |
| Six Hundred Talking Points; 2 Vols.....                  | 4.00 |
| Scientific Living.....                                   |      |
| Scott's Poems.....                                       | 1.75 |
| Self Culture.....                                        | 1.00 |
| Self Help.....                                           | 1.00 |
| Soul of Man.....                                         | 1.50 |
| Story of Creation.....                                   | 1.25 |
| The Steam Engine.....                                    | 3.75 |
| The Story of Creation.....                               | 1.25 |
| The Story of Electricity.....                            | .35  |
| Story of a Grain of Wheat.....                           | 1.00 |
| Story of The Mind.....                                   | .35  |
| Story of a Piece of Coal.....                            | .35  |
| Success in Letter Writing.....                           | 1.00 |
| Successful Agent.....                                    | 2.00 |
| 100,000 Synonyms and Antonyms.....                       | 1.00 |
| Talks by the Old Storekeeper.....                        | .50  |
| Talks on Writing English.....                            | 1.50 |
| Talks on Writing English.....                            | 1.30 |
| The Great Work.....                                      | 2.00 |
| The Tempest.....                                         | .56  |
| Thot Force.....                                          | 1.00 |
| Thought Vibration.....                                   | 1.00 |
| Thoughts on Business.....                                | 1.25 |
| Thusnelda.....                                           | .75  |
| Tennyson's Poems.....                                    | .60  |
| That Last Waif.....                                      | 1.00 |
| Theory of Advertising.....                               | 2.00 |
| The Theory of Business Enterprise.....                   | 1.50 |
| Transaction of Business.....                             | 1.00 |
| Treasures of Truth, Art Boards, 75 cents; [de luxe]..... | 1.00 |
| 20th Century Dictionary.....                             |      |
| Uncooked Foods.....                                      | 1.00 |
| Unwritten Meanings of Words.....                         | 2.00 |
| Washington, George.....                                  | .75  |
| Whittier Poems.....                                      | 1.50 |
| Works and Days.....                                      | 1.25 |
| Wood Study.....                                          | .50  |
| Words, Their Use and Abuse.....                          | 2.00 |
| Wordsworth's Poems.....                                  | 1.75 |
| Worth While Series.....                                  | .35  |
| The Young Man's Affairs.....                             | 1.00 |
| The Young Man and the World.....                         | 1.62 |

SAY—"I SAW IT IN THE BUSINESS PHILOSOPHER"

If These Men Know it, Don't ? You Want to Know it Too .... !

PROF. FLOURNOY, of the University of Geneva, Switzerland, says of it: "We have nothing so well done in French."

PROF. RICHET, of Paris, France—"I have read it with the keenest interest."

PROF. MAX DESSOIR, of Berlin, Germany—"I was especially pleased with its sound, original ideas."

PROF. SCHILLER, of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, England—"I was particularly pleased with this book."

DR. VAN EEDEN, Amsterdam, Holland—"The sort of a book I considered absolutely necessary for the enlightenment of the public on this important subject."

PROF. BARRETT, of the Royal College of Sciences for Ireland—"I trust this work will really have the wide circulation it deserves."

SIR WILLIAM CROOKES, F. R. S., of London—"This book should be read with the utmost interest and care."

DR. I. K. FUNK, of Funk and Wagnalls, New York—"A strong book on a most vital subject."

MORTON C. PRINCE, M. D., of Boston—"I am sure it is destined to do a great deal of good."

HON. LYMAN J. GAGE, banker, ex-secretary of the U. S. treasury—"It has made good its purpose, which cannot be said of all books."

PROF. ELMER GATES, of Washington, D. C.—"It is the best simple statement of the subject extant."

REV. SAMUEL FALLOWS, D. D., LL. D., Presiding Bishop Episcopal Church, Chicago—"Practical, reliable, and has rendered a great service to the world."

REV. NEWELL DWIGHT HILLIS, D. D., Brooklyn, N. Y.—"Fills a real want. All persons will find it most suggestive and helpful."

REV. H. W. THOMAS, D. D., Ph. D., Chicago—"It reaches the heights of a singular power over its readers. There is certainly coming, and very near, a new birth of life."

ELBERT HUBBARD, East Aurora, N. Y.—"It shows a sure insight into the heart of things that is bound to make the world better."

What Are They Talking About?

About a New Book by Dr. Stanley
LeFevre Krebs entitled

"The Law of Suggestion"

If you wish we can get a copy for you, cloth-bound, post-paid,
for 75 cents. (Stamps, check or money-order.)

Sheldon University Press, Libertyville, Illinois

In moments of supreme test,
remember that what others dare, you can dare. —Sheldon